To the

MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY

OF

HENRIETTE-MARIA,

QUEEN OF GREAT BRITTAIN.

A COURT adorned with virtue, and ſanctified with pietie, is here, moſt EXCELLENT QUEEN, to your view preſented; which having once already in pure and Native colours received light and life from the bright eye of your Royal BROTHER, would gladly at this time, in a harſher language and ruder garment, adventure your gracious acceptance.

The ſubject is ſerious, the diſcourſe uſefull, and proper for thoſe, who in Court ſo ſerve Princes, that they neglect not an humble acknowledgement to a more tranſcendent Greatneſs.

It hath pleaſed GOD, as a ſingular favour to this Kingdom, to affoard us in your MAJESTIE a pious Queen, who exemplarly maketh good, what diffuſedly is here handled. Let then leſſer lights borrow beams of radiance, from your greater Orbs; and perſiſt You, Glorious Example of virtue, to illuminate and heat our Northern Clime with celeſtiall ardours. Adde to earthly Crowns, heavenly Diadems of Piety.

Here

Here ſhall a Holy Court be found fairly delineated; nor can I ſee how it will be in the power of perſons of beſt eminence, to plead ignorance, and pretend inability; they having ſuch a Book to direct them, and ſuch a Queen to follow.

Lead then with alacritie, moſt Sacred Majestie, and may propitious Heaven ſo proſper your holy deſires, that the Greateſt may have matter to imitate, and the whole Nation to admire.

TO

SIR,

THis Treatiſe of the Holineſs of Courts, before it be publiſhed, comes forth to behold the great and divine lights, wherewith God hath environed your Majeſtie, whom he hath choſen out to ſanctifie the COURT, by means of two reflections, which are, the Example of your virtues, and the Authority of your Laws. As for example, You ſupply as much as in a Prince may be deſired, who hath brought innocency into the Throne of Majeſtie, as an earneſt-pennie of Royaltie, and whitened the very Flower-de-luces, by the puritie of your heart and hands. This argument, in my opinion, ſhould powerfully operate in the hearts of French-men: For it would be a diſorder in Nature, to ſee bad ſubjects under a good Prince, to plant vice in the Kingdom of Virtue, and to have a bodie of morter, and feet of clay, affixed to a head of Gold. It is fit impudence ſhould be extreamly ſhameleſs, not to bluſh, when the ſparkling luſtre of a Crown caſteth into the eyes the glimmering flaſhes of ſo great a Pietie.

Where example cannot reach, Kings have Laws, which are given them from Heaven, as hands of gold and iron, to recompence merits, and chaſtiſe crimes. And as your Majeſtie, SIR, from your moſt tender years, hath ſhewed a ſingular propenſion to the deteſtation of Impietie, and maintenance of Juſtice, that cauſeth me to ſay, Your Majeſtie hath great means to make the COURT eſſentially holy, which the diſabilitie of my pen cannot expreſs but on paper. It is a work worthy of a Chriſtian King, who ſtandeth in the midſt of Kings, and Nations, as heretofore the ſtatue of the Sun in the midſt of publick paſſages.

Royal hands cannot be better employed, than to erect the Tropheys of Sanctity. That is it which all the firſt have done; CONSTANTINE in the Roman Empire, CLODOVÆUS in France, RICAREDUS in Spain, ETHELBERT in England, CANUTUS in Denmark, WENCESLAUS in Poland.

All thoſe, who have taken that way, have been glorious in the memory of men: whileſt others, that have prepared Altars and Tables to Fortune (as ſaith the Prophet Iſaiah) erecting Monarchie on humane Maxims, have built on the quick-ſands of imaginary greatneſs, which hath ſerved them to no other purpoſe, but to meaſure their fall. Vice and Voluptuouſneſs cannot immortalize men; ſince they have nothing laſting in them, but the ſorrow of their infancie, and the infamie of their name. All the greatneſs and happineſs of a Prince, is to make in his virtues a viſible image of inviſible Divinitie, then to imprint the ſame on his ſubjects, as the Sun doth his brightneſs on the Rain-bowe.

SIR, Your Majeſtie knoweth it by proper experience; God hath made you to read the decrees of good ſucceſs, written as it were, with the rayes of your pietie. By how much the more you are affected to the ſervice of the great Maſter, ſo much the more the good ſucceſs of affairs hath followed your deſires. You have ſeen your battels end in bays, and the thorns of your travels to grow all up into Crowns. And as we are ever in this world to merit, ſo we ought to hope, that ſo many worthy acts, will alſo with time take their juſt increaſe; and that you ſhall ſow new virtues on earth, to reap felicities in Heaven: Laſtly, that he, who hath given you the enterance of Solomon into the Kingdom, will grant you the exit of David. This is the vow which offereth to God

SIR, Of Your MAJESTY,

The moſt humble, moſt faithfull, and obedient Subject,

N. CAUSSIN.

TO THE NOBILITIE OF FRANCE.

SIRS,

THis Work, as it is composed for your sakes, offereth it self to your hands, without bearing any other ornament on the brow, but the reflection of Truth, any other recommendation, than the worth of the subject. It is not the abundant store of sanctity in the Courts of our Age, which maketh this stiled the HOLY COURT; but this Frontis-piece onely carrieth the name, because this Book beareth the model. which verily with more ease is moulded on paper, than printed on the manners of men. Yet we may affirm, that God, who draweth the sons of Abraham, from the midst of flints and rocks, doth in all places reserve Saints for himself: and he that will consider it well, shall find that in all times the Courts of zealous Princes, have had their Martyrs, their Confessours, their Virgins and Hermits.

I have a purpose, when my leisure will permit, to divulge the lives of Kings, Princes, Lords, men of state, and likewise also of Queens, Princesses, and Ladies, who in the course of the world, have flourished in much sanctity, beginning from the Court of David, and then concluding in our Age; to the end the multitude of examples may place the Sun in full splendour before their eyes, who take the greatness of their condition, for pretext of their remisness.

For the present, because Reason should carry the torch before History, I will satisfie my self, with publishing this Christian Institution, which treateth of the MOTIVES and OBSTACLES men of Qualitie have to Perfection, with the practise of virtues, most suitable to their condition; the whole attended by two books of Histories, that very amply contain the good and evil of Courts. I consecrate this small labour, at the feet of the Church, among so many worthy Writers, which make her wholly radiant in gold, not unlike that Bird, which, as the Kings of Asia contributed great treasure to the building of a Temple, she having no other wealth, went thither to present her Feathers.

It remaineth, SIRS, that you make the COURT holy, and you shall sanctifie the world: your examples may do much therein; when you shall advance the standard of piety, a plentifull Train will follow. Behold how all those, that have framed their fortune upon vice, have built on abysses; they have sowed wind (as saith the Prophet) to reap tempests; their hopes are crackt, as clouds swoln with the vapours of the earth; and their felicity like a golden statue hanged in the Air on a rotten cable, hath melted upon their head. Never any man hath had good fortune in impiety. He that looseth his conscience, hath nothing else to gain nor loose: Nothing to gain, for that nothing remaineth for him, but unhappiness; and nothing to loose, because he hath lost himself. So many crimes and impieties daily float on the face of this Age, that you must stretch out your arms against iniquity. If you have your hearts fixed where God planted them, you shall place the confidence of well doing, in the life of the most timorous; and shame of ill doing upon the brow of the most impudent. Your hands shall always be in a readiness to overthrow vice, and your feet shall not walk, but on Palms of victory.

The Church extendeth her hands out to you, and imploreth the aid of your authoritie, and good examples. You are in the house of God, as Joseph in that of the Lord of Egypt. The Maſter hath put all into your hands, defile not the honour of his bed, ſince with his finger he hath imprinted the luſtre of his glory on your fronts. If you be among men, as Mountains over valleys, be Mountains of perfume, of which Solomon ſpeaketh in the Canticles; and not thoſe hills of the Prophet Oſee, which have nothing but ſnares, and gins, to ſerve for ſtumbling-blocks to thoſe, whom they ſhould enlighten. If you be elevated in the world, as cliffs above the Sea, be watch-towers, not rocks. If you be Stars, be Suns, to be the Chariots of light and life, and not comets, to pour malignity on the four quarters of the world. Be ye aſſured, that how much the more you are united to God, ſo much the greater ſhall you be; the more conformable you are to the will of the Sovereign Maſter, ſo much ſhall you behold the earth in contempt under your feet, and Heaven in Crowns over your heads.

The DESIGN and ORDER of the Book.

TO ſpeak properly, we have but two great Books, the Heaven and the Bible, which never periſh; The others have an Air, and a certain continuance amongſt men, and at the laſt arrive unto their period; But the moſt part of thoſe who at this day do write, do come into the world, as drops of rain into the Sea, of which the Ocean takes no notice, neither of their coming in, or their going out. In ſo great a croud of Writers, I have put forth my firſt Tome of the HOLY COURT, as under that conſideration, eſteeming that I brought but a little dew, into a great River, and having ſpoken ſome Truths by the way; I ſhould bury my ſelf, from my birth, in the Tomb of ſo many Books, which is excuſable by the law of neceſsity, and honourable by the multitude, and the qualities of thoſe that write.

Howſoever, I ſee that GOD, who governeth our lives and our pens, hath been pleaſed that this Work ſhould be had in ſome reſpect, and having exceeded the merit of the Authour, it ſhould alſo exceed his hope, producing ſome fruit, and withal ſome comfort to my travels, which I cannot now judge to be ill employed.

This hath again put my pen into my hand, to follow the continuation of it, to which ſo many perſonages of Honour have brought ſo many reaſons to induce me, that having but little leiſure to undertake this ſecond Work, I have had the leſs boldneſs to refuſe it.

Thoſe who complain, that my pen hath not ſwiftly enough followed their deſires, are to remember, that though Slowneſs be a mother a little to be blamed, yet her Children are not deformed; The bringing forth of good Books ought not to reſemble that of Birds, concerning which an Ancient writeth, that they come out of the Belly of their mother before they are born; we ought to give them form, and a long time to foſter them in the Mind, before they appear in publick; For in precipitation it is a poor attempt to be able onely to hope for nothing, but to erre haſtily, to repent at leiſure. I do more fear the Reproches of precipitation, than deliberation, for in this mortal condition wherein we live, our moſt perfect Actions are but heavy aſſays, and the moſt groſs proofs of perfection.

This may be ſaid without any diminution to the merit of ſome celeſtial Spirits, who make promptitude and goodneſs to march together with an equal pace, it being not expedient, that thoſe who cannot follow them, ſhould glory in the infirmities contrary to ſo great abilities. For me, I content my ſelf with the approvement and admiration of other mens works, reſerving nothing but induſtry for my own. And though for all my pains I cannot of my ſelf find in my own work ſatisfaction enough to content the Readers, whom I acknowledge ſo favourable to me, yet ſo it is, that I find I have brought ſomething which bears ſome correſpondence with their deſires.

This I can aſſure them, that the contraction of the precepts which I have drawn into ſo few words, being able to ſtretch them into Volumes, are not without their profit, and that Hiſtories are made moſt choice of in that nature, where (beſides their majeſty which lays forth the moſt ſpecious affairs of the Eſtate of Empires, ſince the beginning of their Chriſtianiſm) they have a certain ſweetneſs with them, which ſound ſpirits will find to be ſo much advanced above all Fables and Romances, as the pleaſures of Truth do ſurpaſs all illuſions of Sorcerers.

You ſhall here perpetually obſerve a great Theater of the Divine Providence, where (God knows) I have no other Deſign, than to advance Virtue, and to beat down vice, without reflecting on any of the Perſonages of theſe times, no more than if I wrote under the reign of Charlemaigne or S. Lewis: I muſt intreat theſe ſpirits of Application, which know not how to behold a work, without making it ſubject to their own fancies, imagining every letter to be the Ecchoes of their own thoughts, that if they have any Commentary to produce, they would rather make a gloſs upon their own Dreams, than on my Books. We live not yet (God be thanked) in an Age ſo miſerable, that we dare not ſacrifice to Truth without a diſguiſe, ſeeing it is the glory of our Grandees, that we may openly make war againſt Vice, as againſt an enemy, and not of our party.

For, to ſpeak ſincerely, having laid my firſt Tome at the feet of the ſacred perſon of our great King, I conſidered what great and gliſtering lights there were in all their Orders within his Court, which might ſerve as Models for my Treatiſe, but to avoid the affectation of all compliance with this world, I did expreſly forbear it, my own nature and my long Robe having ſo far eſtranged me from all worldly pretences, that it would be a diſeaſe unto me, but to ſalute a man, if he had not Heaven and the Stars to return me for it.

As concerning the manner of writing which I have obſerved, I ſhall eaſily confeſs unto my Reader, that it proceeded rather from my Genius, than from Art, and though I have been curious enough to obſerve whatſoever the Greek or Romane Eloquence hath happily brought forth, yet I muſt acknowledge, that there is a Ray of God himſelf, which entering into our ſpirit, and mingling with our nature, is more knowing and effectual, than all precepts whatſoever. And this I can affirm for the inſtruction of youth, to thoſe who have demanded my advice, concerning the qualities and conditions of ſtiles. It is true, I have peruſed variety of Books written in all Ages, and I have acknowledged that the moſt ſenſible amongſt them, have been raiſed both in their conceptions and their words, above the common reach, and alwayes without affectation. Others have been paſsionately taken with ſome fine niceties, which are the capital Enemies to perſwaſion, and above all, to be eſchewed in the Diſcourſes which are made of Piety, whoſe nerves they do infeeble, and whoſe luſtres they do foil; we may ſee that thoſe, who from the chair do ſpeak unto us, either by account or by writing, although it be with terms diſcreet enough, yet they leave a leſs impreſsion on our hearts, and ſometimes are ſo violently carried away to ſerve their own reputation, that they forget their engagements to the Truth. We may obſerve ſome, who through too much ſpirit, ſeek out by-ways of conceptions of common ſenſe, and extravagant words, and ſo ſtrongly adore their own thoughts, that they can ſuffer none but themſelves on their own paper, which is the cauſe, they ſeldom meet with the right uſe of humane underſtanding, being the true Citizens of Plato's Common-wealth, capable to controul all things, but to perform nothing. Others there are, who glory in a ſterility, and are willfully angry againſt God, becauſe in ſome part of the Heavens he placed ſo many ſtars. Theſe can endure nothing that is generous, without ſnarling or biting at it. They conceive Beauty and Light to be blemiſhes, becauſe they are above their capacities. Laſtly there are ſome, who in their continual Allegations, do ſo lay forth themſelves in the praiſe of others, that they make their Diſcourſes like thoſe pictures of Helena, which are all of gold: There is nothing but Drapery to be ſeen, you cannot diſtinguiſh the foot from the hand, nor the eye from the ear. But I will enter no further into the conſideration of our times, having learned rather to reſpect than cenſure the indifferent Works of our Writers. But to ſpeak ſoundly, I never thought it expedient, either to perſwade unto, or to follow the ſame faſhions. And as in this work I have not altogether renounced the learning and the ornaments, which I thought to be convenient, but have inchaſed them in it, ſo I would not fill my papers with Quotations and ſtrange Languages, this Labour being undertaken rather to perſwade the Great-ones unto Virtue, than to fill the Extracts and Annotations of the Students.

I have ſo moderated the ſtyle, without letting my ſelf looſe to the empty language of Complements, which had been beneath my Subject, that I conceive I have rendered it eaſie to be underſtood, even to thoſe apprehenſions which make no profeſsion at all of learning.

It is the onely Deſign that I have, to ſpeak ſo as to be underſtood, perſwading my ſelf, according to the ſaying of Philo, That Word and Thought are two Siſter-germanes, and that the youngeſt is born, onely to make the eldeſt known. I ſtudy more for weight of ſentences, than for ornament of words, pretending nothing to the glory of mundane Quills, which we ſee every day appear amongſt ſo many Authours of this Age, who would be more perfect, if they would apply themſelves to more grave ſubjects, and in ſome faſhion imitate the Sun, who being admired thoughout the whole world, doth not know how to admire it ſelf.

Nevertheleſs it often comes to paſs, but not to the more lofty Writers, who are ordinarily indued with more modeſty, but to certain men extreamly profane, to idolize their own inventions, to condemn all Treatiſes of worth, and to eſteem, that one cannot be eloquent in our tongue, if he writes not Vanity or Impureneſs.

Certainly, if a queſtion were made to judge of the French eloquence, the riches of Babylon are not ſo exquiſite, that they may ſtand in compariſon with the beauties of Sion. As long as letters and men ſhall continue, there ſhall continue the praiſes of ſo many excellent Books, which have come from the hands of ſo many Illuſtrious Prelates, and other qualified perſons, nay, and of the ſecular State, who have exerciſed their ſtyle on chaſte and honourable Arguments, and worthy all commendation. I ſpeak this by the way, having at this time no deſign to enlarge my ſelf on the recital of the number of thoſe able men, who have now the pen in their hands, nor praiſe thoſe of my own Robe, who have given their holy labours to the publick, and who I know may be followed by a great number of excellent Spirits of the ſame ſociety.

For that which concerns me, I am acquitted of my promiſe, and I conceive, that I have ſufficiently ficiently expreſſed in theſe two Volumes, the whole reach of my Deſign; for the reſt, I conceive that the Books of Devotion which are to be made publick, ought to be rare, and to be very well digeſted, becauſe there is already extant ſo great a number of them, that the number of the Authours will ſuddenly exceed the number of the Readers.

Satiety will caſt a cloud on the brighteſt Beauties, and though a thing may be very good, yet we ought not to ſurfet with the exceſs thereof, for fear that good Offices be turned into miſpriſions, and Charity render it ſelf too importunate. But ſo it is, that we muſt confeſs that Pieces well wrought, are never ſeen in ſo great a number, as to bring any faſtidiouſneſs to them who do know their merit.

Here do I ſtop my pen, and if there appears any worth in this Volume, I look upon it as on the Mirrour planted on the wall of a Temple in Arcadia, where thoſe that beheld it, in ſtead of their own face, ſaw the repreſentation of the Divinity which they adored.

Even ſo in all this which may bring any profit to the Reader, I ſee nothing of my own, but I acknowledge the Father of lights, who is the Beginning and the End of all which we do make praiſe-worthy. And I beſeech him, if there be found any thing attractive in theſe Diſcourſes, that He will, like the Load-ſtone, draw up the Readers, and carry them to the love of their Creatour, to whom is due the tribute of all honour, as to him who is the Beginning of all Perfection. It is indeed the onely conſolation which we can receive from our labours. For, not to diſſemble the Truth, he that cares more to write than to live, flattering his pen, and neglecting his conſcience, ſhall have work enough to defend himſelf from the Scurf, the Rat, and from Oblivion. And when in a paſsionate life he ſhall carry with him the applauſes of the world, it ſhall be as a ſmall ſacrifice unto him of ſmoke abroad, to lodge a fire and tempeſt in his own houſe.

It is reported, that the Stars contribute their beams to enlighten the Infernals, and I can affirm, that all the lights of Underſtanding and Reputation, ſhall ſerve onely to inflame the torments of a reprobate ſoul, who ſhall ſhut his eyes againſt God, to open them onely to let in Vanity.

In the end, after many Editions of the Holy Court, as I deſired here to put the laſt hand to it, I am now retired into the ſolitary place of Quinpercorentin, for the love of the truth; where the honeſty of the Inhabitants have made me to find it as my Countrey, which other men have taken for a place of baniſhment: There on the banks of the Ocean, at the feet of a Saint, who is the Tutelar of the Village, perceiving that God had ſweetened to me all the bitterneſs both of men and of the times, by the infuſion of his Paternal Conſolation, I have compoſed more Treatiſes, both of Doctrine and Piety, to render in ſome ſort, my ſilence profitable to the publick, of which one day I will give a good account unto my Readers, if God ſhall grant me life.

Amongſt other things, I have digeſted into good order, this Work of the Holy Court, and I have enriched it with a remarkable Augmentation of the Lives and Elogies of the Illuſtrious Perſonages at Court, as well in the Old as the New Teſtament.

Now I do produce it to the light, after that by the ſingular favour of Heaven, the obſtacles are removed, and Truth acknowledged on the Throne of Lights, with which God hath round environed it.

THE HOLY COURT.

FIRST BOOK.

Of Reasons, which should excite men of qualitie to Christian Perfection.

That the COURT and DEVOTION are not things incompatible.

The FOUNDATION of this TREATISE.

THE wise Hebrews have observed a matter worthy of consideration for the direction of Great-ones, to wit, that between the bed of the Kings of Judea, and the Altar of God, there was but one single wall; and they adde, that David, one of the most holy Monarchs, had reserved for himself a secret postern, through which he passed from his chamber to the house of God, that is to say, the Tabernacle; which served as a sanctuarie for his afflictions, and an arsenal for his battels. They say likewise, he left the key of this sacred postern to his Posteritie, a key a thousand times more pretious than Fortune the golden Goddess of the Romans, giving to it the imitation of his virtue as an everlasting inheritance. Achaz was he, who stopping up the gate of the Temple, shut against himself the gates of Gods mercie, and thereby opened the passage to his own confusion. This is to instruct Princes, and all persons of quality, that as the element of birds is the air, and water of fishes, so the element of great spirits, if they will not betray their own nature, nor bely their profession, is piety.

A notable observation of the Hebrews.

Parali. 2. 28. clausit januas Templi.

Yet notwithstanding, it is a wonder how the Court, where the most noble spirits should reside, hath in all Ages been cried down in matter of virtue. You will say, hearing those speak who make many fair and formal descriptions of the manners of Courtiers, that the Court is nothing else but a den of darkness, where the heavens and stars are not seen but through a little crevis; that it is a mil, (as the Ancients held it) always skreaking, with a perpetual clatter, where men enchained as beasts of labour, are condemned to turn the stones: That it is a prison of slaves, who are all tied in the golden guives of specious servitude, yet in this glitter suffer themselves to be gnawn by the vermine of passion: That it is a list, where the combatants are mad; their arms nothing but furie, their prize smoke, their carreer glassie ice, and utmost bounds but precipices. That it is the house of Circes, where reasonable creatures are transformed into savage beasts; where Buls gore, Lions roar, Dogs worrie one another, Vipers hiss, and Basilisks carrie death in their looks. That it is the house of winds, a perpetual tempest on the firm land, ship-wrack without water, where vessels are split even in the haven of hope. Briefly, that it is a place where vice reigneth by nature, misery by necessity, and if virtue be found there, it is but by miracle.

An admirable definition of the Court drawn out of divers ancient Authors

Such discourses are often maintained, with more fervour of eloquence than colour of truth. For to speak sincerely, the Court is a fair school of virtue, for those who know how to use it well. In great seas great fishes are to be found, and in ample fortunes, goodly and heroick virtues. This proposition, which putteth an incompatibilitie of devotion and sanctitie into the life of men of eminencie, seemeth to me very exorbitant for three reasons. The first, for that it is injurious to God: the second prejudicial to humane societie; and the third sheweth it to be false by the experience of all Ages. To prove these three verities is to ruin it in the foundations; the proofs whereof are easie enough, which we will begin to glance at, that hereafter we may deduce them more at length. For as concerning the first, it cannot be denied to be a great injurie to almightie God, to strike at his heavenly and paternal providence. This is to touch him in the apple of his eye, and in the thing which he esteemeth most pretious. Now, so it is, this maxime which establisheth an impossibilitie of devotion, the first wheel of virtue, in the life of Great ones, imputeth a great defect unto the government of God. The divine providence is a skilful posie-maker, who knoweth artificially how to mingle all sorts of flowers to make the Nosegay of the elect, called in holy Scripture Fasciculus viventium. It constituteth the different manners of lives, different qualities, and conditions. It leadeth men by divers ways to the same port. It is that which maketh Kings to reign, and giveth them officers as members of their state, and by this means frameth the Court of Great-ones: But if after it hath so made and composed them as of the flower and choise of men, it should abandon them in the tempest, without pole-star, without rudder, without Pilot, were not this with notable deformitie to fail in one of the prime pieces of its work-manship? Judge your self.

The Answer.

The Defence of the Court.

1. Reg. 25. 29.

For the second reason, it is most evident, that to further this impossibilitie of devotion, in the course of Courtiers lives, is to cast them, through despair of all virtues (which cannot subsist without piety) into the libertie of all vices, which they will hold, not as extravagant sallies of frailtie, but as the form of a necessary portion of their profession. And as the rank they hold, maketh them transcend other men, who willingly tie themselves to the manners and affections of those on whom they see their fortunes depend; that would be as it were, by a necessary law to precipitate mankind into the gulf of corruption.

To conclude for the third reason, this proposition is manifestly contradicted by an infinit number of examples, of so many Kings and Princes, of so many worthy Lords and Ladies, who living in the Ocean of the world as the mother pearls by the dew of heaven, have preserved, and do yet still preserve themselves for ever in admirable puritie, and in such heroick virtues, that they cannot gain so much wonder on earth, but they shall find in heaven much more recompence. This is it, which I intend to produce in this Treatise of the Holy Court, after I have informed the mind with good and lively reasons, which as I hope by the grace of the holy Spirit of God, shall make all persons of quality, to behold they do infinit wrong to take the splendour of their condition for a veil of their impieties, and imperfections. Virtue is a marvellous workwoman, who can make Mercury of any wood; yea should the difficultie be great, the victorie would be more glorious: but all the easieness thereof is in their own hands, and the obligations they have to tend to perfection, are no less important than those of Hermits, as I intend shall appear in the process of this discourse.

The first, MOTIVE.

Of the obligation which secular men, and especially persons of qualitie have to perfection, grounded upon the name of Christian.

A Great abuse is crept into the minds of secular persons, who hold vice in predominance and virtue under controle. It is, in that they esteem Christian perfection as a bird out of their reach and a qualitie dis-proportionable to their estate. As for my self (saith one of these) I have made provision of virtue, according to my quality, I pretend not to be a S. Francis, nor to be rapt as a S. Paul to the third heaven. I find there is no life but with the living, and to hold time by the fore-lock while I can. Let our pleasures take that scope which nature presenteth to them: were we as wicked as Judas, if we have the faith of S. Peter, the mercy of God pardoneth all. An impertinent discourse as I will hereafter declare. On the other side, there are women who chatter, and say: I will not be a S. Teresa, it is not my intention to be canonized. I love better to see my diamonds in my life glitter on my fingers, than to carrie them after my death on my statues. I better love a little perfume whilst I yet breath air, than all the Arabian odours after my death. I will have no extasies nor raptures. It is enough for me to wallow in the world. I may as well go to Paradise by land as by water. Such words are very impure in the mouth of a Christian, nay, so prejudicial to eternal salvation, that through the liberty of speaking too much, they take away all hope of doing well. For pursuing the tender effeminacy of that spirit, they take the measure of virtue very short and dis-proportionable, their intentions being infirm, the works are likewise the more feeble, not squarely answering the model of knowledge; from whence proceedeth a general corruption. I affirm, not all Christians ought to embrace the perfection of S. Francis and of S. Teresa. No. There are some whom the Divine providence will direct by other aims: But I say that every Christian is obliged to level at perfection, and if he hath any other intention, he is in danger to loose himself eternally. A bold saying, but it is the sentence of S. Austin: You should always be displeased with your self for that which you are, if you desire to attain to that which you are not: and if you chance to say, it is enough, you are undone. And who are you that dare limit the gifts of God? And who are you that say, I will have but such, or such degree of graces, I satisfie my self with such a sanctity, I have proceeded far enough in a spiritual life; let us set up our staff here? What wickedness is this? Is not this to imitate that barbarous and senseless King, who cast chains into the sea, to tie the Ocean in fetters? God hath given us a heart of a larger latitude than the heavens, which he will replenish with himself, and you will straiten it like a snail, to lodge him in narrow bounds whom the whole world cannot comprehend. Judge if this proceeding be not very unreasonable, and if you yet doubt, weigh two or three reasons, which you shall find very forcible, and by them you will conclude with me, you have no less obligation to be perfect, than the most retired Hermit that ever lived in the most horrid wilderness of Egypt.

Aug. Serm. 11 of the Apostle. Semper tibi displiceat quod es si vis pervenire ad id quod non es. Si dixeris sufficit periisti. A notable speech of S. Augustine.

Xerxes.

The first reason I propose to underprop this assertion, is drawn from the nature and essence of perfection. At what mark think you should one aim to arrive to this scope? If I should say, will you be perfect? bury your self alive in a sack, put a halter about your neck, go roast your self in the scorching beams of the Sun, go roul your self in snow and thorns; this would make you admire, your hair stand an end, and bloud congeal in your veins: But if one tell you, God hath as it were engrafted perfection with his own hands, upon the sweetest stock in the world, what cause have you of refusal? Now so it is, as I say, There is nothing so easie as to love: the whole nature of the world is powred and dissolved into love: there is nothing so worthy to be beloved, as an object which incloseth in the extent thereof all beauties and bounties imaginable; which are the strongest attractives of amity: yea it forceth our affections with a sweet violence: to love is natural, not to love is monstrous.

Perfection engrafted upon love.

Then here admire the charms of Divinity, which hath placed all the perfection of man, in the love of his Creatour and Saviour, to love an infinite good which one cannot hate, and not become a devil. S. Peter Chrysologus crieth out: A more delicate warfare never was seen, than to conquer all by love. Ask I pray, of all Divines, if charity be not the quintessence of perfection? Ask of all Religious men where they pretend to place it? in sack-cloth, or hair-shirts? They will answer you, No. In the vows of poverty, chastity, obedience? No. These are most undoubted wayes to perfection, but they are not properly perfection. In what then? In the love of God, which S. Irenæus expresseth by a most elate epithete: Eminentissimum charismatum, the most eminent of all the gifts of God.

Chrys. serm. 94. Teneræ militiæ, delicati constitum est amore solo de cunctis criminibus reportare victoriam. The warfare of Christians delicate.

Cap. 63. Iren. lib. 4. Eminentissimum charismatum.

The Master of the Sentences and some other Divines, have placed charity so high (in which we establish perfection) that they have presumed to say, it was the substance of the Holy Ghost, united and as it were incorporated to mans soul; adding, that as light is called radical light in the Sun, light infused in bodies transparent, colour in bodies which we call coloured: in like manner this charity as it is (say they) originally and radically in God, is the holy Ghost; as it is united to the substance of our soul, it is grace; as it maketh sallies out upon our neighbour, it is charity.

The excellency of charity.

This Doctrine is very subtile, and really giveth a very very high idea of the merit of Charity: but if we would wholly examine it according to the strict rigour of Schools, and weigh it in S. Thomas his equal ballance, we shall find Charity is not, to speak properly, the Holy Ghost, but as it were the first ray of Divinity, which bringeth with it self all perfections. This beam, if you will, is as it were in your power; God every day presenteth it unto you, as freely as the Sun doth his light; it onely behoveth to will, it behoveth seriously once to resolve to love an object so amiable, and then behold your selves perfect. Notwithstanding if you lay your hand on the bottom of your conscience, you shall ever find it in its proper interests, in humane respects, in intentions and affections nothing sincere, in the love of creatures. This is to coyn false money in matter of love; this is to put God under the Altar, and the love of himself above, that it may have the better part of incense. What think you of this indignitie? See you not the obligation of being perfect still remaineth, but the effect is ever pretermitted?

Imitation of Jesus Christ, abridgement of wisdom. Matth. 5. Estote perfecti, sicut & Pater vester cœlestis perfectus est. Greg. Nyssen. Κεφάλαιον τῆς ἀγθρωπίνης σοφίας. In the book of the life of Moses.

For the second reason, I say, the perfection of man consisteth in the imitation of God. Be ye perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect: and very well S. Gregory Nyssen assureth us, that this imitation is an abridgement of all wisdom. Now who is able to mount by force of wing, and flie into the bosom of the eternal Father, thence to draw a pourtraict of his holinesses? Certainly no creature can aspire thereto. And what I pray, hath God, all goodness, all wisdom, done? He hath imprinted all his perfections upon our Saviour, the true figure of his substance, as if one should impress a golden seal upon virgin-wax; which made Origen say, his most sacred humanity was as the foot-step and shadow of the Divinity, and agreed with it as equal well-made dyals with the Sun; whereupon the spirit of God calleth all Christians, and saith to them: Imitate couragiously, behold your Prototype, behold the model of your actions. He saith not, I have two Images of my substance, I have two Sons, I send them both upon the earth; one shall be for men of eminencie, the other for the multitude: Behold one delicately curious, crowned with roses for the nobility; behold another crowned with thorns for the vulgar. It is meer dotage to imagine it. And see you not, it is like sottishness since all Christians bear the same name, the same livery, participate of the same God, the same Sacraments, and pretend to the same Paradise, to think perfection is not appointed but for a silly handful of men, separated from secular life, and that others are excluded? Miserable creatures who to sooth their own remisness plant their own condemnation upon their foreheads!

Humanity of Jesus. An excellent conceit of Origen. Origen 2. περὶ ἀρχ. Indeclinabiliter eo sæ motus suscipiebat.

One same Jesus for the Nobles and plebeyans.

Briefly to conclude, the title and dignity of a Christian, draweth with it great and just obligations, which you cannot countervail but with an exact endeavour of perfection. Do you think one requireth too much of you, who have been nourished and trained up in the Church of God, if you be demanded (at the least) to shew resolution and courage to resist a sin, as some Heathens have done in their infidelity? And to produce in gross three examples, upon the three most ordinary temptations, behold with S. Austine, Polemon, who telleth you: I was an infidel, a young man deprived of the knowledge of the true God, resigned over to all sort of intemperance; wine, love, play, rashness were the Chariot, which drew my youth to downfal. I was no sooner entered into the school of a Heathen Philosopher, as my self, but behold, I was wholly changed. And thou, O Christian, dost thou think it will be lawful for thee amongst so many important and forcible instructions, so many enlightenings, so many inspirations, to play the smiths old dog, and lie sleeping under the anvile? This man here, upon the onely word of a man, layeth down his flowery crowns which he bare on his head, his drunkenness, his unthrifty riots, and where is there a worldly woman at this day, who at the end of a Sermon, enkindled with zeal, dissolveth one piece of her gaudy dressings?

S. Augustine Epist. 130. saith of this, Non humano operi tribuerim, sed divino. Polemon praised by S. Augustine.

Behold on the other side Spurina, who saith in S. Ambrose: I was a Gentile, bred in the corruption of an age, where virtue was in declination, and vice on the top of the wheel. I was endowed with an exquisit beauty, which by right of natural force gave me the key of hearts: and I seeing it was too much affected, and courted by wanton eyes, and served for a stumbling-block to chastity, I purposely made scars in my face, extinguishing with my bloud, the flames of them that sought me. For I loved better to seal my innocency, as with the seal of voluntarie deformitie, than to possess a beauty that served onely as a bait for anothers lust. O thou Christian woman, who dost paint thy self with an ill intention, seeking to gain that by imposture, which thou canst not attain by truth, and not satisfying thy self with adulterating thy beauty, spares not to discover among company a scandalous nakedness, to shew in thy breasts the impudence of thy forehead! Consider a little what thou wilt answer to this Paynim with all thy curiosity, when her bloud, her wounds, scars, her beauty disfigured, which served as a sacrifice to her chastity, shall accuse thee before the inevitable tribunal.

Spurina.

S. Ambrose in the exhortation to virginitie. Deformitatem sanctitatis meæ fidem, quam formam irritamentum alienæ libidinis esse malui.

Greatness of Lycurgus.

Behold likewise, Lycurgus is elected King of the Lacedemonians, if so his dead brother should leave no heir in his wives body. The perfidious and unnatural Queen, sendeth this message to the King new chosen: SIR, I am with child, and according to the laws of the countrey, it may fall out the fruit of my body may snatch the Scepter out of your hands. I see the kingdom is a dainty morsel, hard for them to disgorge, who once have swallowed it. If you will be wise in your own affair, I know a means by a potion, to put your crown in safetie, and by anticipation, taking away the life of this little creature, settle your throne for ever. Onely be mindful of me your faithful hand-maid, who with loss of my own bloud, tender this grateful office. Hereupon Lycurgus detesting in his heart the treacherie of this ravenous she-wolf, dissembleth, and answereth: MADAME, Let the infant come into the world, be it male or female, it importeth not: we alwayes shall find means enough, whensoever we shall think good to dispatch it. As soon as the child was born, which proved a boy, he took it in his arms, he assembled the Magistrates and people, and covering the little Creature with his royal Robe, saith: Sirs, long live justice and loyaltie. Behold your King, I am but his vassal. O Christian, what sayest thou to this Pagan, that would not purchase a Kingdom by the single sin of another? Yet many times a little interest makes thee neglect all that which is divine, in Faith, Justice and Religion. It is not required of thee thou shouldest be a S. Antony, a Macarius, an Angel of the desert. It is demanded of thee, that for Gods honour, thou shew some small resistance of sin, which these infidels have done for a shadow of virtue, and it shall suffice. Dost thou not behold, that thou art enforced not onely for good fashion, but for necessity to this Christian perfection, which thou imaginest to be far separated from thy condition?

Conclude (O ye Noble men) out of this discourse, that the obligation which you have to be perfect, is most evident, since you have JESUS CHRIST for a sharer, the charges ease; it consisting not but in loving a goodness, which one cannot hate, and which never any one can love, if he offer not the homage of his proper interest to his divine Majesty. Behold all perfection.

The second Reason.

Drawn from Nobilitie.

HAving in general declared the obligation all Christians have to become perfect, let us in particular behold the reasons which invite Nobilitie to perfection. I doubt not if you maturely ponder those which I have to propose, you shall find them no less obliged to the solid eminencie of all Christian virtues, than Hermits themselves, and this by the right of their condition: so as that which seemeth to enlarge their scope to a life of greater libertie, rather serveth as a bound of their dutie, and a bridle for their dissolutions. Let us take the first reason, which is their Nobilitie. It is an argument that cannot proceed but from a low judgement, or a spirit soothed with its own effeminacie, to say he is Noble, he is a Courtier, he is a States-man, his qualitie tieth him not to perfection, his virtue must be measured by the ell of the world; if he were over virtuous, the excess of his sanctitie would be prejudicial to his fortune. What an extravagant humour is it to fix ignominie upon the front of Nobilitie in the first beginning? He is Noble, he therefore should be the less devout, and less virtuous. Change the Gamuth, and say: He is Noble; he hath therefore the more obligation to be perfect. Nobilitie hath put the yoak of a happie necessitie upon him, which he cannot shake off without much cowardize. And to make you thereby behold that Nobilitie is a bond of Christian virtue in all eminencie, no man will deny but that by how much the more God giveth powerful and effectual means to man to arrive at a good end, so much more obligation he hath to carry himself with fervency of affection; and in case of failing, his neglect is made the more faultie. The servant to whom the Master hath given five talents to negotiate with, ought much more to profit and bring gain home, than he that received but one single talent. Who can deny this, if he will not belie the light of nature? Now so it is. Great men have many more talents of God, for the traffick of virtues, than others have; and behold the first of all, which is the happiness of their birth. An Oratour making a solemn Oration in the praise of Constantine the Great, in the Citie of Tyter, let fall these words: The first and greatest gift of heaven, was to be born happy, and as soon to be in the lists of felicitie, as of nature. The Scripture it self recommendeth Nobilitie in the persons of the three valiant children, held in the Captivitie of Babylon; in that of Eleazar, and others. It is a wonder how S. Hierome in the Epitaph of S. Paula, hath not omitted that she was descended from Agamemnon. Which would never have been mentioned, were it not that Nobility is valued amongst the temporal goods, which are distributed to us by the providence of Almighty God. Now that Nobilitie is a good instrument to conduct to perfection, appeareth by an irrefragable reason, which I intend to express. I will not say what might be proposed, and fortified by experience, that the bodies of Noble and Gentlemen are ordinarily better composed, and as it were more delicately moulded by the artful hands of nature; that they have their senses more subtile, their spirits more agile, their members better proportioned, their garb more gentile, and grace more accomplished: and that all these prepare a fair shop for the soul, to exercise her functions with greater liberty. Let us rather say with Petrarch: If Nobilitie were not tied but to flesh and bloud, it were a small matter; since it is very difficult to distinguish between the bloud of Cæsars and Porters. Nor yet will I touch what might pertinently be disputed, that the souls of men extracted from the treasures of Heaven, though they be all cast in one mould, and be of the same kind; may notwithstanding be created by God with qualities very different, as we behold in the flowers of a beautiful meadow, which are of the same name and nature, a very great dis-proportion in figure, colour, and other accidents: semblably between the stars and precious stones, which are of the same substance, one will have a lustre more sparkling, another more dull and blunted. This maketh us probably believe, that the souls of men, when they are infused into bodies, although they be essentially marked with the same stamp, may have some accidental perfections one above another; and that this great diversitie which we observe therein, making one man appear of gold, another of lead, doth not onely depend on the varieties of Organs. Mercury Trismegistus was of this opinion when under the bark of a fable, he represented souls unto us which before they entered into the bodie, drank in the cup of spirit, not all of them, but those which happily encountred that fortunate success. For he feigneth, according to the inventions of his brain, that God sendeth a messenger upon the earth, to wit, one of his Angels, who placeth a large cup as big as (it is to be supposed) that of Semiramis was, which as Ælian reporteth, weighed a thousand and four-score pound: and this cup is full of a celestial liquor, of power to make men subtile and spiritual: the messenger maketh his proclamation, and saith to every soul: Up soul, drench thy self deeply, and drink with all thy force in this cup of spirit. Thereupon they drink, some more, some less, which maketh a great diversitie of understandings. Some wholly abstain, who when they have entered into the bodie, have no other share but the gifts of reason, which necessarily is a prerogative of their nature: but as for spirit they are deprived, as being absolutely stupid, and extreamly shallow. It is a wonder how these ancient Sages have pleased themselves in these fabulous discourses. Needeth there so much outward cover to give us this maxime, that all souls have not one and the same relation to accidental qualities, though, as Aristotle teacheth us, they are in their own essence, as unchangeable as numbers in Arithmetick?

This diversitie of spirits presupposed, one may say that great and noble men are more priviledged from the time of their birth, and that with some probabilitie. So Philo hath given to Kings and Potentates, a double understanding, the one for the rule of themselves, and the other for the government of their estates. But not to sooth the Nobilitie with feeble and superficial reasons, it behoveth they know, that although one should admit this accidental diversitie in the Oeconomie of humane spirits, yet would the consequence not necessarily ensue, that they always thereby should be the better provided. God maketh no difference of persons in this distribution. There are spirits that have come into the world from among the cobwebs of a nasty cottage, who have filled Ages with admiration of their greatness. Others have been clothed in golden glitter and purple, who have been miserably stupid and dull: and although fortune doth still hold to the oar, who deserve to be at the stern; yea, and some be at the stern who merit to be at the oar, yet the providence of God doth mannage it as best pleaseth himself for certain ends, which our foresight cannot penetrate with the best light. What infallible motive shall we then derive, to establish the obligation which tieth the Nobilitie to virtue above others, since we rather seek weight of reason than colour? Behold one which cannot well be denied by a well-rectified judgement. It is, that as God hath given to women, I know not what instinct of shamefac'dness, which enforceth them as it were with a sweet violence, to the defence of their honour; and this in them them is so powerful a touch from Heaven, that they cannot discharge themselves thereof; rather they feel it in every part, unless they bewretchedly insensible. Plinie affirmeth the same, who saith their bodies after death, float in such posture upon the waters, that they hide the nakedness from humane eyes, whereof nature, during life, hath been so careful. Even as God hath ingrafted the love of modestie upon this sex, so likewise he hath affixed a spur of honour upon the spirit of Noblemen. This is the pourtraict of Phidias which cannot be taken away without breaking the Minerva. This is the character wherewith God will imprint virtue in them. They are all naturally sensible in the points of honesty, or else degenerate from their Nobilitie.

Plin. lib. 7.

Prouæ fluitant pudori earum parcente naturæ.

Where is the motive of virtue in the Nobilitie.

Behold, I pray you, the force and power of this spur which God hath used for the good of Nobilitie. They would flie if it were possible to Heaven, and penetrate the depths, to avoid the least stain of dishonour. What flames actually would not they go through, to what breaches, assaults, musket-shots, to what images of death, which make nature to tremble with cold fear, do not they expose themselves, to conserve or acquire reputation? The spirit of lies, seeing they cannot be altered in this spur of the inseparable honour of their condition, what doth he? Not being able to wrest it from them, he rebateth the point; nay rather he rebateth the brain, and makes them place the point of honour in infamie, knowing very well that this is an effectual means to ruin them without discoverie. A wonder! They rather will become Apostates from Christianitie, than from the spur of honour. They meet in the field, cut one anothers throat, and emptie their quarrels through the channels of their bloud, for that they think the thing is honourable. Judge now, and conclude what I am to say: if they would suffer this spur to pursue that course which God hath begun in their souls, perswading themselves what is most undoubted, that the most ignoble act which a Gentleman can do, is to serve sin, would not they quickly become perfect? would not they be invincible against all vices, and ever in possession of virtue? This argument is very strong, and will admit no evasion. Noble spirit, thou naturally lovest honour more than thy life, and therein thou dost well: Thou art a Christian, if thou wilt not renounce thy baptism and the bloud of thy Saviour; Christianitie teacheth thee that the highest and most solid honour thou canst ever pretend unto, is to put vice under foot, and virtue over thy head; why stayest thou to make resolution?

Against such as betray their Nobilitie.

Unworthy that thou art, if thou goest about to tie Nobilitie to flesh and bloud, or to some old rotten ruins, to some monuments, which cover a nothing under the golden traces of an Epitaph. Ridiculous that thou art, if with full mouth thou vantest a paper-Nobilitie, yea which is not thine: as if a blind man should boast his Grand-Father had had good eyes, and a stammerer that his great Grand-Father had been en excellent Oratour. Miserable that thou art, if after thy Ancestours have planted the French Lilies amongst the Palms of Palestine, sincerely led thereto with the zeal they bare to their faith, thou betrayest religion, virtue and conscience, by a brutish life drenched in wild passions, and framest to thy self under a head of gold, a foot of clay. God who breatheth on the intentions of men, reproveth such a Nobilitie: and though these mongrels should make themselves as white as Swans, God esteemeth them as black as Moors. All Nobilitie before this great Judge, is nothing in comparison of justice and perfection. Yea so it is, that in Holy Writ the Nobilitie of Noe is valued, Hæ sunt generationes Noe. Noe vir justus erat atque perfectus. Behold a marvellous manner (saith Saint John Chrysostom) to delineate a Genealogie. The Scripture beginneth and saith, Behold the Genealogie of Noe. It seemeth to make way through all the Patriarchs from whom Noe was descended. It seemeth to make a rehearsal to us of all their titles and signories, of their acts and atchievements: and presently endeth in saying, Will you know the Genealogie of Noe? he was a just man, and a perfect. Behold all his Nobilitie. On which subject S. Ambrose hath an excellent saying: Nobilitie hath no better a character, than that of sanctitie: the race of men, are men, but the race of souls are virtues.

Amos 9. Nunquid ut filii Æthiopum vos estis mihi Israel?

Nobilitie of Noe, wherein: Gen. 6. Chrysost. in Genes.

Noblemen, if you desire to be esteemed worthy your rank, do not as the little Sea-crabs, who by chance finding the shels of great fishes emptie, enter into them without saying, by your leave, and make boasts of a borrowed habitation. Cover not the giddie fantasies and illusions of a spirit, drunk with self-love, under a vain veil of Nobilitie. Rather do as Boleslaus the fourth, King of Poland, who bearing the picture of his father, hanged about his neck in a plate of gold, when he was to speak or do any thing of importance, he took this picture, and kissing it, said: Dear father, I wish I may not do any thing remissly, unworthy of thy name. Rather do as that brave Eleazar, mentioned in the Book of Machabees, who being assaulted with all sort of batteries, blandishments, menaces and torments, to make him counterfeit but one sole sin against his own law, he fixed his eyes upon the true point of honour, upon the consideration of his Nobilitie. Out alas (said he to himself alone) the whiteness of that venerable hair, with which thy head is covered, after it hath grown hoarie in the exercise of thy religion, hath it not yet taught thee where the point of honour lies? It is not enough for Eleazar, not to counterfeit impietie, but to profess virtue, even at the price of his bloud. Now God grant I may not serve as a stumbling-block to the youth of this Citie, since God will make this day a Theatre of my constancie. I will not belie the law of my Master, I will not dishonour the School in which I was bred and brought up. My soul shall flie out of this bodie, wholly innocent, discharged of infidelitie, into the bosom of my Ancestours, and the honour of my life shall be conveyed into the ashes of my Tomb. These words mixed with his bloud, stopped his mouth and life with one and the same seal.

The third REASON.

Drawn from the greatness and dignitie of Gentlemen.

SAint Augustine hath spoken very prudently, discoursing upon the presence of God, to wit, that of necessitie it behoveth us to be virtuous, since we are perpetually discovered by the eyes of the great Judge, before whom neither the bottomless abyss, nor hell it self hath darkness enough to hide us. If this exercise of the presence of God were as familiar to us as it is effectual, it would be a powerful motive to cleanse all the impurities of our intentions and affections, and quickly would give us leave to arrive at the top of perfection. A wise Hebrew said very well, to extirpate sin from the earth, it behoveth every one to figure himself a great eye, always wakeful upon our actions, an ear always open to observe our words, a hand indefatigably ever writing and summing up the account of our works. But seeing our soul, while it is in this mortal habitation, folded up in flesh flesh and bloud, stirs it self but lazily to the consideration of things purely spiritual, expecting the senses by which she operateth, should give her the alarm; God, all-wise, all-good, serveth himself with an efficacious means to fix us in the contemplation of his presence, which is the consideration of men in themselves, the most perfect images of God that can be found in this great universe. By how much the more we are encompassed, and as it were shot through with the eyes of beholders who view, serving as witnesses of our actions; so much the more doth our obligation of perfection increase. The greater part of sins are committed for want of witnesses, saith very pertinently a grave ancient Writer. If Venus should make a veil of clouds to cover all her favorites, (as fables imagined) the earth would soon be filled with adulterers, and quickly become a Gomorrah. Nothing dismantleth vice so much as its own nakedness; take the mask from it, and you bereave it of the means of progression.

It is from this point I intend to draw the first reason, which bindeth the Nobilitie to great perfection, especially those who are of state and dignitie, seeing that how much the more they are eminent in honour, so much the more they are proposed as an aim to the eyes of all the world. If a little planet happen to be eclipsed, who can tell the news thereof, but some cold-foundred Mathematician, who perchance beholdeth it in the shadie obscurities of the night? But if the least change happen that may be to the Sun, every one lifteth his eye to Heaven; he cannot make a false step, but the numberless numbers of men which inhabit the four quarters of the earth, do observe it. The like thing is seen in the life of Great men, and private persons. If an Hermit in his Cell suffer himself to be transported upon some motion of choler, who knoweth it but his cat or table? And if it be a religious man in a Covent, his imperfections are manifested but to few, which would be of force to cherish their vices, if they did not take their aims rightly levelled towards God. But as for great ones, all the eyes of men are fixed upon them, nor can they suffer eclipse but as suns; so darkening the whole world with their shadie obscurities, that they, who in their own errour have eyes of moles, are Arguses and Lynxes, to see and censure the actions of men of qualitie. Great men vitious, resemble King Ozias; they all carrie their leprosie upon their forehead. Then I demand of you, this admitted, that they cannot hide themselves no more than the Sun, and that they all have honour in special recommendation, fearing the least blemishes of fame; do you not behold them between the desire of honour, and fear of contempt, as between the hammer and the anvile, enforced, as it were, with a happy necessitie to do well, since to do ill is so chargeable?

Life of Great men enlightened.

You will say unto me this intention were impure, to carrie ones self in praise-worthy actions by the paths of humane respects; to which I agree: But withal adde, it may easily be purged and freed, if you prefigure in your mind, that so many men as watch upon our actions, are so many messengers of God; if you consider them not as men, but as Angels of this Sovereign Majesty, who are assigned for the inquisition of your actions. This contemplation well imprinted in your spirit, shall by little and little proceed, rarifying the most gross thoughts, as the Sun-beams do the vapours of the earth, and you shall change this necessitie you have to do well, by the honest enforcement of those who enlighten you, into a will so free and dis-interessed, that you will ever after put on a resolution to remain in the lists of virtue, although all the world should be blind. You will resemble the Sun, who placed in Heaven by the Creatours hand, if happily he one day should chance to have no spectatours of his light, would shine as radiant for the eyes of a Pismere or silly Bee, as for the greatest King in the world. S. Augustine maketh mention of an old Comedian, who in his younger days, after he had a long time played in the Comedies, which those blind Idolaters had instituted to the honour of their gods, with the general applause of the people, the glory thereof did so intoxicate him, that playing for the gods, he acted all as for men: when he grew old, and not so followed by his ordinary troup of Auditours, he went to the Capitol, and made much ado to play his Comedies alone before the statues of his false gods: doing all (said he) then for the gods, and nothing for men. If this poor Pagan had not failed in the principles of true Religion, he had hit the mark. It is true, men many times serve to polish our actions; their presence is to us a sharp spur, which makes the spirit to leap, and bound beyond it self. The like whereof is seen in Oratours and Preachers, to whom their Auditorie sometime serves as pipes to Organs. Such penetrate the clouds, born upon the wings of the wind, who otherwise had low flagged in the dust, void of the estimation of men. It would be a miserable vanitie to have no other aim, than always to play for men, and never for God. It is fit that all these creatures should serve us for ladders, to mount up to Heaven. And this it is wherein men of state, who are in eminent place, have much advantage; they are in a great Theatre, which is to them a powerful spur to do well; yea so forcible, that it was a wonder admired by the judicious Cassius Longinus, to hear it said, that a Grecian Captain, seeing himself in a dangerous encounter, involved in night and death, desired not of God the safeguard of his life, but onely so much day as might suffice to see himself die valiantly.

Behold the force of this motive, to give up a life the most pretious thing in the whole world, to enjoy one glimmer of a day-light, which could serve to no other purpose, but to enlighten his death. Then, Noble men who are seated in dignitie, I leave it to you to conclude, if you, perpetually being in the mid-day, and in the rays of so many as behold you, who illustrate your life, and make your death lightsom, have cause or not to slacken or grow remiss in the course of perfection.

For the second reason I say, the foyl setteth off the sparkling of the diamond, and greatens the lustre of virtue. How doth a man know what he is, if he see not himself in the occasions of good and ill? The triumph of virtue, as Plato said very well, is to have sin in power, and virtue in will. To be able to sin, to be thereunto sollicited by attractive pleasure, and yet not to commit it; this is all which a good man can do. A solitary life is not alwaies laudable, if it be not guided by divine and super-natural helps, as that of Saints. For what honour is it for a retired man, to have this Epitaph of Vacia inscribed upon him: Here lyeth he, who fled from the world and the affairs thereof, confined to himself by the miserie of his passions, who could not endure any man to be more happy than himself: who hid himself for fear, who in present liveth not, either for another, or for himself, but for his belly, sleep and pleasure. Behold a poor praise, and which well sheweth, virtue doth not alwaies consist in the flight from greatness, but in the conquest over passions, which is by so much the more glorious by how much the adversaries are more invincible. Theophylact said, that gold is like the river Rhone, for one cause; which is that anciently those warlike Nations inhabitants of Germany, used it to prove their children in, as we use to trie gold with a touch-stone. As soon as these little creatures were born, they carried them to the Rhone, and plunged them in that river, and then knew by certain signs given by the child, either in wrestling with the waves, or in shewing Erit illi gloria æterna, qui potuit transgredi & non est transgressus. Eccl. 31.

Epitaph of Vacia. Qui res & homines fugit, quem cupiditatum suarum infelicitas relegavit, alios felliciores videre non potuit, qui velut timidam, atque iners animal metu oblituit: ille sibi non vivit, sed quod & turpissimum, ventri, somno, libidini. Senec. ep. 55.

ing much terrour and affrightment, whether he would be couragious or cowardous. He that bare himself bravely in this merciless element, was their true son. Men are not tried in Rhene, said this learned Authour, to see whether they be men, but in Pactolus, in a river of gold: place them in honours, reputation, in affluence of riches, this will procure you a never-erring judgement of their virtue. What knoweth one how he, who is born and bred all his life time amongst cobwebs, would use cloth of gold if he had it? What knoweth one how humble a man may be, who is as soon found in misery as in nature, by the course of his lineal extraction? Who knoweth how abstinent one would be in the full delicacies of a great feast, who hath never seen upon his table but cabages and turneps? Who knoweth how temperate another would be in commanding over men, who never hath exercised his power, but over dogs and calves? It seemeth all virtues, either are no virtues, or are stifled in a low condition, if we speak morally. But to see a man poor in spirit in abounding plenty of riches; humble in large trains of attendants, which he daily beholdeth prostrated at his feet; temperate in a thousand occasions of excesses which hourly are presented to him; moderate in a fortune ever upon increase; peaceful in the clattering clamours of affairs; uniform and equal in the vicissitude of humane accidents; a man who can do all he would, and will do nothing but what is reasonable; a man that suffereth not his appetites to flie like little butter-flies, fluttering amidst the concupiscence of creatures, but limits them in the lists of modesty, and not touching the earth but with the soles of his feet, fixeth the better part of himself in Heaven; this is to behold a perpetual miracle.

Great virtue of Great men

August. tract. 13. de verbo domini.

Magna virtus est cum felicitate luctari, magna felicitas à felicitate non vinci.

We must then necessarily aver, if we will not belie our judgement and reason, that in the greatest occasions of ill, is shewed the greatest reflection of good. Great felicities are so ticklish, that it is more easie to live on the dung-hil of Job with patience, than in the mannage of great Kingdoms with moderation. Saint Bernard said to Pope Eugenius, He is truly great on whom fortune hath smiled, and not deceived him. It is a heavie burthen to bear a great fortune. This is daily seen in the spirits of this Age: there needeth but a little sparkle of felicitie to dazle their eyes, to puff up their skin, to drench them in pride, in ingratitude, in tyrannie, in a deluge of dissolutions. One sole hour, which a favorite may have in the prosperitie of the Court, will make him forget a friendship of thirty years standing; a most evident mark of a weak spirit. On the contrary, to pass from a poor garden, into a Kings Palace, as Abdolomin did, and handle the Scepter with the same humilitie of heart, without prejudice of authoritie, that one would do a spade, is a virtue which rarely hath an example upon earth, but is admired in Heaven it self. It is a virtue which cometh to men from the treasures of God, not from their pedegree. It is the faireſt object, which the Sun drawing aside the curtain of the night, discovereth upon earth. And I doubt not, but the divine providence hath purposely held some religious Monarchs in the world, as our S. Lewis, for example to declare how high Christian perfection may ascend, which is to plant humilitie upon the diamonds of regal crowns; to lead in Court an Hermitical life; to command greatnes and humilitie, which seldom are of alliance, mutually to embrace as sisters.

Abdolomin.

Adde for the third reason, which is received by the common consent of all men living in the world, that tribulation serves as a fornace for virtue: the more stout and masculine it is, the more it glitters in affliction. What knoweth a man that hath alwaies been bred in a lazie languishing life, as the trees of Sodom in the dead sea, with what measure perfection is measured? Prosperities are like a veil tissued with gold by the fingers of fortune, to cover the ulcers of vice: and adversitie is the Theatre of generous spirits, who feed themselves with afflictions, as the Sun with salt water. What a glorious spectacle is it to behold, saith S. Cyprian, an invincible courage counter-buffed with storms and tempests, on whom it seemeth Heaven will burst and fall in pieces, to behold him, I say, amongst the threats of the air, ruins of the world, alwaies standing upright, as a great brazen Colossus, scorning these as mists, and small flakes of snow?

Prosperitie.

Cyprian de mortal.

What a brave word is it, to hear a man say in a world of contrarieties, which oppose him, God be praised, who hath deemed us worthy to serve as a trial of humane nature, to see to how high a pitch patience could mount? What a Majesty it is to be able to bear this fair ensign, wherewith our Lewis the Twelfth, with a generous affection was much pleased, which was a celestial cup, advanced in rays of gold, amongst eclipses, with this motto, Inter eclipses exorior. And surely virtue never shineth so much as when she is in eclipse; which it seems the Holy Ghost would mysteriously signifie in these words of Job: Thou brave spirit who struggleſt against tempests, thou ſhalt find thy noon in the evening, and when thou ſhalt eſteem thy ſelf annihilated, thou then ſhalt elevate thy ſelf as the morning-ſtar. It is a wonder that in this passage, he useth an Hebrew word for two purposes, signifying two contraries, to wit, to shine, and to be darkened. It is to shew us, that obscuritie which cometh from adversitie is a true and perfect light.

A worthy letter in Job.

It then being admitted, which all mouthes do preach, and pens do write, that adversities are necessary to make up a great virtue; we will thereon conclude, that perfection will be more suitably accommodated to the lives of Great men, than any other though never so good, since they are those, who daily are exposed to the greatest hazards. The crosses of religious and private men, are but meer paper in comparison of those which happen to the Great men of the world. The learned Sineſius saith, they are illustrious on every side; one while they mount as high as Heaven, another while they descend even to the abyss; their change is never in the mean, and their fortune is pointed out in extremities: this manifestly declareth, that as their fortune hath no bounds, so they should not limit their virtues. O men of honour, it is a brave thing to see you courageous in disasters, as Eagles, who flie confronting that part of heaven where raging tempests most reign, not unlike Dolphins, who leap and bound with full carreer in the tumultuous waves; or as vast rocks, who erect their crests against the clouds, and mock at the foamie waves billow-beating their foot. This is truly the element of virtue, resembling the pretious stone, called Ceraunia by the Grecians, as one would say, the Thunderer, for it is bred among thunders, and is found in places, where Heaven all swoln with anger, hath cleft the master-piece of the worlds great magazin. So after the black vapours of obloquie, after the mistie clouds which have dis-coloured our reputation, after envie, rage, after brutish furies, after oppressions of innocencie, after the death of kindred, after faithlesnes of friends, after disgrace, after thunders shot from the Capitol; when you behold a heart firmly fixed in a fair situation, which enfoldeth it self within it self, and sucketh in the rateful sweetnesses of a good conscience, then behold a thunder-stone, which gladdeth Angels, and dazleth eyes fearful of his lightening flashes.

Sineſius de regno ad Arcadium.

Θαῤῥεῖ μεταπίπτει τὰ ἀδύνατα.

Ceraunia.

Conclude then upon this whole discourse, that greatnes is the very element of great virtue; and if you yet hereof doubt, learn the same from the authoritie of God, who hath judged greatnes so necessary an object for virtue, that he hath conducted all his greateſt ſervants to perfection, if not by the enjoying of greatneſs, at the leaſt by contempt thereof; and never had they been ſo great, if ſtruggling with greatneſs, they had not ſcorned to be great. Our Saviour, to ſhew he was the example of perfection, would appear great in refuſing a world, which Satan had (as it were) unfolded before his feet. He would the virtue of the greateſt of all men, ſhould appear in the refuſal of the greateſt of all titles, when S. John Baptiſt denied the name of Meſſias. He ſheweth the greatneſs of his faithful ſervant Moſes, in the contempt of Pharaoh's kingdom. He gave Nero's Court to S. Peter, and S. Paul as the Amphitheater of their glorie. He likewiſe many times hath drawn Hermits from the unfrequented deſarts, to make them mannage great matters in the Cataſtrophe of their lives, in the palaces of Princes; ſo neceſſary it is to have to do with greatneſs, to act ſomething important. If God hath transferred to Court (as it were on the wings of impetuous winds) thoſe that were by birth and profeſſion alienated, to work wonders there; what Theatre (O ye Noblemen) expect you more ſuitable then this, to place virtue in her faireſt ſeat? Or what obligation can you have more ſtrictly binding to perfection, than your ſelves?

The fourth REASON.

Proceeding from riches.

IT was a thing very ſtrange amongſt the plagues wherewith Ægypt, ever bent to reſiſt the ſpur the more deeply to wound it ſelf, was chaſtiſed by the angrie hand of God, to behold Nilus, that great and goodly river wholly become bloudie: but yet more marveilous to ſee that from one and the ſame river, the Ægyptians drew bloud, and the Iſraelites a lively and chriſtalline ſtream. Joſeph Antiquit. Jud. l. 2. c. 5.

The like ordinarily is ſeen in the lives of good and bad rich men. The bad draw into their ſtore-houſes gold and ſilver, heaped one upon another by rapines and violence, as in a river conſiſting of the veins and bloud of the poor. The good, in the honeſt abilities which Heaven hath graciouſly given them, find pure water, which they ſuffer to diſtil for the publick good, as through the conduit of their liberalities. All that which the holy Writ and eloquent tongues of the Fathers thunder out, repleniſhed with threats, horrour, and malediction againſt riches, is not underſtood but of thoſe whereof the vices of men, and not the condition of the things, have made the uſe damnable. Such riches are deceitful ſhadows, which cover an apparent good under an undoubted evil: they are hands, that take their Maſter by the throat; they are poinyards with a golden haft, which delight the eyes with vain ſeemings, and pierce the heart with mortal wounds; they are precipices, furniſhed with precious jewels, ſuch as Heliogabalus deſired to illuſtrate his death with; they are hights, which are not meaſured but by their falls; they are deadly poiſons ſteeped in a golden cup. For this cauſe Euſebius Emyſſenus ſaid: Poor man, who admireſt thoſe that are on the top of the wheel of the favours and riches of the world, whereunto they have aſcended by iniquitie, are maintained by violence, and cannot deſcend but by headlong ruin! How blind are you to have thoughts ſo unmanly and unworthy of a Chriſtian? Eſteem you a frantick man to be ſtout and couragious, who ſtabs himſelf with a poinyard? Say you, he hath a brave ſteddie hand, who hits his own heart right with a daggers point? Say you that man is happie who holdeth the ſhadow of good in his hands, to produce to himſelf an eternitie of evils? Who hath ever ſaid, He who nimbly mounteth on a rock to precipitate himſelf, was an able man? Who hath ſaid, ſeeing him on the ſteepie cliffs top ready to fall, This man is happie, all the world hath an eye upon him? Who hath ſaid of him, that hath a golden cup in his hand filled with poyſon, This man is fortunate to drink in ſo rich a goblet? And you yet daily ſay the ſame, when you behold a man in the iniquitie of ill gotten goods covetous, ungrateful, diſloyal, perfidious to God and men; you think him happie, and ſee not that he twiſteth his own ruin in threads of gold and ſilver. Such riches are damnable. It is true. But who maketh them damnable? The perverſe diſpoſition of men. Take away vice which is not of the eſſence of riches, you will find they are a great prop to virtue, and a powerful motive to perfection, for thoſe that poſſeſs them. It is to you, Noblemen, to whom S. Hierom (a) addreſſeth this worthy ſaying: To you it appertaineth to have riches, to tread them under your feet, and not carrie them on your head: the more they are under you, the more they raiſe you, and the more they elevate you to perfection. The reaſons are manifeſt and pertinent.

Firſt, it is a matter very difficult to preſerve a great virtue in a great povertie, it being given but to very few ſouls; yea, and to thoſe of the beſt temper. The poorer ſort ordinarily have ſo much employment to think how to live, that little time remaineth for them to think how to live well. The bellie that hath no bread, hath no ears; and precepts of wiſdom are found very ſhort and inſufficient, among people perplexed and over-whelmed with want. A father of a family who beholdeth poverty in his houſe, beſides a multitude of children ranked like Organ-pipes, whom he muſt cloath, feed, and provide for; who ſeeth creditours attending on him at their day, ſergeants dogging him, proceſſes that afflict him, cattel caſually to die on the one ſide, his houſe utterly to ſink on the other ſide; his debts not payable but with bankrupting, and rents to fail him at a need, hath full enough to do to caſt time, as the proverb ſaith, behind his back. Neceſſitie many times is the mother of vice, and when one hath no more goods, he is in danger to do that which is not good. Behold why the Wiſe-man asked of God, if not great riches, at the leaſt exemption from povertie. You who have, be it great or indifferent means, are not brought into this penury, if you call not that a penury, when you cannot ſatisfie an exorbitant concupiſcence, which hath no other pleaſure than exceſs, nor other bounds but infinitie. You ſee in your houſe a ſettled eſtate far diſtant from the multitude of diſcontents, under which ſo many mortal men do groan; ought not this to ſerve you for ſome ſmall motive to perfection? See you not in Geneſis, how God, willing to exerciſe Adam in a contemplative life, cauſed him to find at his firſt coming, houſe, table, bed, and cloath laid? If it had then behoved him to take pains to get his dinner, and build himſelf a houſe, as little birds do their neſts, then had he had pain and care; but to the end he ſhould have full liberty for his Maſters affairs, God took all obſtacles from him, that he might have no cauſe to accuſe any man in his miſerable misfortune, but his own ingratitude. O you Noblemen, God uſeth you as Adam in terreſtrial Paradiſe, he ſuffereth you to eat the corn at eaſe, which others have ſowed, and the wine which others preſſed; he cauſeth your meat to come to your tables, as if it were born by certain inviſible engines; he holdeth the elements, creatures, and men in breath, not onely to ſupply your neceſſities, but your well-beſeeming accommodation: and can you then think he requireth a thing unreaſonable of you, if giving you all things above other men, he would have you virtuous as other men?

Difficulties of the poor in virtue.

Mendicitatem & divitias, ne dederis mihi, tribue tantum victui meo neceſſaria, ne neceſſitate compulſus furar, & perjurem nomen Dei mei. Prov. 30. 8.

Priviledges of Nobilitie.

Secondly I ſay, poor men, admit the caſe they be not Euſebius Emyſ. Hom. de Sancta Epiphania niſi ſit Epiſcopus Rhegienſis. An tu hunc hominem potentem & felicem vocas, qui in ſuam mortem fortis eſt? Cui proventuum fallax umbra præſentium æternorum congregat cauſas malorum? Quis beatum ſibi putet, qui tam diſerit validam in ſuum jugulum dexteram? Quis laudet velocem ad arcua præcipitia feſtinantem? Quis ejus miretur aſcenſum, quem de ſummo proſpicit eſſe caſurum? An illum felicem vocas qui gemmato atque auro ſibi poculo venena miſcet?

not so pressed with painful necessities of life, and that time passeth with them a little more sweetly, they may perhaps deafly attend devotion in the silence of a little family, but their virtue is not strong enough in the wing, to take a long and distant flight, nor have they arm enough to undertake great enterprises. Their little authority maketh their words not to have much weight, nor their actions (how laudable soever) to be of power to draw others to imitate them. Besides, rich men sometimes have an avertion from doing well, for fear they should have virtue common with the poor, from whom they would (if it were possible) be separated even in elements; but great men are ever powerful to authorize good works. I leave you to think, if many not through malice, but by the servile slavery of complacencie, do praise even their vices and imperfections, what will they do with their virtues? For we must not suppose, (as saith the Wise-man) that the state of hell is wholly established upon earth, and good conscience eternally banished: many are vitious more through infirmitie (as not being able to resist the tyrannie of opinion and custom) than out of affection they bear to vice. If it happen, rich men advance the standard of piety, all the world rangeth themselves under their banner: some that were willing and not daring to do it; others though unwilling, were drawn along with a swinge of superiority, which they would not contradict. This is an argument which I will hereafter deduce more at large, when I shall speak of example. And from hence, O you rich men, judge, if God giving you such a liberty and reputation to do well, you make ill use thereof, what neglect you fall into, when you employ your authority to raise vice with a strong hand, and put virtue in dis-estimation. Anciently pearls were called ushers, because they made way for Ladies who were adorned with them. Rightly may now riches bear the like name; every where they are obeyed; every where they make place: it is a good reason, if all the world serve them for ushers, they do the same office for piety, without which all their goodly lustre will be but unjust pillage. Then shall they potently reign, when they have restored virtue to her throne.

Authoritie of great men to strengthen their devotion.

Pearls are ushers, saith Seneca.

Finally, to conclude with a third, and in my opinion the most formal reason, which evidently declareth how riches are absolute obligations unto you of Christian perfection: it is, that God seemeth to have enchased all in the charity which is exercised towards our neighbour: Give alms, and behold your selves wholly pure. This practice of giving alms is so excellent, that God hath chosen no other for himself. His nature is to give, and to do good, as fire to heat, and the sun to illuminate, saith the eloquent Synesius. And to speak unto you the richest word which ever came out of the mouth of a Paynim: It is Plinie, who after he had well wandred through all sects of Philosphers, describing the essence of God, pronounceth this goodly sentence, That the greatest divinitie is, to see a mortal man oblige his like, and that it is the shortest way to arrive at eternal glorie. We also see in the Canticles, the hands of the Spouse compared to golden globes, which in them hold the sea enclosed. These hands are of gold, to denote to us the munificence of God, by this symbole of charity: His hands are globes made round, there is nothing rugged, clammy, or bowed; nay they are smooth, neat, polite, to pour his blessings incessantly upon men. They always emptie themselves, and are always repleniished; for they are filled with a sea of liberality which never will be exhausted.

Deus est mortali juvare mortalem, & hac ad eternam gloriam via. Plin. l. 2. c. 7.

Cant. 5. Manus ejus globi aurei, pleni mari. Where our translation saith, manus ejus tornatiles, aureæ, plenæ Hyacinthi. Hands of God a golden bowl full of the sea.

God then having bounty so natural and intrinseal in him, will needs see it shine in his servants, and therein establisheth salvation and perfection. Which admitted, who seeth not, O you rich men, you have a particular obligation above all others, since God hath elected you to be the Stewards of his goods, the messengers of his favours, and the conduits of his liberality? Religious men, who have given the tree and the fruit all at once, have nothing more to give. The indifferently rich are ordinarily full of appetites, and produce no effects. You have power in your hands to discharge the duties of all the world, you have met with the Philosophers stone, you have the books of a heavenly alchimy in your coffers, you have a golden rod, which can turn the durty pelf of India into celestial substance. Consider what greater ties of duty can you have, what more pressing necessity to be perfect, than to have the instrument of perfection in your full power? Perswade your selves no longer that riches are impediments of glory and salvation; for this unhappiness proceedeth not but from corruption and ill custom; if you take them on a false byass, they are of lead, to drench and drown you; if on a good, they are feathers to bear and lift you up to Heaven. Prophane storie maketh mention of one Sesostris King of Egypt, who triumphantly rode in a chariot drawn by Kings, he was so swoln with the success of his prosperities. It was to take the way of hell in the chariot of pride, so to triumph; but you may in the chariot of charity, all glittering with gold and silver, harnessed out with poor men (each person whereof representeth the Sovereign King who raiseth all Imperial sceptres) take the right way of Paradise, and that by the means of riches. Then judge whether they lead to true felicity or no. If you love these terrene things, you do well; love them boldly, but as the objects of your glorie, as the instruments of your salvation, as a gift of your friend, as a benefit from your Master, as the earnest-penny of your spouse, as the pledge of your predestination.

The fifth REASON.

Drawn from perfections of the bodie.

IT is a lamentable misery to behold, how sin hath so perverted the nature of things, that it not onely giveth ill under the appatance of good, but also sometimes evil effects to that which is good. Behold for as much as concerneth the perfections of the bodie, (not speaking here of health, or strength, wherewith the Great-ones are not always the best provided:) beauty, grace, or garb, which seem to be more connatural to them, they are so cried down by the corruption of manners, that one knoweth not what apt place to give them either among things good or evil. S. Augustine speaketh with indifferency in these tearms: Beauty of bodie is a benign gift of God, but he bestows it often on the bad, that the good may not deem it a great good. Not onely the writings of Saints, and of most austere religious, have made great invectives against beauty, but even those who at other times have with passion praised it, condemned it, as soon as they became wise. Petrarch, that worthy spirit, after he had adored a humane beauty, doth suddenly cast down the Altars thereof under his feet, and dis-avowed in ripe age, that which foolish youth had made him vehemently commend. For what saith he not in his book of the vanitie of the world, which he entituleth the Remedies of Fortune? You who establish your glorie in the beauty of the bodie, know, you have an enemie under your roof, and which is worse, a flattering and with-delight-tempting enemie. You harbour a thief, who stealeth your repose and time, two the most pretious things of the world. You lodge an executioner,

Who always will hold you to the rack and torture. You entertain a subject of toil and affliction, a motive of warfare and contention, an incendiarie of sensual appetite, which is no less capable of hatred than love. This deceitful beauty putteth a snare on your feet, a veil over your eyes, and bird-lime on your wings. It is a superficial grace, which covereth with the smooth delicacie of the skin loathsom and horrible stenches; so with her poison charming the drunken senses. Another (a) saith, it is the nurse of love, the spur of sin, and that virtue lodged with beauty, hath always a slippery foot, as being in the house of a dangerous hostess. S. Chrysostom (b) in an Homily which he made upon the vain beauty of women, hath delicate observations, not being able sufficiently to admire the sottishness of those cold-starved Amorists, who hasten to roast themselves in the ashes.

Κόνεως κάλλιον τὸ σῶμα. Defence of beauty as the gift of God.

Notwithstanding all these sayings of wise men, we must affirm that beauty and graceful comeliness of bodie, is a great gift of God, able to do infinit good, when they once hold correspondence with sincere virtue: and therefore they rather ought to be esteemed among the motives of well doing, than the instruments of mischief, it being unreasonable to condemn a benefit of God the Creatour, for the abuse of men, since no man blameth the candle that clearly burneth in the house, though butter-flies sindge their wings in it. For proof whereof I will produce three reasons onely, which seem forcible enough to convince the understandings of wise men, and evidently declare to all those that are endowed with corporal beauty, the injurie they do to God, when they abuse the beauty of the bodie to the hinderance of the soul, and drag the gifts of God along in the dust.

First it is undoubted, that to attribute the work of corporal beauty to any other original than that of the wisdom and goodness of God, were to apostatize from Christianitie, and to ranck ones self among the Manicheans. God necessarily approveth beauty, since he himself is the authour thereof. He hatched it in his bosom, as light in the East, and distributively spred it upon all the creatures of the earth, as the rays of a bright day. Man hath been from the beginning the best provided for, since God hath made him as it were a Scutcheon whereon he hath pourtrayed all the titles of the most excellent beauties of the world. Origen saith, he is fair as the firmament, which we see enameled with so many stars, that resplendently shine, as torches lightened before the Altar of the Omnipotent. S. Chrysostom, that the Angels are the morning stars, whereof mention is made in Job, who incessantly praise God, and men are the evening stars, fashioned by the hand of God, with the same beauty in proportion to do the same office. And S. Ambrose, that God the Creatour, for singular testimony of love, hath granted to man the same graceful habiliments with which he himself is garnished, all which are nothing but beauty. Behold whether this be not highly to raise the merit of beauty? I adde hereunto also two considerations very pertinent, which Favorinus hath judiciously observed in the book he composed of the excellency of man. It is, that the Creatour, who hath given beauty to man in proportion, hath by the same mean impressed in his heart a love so tender, that every well understanding man would rather desire to be reduced to nothing, (an estate which some have less accounted of than that of the damned) than to be translated according to the imaginations of Pythagoras, into the form and figure of some ugly and monstrous beast. The other reason is, that the wisest Nations (as he observeth) detesting the beastlinesse of those, who have clothed the Divinitie in shapes of beasts, have made expresse decrees, forbidding all painters, gravers, and image-makers to represent God in any other figure than of man. And the reason they give is very admirable: for you would say if you heard them, they had already some knowledge of this great alliance, which should be made between the Divine and humane nature, when they said, That God was not a lover of horses or birds, but a true lover of men, and that he was much pleased to be conversant with those who were most virtuous and capable of his presence. Ponder with your self whether this beauty (which God from the infancy of the world hath so carefully lodged in man) ought not to be esteemed an important thing, and a strong motive to virtue?

Natural beauty of man praised by Poets.

For the second reason I say, that God making use of it in good occasions, it is an infallible mark he approveth the nature thereof; for never doth he purposely make use of things unlawful, to make the greatness of his counsels and works succeed. Now it appeareth, that he oftentimes hath chosen beauty as an instrument of his wonders, a lightening-flash of his power, a bright torch of his victories. As when he purposed to stay the violent stream of Olofernes arms, he could with an omnipotent hand have touched the rocks, and made men to rush out in armed equipage, yet notwithstanding without stretching his hand to any other miracle, he railed the beauty of a widow, to triumph over the flourishing legions of the prime Monarch of the world, and himself added a certain air, or gracious garb of attractive parts in Judith, to surprise this barbarous commander, drunk with love and wine, in the snare of her eyes. He fought with the self same engine, with the same arms against the proud and insolent Aman; for when he was ready to command the throats of infinit numbers to be cut, as sheep marked for the slaughter, God set a frail beauty before him, which made him leap from the height of fortunes wheel, to the strangest calamitie that may be imagined, and changing in an instant King Ahasuerus from a Lion into a Lamb, confirmed the safety and liberty of her people.

Beauty an instrument of God.

Esther. 8.

Would you have greater proofs, of the estimation which God maketh of beauty wedded to virtue, than his affording it so glorious triumphs? Hath not the Son of God consecrated the same in his own most illustrious Person, and in that of his most holy Mother, whom ancient traditions (joyned with the interpretation of the Fathers upon the texts of Scripture) shew to have been endowed with an admirable grace and singular beauty, to serve even as an adamant to captivate hearts, and sweetly range them under the yoak of the Gospel? I am not ignorant, that Clemens Alexandrinus thought our Saviour was willing purposely to deprive himself of corporal beauty, as from the possession of riches, searching out in all things the greatest lowlinesse; but in this proposition he hath grounded himself upon a passage of the Prophet Isaiah, which describing the Savior of the world, in the day of his passion saith, We have seen him, and he had neither favour nor beauty. This foundation is ruinous, and this Authour doth no otherwise than as a painter, who to represent the Moon in her proper nature, should delineate her in her eclipse. Other Authours, grounded on this passage of the Psalm 44. speciosus forma præ filiis hominum, assure us our Saviour expresly selected for himself an excellent beauty of body, and a supream grace of speech. Nicephorus relateth certain lineaments of his stature, colour, and proportion of his bodie, which he drew out of antiquitie, in all parts lovely and specious. And S. Epiphanius speaking of the beauty of the blessed Virgin, saith, She was Majesty it self. Judge, and behold, since God (voluntarily despoiling himself of honours, riches and greatness of the world, to give us an example of humility) would notwithstanding sanctifie beauty in himself and and his Mother, what value you ought to set upon this Heavenly gift, and whether it be lawful for you to profane it. Moreover I affirm, that the Creatour hath not onely cherished beauty, but hath likewise held in account the instruments employed to the service thereof. It is a wonder that in Exodus he commanded Moses to make a brasen bason, with a foot to bear it, for the Priest to wash in, and to furnish and adorn it with looking-glasses, who kept (as it were) centinel before the gate of the Tabernacle: To what purpose was it to fasten these mirrours in a holy place, to this sacred vessel? Theodoret, Saint Cyril, and Procopius observe, that the Ægyptians went to the sacrifices of Isis, clothed with a linen garment, holding a scepter in one hand, and a looking-glass in the other, and that the Hebrew women afterward appeared in the desert in the same manner. But God, who would shew the spoils of Ægypt were reserved for his greatness, caused them to lay aside these mirrours, to consecrate the use of them in his own Tabernacle. The Hebrew Interpreters yield another reason, to wit, that the Israelites seeing themselves to languish in Ægypt, in the setters of a painful bondage, had resolved to abstain from the act of marriage, that they might get no children to inherit their misery. But God, who intended another web, different from that which the thoughts of men wove, stirred the women, who tricked and adorned themselves so well with these Ægyptian looking-glasses, that they enkindled the chaste loves of their husbands, buried under the ashes of their servitude, to produce a posteritie, by help whereof the Nations of the earth should be blessed. And this action of the women so pleased Almighty God, that he afterward caused these mirrours to be placed in his Tabernacle, which they had used to grace that beauty, which had been the cause of so much good. It then being so, see you not God hath made himself a favourer, and a protectour of corporal beauty; who then dare to condemn it?

Power of beauty.

In the third place, I adde, this command which beauty exerciseth over hearts, is not a thing due to human forces, to the end that nature become not ambitiously proud; it is God who (as it were) imprinteth with his finger upon the foreheads of men, and especially of great ones, the beams of grace and majestie, to make them more reverenced of the people, which he doth to excellent purpose; but the creature sinisterly abuseth the gifts of the Creatour.

Maximus Tyrius saith, that a fair soul in a fair bodie is as a river, that windingly creepeth with many wavie turnings within the enamel of a beautiful meadow, and ravisheth the whole world with the admiration of its excellency. A brave Oratour in a Panegyrike he made of Constantine, who was one of the goodliest Princes of the earth, saith that nature was sent of God as a gallant Harbinger, to compose a bodie for him suitable to his great spirit, as a stately house for a beautiful Ladie in it; and that onely this exteriour form made him to be beloved and esteemed of all the world, no less then a God descended from Heaven. Which is also much more admirable in the other sex. How many Monarchs, after they had with horrour terrified the world, have been seen to become tributaries to a mortal beauty, captives to their slaves; and how many to buy out their bondage, have yielded at the feet of silly women, to do services, and commit follies unworthy to be remembred on paper? Bathsheba was neither a Lion, a Goliah, nor a Saul, yet notwithstanding with the glance of an eye, she powerfully quelled him who tore Lions, trampled Goliah under feet, and resisted all the arms, power and legions of Saul. The Philistines found not cords strong enough to bind robustious Samson in; yet Dalila quickly captived, and fast tied him with one hair of her head. Solomon had a heart as deep as the sea, yet women found the bottom of it. It is a wonder what Pythagorical transmutations this beautie of bodie maketh, which causeth it to be acknowledged and esteemed every where a true tyrannie without an executioner, as Carneades calleth it. Doubtless the impostures, the sinister intentions, the unchaste loves, the abuses which are affixed to beauty, proceed from the sleights of Satan, and depraved will of man: but the lustre and commanding power thereof, is the real gift of God, which operateth that in humane bodies, which the Sun doth in the clouds, to form a Rainbowe in the Heavens.

Beauty of Constantine.

Carneades apud Lactantium.

Ladies, think hereon; you to whom God hath imparted this grace, this delicate composition of bodie, whether it be not a great motive to you, to serve him well, and to employ it wholly to his glorie? You shall be accountable for your beauty at the Judgement-day, even to the least hair of your head. If you harbour an ill hostess in this goodly mansion, which God hath builded for his service, a wicked soul, an unchaste soul; if you make glorious vaunts of borrowed coyn, of a fading flower, the spoil whereof time, age, sickness, and death will divide between them; if you display a scandalous nakedness, to kindle the fewel of lustful affection; if you seek the courtship and unlawful love of men, with a gift which is not yours; if you so often consult with your looking-glasses, and take so much pain gaudily to dress and attire your selves for a meer vanitie, which you turn into an absolute profession, you shall be the marks of the wrath, and vengeance of God. This great Justicier, will suffer this malediction pronounced by the Prophets, to fall upon you, That your carkasses shall one day be drawn out of their tombs, shall be shewed to the eyes of Heaven, and to the rays of the Sun; and it shall be said, Behold the bones of them who heretofore have boasted the frail beauty of a little white skin, spred over these corrupt impurities! Worms and serpents now triumph thereon, as in a town taken by force, the bodies are a prey of putrefaction, and the souls have hell for their tomb.

Abuse of damnable beauty.

Ejicient ossa de sepulchris & expandent ea ad solem. Hier. 8.

O what a Catastrophe is this? Preserve your beauty for God, men love it as the hunters the flesh of the bore, but God cherisheth it as his Temple. Handle the matter so, that all the extent of its reputation and power may be limited to the service of it's Creatour. It shall have command sufficient, if it obey him that created it. A good Authour relateth, that a strong town debauched, was heretofore reformed by the beauty of women, who seriously addicting themselves to virtue, never beheld any of all those with a good will, who required them by the way of lawful marriage, that had not first ranged themselves in the lists of devotion and piety. This was an effectual means to extirpate vice, and gloriously advance the standard of perfection in such sort, that in short time the face of the Citie was seen to be changed. Practise the same, and God will bless your beauties, when they shall offer all their homage to his Altars.

The sixth REASON.

Drawn from the beauty of the soul.

Excellencies of the soul remarkeable.

THe beauty of the bodie compared to that of the soul, is but as a candle in comparison of the Sun. All the greatness, Empire, and signorie of man, doth onely flow from the excellencie of the soul, as a streaming brook from the fountain head. If the bodie be a fair shell, the soul is the pearl.

pearl. If the bodie be the lantern, the ſoul is the light. If the bodie (as S. Ambroſe ſaith) be the triumphant chariot of the peaceable Solomon, the ſoul is the Queen, which ſitteth thereon to guid and govern it. If the bodie be as the green moſs of ſome ſea-neighbouring rock, the ſoul is the diamód, which within hideth it's luſtre. It is the well-beloved of God, which is fallen from his mouth into this mortal priſon; it is that which advantageouſly is marked with his ſtamp and image, it is that which beareth the rays and exteriour lineaments of this great Majeſty; it is that on which the Creatour hath diſtended his royal purple, as is ſaid in the Prophet Ezechiel: And this royal garment is no other, than a collection of all the perfections of creatures, contracted in the ſoul of man, as the figure of the world would be in the circumference of a ring. And as heretofore Aaron the High-Prieſt of the old law, bare upon his robe the whole world, embroidered and heightened in Gold-ſmiths work: in the ſame manner our ſoul beareth in its liveries all created excellencies, which are moſt lively repreſentations of the perfection of the Creatour. The Seventie Interpreters in the fore-alledged place of the attire of the ſoul, called it by the word τρίχωμα, which is very obſcure; our Tranſlation ſoundeth it, a thin and ſlender garment; indui te ſubtilibus: Origen deriveth it from the Greek word θρὶξ which ſignifieth hair, as it were ſaying, that this habit of the ſoul, is an attire woven with moſt fine hair, & ſo ſubtile, that the moſt ſtrong and ſharpened ſights, cannot penetrate the contexture. Faith teacheth us it is a ſubſtance, which is not ſubſtance of Elements, nor ſubſtance of God, but a ſubſtance created of nothing by the Word of God, reaſonable, intellectual, ſpiritual always active, always lively, ſo capable, that nothing but God can repleniſh it. He that will know more than the eternal Wiſdom hath revealed, and will not believe it immortal for his glory, ſhall feel it immortal by the eternity of puniſhments, ſaith S. Auguſtine. It is not my preſent purpoſe to ſpeak either of the excellency or immortality of the ſoul, having fundamentally treated theſe queſtions in other diſcourſes: I onely ſpeak of this part of the ſoul, which we commonly call the ſpirit. It is undoubtedly true, that all men have one ſoul of the ſame kind, but very different in their functions and qualities. In ſome this their ſoul ſleepeth perpetually in fleſh and fat, and abideth as a ſword beſet and garniſhed with Diamonds, always ſheathed in a ſcabard of ſtraw and morter, without a ſtroke ſtriking; all we can do, is to find ſome ſparkling glimmers of common ſenſe and reaſon therein. In others this ſoul glittereth and twinkleth from its moſt tender years, afterward it penetrateth the clouds, and diveth into bottomleſs abyſſes, with great promptneſs, fervour, and vivacitie; and that is called the ſpirit, which ordinarily we behold in great and noble men, excellently well thereunto diſpoſed: for they are for the moſt part docible, intelligent, capable; from whence I draw a great motive of the obligation they have in this point ſeriouſly to diſpoſe themſelves to virtue.

Conſtantine the Great, heretofore made a law, by which he forbade to adorn the Countrey to the prejudice of the Citie: If any bodie after the publication of this law, be found to tranſport the ornaments of Cities, to wit, Marbles and Columns, to Countrey-dwellings, let him be deprived of the poſſeſſion thereof. Oh alas! Our ſoul is the Citie of God, garniſhed with ſo many fair embelliſhments, titles, trophies, ſo many triumphant arches, ſo many graces! Yet notwithſtanding, O Noblemen, it often happeneth, you forſake the Citie to build in the Countrey, to leave your ſouls barren, languiſhing, bare and naked, whileſt you in the mean time ſtretch all your ſinews, all your veins, to the decking and eaſeful commodities of the bodie. You deſerve to be deprived of your poſſeſſions and inheritance, ſince you manure it ſo careleſſly.

I will onely propoſe two or three reaſons, to demonſtrate how unworthy a thing it is, to apply a noble ſpirit to trifles and ſottiſh toys, which eaſily may be proved, but not ſufficiently commiſerated. Firſt, it cannot be denied, but that every thing which exceedeth the limits of its own nature, thereby becometh very irregular: we ſee all the elements, plants, beaſts, and all creatures of the world, do conſtantly hold the ranck, which God the Creatour appointed them. The fire always retaineth its heat; the water though it be boyled on burning coles, returneth to its natural coldneſs: honey aſſumeth not the nature of wormwood, the Lion playeth not the Ape, nor doth the Eagle become an Oſtrich, to trail her wings on the ground. Now the nature of the ſpirit, how much the more noble and elate it is, ſo much the more it ought to transfer it ſelf to the conſideration of things divine, to wit, from whence it cometh, whither it goeth, what within it ſelf it acteth. This is (ſaith the Oracle of Roman Philoſophie) an infallible mark of a divine ſpirit, when it pleaſeth it ſelf to diſcourſe of things divine, and is entertained in theſe contemplations, as with her familiar and peculiar affairs. Judge then what indignitie it is, to bury this vigour and light of the ſpirit, which God ſo freely hath communicated to you, in frivolous employments and petty fopperies, which diſcolour the luſtre and honour of your name. What a ſhame it is to ſay this Sovereign hand hath moulded man to be the King of creatures, and he betraying his nature, maketh himſelf the Comedian, the mimike ſtage-player of all creatures, acting all ſorts of perſonages but the good, and that which his own excellency is obliged unto. Which verily is the ſame the great Tertullian deplored: Man is the work and image of God, who having apoſtatized from his Creatour as well in mind as bodie, maketh himſelf an Actour of all the evil perſonages in the great Comedie of the world. Yet that ſeemeth more tolerable in perſons who are not eminent, either in judgement, learning, or ſpirit; but Great-ones, whom God hath created advantageouſly to tranſcend all others, and who ſhould live and converſe among men like Angels, to play the Hogs and Monkeys, abaſing themſelves to I know not what kind of childiſhneſs of ſpirit, and to a life corrupted with the curious delights and voluptuouſneſs of the bodie; conſider (I pray) whether this be not a thing as unreaſonable in its own nature, as prodigious in the effects.

Secondly, It is to do a great wrong to ones ſelf, to live in ſuch faſhion; yea it is a meer frenzy which is not made probable to any man, but by the multitude of mad men. See you not very well, that to employ ſome rich and precious inſtrument, to a baſe and ſordid uſe, is an act of a man who hath loſt his wits? If you ſee a great Monarch employ his purple robe to ſtop an oven with, and his ſcepter to ſhake hay, you would crie, Out upon it: and yet the ſoul which God hath given you, incomparably more precious than the purple and ſcepter of Kings, you ſuffer to wallow in the filths of fleſh, you apply it to perpetual idle diſcourſes, to vanities, quarrels, and revenges. Is not this wholly to abuſe the gifts of Almightie God? It is ſaid, Nero took delight to dig the earth with a golden ſpade, and when there was queſtion about cutting the Iſthmus of Corinth (a deſign which long time troubled his brain) he went thither, led on with muſical violins, holding in his hand the golden ſpade, with which he began in the ſight of the whole world, to break the ground; a matter which ſeemed ridiculous to the wiſeſt living in that Age. For my own part, I find it more ſtrange, that a noble ſpirit ſhould amuſe it ſelf in things things frivolous and impertinent. For, to dig the earth with gold, was to bring back gold to its course, since it first sprang from the entrails of the earth: but for a heavenly spirit to delve in ordures, stenches and dung-hils, this is it which is wholly inexcusable, especially in the Nobilitie.

Sacrilege of fair souls.

In the third place, I say that such manner of proceeding is manifest sacrilege, for two reasons: the first is, it retaineth wickedly and traiterously, a thing sacred, for a profane use. S. Augustine in an Epistle that he wrote to Licentius, a young man of a noble spirit, which a little too loosely he abused in the vanities of the world, presseth this argument in these terms, If by chance you had found a golden Chalice in the streets, you would take it from the ground, and give it to the Church, otherwise it would be a sacrilege. God hath given you a soul all of gold, so excellent it is, so delicately purified; and you use it as an instrument of sensuality, and make of it a vessel of abomination, wherein you present your soul to Satan as a sacrifice. Fear you not the anger of God?

The other reason is, You not onely with-hold a vessel consecrated to the service of the Omnipotent, but you attempt upon the image of God himself. This fair spirit which he hath given you, as the flower and quintessence of your soul, is a true character of the Divinitie, and you hasten to prostitute it to publick affections. Remember, I pray, it hath heretofore been held a capital crime, to carrie the Emperours picture into a place undecent, or uncleanly: and expressly Paulus, a man of eminent qualitie, as one who had been Pretour, was accused and prosecuted as criminal under Tiberius, for that he took a chamber-pot into his hand, having a ring upon his finger graved with the Emperours form. And can you think it will be lawful for you to carrie, not a dead figure, but the living Image of your Heavenly Father, into the impurities and pollutions, which your exorbitant passions extrude, as the scummie froth of folly? Is not the blame most formidable, which God by the mouth of the Prophet Ezechiel, pronounceth against an ungrateful soul, in such manner abandoning it self? Ingrateful and wicked as thou art, thou then hast dared to take away the most precious vessels framed of my gold and silver, to make masculine idols, and so to satisfie thy fornications. Thou hast caused my oyl to burn, and incense to smoke before their altars. What ingratitude is like to this? Alas, what idols are daily made of the gold and silver of God, when so many brave spirits are employed to figure chymeras and monsters in their own sensual wills? What oyl burneth, and incense smoketh before the devils altar, when so many talents, so many perfections, are unprofitably wasted in vice and vanity? In the mean time, the 70. Canon of the Apostles excommunicateth those, who onely bear oyl to the Jews Synagogue, or the Paynims Temples. And in what account shall we hold the Christians, who make a perpetual sacrifice of all the faculties of their souls, to the corrupt vices and follies of the world?

Si quis Christianus oleum tulerit ad Ædes gentilium, vel Synagogam Judæorum festis ipsorum diebus, aut lucernas accenderit, de societate pellatur. Canon. Apost. 70.

Wise men affirm, that beside the fire which shall devour the bodies and souls of the damned for ever, there is a hell of science and conscience, which shall particularly torment those who have been endowed with a generous spirit, and have ill employed it. When Adam opened his eyes to see his nakedness, his spirit and knowledge served him for a keen knife to transfix his soul, his ignorance in that kind was a great part of his felicitie. What disastrous misery shall then befal those unhappy spirits of the damned, when they shall know their abilities, all the good things they might have done, and all the ill they have done? Although all the flames and tortures should surcease, they would find their hell in the eye of their own knowledge, and in their own understanding. No eye to a man is more troublesom than his own. It is that which the cloudie conscience desireth most to avoid, and can least do it, saith S. Bernard, speaking of the eye. Ponder hereon (O Noblemen) whether this motive meriteth not to be seriously considered. Hell vomiteth up brave spirits, who after they have served for instruments of vice, are now become the food of flames. Augment not the number. The knowledge of God, of ones self, and the studie of virtue, is a fair employment of a Noble spirit, wherein man cannot be too seriously busied, nor more fruitfully.

The seventh REASON.

Proceeding from Courage.

OF all these reasons before alledged, which serve as a spur to the Nobilitie, seriously to imbrace perfection, I see not any comparable to Courage, which is a force of spirit, consisting in two principal points, as Aristotle and S. Thomas observe, to wit, to undertake and suffer great things with judgement, and by the excitement of honesty. This courage among all the excellencies of the spirit, is powerful, elate, stirring and astonishing: and very well S. Ambrose compareth it to the river Tygris, which among all streams hath its current most swift and violent, so as with an unresistable impetuositie, it combatteth and surmounteth all obstacles opposed against it. Thus (saith he) Courage flieth through perils, breaketh throngs, and works it self a passage through a world of contrarieties. This courage is an Eagle which confronteth storms, a Lion which oppoſeth all violences, a Diamond which never is broken, a Rock which scorneth waves, an Anvile which resisteth all the strokes of the hammer. It is a thing which with admiration ravisheth heaven and earth, to behold in the flesh of a frail and feeble man, a spirit to make trial of all accidents, which is amazed at nothing, which surmounteth all difficulties, and which would rather cast it self into the gates of hell with undoubted loss of bodie, than into the least suspition of remisness. This striketh the spirit with admiration, and be it either in military actions or civil, Courage is highly valued, though success always answer not good enterprises; and enemies most cruel are enforced to admire a valour and vigour of spirit, that never bowed under an evil which it was not able to vanquish.

Greatness of Courage.

The Historie of Herodotus relateth, that one called Calimachus in the battel of Marathon, being found by the Persians stuck all over with arrows like a hedge-hog, standing boult upright amongst a heap of dead bodies, as if he had been under-propped by the counterpoize of the same arrows, they were so astonished with the dauntless valour of this dead man, that they held him as immortal. Never did Seneca so demonstratively shew the strength of his eloquence, as in praising the courage of Cato. This man (saith he) hath not opposed, nor fought with savage beasts; it is for hunters: He hath not pursued monsters with fire and sword, he lived not in an Age in which it was believed, that a man supported Heaven with his shoulders. Behold why he was not esteemed as a Hercules nor as an Atlas, who notwithstanding fought with greater monsters than Hercules. He carried another manner of burden than did the fabulous Atlas. He alone combated against ambition (a monster of many heads) against the vices of a degenerate Citie, and which daily, like an old house, was sinking with the excess of weight. This incomparable man supported the Roman Common-wealth, as long as he could; yea even when it fell into the abyſs of a thouſand lamentable confuſions, he yet held it up with a hand prompt, always upon the brink of the precipice; and not being able longer to under-prop it, over-born as he was by the violence of miſchiefs, he choſe his tomb in the ſepulchre of his Countrey. What greatneſs, what Majeſty! Undoubtedly courage hath ſo much luſtre and glitter, that obſtinacy it ſelf, which is a vice in all things elſe very hard and rude, being clothed with the mantle of courage, findeth much reputation amongſt men. Now this generoſitie of which we ſpeak, is a faithful and an inſeparable companion of true Nobilitie. All great men ordinarily have a courage very high, and even as certain brave Lacedemonians were born from their mothers womb, with a lance pourtrayed and characterized upon their skin; ſo all Noblemen ſeem to bring magnanimitie into the world, from the day of their birth. This might be a marvellous motive to lead them in a ſtraight and direct line, to great and valiant actions, were it not that the evil ſpirit inſtantly ſpreadeth a film over their eyes, and makes them feel impreſſions of meer ſluggiſhneſs, under the falſe veil of courage.

A lance graven on the skin. Dion. Chryſ. Orat. 4.

Two things, O Noblemen, will make you exactly accountable before the juſtice of God. The firſt, to abuſe this gift of courage with vanity. The ſecond, to defile it with cruelty. The one ſavours of childiſhneſs, the other of barbariſm. What can one imagine more weak and childiſh, than to have received a courage from God, capable to conquer Heaven, and to employ it in petty fopperies, wherein the thoughts better part, and the daysactions are waſted, to court a Ladie, to gormandize a banquet, nicely to quarrel upon the interpretation of a word, to ſuck up wind, to feed a fond curioſitie with other affairs, to buy plumes of feathers, to cenſure mens apparel, to dreſs himſelf up for dancing, to play at dice, to hold a racket in a Tennis-court, to play the Buffon in a feaſt, to utter a ſecret, to forge a calumnie, to envie one greater than himſelf, to deſpiſe equals, to baffle inferiours, and a thouſand other ſuch like exerciſes, which are the ruſt and moth of the ſpirit. Behold into what, theſe brave courages, which ſhould plant the Flower-deluces in the eaſt, are diſſolved. Is not this a ſhame? Is any thing more puniſhable, than ſo to abuſe the gifts of God? Is it not a goodly thing to behold in Poets a Jupiter, who hath forſaken his fiery chariot and winged horſes, letting all go at random, in the mean time to buſie himſelf in painting upon the clouds, ſometimes Goats, Apes and Centaurs? Behold what Great men do, when forſaking the duty of their charges, and the obligation of their profeſſions, they vilifie themſelves in inferiour actions, beſtowing therein a great part of their time, and (as it were) their whole ſpirit.

Baſeneſs of courage in certain Noble men.

A Jupiter painting goats on the clouds, what it ſignifies. Philoſt. in Apolon. lib. 21. cap. 10.

Vanity would alſo be more tolerable, were it not that it changeth into cruelty, which is apparent in the beaſtly quarrel and bloudy duels, that transform the nature of men into a brutiſhneſs abſolutely ſavage and tyrannous. We muſt draw iron out of the entrails of the earth, to make it (as it were) firſt to bluſh with ſhame, before it be ruddy with bloud, to ſee it ſelf employed to ſuch a uſe, to behold it ſelf ſharpened by the hands of men, to cut and transfix men: differences muſt be determined with the loſs of life. Theſe miſerable creatures, ſometimes for the interpretation of a word, ſometime through promptneſs of ſpirit, provoke one another to ſingle combat, they ſend a letter of challenge, the place of meeting is appointed; they chooſe God-fathers, as if they would make a baptiſm with a ſacrifice of furies, they procure Seconds, who well ſee, that to go upon cold bloud to hazard their lives in an unhappy combat, againſt a man that never had offended nor known them, is a ſublimitie of folly; notwithſtanding on they go tyrannically, led along by the laws of vain honour, which hath no other foundation but the ſottiſh brainſick-folly of men. All of them have for the moſt part more outward ſhew than malice, their hearts tremble with cold fear, in the conſideration of the peril to which they expoſe themſelves, yet their lips leave not to ſound vain-glorious bravadoes. They ſeek out ſolitary places like Sorcerers, and ſometime they go by Moon-ſhine to act this hateful outrage, not ſeeing at all, that God beholdeth them with as many eyes of vengeance, as the firmament hath ſtars. At the end of all this, they think to do an act full of courage, moſt Heroick and manly. What ſhall we ſay here? that this paſſion is a rage more than brutiſh, which hath for inheritance the death of the bodie, the eternal and irrecoverable loſs of the ſoul, the inevitable anger of God, the indignation of Kings, the thunder of laws, the execration of the juſt, the malediction of heaven and earth? No, this is not it which I now intend to ſpeak. For ſeeing I treat of generoſitie which obligeth the Nobilitie, firſt to Almighty God who giveth it, ſecondly to virtue which ſeeketh it as a moſt neceſſary inſtrument, I muſt ſhew that in this action of duels, pretended to be all courage, there is nothing leſs than courage in it. And although they were not liable to the vengeance of God, for being infringers of laws both divine and human, by this deteſtable manner of proceeding, yet they would be ever greater culpable, to blaſt and defile with this abject humour and remiſs ſpirit, the gift of courage, which is particularly granted to them out of the treaſury of Heaven.

Reaſons.

Againſt duels

I know not what falſe ſpectacles are clapt over the eyes of the Nobilitie, by the ſpirit of lies, forged in the ſhop of hell, which oftentimes make them to take glaſs for Diamond, and a Keſtrel for a Faulcon. Yes verily, you have a certain bird in the myſterie of faulconry, called the Hobby, which coupleth with the race of Faulcons, Goſhawks, and Sparhawks: Yea this wretched bird doth alſo mix with the Saker and Lanaret, ſhe flieth after the Faulconers, and hovering over the field, if the dogs ſpring ſome little bird, ſhe ſowceth upon it, making boaſts over this feeble creature, ſeeing ſhe hath neither heart nor reſolution to grapple with the great ones. Juſtly herein behold the model of a Gallant, who maketh profeſſion to preſent the letter of challenge to call others to duel: he hath degenerated from true Nobilitie and real courage, which is produced in goodly and great actions, undertaken for the ſervice of God and his King; he hath no longer left in him ought but a little fierce rebellious ſpirit, to peck at thoſe whom his own temerity judgeth more weak than himſelf. And ſhall then this man be taken for a man of courage? O Noblemen, ſee you not that true actions of courage are too high and eminent, to impart their worth and honour to lackeys and horſboys? Now it is ſo come to paſs, that there is not any inferiour foot-man nor petty groom of a ſtable, that will not watch to take revenge by duel, that will not endeavour to determine differences by ſome kind of ſingle combat. There is not any vain braggard deſcended from ignoble plebeyan parents, under the pretence that he carrieth a pen in his ear, (which peradventure might be the ſword and lance that his father or grand-father made boaſts of upon a ſhread of parchment, to gain 6 d. a day) that ſtriveth not to have a ſword of a good temper, to provoke his adverſary to ſingle combat, and the more infamous he is, the more audaciouſly he furniſheth himſelf out for this enterpriſe, preſuppoſing that this is a true means cloſely to cover his baſe condition. Anciently in the wifeſt and moſt valorous Kingdom of the world, thoſe which engaged themſelves in theſe duels, were people gathered out of the dregs and leas lees of men, ſlaves, vagabonds, and loytering rogues, furnitures for a gibbet: then judge you, if it be not a madneſs to ſay, you deſire in all things to ſeparate your ſelves far from the multitude, to enworthy and diſtinguiſh your Nobilitie, and yet in this one action alone, you leſſen and vilifie your courage, even to the condition of the moſt captive and abominable creatures of the earth.

Great want of generoſitie in duels.

You will ſay, That is true, but a man cannot refuſe a duel when he is urged. Why? Becauſe ſhame and ignominie always attend, ſay you, on theſe denials. See you not by this anſwer, you give arms againſt your ſelf, and freely confeſs that a duel is not an action of courage? For to lay apart the ordinances of the Church, take but the laws of Ariſtotle, a worldly man as your ſelf, and more than you, doth not he moſt pertinently demonſtrate in his Ethicks, that it is not an action of valour, when a ſouldier is valiant, while his Captain hath ſet the enemie on one ſide, and a river on the other, to enforce him to fight? or becauſe a Sergeant of a band is ready to transfix the veins of his back with a halbard, if he retire? Virtue which is not virtue, but for avoidance of diſhonour, is true puſillanimitie under the veil of falſe courage. I then demand of you, who more tyrannically aſſaulteth a man, either the Sergeant of a band, who thruſteth a ſword into his reins, or the point of honour which poſſeſſeth his brains? Without all doubt you will agree with me, that there is no tyrannie comparable to that of this mad duel, which is called Point of honour. And in the mean ſpace, becauſe (forſooth) this goodly Sergeant of a band enforceth you, and beareth you forward upon the hips with the helve of a halbard, you muſt haſten to a duel, you muſt go to precipitate your ſelf into the throat of hell, whereas otherwiſe were it not for the ſhame of the world, you would not ſtir a foot. Behold a brave act of courage.

Ethic. c. 8.

What then ſhall we anſwer to thoſe who provoke you? That which conſcience permitteth, and Doctour Bannes adviſeth; that you ſeek not dens nor cavems, that you go into every place with your head erected, and if they ſhall be ſo temerarious as to aſſault you, they may find you upon that defence which the law of nature permitteth. Behold a good anſwer for a Doctour, but the world is not paid in ſuch coyn. Anſwer them as the wiſeſt among worldlings, Auguſtus Cæſar to Mark Anthony, who challenging him in ſingle combat, he cauſed in plain terms to be ſaid unto him, that when the diſpair of the ſucceſs of his affairs ſhould reduce him to the furious rage of hating his life, yet he would find out other ways to die much more honeſt, than by this butchetly frenzie. Yea but this is an anſwer of a coward. This coward in the mean time eſtabliſhed the prime Empire of the world, ſtruggling by ſtrength of arm againſt a torrent both of arms and opinions, which hindered his paſſage, conſtraining the whole world to yield obedience to his valour; and he that challenged him with all his magnanimitie and courage, died in the arms of a woman; rage and effeminacie ſharing the reſt of his life, as well as the triumph of his death. Behold you not a goodly courage? Howſoever the matter ſtands in refuſing of a duel, the diſhonour of the world cannot be eſchewed. What is the world? A maſs of mad men. If you have ſworn to pleaſe them by ſacrificing your bloud, your life, with the damnation of your ſoul, are you not then the moſt miſerable ſlave that ever was fettered in the guives of a rigorous ſervitude? Are you not a ſoul prodigiouſly ſervile, ſo far off are you from having one ſole point of courage? We then muſt go out of the world? Leave it, if you cannot live without the damnation of your ſoul; be gone, break the chains immediately. But I am too much bound, it is fit the goat brouſe where he is faſtened. What counſel ſhall one give you? You can neither go nor ſtay. Reſolve then to live in the world, trampling under your feet the opinion of the world, ſubjecting the laws of the earth to the Empire of Heaven, and then fear not but you ſhall have courage enough.

The eighth REASON.

Proceeding from education.

ONe of the greateſt benefits which man can receive at Gods hands, is the favourable bleſſing of good education. It is it which polliſheth and puriſieth nature, as one would do a precious ſtone, wholly defiled with earth and filthy ordure; it is it which maketh men become Angels, and without it the goodlieſt and beſt natures would perpetually dwell in brutiſhneſs. The Hiſtorie of Germanie telleth us, that heretofore a child was taken in the forreſts, which was preſented to Henrie Landgrave of Haſsia. From four years old he had been bred among wolves, the wolves taught him to go on four feet as a bruit beaſt, he went a forraging with the wolves, he divided the prey with the wolves, he ſlept amongſt the wolves to be the more warm; to conclude, he wholly became wolf. When he came to be made tractable and tame, they were enforced to tie his hands to ſtaves, to teach him to go as men do, yet did he break all to return to the condition of a wolf: ſo powerful is the force and tyrannie of education. Another ſucking the milk of a ſow, took a ſingular pleaſure to wallow in the dirt; and lambs nouriſhed with goats milk, retain the roughneſs of hair.

Force of education.

A wolf-child.

Hereupon judge, O you Noblemen, what obligation you have to the Divine Majeſty, and what motive to tread the paths of perfection, ſince ordinarily (as I intend here to prove) you meet with all thoſe things which may conduce to the happineſs of good education. How many ſpirits think you are there in the world, that for want of education remain as diamonds buried in a dung-hill, which if once you unearth and free from ruſt and putrefaction, will ſet the ſun before your eyes? Behold an infant bleſſed with a beautiful bodie, a fair ſpirit, but yet born with a yoak on his neck, the yoak of povertie and ſervitude. The condition of his birth hath ſhut him in a cage, what means then, I pray, hath he to work wonders? As ſoon as ever he beginneth to open his eyes, he beholdeth himſelf to be born in a houſe hanged round about with cobwebs, he beholdeth his father and mother to groan under the burden of a needy life, his brothers and ſiſters to roul the ſame ſtone. There is no queſtion made of civil education, inſtruction, or knowledge; bread muſt be ſought for, ſo much ſollicitude muſt be had onely to live as bruit beaſts, that no leiſure will be found to think how to live like a man: and admit it were thought on, there are no books in this poor cottage, but rotten worm-eaten walls; no arms but the anviles of a ſhop or forge; no other muſick but their obſtreperous clatter, no other Maſter but the neceſſitie of learning nothing, no other leſſon but ignorance and miſery. Behold, ſeeing you might have been reduced to this condition of life, what have you done to God before your being, to be that which you are? He hath not been content to give you bloud, wealth, qualification, ſpirit and courage, but alſo he alloweth you the happineſs of good education, which ſetteth and compoſeth all the natural parts into a fair way.

Defect in education.

Miſery of want.

You demand of me, whether I judge ſeriouſly the education of Great-ones and men of quality to be such? I affirm, at the least it hath all the possible means and opportunity so to be, in which consisteth the knot of obligation we seek for.

And without going further, is it not an uncontrolable proof which sufficiently declareth, that even the education of Court is worthy recommendation, to say that God, seeking out a school for the greatest States-man that ever was in the world, chose no other place than the Court of a King? You know what a man Moses was, how great, how eminent, how much beloved of Almighty God, who elected him to be a conduct and captain of six hundred thousand men at arms, to give him a regency over the elements, and a power to replenish the four quarters of the world with the greatness of his prodigies. What did he to breed him, and frame him to so high and supereminent a condition, to so heroick virtues? Did he suffer him to be bred as other Hebrew children, in fear, in bondage, in poverty, which overwhelm the goodliest and best dispositions, as soon as they begin to set forward? No, he brought him to the Court of Pharaoh, he caused him to be nourished in the exercises of Nobilitie, to swallow all the wisdom of the Ægyptians, who then were in reputation to be the wisest men in the world. This is it, which S. Stephen said in the Acts, Eruditum omni sapientia Ægyptiorum. And Philo in the book he hath written of the life of Moses, unfolding to us the history of his education, saith, he learned in the Court of the King of Ægypt, Arithmetick, Geometry, Musick, as well contemplative as practick Philosophie, and the secrets of Hierogliphicks. But to shew Noblemen how lawful it is to learn Court-civilities and garbs, without contracting the vices, the same Moses who learned all lawful sciences from the Ægyptian Doctours, never would suck milk from nurses of the same Nation, which might infuse any bad influence upon his manners. God held the very same course in the education of the Prophet Daniel, and of those three holy children, who planted the trophey of their faith among the burning coles of an oven; he caused them to be educated in the Court of King Nebuchadnezzar, he caused them to learn the Chaldaik language, to be trained in literature, to be afterwards presented to the King, well instructed in all sorts of sciences.

Pueros in quibus nulla esset macula, decoros forma, eruditos omni sapientia, cautos scientia, & doctos disciplina. Dan. 1.

From hence you may judge that education of great men, is a matter full of worth and recommendation, since God, who disposeth all with so excellent oeconomy in favour of the just, hath pleased to give to his greatest minions and favorites, the Courts of Kings for a school. And in effect, we must aver there is the best education, where the best tools and instruments of great actions are, and these are found in the houses of personages of qualitie. Education of children is begun in the choise of nurses. Poor people take such as necessity permitteth, many times surcharged with imperfections and disproportions of nature, which make corruption creep into the child with the milk; the rich and those of quality elect them with all possible advantage, which gold, credit, or authority can procure. This choise of nurses is of no small importance. The Scripture observeth that King Nebuchadnezzar having bee from his infancy exposed in a forrest, and nourished by a wild goat, contracted thereby brutish manners, so that degenerating into a vehement stupidity and most barbarous pride, it made him afterwards by the just punishment of heaven, return to the life of beasts, among whom he had been bred.

Why men of qualitie are best bred.

Glossa Lyr. in Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar nursed by a Goat.

The same happened in the person of the Emperour Caligula, (a portentous prodigie of man) who seemed to be born for no other purpose, but to shew the world the mischief which a great power can perpetrate in a great brutishness. It is held this corruption came to him neither from father nor mother, who both were reputed the most honest and prudent in the Roman Empire. But it is said, that (perhaps) of purpose to make him one day martial, they gave him a masculine brave nurse: For she was hairy on the face as man, she drew a long bowe, she ran at the ring, she curvetted a horse like a rider, but in other kinds she was mischievous and cruel, and made her little nurse-child superlatively inheritour of her vices.

Dio. Cassius. nurse of Caligula.

If then the goodness of nurses be one of the principal favours which happeneth in education, who will have them if not Noblemen? As soon as Ladies and Women of qualitie are ready to be brought in bed, every one will present them a nurse, every one will offer one of their own choise; there is not a visitant not gossip that will not roam from house to house for this purpose, and redouble journey after journey. It falleth out oftentimes, that after the mothers do neglect personally to give their children suck, and use so much curiositie in the election, drawn by considerations meerly terrene, that overmuch choise maketh them to elect ill. The children of rich men become draughty amongst a mass of fountains, wherewith they are presented to suck from their infancy; and those of poor men, amongst the incommodities of nourriture, grow up as saffron under hail; God counterpoizing to the one their over much solicitude of human helps, and supplying the want in the other. Notwithstanding it cannot be denied, but that a moderate choise of nurses, ever accommodated to Gods greater glory, is most available to the infant, and that persons of qualitie have this favour much more transcendent than others.

After the nurses, come the governours and governesses. The poor creatures are instantly abandoned, and cast amongst a little crew of children, their ordinary companions and play-fellows, and there have they all liberty to besmear one another as a Colliers sack. In the houses of great-ones, there is always some sage woman, who giveth the first tincture and impressions to the souls of children, and beginneth to trace on their tender hearts, the first draughts of the fear of God. When the infant is capable to learn any thing, the poor creature much wanteth instructions; for the Chariot of learning is now adays moved with the arms of gold and silver. Great men make all arts and sciences tributary to their fortune. If books be wanting, goodly liberaries are erected with money. If good teachers, all the best spirits and choisest Masters make haste to enter into the houses of Great-ones. There is not a Grammarian, Geographer, Chronologer, Rhetorician, or Philosopher will fail them. If they could not otherwise have it, but that they must fetch learning from the furthest confines of the earth, to infuse it into their brain, they would have it at what ptice soever. If they be to be trained in Militarie exercise, the bravest Academies are opened to them. If the parents shew themselves (though it be never so little) affected to devotion and virtue, they that never were bent thereto, will be plyable and seek rather to make sale thereof, than to use it.

Arts tributary to great men.

Verily you, O Noblemen, behold that the help of education is great, and wholly in your own hands. Judge now then, the injurie you do to God, and the wrong you inflict on your selves, when you abuse these bounties of Heaven. Wherein do we abuse it then? In two principal points. The first in neglecting good instruction. The second in subverting it by vice contrary thereunto. How is that? First many fathers and mothers at this day, resembling Ostriches who lay their egs in the open way without hatching them, little regard to till the minds of their children, by planting therein the fear of God, to gather afterward a rich harvest harvest of eminent virtues, suitable to their condition. But if a proposition be made, to expose them to the height of the wheel of worldly honours with the fresh gale of favour, then are they eagerly busie. Is not this it which the Prophet Jeremie did deplore, when he said, Hierusalem was cruel as an Ostrich in the deserts? Such fathers there will be found in the world, who without any guidance or direction, thrust their sons into the throng of many hazards of being undone, and will not spare to send them into the fellowship of devils, into the contempt of Religion, and loose libertie, so that it may be a degree to advance their fortune. What Christianitie is this? Guevarra a great Courtier, saith, that parents which so send their children to Court, without prescribing how they ought to demean themselves, and not allowing them some person, who may seasonably reprehend their imperfections, should do much better to load them with irons, and place them in the house of fools, because there they are bound that they may become more wise, and in the Court, they are let loose to make them more foolish. If a young man, have deserved the wheel, do but put him into the hands of his own will, a more butcherly executioner you cannot give him.

Filiæ populi mei crudelis quasi struthio in deserto. Thren. 4.3.

Guevarra in the Alarm to Courtiers, translated by Monsieur Hardy.

The other point is yet more perillous, when they are not onely neglected, but are purposely bred in pride and sensuallity, which are the two rocks whereon these young souls make ship-wrack. One of the wisest men of the Roman Empire, complained of the time he lived in, wherein they first built palaces before the mouth was formed; that young boys were wrapped up in scarlet, that they grew up in litters and coaches, without ever scarce setting foot to the ground, and that their lips were kissed for having spoken some sottish foppery. This was somewhat tolerable amongst Heathens; but to see Christian children bred up in pride, in flatteries, in perpetual apish toys, services and submissions, which raise their high spirit, is it not a prodigie? These little Thrasonists are no sooner out of the shel, but instantly they establish a jurisdiction in the family, they make a nose of wax of their parents, drunk with love and childish indulgence, to lead and turn them where they list; they do and undo what they please, and indeed exercise even then a petty tyrannie, to make themselves afterwards loose and unfettered Lions. And they seeing all things are permitted them, do instantly take that vogue, which depraved nature doth present unto them, they follow the track of pleasure and voluptuousnes, so fattening and engrossing their souls, that all the lustre of the spirit is wholly buried and extinct. Their household-servants who nearly attend them, seeing their favour may this way be gained, desperately corrupt them, proposing vices to them, of which they never had the least knowledge.

Great corruption of Nobilitie.

Ante palatium eorum quàm os instituimus: in purpuris reptant, in lectîcis crescunt, gaudemus si quid licentius dixerint. Verba nè quidem permittendæ deliciis, risu & osculo excipimus. Fabius Quintilianus.

Domesticks vitious, how abominable.

Hereupon, fathers and mothers, take heed; cankers which devour bodies, and pestilences which suffocate hearts, are not so dangerous as are these creatures, unworthily slavish in the most prodigious servitude that may be, when under pretext of wel-wishing, they thrust your children into vice; before their eyes are open to distinguish it. Know, that children are, as saith Clemens Alexandrinus, the flowers of marriage, nothing is so easie to be corrupted, a little contagious breath will tarnish and drie up all their beauty. Understand they are your possessions and inheritances: possedi hominem, per Deum, said the first mother of mortals. If you leave them unmanured, all over-run with thorns and briers, you shall become answerable to the justice of Almightie God. Look well unto it, saith S. Hierom, that they carrouse not in the cups of Babylon, and be not strucken with the hammer, the noise whereof will resound through the earth, otherwise they will one day be nails and lances in your sides; (as saith the Scripture) to transfix you even to the heart. In the fourth book of Kings 42. children ill brought up, were devoured by Bears, to teach parents that since they have done less than Bears, who shape their whelps by much licking and smothing them, they therefore by Bears were bereft of them: and such infants (saith S. Cyprian) will one day complain at the tribunal of God, saying, The perfidiousnes of others hath betrayed us, our fathers and mothers have been our parricides. In like manner, youth, take heed how you abuse the gift of your good education, and the many instrumental means which God hath granted you for the exercise of virtue, otherwise you shall pay the losses thereof in the length of a corrupt and miserable life, and your bones in old age shall be filled with the follies of youth, which shall sleep with you even in your tomb, and drag your souls into the bottomless precipice, from whence there is no recovery.

The ninth REASON.

Which maketh it appear, the Court is a life of penance.

AMongst the motives which the exact Masters of spiritual life propose to Religious men, to invite them to perfection, they set before their eyes, that they are all stirred up to virtue, when they already are in the arms of penance. The like with just reason we may say to Courtiers, the more to inflame them to fortifie themselves in great and glorious virtues, to wit, that arriving at Court, they enter into a house of penance, where they every day have a thousand occasions of suffering, which is the shortest way to perfection. That the Court is a place of publick penance, appeareth for the reasons which I intend now to produce. First, Antiquity hath called penance, by the word Envie, as Tertullian hath done, who saith, We strike at the gates of Heaven, as with the hammer of envie; that is to say, with penance. This name hath been given, either for that it doth make God as it were envied, if he pardon not; seeing the estate of penitents so deplorable; Invidiam facit Deo, nisi ignoscat, as the most learned Bishop of Orleans hath noted in his observations upon Tertullian: or for that the Latine word invidere signifieth originally not to see any thing, but to turn the eye aside as from a sad object; and the habit, estate and condition of the penitents was heretofore so lamentable, that the nice and curious averted their eyes from them, and could not endure so much as onely to behold them. Howsoever it be, the title of envie doth excellently well agree with the Court. That is the nest where envie hatcheth her egs, the throne where she exerciseth her Empire, the Altar where she hath many sacrifices, and were she banished from all the corners of the earth, we then should search for her among Courtiers, their life always being between the two scales of the ballance, whereof the one is called envie, the other miserie. This is it which obligeth them to an extraordinary perfection, that they may perpetually stand upon their guard, and avoid the least defect. This is it, which if they know well how to use it, doth absolutely shut up from them the gate to all excess; for if envie (according to the proverb) will offer to shave an egge, what will she not do in a meadow?

Tertul. Apol. c. 40. Invidia Cælum tundimus.

Penance called by the name of envy.

Envy of Court.

Secondly, the ancient Canons and Doctours of the Church, as S. Basil, observe five degrees of penance. The first was called sorrow, which was a state of tears and grones. The second is called audience, which was a degree to which penitents, after an infinit number of sighs, were admitted to hear the instructions and preachings of the word of God, whereof they were before deprived. The third, humiliation, which was when the penitents were admitted to a certain part of the Mass, but not at the Sacrifices, for they went out before the consecration, a little after the newly instructed Christians, the Priest repeating over them a certain prayer, during which time they made a low obeysance, their face bowed to the ground. The fourth degree is called consistentes, where the penitents had leave to hear Mass at the full length as others, but not to make any oblation, nor to communicate: for that was reserved to the last degree, called communion, where they obtained a full reconciliation in the participation of the holy mysteries, as the fore-alledged Bishop hath most excellently explicated.

Five degrees of penance among the Ancients. προσκλαυσις, ἀκροασις,

Of these five parts of penance, Courtiers for the most part exercise those which are most irksom, and very seldom participate in the consolations of the other more sweet and benign. If penitents have a degree of tears and lamentations, where are sighs and groans more frequent than in Court, for the many disasters which ordinarily occur in their affairs? One may well apply to them that passage of Job, expressed in S. Gregorie the Great, The Giants or men of the earth, do groan under the waters. Out alas! how many times the poor miserable creatures, after a world of travels, pursuits and hopes, which are dreams without sleep, seeing themselves transported into disgrace, with a furious torrent of envie, sigh and mourn in an Ocean of calamities? One frown of an incensed Prince, is more formidable to them than the eye of a Basilisk, yea more terrible than the crack of a Canon. The favours they enjoy, are winged and slippery; all the contentment they can possibly receive in ten years, will not afford so much joy to their hearts, as the repulse of one sole day, coming as a stroak of thunder, afflicteth them and makes them give ground, if they have not recourse to heavenly consolations. See you not how Absalom reestablished in Court, yet deprived of the King his fathers sight, bare this disgrace with so much anxiety of mind, that he asked a bloudy death for his remedy? What will the look of a Lion be, if the onely deprivation of a favourable eye, be so ill to be digested? What will become of so many other contrarieties, which at every turn transfix so many brave designs, so well projected? Where will not occasion of many most bitter sorrows be found, among so divers accidents, which cause us to stand at all times prepared for blows? If penitents be in a state of humiliation, wherein, as other Interpreters observe, they not onely humbled themselves, prostrated on the earth at the Priests benediction, but they lowly laid themselves under the feet of all the world; where I pray are souls found, born more to servitude, more pliant, more abased, than the Courtiers? They bend like the fishers angling-line, they stoup, they turn, and wheel about to all purposes, that they may arrive where they pretend. They buy all their honour at the price of great submissions, their scarlet at the price of sordid ambition, and glory with the coyn of slavery. That is it which S. Cyprian excellently well observed: Behold ye this Courtier, who gazeth on himself in scarlet? If you knew how many base submissions, the flashing lustre of this bright garment cost him, if you knew what scorns, what repulse, what contempts, even of such as were more arrogant than himself, he hath swallowed; how many proud gates he hath (as it were) besieged every day, going to perform his complements; and how many times he hath made himself a stirrop-holder, or foot-boy for the service of a disdainful Prince, to gain this train which now attendeth him, you then would have more pitie of his person, than envie of his fortune. An ancient Courtier being asked, how he had grown old in Court, did not he answer: by receiving injuries every day with thanks? Many men fatten with disgraces, as faithful dogs with bastonadoes.

Behold how Courtiers participate with penitents in pains, and not in comforts. For penitents after many austerities come to enjoy with tasteful contentment the hearing of the word of God. A Courtier after a thousand and a thousand mortifications, shall not gain oft-times one good word from his Prince. Penitents, after they had been throughly turmoyled, came to the state of repose and consistence, but Courtiers are always upon the wheel, not finding a firm footing of constancie to fix themselves on. The penitents came in the end to the participation of mysteries; and Courtiers with all their ministries of iniquitie, seldom enter into the temple of hoped honour, and if they do enter, they find not the mysterie which can satisfie all their appetites.

Behold you not a rough penance? Behold you not a patience able to make Saints, yea Martyrs, if they did onely measure themselves with the ell of torments? Guevarra, who had lived in a cloyster and a Court, found the penance of Religious men was much sweeter than that of Courtiers. A religious man many times stayeth long in one house, and buildeth at his good leisure a little nest, to die in the sweet-smelling odours of good life and holy conversation: and it seemeth (said he) the malediction of Cain, is fallen upon Courtiers; for they are always in motion, as strangers, and every day change innes and hosteries. A religious man obeyeth but one onely, a Courtier hath so many Masters as he hath passions and pretensions, which fetter his liberty, a good never to be estimated by a valuable price. A religious man maketh an account of his demeanour to his superiour: a Courtier hath a thousand controllers of his actions. So many parts and members as the estate of the King hath, are to him so many chains, so many observances. He must (saith this Authour) serve the King, wait on favorites, visit Noblemen, court Treasurers, give to door-keepers, frugally endear Auditours, entertain Provosts, gain harbingers, flatter pay-masters, do for his friends, dissemble with his enemies. All which things infinitely exercise obedience, and attract unspeakable slavery. If a Courtier once do what he can, he is a thousand times made to do what he would not, and admit he be a favorite of the Prince, he is a slave to all the officers, and to all respects and relations by which he holds his fortunes, as if one should hold a wolf by the ears.

A Religious man maketh a vow of poverty; such a Courtier there may be found, who without vow-making, findeth himself the most part of his time miserably poor; great fortunes, yea those who carrie all at the end of their account, finding themselves hunger-starved and wretched. A poor Religious man at dinner time findeth his napkin laid, and without taking of further care, the gifts of God arrived, as seasonably as if Elias Crow had brought them. Such a Courtier is to be found, who oft-times lodgeth in some crooked narrow lane, he eateth on some hired table, lieth on some borrowed bed, and abideth in a chamber without door or portal, and at the end of all comes an host, who surprizeth him when he hath nothing to content him; at which time his affliction is greater to discover his povertie, than to feel it; less it grieveth him to be miserable, than to have a witness of his wretchedness. Such an one hath been seen possessed of above 2000. ducats of yearly rent, who neither had bread, fewel, spit, nor kettle in his house, but every day a register ready of great mens boards, where he might go to beg a dinner.

Quot tumentium contumeliosa vestigia ante præcessit, ut ipsum etiam salutantium comes postmodum turbat præcederet.

dinner. What beggerie is this? Guevarra addeth also to this specious poverty of a Courtier, that Grooms rob him, Caters bring in false reckonings, Buffons importune him, Ladies of Court unplume him, other women less honest filch from him. When every one beholdeth him unfeathered, they hasten to pull the plumes off his wings, and if his wings fail him, he no more shall have friends nor succour.

A Religious man having made a vow of chastitie, hath very great and undoubted means to observe it, provided by his rule; the chastitie of a Courtier is always in snares and combats, his battels are perpetual, his victories most rare, the obligation notwithstanding of continency sticks upon him, and his transgressions are reserved to Gods vengeance. A Religious man hath his watchings for the service of God, and notwithstanding hath his season of watching, repast, and studie all distributed with a prudent oeconomie: the Courtier hath neither repose nor repast certain, for the service of the world. He dineth when it pleaseth his Alexander; and his sleep is no more his own than his libertie, of which he is dispoiled before he go to bed; a thing notwithstanding so precious, that whosoever well knoweth the price thereof, would not lend it out, though he had the whole world for a pledge. A Religious man maketh voluntary abstinencies, with merit and consolation; your Courtier fasteth oftener then he would, with demerit, without comfort. Briefly, a Religious man weareth hair-cloath, and the Courtier thorns and cares, which never forsake him. A Religious Recluse, hath as it were no bodie to please but himself: a Courtier who endeavoureth to content all, many times satisfieth no man: if he hold his peace, he is a lourdane, if he speak, he is a babbler; if he spend, he is a prodigal; if a good husband, covetous; if he stay in his lodging, he is an hypocrite; if he make many visits, he is a busie-bodie; if he be bravely attended, they say he is a fool; if he eat alone, he is miserable.

In fine this great Courtier Guevarra, after he had represented the fashion of the time, and disposition of the Court most lively, draweth this conclusion, That the life of Court is not a life, but rather a publick penance: and that we ought not to call Courtiers living men, but interred alive, because they die as often as they understand that another is more in favour of the times than themselves.

Judge then upon all this which I have here discoursed, whether one ought to fortifie himself so much the more with virtue and courage, by how much he beholdeth himself exposed to great and perpetual occasions, either of sin or misery? Whether the Courtier have less obligation to virtue than the Religious, since he seeth himself at all turns in greater and more evident perils? Judge, if this be a favour of Almighty God to have a subject of penance and a fair field to exercise patience, how Courtiers herein are made happy, and how many palms they might reap, if they would adde the application of spirit, sincerity of intention, and spiritual direction to the exercises of their profession. Through the want of these virtues, thinking to gain all, they loose all, merit escapes them, and all their life the bad theefs cross abideth with them. And that which is most deplorable, is, that they adore their punishments, and like the tribe of Zabulon, of whom scripture speaketh, they suck in the water of the sea as milk, and all bitterness seems sweet as sugar to their depraved tastes.

Deut. 31. Inundationem maris quasi lac sugent.

The tenth REASON.

Which dependeth on acknowledgement, or gratitude.

HAd Noblemen and worldly Great-ones no other spur to incite them to perfection, but the acknowledgement of so many benefits which they have received from the liberal hand of God, it were always a potent motive to a heart truly generous, who feareth ingratitude more than death.

It is not without mysterie, that God in the beginning of the world's creation, of twelve names attributed unto him, he taketh that of Elohim, derived from an Hebrew word, signifying to tie and oblige, making himself at the very first known to man, even in the worlds infancy, under the title of obliging, to teach him that he is born among benefits, the acknowledgement of which should become natural to him. That great man Philo the Jew, in the book he entituled Noës Plant, figureth unto us a certain tradition of the Sages of his Nation, to wit, that God the Creatour, after he had framed the world as a Scutcheon of his Nobilitie, a contracted table of his titles, a mirrour of his greatnesse and wisdom, demanded of the Prophets, or the Angels then in glory, what they thought of this work; and that one among them, after he had highly commended the architecture of this goodly universe, said freely, that he also therein yet required one perfection, to see a seal upon so many brave and rich inventions. What is it (saith the Eternal Father?) I would desire (replied he) a strong voice, powerful, harmonious, which born upon the wings of the winds and clouds, upon the Chariot of the air, might replenish all the part of the world, and incessantly eccho forth night and day in praises and thanksgiving for your incomparable benefits. Verily a goodly invention, and worthy of an Angelical spirit, yet notwithstanding, God hath sufficiently provided for this defect. For framing the world as a large clock, he hath proportionably given to man the place which this celestial spirit seemed to require. And that it might not be otherwise than so, the first wheel of this great clock of the world, is the primum mobile, the continual motion, the secret influences of Antipathies and Sympathies, which are as it were hidden in the bowels of nature. The hand thereof, is this goodly and beautiful embowed frettizing of the heavenly orbes which we behold with our eyes. The twelve signs, are as it were the distinctions of the twelve hours of the day. The Sun exerciseth the office of the steel and gnomon to point out time, and in its absence the Moon. The lights and stars contribute thereto their lustrous brightnesse. The sea, the azure of his waves for ornament. The earth serves for counterpoize. The stony quarries, the mettals, and the plants, for an Emblem to exercise the wisest in the knowledge of this great work-man. The living creatures are the small chimes, and man is the great clock, which is to strike the hours, and render thanks to the Creatour.

God named Obliging in the beginning of the world.

A notable discourse of Philo.

The world a Clock, and how.

This acknowledgement of course is due to God from all men, and the failing herein is greatly punishable for two reasons. The first is, That God hath with his finger engraven it in the nature of the world. The second, That he extraordinarily recommended it in the new and old Law. As concerning what toucheth the law of nature, benefits are the wings of love, more swift than tempests; they overtake birds in their flight. We behold in history, where on one side a Stork cometh to cast a precious stone into the bosom of a maid, which had healed her of a wound; and on the other side an Eagle, that seeing the bodie of a young man burned, which had fed and cherished her, cast herself with alacritie into the flames of her enkindled pile. Good turns are golden nets, which catch the swiftest gliding fishes; we find the proof hereof, when the Dolphins assembled with troups upon the Sea-shore, where they celebrated the obsequies of one called Ceranus, who had before freed them from the snares of the fisher-men. Benefits are sharp-pointed arrows, which throughly penetrate the heart of Tygers and Lions. We find it in the historie of Androdus, who because he had pulled a thorn out of a Lions foot, made a beast of service of him, and led him through all the Citie of Rome, gentle and meek as a lamb. O how strong bird-lime is a benefit! all generous birds are taken with it, there is none but some certain ill-conditioned Owls which escape from it.

Natural gratitude, excellent proofs of it. Ælian. de nat. Plin. lib. 10. cap. Ælian. l. 8. c. 13

Interroga jumenta & docebunt te, & volatilia agri, & indicabunt tibi. Agnovit bos possessorem suum, & asinus praesepe domini sui: Israel autem me cognovit. Isaiah 2.

Noblemen, will you think you do too much, if you should acknowledge the benefits of your Creatour, since beasts the most savage, recompence good turns received from slaves, and forgetting their nature, cannot but remember a benefit, though small? As for the written law, what virtue is more often recommended, than gratitude and thankful acknowledgement? God giveth not any benefits without preparing monuments. If he deliver his people out of Ægypt, a lamb of Passe-over, under the title of gratitude, is to be offered for ever; if he give Manna, a pot thereof is reserved in the Tabernacle; if he work wonders with Moses rod, it is preserved for an eternal memory. Gratitude is the key of the land flowing with milk and hony; ingratitude is a channel from whence all the plagues of heaven pour down upon rebellious and contumacious heads. Is it not very remarkeable, that the Israelites were more careful to carrie with them into the deserts, timbrels to praise God with, than arms to defend themselves? Praises go before curtlaxes, and all warlike engins. The Captains of the valourous Debora, are for the same cause termed in Scripture Notaries, because they went into the war with pen and sword. The sword to fight with, and the pen to write the praises of God. If you demand of Rupertus, why in Genesis, when all creatures are spoken of, there is not one word of the sphear of fire: he will answer you, that fire because of its barren unfruitfulness, is the symbol of ingratitude, and for that purpose it is not once mentioned in the place where question was made of the sacrifice of acknowledgement. If you ask of S. Chrysostom, why God, coming to give a law to his people, appeared amongst briers and thorns, he will tell you, it was to shew to this ungrateful people, the deformity of their ingratitude, signified by those thorny plants. S. Ambrose likewise observeth it was the providence of heaven, to give young Tobie an Angel and a dog for companions of his voyage. The Angel to do him good offices, and the dog, who is most sensibly mindful, to cause him to remember a benefit. See you not the world and the law are extended and disposed, one in his creatures, and the other in all his precepts, to impress gratitude in our hearts? One of the Ancients said, that to die ungrateful, was the most infamous death might be imagined. Would you then (Nobles) have your bodies buried in Churches, in places most eminent and conspicuous, yet spare not to make ingratitude a sepulchre for your souls?

Excellent observations upon this: Exaltationes Dei in gutture eorum, & gladii ancipites in manibus eorum. ὑψηλογίαι ἐν στόματι αὐτῶν καὶ ῥομφαῖαι γραμματεῖαι. Psal. 49. Jud. 5. v. 14. Interp. 70. Interpetum. à Rupert. in Genes.

Adde hereunto presently a consideration well worthy to be pondered, that by how much the benefits you have received from the liberal hand of Almighty God are great and glorious, so much the more is it a hideous thing, to repay them in the coyn of ingratitude. Follow the foot-steps of the Oracle of Doctours, S. Augustine, pursue the practice which he used to enflame himself to grateful acknowledgements. Go ye upon the brink of abysses, and speak to Nothing, which is not at all, nor ever was, nor ever shall be. Cast up your age and demand of it, Where were you so many years? It will reply to your heart with dumb words, and tell you, That which you have been, it is. And what have you done to God, to be at this time, that which it is not? Take into your hand a Diamond, it will tell you it hath essential being with you, but it liveth not; and what have you done to God to have life above the same? Go to Cedars and Palm-trees, and you shall understand, they have life common with you, but you sense above them. Under what title was it due to you? with what money did you purchase it? Go to Eagles and Lions, and they will tell you, they have sense common with you, but you have reason, an incomparable good above them: You have judgement, memory, understanding, free-will; you are men, and they are beasts. What have you done to God to be made man? to be a reasonable creature capable of an infinite good? What have you done before your being, to be that which you are? What sacrifice have you presented, being as then in nothing, to be born into the world supereminently prelated above all the creatures of the world? Well, admit you had deserved your being: Where have you merited your well-being? Say you had merited to be men, where have you deserved to be Christians? to be selected by the hand of God from so many infinite nations which daily people hell? to be washed with the bloud of his Son, to be regenerated by the waters of baptism, to be impressed with his own stamp, to be beautified with his grace, supported with his merits, enlightened with his knowledge, protected under his wings and the shelter of his Angels, to have all the means and opportunitie to begin in the world a celestial life, and afterward to reign in Heaven for ever, and there to remain absorpt in an ocean of pleasures and felicities?

Excellent practice of S. Augustine to encourage himself to gratitude.

At what price have you bought all that? Are you not a jadish mule to suck such a teat, and then to kick with your heels?

Particular obligations of Noblemen.

But you say it is common to you with all Christians. I answer, the Sun is no less the Sun to you, for that it enlighteneth the eyes of a Pismear. But behold what personally toucheth you, and that which you cannot forget without disloyal ingratitude.

Nature hath cast all men in one and the same mould, all are equal according to birth, all equal in death, who useth to measure with the same ell Linsy-woolsey and cloth of Tissue. But what inequality is there in the conditions of life? It seemeth when the course of each mans estate and fortune is well considered, there is more difference between man and man, than between man and beast.

How many creatures are born ever in the fetters of miserable servitude, and salute life with a yoak on their neck? And behold you are not onely born free, but Noble, but great, but eminent, you come into the world like Diadumenus, with a diadem of honour on your foreheads.

How many do you behold born with very great disproportion of bodie, with bunched backs, crookedness, maladies, deformities, which they are enforced to carrie with them from their mothers womb, to their grave? And behold you are born with a bodie well composed, that nature hath framed to serve as a Cabinet for the soul, which God would lodge in.

How many stupid, gross and obscure spirits, unjoynted judgements, irregular brains are there in the world? And yet God hath given to you a spirit capable of all kind of lights, knowledges, a judgement well grounded, a faithful memory, and all the moveables of a fair soul. How many children come into the world as little abortives, and are afterward left without instruction, guid, or conduct, as lees and dregs of the creatures of the earth? And behold how all things co-operate to your education.

How many millions of mortals daily dissolve into poverty, in a wretched and needy life, in extream miseries, which make them feed upon gall, and every day to drench part of their life in tears? And behold you are born to great patrimonies, infinite riches, large revenues; behold not onely men and beasts, but all the elements also are kept in breath to concontribute to your ſervices, your magnificence, your felicities, your delights.

How many are at the foot of the wheel, trampled on and oppreſſed under the tyrannie of men, many times more cruel than wild and ſavage beaſts? And behold you are on the top of the wheel, behold you are upon the higheſt ſpheares of honour, feared of your enemies, cherished by your equals, adored by your inferiours; doth this ſeem nothing to you? Or if it ſeem fit to you to caſt it up with your account, tell me if you have it from your ſelves? Tell me if you were before your being able to merit all theſe favours from Heaven?

Take now the ballance your ſelf, and judge, if it be not a looſe and barbarous ingratitude to ſteal the ſilver and gold, of God, to make idols to Baal, to light your lamp at the Altar-fire of the Omnipotent, to make pillage afterward of his Temple, to take bread from the Maſter of the houſe with one hand, and to ſtab him with the other? And this is it which you do, when you wholly abuſe all theſe gifts of Heaven in impiety, injuſtice, ambition, luſt, envie, rage, in a brutiſh and ſtinking life. This is it, which bringeth aſtoniſhment even to the gates of heaven, and cauſeth the heavenly Father to ſpeak theſe lamentable words of Jeremie: How comes it to paſs that my beel-beloved hath committed ſo many outrages in my houſe? Have I then (O my beloved) lodged thee in my Temple, have I nouriſhed and bred thee from thy cradle with a fatherly hand, to betray mine honour and defile the glory of my Altars? See you not that in doing this, you weave the thread of your eternal ruin?

Weigh ſeriouſly (O Noblemen) what you are, what you can, what you have, what you are worth, and in good time take hold of this maxime, not to deſire to be, nor to be able, nor to be valued, but for him to whom you ow all your being.

The eleventh REASON.

Drawn from the effect which examples ſhould produce.

ON what ſide ſoever I turn me (O you Great ones) I find motives for you in every place of duty, ſpurs of honour, and inevitable obligations of virtue. Behold one of the moſt principal, to wit, Example: Yea the example of great men is one of the moſt potent charms, as well for good as ill, that may poſſibly be found in nature. See you not how the ſpirit of lies, who keeps an open ſhop of all wiles and active pliantneſs, hath not found in all hell an engin better able to ingulph mankind in a thouſand lamentable confuſions, than to ſet before him the bad example of great-ones, who by cunning ſleight and tyrannie came to that height as to cauſe themſelves to be accounted as God? Satan having ſet them upon the Altar, puts himſelf in poſſeſſion of their hearts: for coming to ſhew to theſe blind idolaters an adulterous Jupiter, an unchaſte Venus, a bloudy Mars, he whiſpered in their ears, The God whom you adore, and for whom you erect Temples and Altars hath done this and that, and are you better than he not to do the ſame?

The world heretofore perverted by the example of great-ones.

Depraved nature which no ſooner hath being, but that concupiſcence entereth thereinto, being already vehemently tranſported into exorbitancy by general inclination, and coming afterward to feel the ſwinge of this ſo alluring example (in thoſe who were not onely eſteemed great, but Gods immortal) ran to miſchief with full ſpeed, erected trophies of its own diſhonour, and covered its ulcers with a golden veil.

The great wit Julius Firmicus, hath excellently well obſerved this reaſon in the book he compoſed of the errours of profane Religions. Is man an adulterer? He caſteth his eye upon Jupiter, and draweth from the Idol of his falſe god, the enkindling tinder of his luſt. He approveth, he imitateth, he praiſeth his god, becauſe he deceiveth a ſimple credulous maid in the figure of a Swan, raviſheth another in the form of a Bull, and afterward in another encounter, perſonateth the ſhape of a Satyre.

Julius Firmicus de errore profan. Religion. Adulterio delectatus quis? Jovem reſpicit, & in de cupiditatis ſuæ fomenta conquirit: probat, imitatur, & laudat quod Deus ſius in Cygno fallit, in Tauro rapit, ludit in Satyro

What may be ſaid more of the force and tyrannie of example, than to ſay with S. Auguſtine: Not onely the vitious purſue vice in full ſpeed which leads the way, but even thoſe who have the fillet of ſhame-fac'dneſs upon their brows, ſuffer themſelves haſtily to run after the torrent of examples, and ſuppoſe to have a portion in the fortune of great men, when they have a ſhare in their vices. I heard my companions who boaſted their wickedneſs, making themſelves ſo much the more glorious, by how much they were more beaſtly and diſhoneſt. And needs would I do as they; not ſo much through appetite of doing ill, as for complacence to be applauded for ill. It often happened to me to counterfeit the ill which I had not done, doubting to be innocent, for fear of being reputed a man of no worth, and loth to be eſteemed chaſte, leaſt chaſtity ſhould make me contemned by the world.

Tyrannie of Example. Aug. Confeſ. 2. c. 3. Audiebam eos cantantes flagitia ſua, & tanto gloriantes magis quanto magis turpes eſſent, & libebat facere, non ſolum libidine facti, verum etiam laudis: fingebam me feciſſe, quod non fecerim, ne viderer abjectior, quo eram innocentior, & ne vilior haberer, quia eram caſtior.

Behold, O Noblemen, what power Example exerciſeth upon the hearts of men. Blame none but your ſelves, if you create not a new world, that you baniſh not vice from the earth, and make a golden Age return again. God hath placed you upon the higheſt ſteps of greatneſs, and cauſeth you firſt of all to ſee the ſtorm and calm. God hath planted you with his hand as ſtars in this goodly firmament of honour, upon your influences depend the whole courſe of this inferiour world. If they be good, they bring health, ſolace, and life into the whole world. The people are as the ſea, and you are the winds which raiſe or depreſs them when you pleaſe. The people are like the Polypus, who changeth colour according to the diverſitie of objects; and you are the rocks, to which he is tied with a long chain of ſervitude; you take his liberty and give him colour. The people is as Ivie which creepeth and clingeth according to his ſupport; you are the Coloſſus and walls which under-prop it. The people hath a heart of wax and clay, and you are the Maſter-potters to give what proportion you pleaſe. A good Prince ſheweth the way of doing well to his ſubjects in well doing himſelf, and though he be great by the title of power, he is much greater and more potent by the force of example.

Importance of the example of Noblemen.

Velleius. Facere velle civeſ ſuos Principi optimus faciendo docet, cumque ſit imperio magnus, exemplo major eſt.

Hereupon I leave you to judge the great offence you commit, when by ill example you make vice to paſs for law, vice which would have no force nor vigour at all, if you did not give arms and weapons into its hand, to ſack and ſubjugate all the world.

Firſt, you commit a great ſacriledge abuſing authority, which is a ray of the omnipotencie of God, impreſſed on your foreheads to enlighten and ſweetly incline your inferiours to duty; and you make boaſt as if it came from your ſelves. Thieves that you are of the treaſure of God; you have rifled the chief of his coffers, which is that abſolute power by which he is God; you have taken from thence a pearl which himſelf afterwards enſigned into your hands, which himſelf fixed upon your head, to give you, as it were, a participation of his own eſſence, and you unworthily retain it, without making it tributary to its Creatour. My God, it is true, that he who ſeeketh his own glory from thine ornaments, is a very thief and a robber, who endeavouring to filch Gods honour from him, ſtealeth Paradiſe from himſelf. What ſacriledge, I pray, can you think comparable to this?

Great ſin through bad example.

Se-

Secondly, what an indignity it is to do that, which the ill example of Great-ones operateth, so to put vice into grace, and virtue into neglect? Think you not, if proof be made unto you, it is the work of Antichrist, but that will suffice to make you detest it? And what will Antichrist do? To what will he bend, and dispose all the sinews and arteries of his power, but to set vice on the Altar; and you will before-hand prepare a way for him? All that which Jesus Christ hath said and done, all that which he hath sweat for, all that he endeavoured, all that he hath wept, all that he hath bled, he hath done to blot out and extinguish with works, with words, with sweat, with tears, with bloud, the work of sin.

Ill example the work of Antichrist.

And you forsooth will again erect the statues; If sin coming from you were esteemed as sin, it would always be unreasonable, but less dangerous. But now it happeneth not to be so reputed. The sins which in a mean fortune would be thought sins, when they are dressed up with a diadem; or covered with a scarlet cloak, become the virtues of the times, which is a thing most abominable. And by your ill example, you are the cause of this illusion of mankind, which holdeth vice for virtue, and crime for trophie. Observe what punishment a false coyner deserveth. Advise with your self if idolatrie be the first and chief of all sins, what would he merit who were not onely an Idolater, but the authour and inventour of a new idolatrie?

Desinunt esse probri loco purpura flagitia.

And bad example doth it. When you, O Noblemen, degenerate, you impress sin with the stamp of virtue, you place it upon the Altar, you are the cause that a thousand and a thousand present oblations to it; you make a stable for horses of the Temple of honour, and you being by the world esteemed as little gods, employ all this reputation to destroy the honour of the true God, through the example of your wicked life. You make a dung-hill of Heaven, you cruelly and miserably dragging wandring souls through headlong precipices, when to cause them to sin the more freely, you shew them the examples of the pettie gods of the earth. These are the words of Julius Firmicus. What ingratitude will make Heaven blush, and the earth to shake, if not this? If you well weigh this consideration, it will never escape you to do an act of ill example, or if passion should happen to be exorbitant, at least you should imitate that bird which by antiquity was called Just, because she hid her excrements which she knew to be very pernicious, for fear it should infect men; so you rather should bury your ill deportments in night and obscurity, than expose them to publick view.

Cœnum de Cœlo facitis & errantes animos per abrupta præcipitia crudeli calamitate ducitis, cum hominibus peccare volentibus facinorum viam de Deorum monstratis exemplis Julius Firm. Photius in bibliotheca.

For the third reason, consider what wickedness it is to thrust the knife into the throat, not onely of a multitude that adores your fortune, and glorieth in the imitation of your vices, but also to pollute all posteritie with the authoritie of your crimes. Every Age teacheth us we may do what hath been done, and crimes become examples, saith the eloquent S. Cyprian. Your sin is like much rust, which cleaveth close to all your successours, and how much the greater you are, so much the more precipitation and malice it hath.

Admonetur omnib actus fieri posse quod aliquando factum est; exempla fiunt, quæ jam esse facinora desiterunt. Cyprian ad Donat. Eccl. 1.

Say not, you are personally culpable and no more; that you are not to answer to God, either for the sins of those who live with you, or those that come after you.

Sicut æramentum æruginat: nequitia. Figure of ill example. Exod. 21.

Which is so much otherwise, that the Scripture ordaineth, who shall open a common cistern without shutting it again, if it happen that cattel fall therein, he was bound to repair this loss. Your brother doth he not more nearly approach to God than a bullock or a horse? You have opened to him the gulf of scandal and corruption, he is fallen into your snares, you shall give an account to God for a soul redeemed with the price of his bloud.

Although you have caused but one small spark of fire to flie out, if it happen to blast and burn the fruitful fields, and destroy the corn of your neighbour, you are bound by the law to make the possessour satisfaction. A flashing sparkle of concupiscence which proceedeth from your eyes, and afterwards enkindleth a great fire of vices and calamities, shall be imputed unto you in the day of judgement. And what satisfaction for such damage? Exod. 22.

But on the contrary (O Noblemen) when you seriously embrace virtue, you ravish and appease the most savage spirits by your authoritie. Nothing resisteth this sweet violence. Goodness born in the chariot of greatness, hath darts so sharp and flaming, that they make the flint-stones to melt. The present times invite you, the most distant admire you, all posteritie blesseth you, and God most gloriously crowneth you.

It is said when the Rainbowe in Heaven boweth his crooked horns directly upon the flowers, he imparteth to them a most celestial odour, which infinitely reviveth their kind. God hath fixed you in the sphear of greatness, as heavenly arches; you know from whence he hath extracted you, and that no otherwise, than the Rainbowe in Heaven; you are but a petty vapour, but this Sun hath guided you, enriched you, enameled you with so many perfections, that justly we may call you the children of admiration. Be you then to mankind that, which the Rainbowe is to plants, leave it to the odour of a good conversation which may become natural, you shall reap here below true and solid glory, contentments so tasteful, that a man may more easily feel them than express them; and in Heaven your recompence shall be equalled to the profit, which your example shall have made on earth. Plin. lib. 12. cap. 24. Rainbowe upon flowers.

I know not what may be produced more pressing to a generous heart, to oblige him to perfection.

The twelfth Reason.

Drawn from punishment.

Clemens Alexandrinus observeth, that the belief of one God, and the faith of one judgement, are in the soul of man by like consequence necessary; and that the Heathens in the dead obscurity of infidelity, were not able to shut their eyes against this veritie. Clemens Alex. Stromat. 5.

There is no soul in the world so barren, which by force of the light of nature conceiveth not, that if there be certain rays or reflections of virtue, diffused through the actions of men, the same ought to be in God, as in their source, with a radiant lustre of supereminence. Wherefore? Because, as Dionysius Areopagita saith in the book of divine attributes, God is a great Thesis, which hath but one word for expression, but this draweth along with it all essences, verities, and perfections. And for the same cause S. Augustine calleth this Sovereign Majesty, Bonum omnis boni. Now so it is, that we behold shining in men (though otherwise very imperfect) certain traces or draughts of Justice, and we observe they are naturally addicted to the love of this virtue, were it not that passion maketh them belie their hearts, and betray their own nature. We must then necessarily conclude that Justice is in God, as water in the fountain, lines in the center, and beams in the Sun. God, a great Thesis. Θεὸς ὑπὲρ ὑπερθεότης. S. Dionis de divin. nomin. c. 2. August. de Trinit. l. 8. c. 3.

Justice and Mercy are the two arms of God, which embrace, bear and govern the whole world; they are the two engins of the great Archimedes, which make Heaven descend upon earth, and earth mount to Heaven. It is the base and treble-string of this great lute of Heaven, which make all the har- Justice and mercy.

harmonies and concable symphonies of this Universe.

Now, as Mercy is infinite, so is Justice. The divine Essence holdeth these two perfections, as the two scales of the ballance, always equally poized. Judge hereupon, O Noblemen, if the favours and mercies of God are so eminent with you, what part shall Justice have amongst you?

Psal. 89. Quis novit potestatem iræ tuæ, aut præ timore tuo iram tuam dinumerare? Sap. 6. Horrende & citò apparebit vobis, quoniam judicium durissimum his qui præsunt, fiet. Exiguo enim conceditur misericordia, potentes autem potenter tormenta patientur. Non enim subtrahet personam cujusquam Deus, nec verebitur magnitudinem cujusquam.

David, who had felt the scourges, cried out as in a deep extasie, Oh my God, who can be able to know the force of thy anger! Who can be able, amongst so many perplexities and affrightments, to recount the effects of thy indignation! True it is, thy Justice doth most extraordinarily appear on the rebellious heads of sinners, but especially upon the Great-ones of the earth. These words of the Wise-man are terrible to any that will maturely consider them: You, who hold the highest place amongst men, and live without fear or aw of that Majestie which hath constituted you where you are, know God will visit you, and appear to you with speed and horrour. A most rigorous judgement shall be executed on those who command over others. Mercy is for the little ones and humble; but if you persevere in your wicked life, as being potent, you shall powerfully be tormented. God is not a man to sooth you, to distinguish your persons, and treat with you with observance of your qualities. Beware. The reasons why the chastisement of great men shall be most severe, are clear and evident, the principal whereof I will briefly here produce.

Knowledge of good and evil, makes the sin the more foul.

First, by how much the more a sin is committed with exact knowledge of good and ill, so much the more punishable it is, because it participateth the more of the venom of malice. Ignorance unto many is part of their sanctitie, others with open eyes run headlong to ruin. Now, can it be denied but that great men (ordinarily being endowed with good spirits, capable judgements, and most happie memories, and they instructed by so many Doctours, both speaking and dumb) should have much more light and knowledge than the ordinary sort of men. Behold why degenerating, it cannot be but they must needs break a thousand bonds that held them in their dutie, blunt a thousand sharp points, a thousand inspirations from Heaven that feelingly touch their conscience, the which cannot be done without great and determinate malice, which rendreth their sin the more enormous, and their heads the more punishable. This is the reason Divines give touching the punishment of the Angel apostate. A strange thing, that God coming from Heaven upon earth, to take human flesh, to distend his imperial robe upon man (who lay on a dung-hill) drawing him out, washing him, guilding him over with grace, (the true seed of glory) in the mean time left the bad Angel without mercy, for a prey of punishment which shall not end no more than God himself. Wherefore is this, but that the Angel offended with an absolute and deliberate malice, as one much more illuminated, and Adam suffered himself to slide into sin rather by surprizal, by infirmitie, by complacence to the humours of his wife, as S. Augustine observeth, than purposely or contemptuously? Alas! me thinks this horrid punishment of the contumacious Angel, should make the bloud congeal in the veins of all the Great-ones of the earth, who offend their Creatour with as much malice as they have knowledge. Ask (O Noblemen) of the Divine Justice, from whence it proceedeth that these evil spirits have been so roughly handled? If beauty could mollifie the rigour of a Judge, they were adorned with an incomparable beauty above all creatures. If the excellency of nature be esteemed, they were the most lively Images of the Divinity, amongst all things created. If the spirit contribute thereunto, they penetrated by their active vivacity, even from Heaven to the deepest abyss. If the glory of God were in this act considerable, they were creatures who could love, bless and glorifie God eternally. If evil had been to be prevented, this great Judge saw there would arise from their damnation an infinitie of blasphemies, and invincible obstinacie, a long web of contrarieties opposite to the advancement of his honour amongst men, a subversion of the world. All this might have been avoided in giving them one small hour of repentance; which with what fervour, detestation and dolour would they have embraced? Yet notwithstanding without regard to this beauty, this grace, this excellency of nature, these praises, this good or ill, behold them taken in the boiling ardour of their crime, strucken with the thunder of the Divine Justice, thrown down, broken in shivers, captivated in prisons of fire, left to the sword of vengeance, to eternal tortures, never seeing amidst their darkness and sulpherous flames, one sole beam of the eyes of Mercy. O terrible sentence! inexorable sentence! Oh unhappy spirits! O judgements of God! What a terrour, what a bottomless depth you are! Judge now (O ye Great men) if the crimes of knowledge and malice are so rigorously punished, what will become of you, if you live neglective of the Divine Majestie, you being among the people, as were the Angels among other creatures?

Why bad angels were punished without mercy.

Marvellous Justice.

Punishment of the ungrateful sacrifice of jealousie.

Non fundet oleum nec imponet thus. Num. 5.

Secondly, no punishment is more sharply nor lawfully inflicted than upon the ungrateful, who deserve that all the elements with their best forces, should conspire in the avengement of their offences, since they violate a law engraven on this universe by the hand of nature. Their punishment is the sacrifice of jealousie, spoken of in Scripture, whereon neither oyl nor incense is powred: there is no more oyl of mercy to sweeten their torments, no more incense of prayers to appease Gods anger; nothing is there but thunder, lightnings and vengeance. Now it appeareth that Noblemen and Great-ones, cannot depart from the service of God, without a deep mark of ingratitude, for the benefits which I have touched before; and you thereon will necessarily infer, they transcending others in condition, should not in case of failing or neglect, expect an equalitie of punishments. God will call Heaven and earth to their Judgement, and then speak to them in the presence of all creatures, with a voice of thunder. Hearken ye (O you Princes of the earth) I made you as Eagles, I gave you strong wings to lift you up to mount Libanus, and to extract pith from the Cedars. I advanced you in spirit, in judgement, in courage, in riches, in reputation, in honour above other men. I imprinted the rays of my power upon your fronts, to infuse the regard of your persons into the hearts of the people. I held Heaven, and earth, men and beasts in breath, to contribute to your authoritie and services. And you have taken arms employing all my treasures to make war against me, you have lived, not as reasonable men, but as bruit beasts, without God, without law, without ever casting your eyes to Heaven, but to vomit out blasphemies in the face of it. If I haue put power into your hand, you have employed it in oppressing the weak: If justice, you have perverted the use of it, and made the ballance incline to the tyrannie of your passions. What can such an ingratitude expect? I leave the conclusion to your selves.

Horrible exetcrations of God upon great men vitious.

Exemplar crimes deserve exemplar punishment.

In the third place, seeing the bad example of great men is most pernicious to the inferiours, by the strength of their authoritie (which draweth their weak souls to a servile imitation) God expressly counterpoizeth the insolence of their vices, by singular and remarkeable punishments, to the end that those who are attracted by the lustre of their fortune, may be affrighted with their falls. It is true, we are in this world as owls in the night, our eyes benummed and surcharged with terrestrial humours, which hinder us throughly to penetrate this cloud of the Divine Providence. Notwithstanding, God darteth forth as it were out of these clouds, certain flashing sparks of fire and light, to make you read in the punishment of so many ill-living great men, the unrelenting rigour of his justice.

Strange punishments.

High steeples are not so often rent and defaced by the violence of thunder, as are Crowns and Diadems on the heads of wicked Princes with Heavens chastisements. Read sacred and profane Stories, what strange punishments are there of great men? One sheweth a desire to leap into Heaven to plant his throne among the stars, yet God maketh him eat hay with the beasts, enforcing him to die alive, not onely to honours and the nature of man, but to lead a life in bruitishness: This was Nebuchadnezzar. Another in the middest of the fervour of a feast, heareth the great clock strike his hour, and seeth the hand of a man on the wall, drawing a dreadful sentence against him: This was Belshazzar. Another dieth eaten up with lice, as Herod. Another, loathsom with infections, as Antiochus. Another hanged on a tree, as Absalom. Another on the gibbet which he had prepared for him whom he accounted for his slave, as Haman. Another dying by his own hand, not being able to find any other in the world more cruel than himself, as Nero. Another maketh himself a sepulchre with drunkenness, as Alexander. Another is massacred in the midst of the Senate, as Cæsar. Another from the throne of the Roman Empire, goeth to prostrate his foe, the Persian, to become thereby a foot-step for him to mount on horse back, as Valerian. Another is carried about in a Cage, as Bajazet. Another is strucken with lightening, as Anastasius. Another is slain in his camp by a hand invisible, as Julian the Apostate. Great volumns might be made, if one would compile all these mortalities; they make Theatres to resound, and Tragedians deplore.

Consider (O Noblemen) if in this world good and ill are given to us as it were in picture, (since the figure of the world passeth away, saith the Apostle) and since God useth such rough rods to chastise the vices of great men, what will that be in the other world? The arrows of chastisement do presently pass away, but the voice of thunder, the sentence of judgement shall go like a wheel, and the execution shall have no end. If there happen unto you a loss of goods, it is an arrow that passeth; loss of children, an arrow that passeth; sickness, an arrow that passeth; disgrace, an arrow that passeth; temporal death, even a feathered-arrow which doth nought else but pass away. But eternal death is the thunder in the wheel, which never passeth. To be drenched in a lake of sulphur as a victime of vengeance, in a fire enkindled with the breath of Gods anger, to see nothing but devils, to abide in nothing but torments, to suffer pains in every sense, to find hell in his own conscience; to have no other life but an eternity of torments, is a thing to be feared above all things most dreadful.

Præterit figura hujus mundi. 2 Cor. 7.

Sagittæ tuæ transeunt; vox tonitrui tui in rota. Psal. 76. 19.

Paulus Orosius, in the historie he dedicated to Saint Augustine, observeth that the tracks of Pharaohs chariots, after his detestable death remained a long time upon the sands of the Red sea, to serve as an example for posteritie. Behold (O Noblemen) the bloudy foot-steps of so many and so many Great-ones, who have gone before you, whose spoils are perhaps (as yet) in your hands, their bodies in putrefaction, and their souls in torments! Resemble not those that pillaged the souldiers of Sennacherib, who strucken with the revengeful hand of Heaven, found men of ashes in golden arms; they took the gold, without thinking at all of the ashes, which scattered by the ways. Take good heed, how you suffer your selves to be deceived with the glimmer of the honours of these ill-living Great-ones, lest you be surprized with their death and catastrophe. The day of death will come, be it sooner or later, the post is on the way who bringeth the date hereof. If you have lived ill, a thousand terrours, a thousand frightful fantasies will then besiege your heart, altogether drenched in the bitterness of death. A tumultuous army of thoughts shall strike an alarm to your repose: some shall represent unto you your goodly palaces, many times cemented with the bloud and sweat of poor men, which you must forsake, and pay all in one gross sum; other, all the goods which you shall have invaded either by violence or subtiltie, whereof you shall be stript, and shall go to the judgement of God, devoid of riches, and surcharged with accounts: others shall decipher unto you the follies of your youth; other will depaint unto you the day of judgement and hell, before you sensibly make proof of them. The Ladie which sleepeth by your sides, and ever holdeth the fire and spur in your hearts, moving you to new violences and extortions, to foment her pride and entertain her pompous vainglory, shall leave you then to wrestle with death, and shall seek the safety of her own affairs. Your eldest son, for whom you presently pawn your soul to all injustice, and exhaust your own abilities as the spider, to make him great, shall willingly out-run the steps of death to close your eyes, and scarcely shall there be found in the house some poor old woman to shrowd your bodie in a winding-sheet, to be put into a coffin. In the mean while, the soul seperated from the bodie, shall be presented to the judgement of God, to receive the inevitable sentence.

Alas! doth he not sleep a long and deadly sleep, who is not awakened with the sound of such a trumpet?

The thirteenth REASON.

Taken from Reward.

Punishment and Reward, Deities of the Common-wealth.

AN Ancient said, that the two most powerful Deities of Common-wealths, were Punishment and Reward. These likewise are the two bases, and as it were the two fundamental laws, upon which God the Creator hath established the policie of the Universe. As he is a severe revenger of offences, so he is most liberal in rewards. The Scripture teacheth us this in very remarkeable tearms, speaking of the Justice of God, and gives it him in strict measure when there is no question of chastisement, as if it were an act disproportionable to his nature, and his ordinary practice. But when he is actually disposed to pardon a sin, to reward a good work, to crown a virtue, he poureth out his graces as out of a golden tonnel, with a free and plenteous provision. For the same reason, the Prophet Isaiah saith, He measureth the waters with his fist, and poyzeth the Heavens with his palm; that is to say, he giveth chastisements and afflictions, signified in the Scripture by the waters, with a sparing and close hand, but as concerning rewards represented by the Heavens, he pours them on all parts, with his sacred and bounteous hands. Fear not then (O Noblemen) that you, having vowed a faithful service to your great Master, shall be in any kind frustrated of the recompence, which he hath established for his servants. He hath always the reward in his hands: If he present on one side the sword of Justice to sinners, on the other he extendeth unto you the olive of peace and benignitie. Figure to your selves the great Emperour, bearing in his arms an Eagle with two heads, who who in one beak held a thunder-bolt, and in the other a branch of Palm, with this motto, Every one in his time. God runneth the same course; if he hath thunder-bolts to crush rebellious heads, he hath palms to crown the faithful services which men of quality render to him. And without speaking here of rewards (O Noblemen) common to you with others, if you be constantly ranged in the way of virtue, you shall find that God will liberally give you three things, which those of your condition ever hold in great esteem. And what are those? A house competently rich, a solid glory, a flourishing posterity, and how is that? Amongst those who enjoy great fortunes, some build like moths, others like swallows, the rest like halcyons. Those build like moths, who raise houses of injustice and iniquity, which in the same proportion as they are reared to the clouds, unperceivably sink into hell, wear, waste, and in the end quite vanish away. This is the goodly consideration of holy Job, speaking of the palace of the wicked: He builds his house as the moth. And how doth he build? With destroying. You will say this little creature, harboured in some cloth or old garment, maketh much adoe, he gnaweth and gnaweth day and night, as endeavouring to build a lodging for himself, and in gnawing discovereth himself, the end of his travel is his loss and nakedness. O how divine is the Scripture, to represent so natively to us the blindness of the great and rich of this world, who suppose they can make magnificent and happy houses without the foundation of the fear of God! All in doing this build as the moth, that is to say, in gnawing; they have plots and designs in the Countrey, in the Citie, in every place, they have Overseers and Architects; they employ the mason, the carpenter, they raise houses of pleasure, they make magazins fretted with gold and silver, they buy, they purchase, they contrive in their imaginative brains their rents and revenues, and measure all things with the ell of eternitie. Notwithstanding one would be amazed to see that all this goodly building of fortune, composed of injustice, concussions and rapines, cemented together with the sweat and bloud of the poor, falleth by little and little into ruin; and when this cometh into the judgement of God, the foolish moth, who hath so gnawn to feed and cover himself, findeth himself naked, hungrie, ashamed, and extreamly miserable.

Three sorts of Great men make fortunes.

Job 27. 18. Ædificavit sicut tinea domum suam.

House of the moth.

Those build like swallows, who also much labour to erect houses, but with little success of fruit for posterity. Swallows after they have well built in Summer, forsake us in Autumn, and leave no other memory of them but of morter, straw, and dung: so, many Noblemen oft-times build palaces, make huge purchases, and that with unspeakeable industrie, but because they proceed therein with sinister and impure intentions, God suffereth not their posterity to enjoy it. We see houses emptie as swallows nests in Autumn: Some men will ask, who built this house? Answer will be made, such a one, a mushrome of the Court, coming from nothing in one night, in all other things faithless to God and men, who hath not left any thing memorable behind him but his vices; and thus all the fame of this man consisteth in picking of straws, which are temporal riches scattered here and there, and in the dung of an ill name, which he leaveth to posterity. Behold an aim ill taken, for the raising of fortunate buildings!

House of swallows.

But as for you (O virtuous Noblemen) God permitteth you to build as Halcyons. How is that? Two notable properties are observed in the nest of the Halcyon. The first is, that the architecture of it is so strong, so durable, it cannot be broken or cut, even with the violent stroak of iron. The second, that it is so proportioned to the bird, as if it were sowed to her bodie, in such manner that no creature can therein be received but the architect himself. Justly behold the conditions which God hath given to your houses, when they are built upon the fear of his holy Name. They are strong, of force, lasting against all the stokes of fortune, nor is there any violence which can oven them to destroy them. It is the infallible promise of God: The house of the wicked shall be demolished, but the tabernacles of the just shall flourish. Moreover they have a certain benediction, which disposeth all things in good order, the rule of expence proportioned to the quality of their persons, the Oeconomie sage and prudent, in such sort, that all things are managed there with measure and compass, as in the Halcyons nest. And as an ancient Writer hath said, order is the world of worlds, which reacheth all things in their lustre, and uniteth them with a seam and lasting band, when once it is fixed in the families of Great ones, which happeneth by the means of piety, where it always produceth the same effects, which it doth in this great Universe.

Domus impiorum delebitur, tabernacula vero justorum germinabunt. Prov. 1. 11.

The second reward, is the honour so much desired by noble spirits. It falleth out, that the wicked are sometimes raised to the greatnes of the world, but they are therein as Comets, as fires of mud and earth, who taking a false lustre, make show for a time in the air of vanity; and afterwards they are scattered, casting pestilence and poison into the four quarters of the world. On the contrary, real Noblemen, are like true stars planted and enchased by the hand of God, even in the firmament of honour, to enlighten an eternity. Their glory is fixed with nails of adamant: Calumnie may perhaps shake it, but never overthrow it; yea time it self confesseth, that there is neither pincers nor hammer can work this effect. It is God that promiseth this: Whosoever shall glorifie me, I will glorifie him, and those which despise me, shall become ignoble. Hereupon judge, how solid the honour of Great men truly virtuous is, since it is fastened to the honour of God himself, who glorieth in honouring them. A thousand and a thousand Princes, and phantastick great Ladies, have galloped honour upon the full speed, and with a discomposed spirit have invented imaginary forms to find credit and admiration in the hearts of men. Some have caused mountains and rocks to be cut, to raise statues to themselves, as Semiramis. Others have taken crows, parrats, and other birds, counterfeiting human speech, and have taught them a lesson, which was to salute them as gods, afterward enfranchizing them for the open field, have sent them into the air to carrie these salutations, and impress in the minds of men, a false idea of their divinity: so did Psapho.

Quicumque glorificaverit me, glorificabo eum: qui autem contemnunt me erunt ignobiles 1 Reg. 2. 30.

Fantasies to gain honours.

Others have taken the figures of Eagles, Lions, and Serpents, (as certain Kings of Ægypt) to strike a tertour into the souls of mortal men: others have left Medails, triumphant Arches, Colossuses, goodly Palaces, Theaters, Amphitheaters, as the Romane Emperours: others have placed themselves openly upon Altars, as Caligula, who set the figure of his own head upon the statue of Jupiter. Posterity hath exploded all this, the times have derided it, oblivion hath swallowed all of them; or if it hath not set its biting tooth therein, it hath been for no other cause, but to leave them to a hateful and detestable memory, a thousand times worse than forgetfulnes. Much otherwise, Great men that build their fortunes upon the foundations of the fear of God, from small and feeble beginnings have come to so high a pitch, that they have replenished all tongues with their praises, all hearts with their admiration, all Ages with the monuments of their glory. For it is God alone that causeth men to take aims of true and ſolid greatneſs, and who with a puiſſant arm daſheth and overwhelmeth thoſe ſpirits, which ſuffer themſelves to be tranſported with the torrent of vanity, courting airy ſmokes, emptie apparences, and flying clouds, whereby they produce monſters in ſtead of deſerved honour, ſeated fairly upon the firm rock of conſtancy. God hath in ſuch wiſe ſhewed himſelf to have greatneſs in his own hands, that extracting men from the dregs and froth of the earth, he hath made them mount ſo high, that oftentimes Imperial heads, radiantly glittering with Rubies and Diamonds, have bowed under the aſhes of a poor fiſher-man. And who ſeeth not, that the true and onely mean to enter into the poſſeſſion of honour, is ſtraitly to unite ones ſelf with this Divine Majeſty, from whence on man reflect all the luſtrous rays of greatneſs?

For a third reward, this ſovereign Mover and Architect of our lives and fortunes, doth propagate alſo the glorie of Fathers to their children, and giveth them a flouriſhing poſteritie, which makes them eternally live in the memory of men, by the moſt lively images of their virtues. It is often obſerved that Noblemen, who have eſtabliſhed tyrannie in the world, have neither been fruitful nor fortunate in their poſteritie; and as nature is ſcantie in the propagation of wolves deſigned for ſpoil, which otherwiſe would bring all the world into deſolation; ſo Almightie God by a ſecret oeconomie of his divine Providence, permitteth not that great men (who have made themſelves diſturbers of publick peace, and infringers of laws both divine and human, whereof they ought to be protectours) ſhould make the bruitiſhneſs of their ſavage ſouls, to ſurvive them in their poſterity. But as for thoſe who are arranged in the liſt of ſanctitie and modeſty, God hath (as it were) immortalized their bloud in their poſteritie, as we ſee it happen in worthie and illuſtrious families. But to what value amounteth all this which I have ſaid, in compariſon of that crown of glorie which God placeth on the heads of Noblemen in the other life, when they have virtuouſly governed in this mortal manſion? O what a brave death it is to die under the ſhadow of the Palms of ſo many heroical virtues! Oh, it is the death of a Phœnix, to die in the odours of a holy converſation, to change his ſepulchre into a cradle, and even draw life out of the Tomb! Oh what an immortalitie it is, to ſurvive eternally in the mouths of men, but much more to live in Heaven, enjoying the knowledge, love, life, and felicitie of God! O Nobles, betake your ſelves betimes and in a good hour, to the way of this temple of honour, by the exerciſe of holy virtues, which are like Elias chariot, all flaming with glory, to carrie your purified ſouls even to the height of the Emperial Heaven.

THE SECOND BOOK.

Of Hinderances, which worldly men have in the way of SALVATION and PERFECTION.

The firſt OBSTACLE.

Faintneſs and weakneſs of Faith.

Againſt Atheiſts.

HAving ſufficiently proved the obligations which Great-ones and men of qualitie have to perfection; let us now ſee the hinderances which may ſtop the increaſe thereof, as well to take from them all pretext of falſe libertie, as to denote the confuſions, very frequent in the corruptions of this Age. The firſt is a certain languor and debilitie of faith, which openeth the way to all ſorts of vices; ſo that putting all the greatneſs of the world into a falſe ſeeming, it beholdeth Paradiſe, and all the bleſſings of the other life with blear-eyes, and clouded with a perpetual eclipſe. And that you may well conceive this, let us obſerve, that in this Age greatly changed by hereſie, libertie and vice, two ſorts of men are to be ſeen, whereof the one doth ſymbolize with juſt Abel, and the other are of the ſect of Cain. Theſe two brothers began to contend together even in the worlds cradle, as Jacob and Eſau in the bellie of Rebecca. Abel had a ſoul impreſſed with a good ſtamp, religious, docile, pure, perpetually fixed in the chaſte apprehenſions of the Divinitie. Cain quite contrary, an impious ſoul, greatly infected with the ſerpents breath, black, variable, wavering in faith, and in the virtue of the Divine providence. He verily is the father of Atheiſts, and S. Bernard hath properly ſaid, He killed faith before he murdered his brother. Procopius calleth him the ſon of the earth, becauſe this unfortunate creature perpetually looked downward, having already as it were buried in the tomb of oblivion, the lights and knowledges of heaven. From thence proceeded the irreverence of his unbridled ſpirit, his wicked ſacrifices, his envie againſt his brother, afterward his furie, murder and bloud, and laſtly a deluge of calamities. The onely example of his diſaſter ſhould ſuffice to terrifie thoſe, who following him in his impietie, make themſelves undoubtedly the companions of his misfortune: but ſince it alſo is expedient we proceed herein by diſcourſe and reaſon, I obſerve the cauſes and remedies of this infidelitie. Faintneſs and debilitie in faith, and conſequently atheiſm, is formed in three ſorts of conſciences, to wit, the criminal, the bruitiſh, the curious. Atheiſm proceedeth from a criminal conſcience, when a ſoul findeth it ſelf involved in a long web of crimes, and as it were overwhelmed in the the habits of ſin. In the mean time God doth inwardly torture, prick forward, and ſcourge it, and then all bloudy and ulcerous as it is, not able longer to remain within it ſelf, but tatling ſo many diſturbances in its proper manſion, it ſearcheth evaſions and ſtarting-holes, expatiateth in the pleaſures and delights of the world, to diſſolve her many griefs, and findeth in every thing her gnawing worm. She looketh back upon the path of virtue, which ſhe hath either forſaken or never trodden, as an impoſſible track, the ſpirit of lies repreſenting it unto her all paved with thorns and briars: ſhe re-entereth into herſelf, and ſaith in her heart, that there is none but God who afflicteth her, and that neceſſarily ſhe muſt free herſelf from him; for our felicities are meaſured by the ell of our opinion, and no man is miſerable, but he that apprehendeth his own unhappineſs. Then ſoothing herſelf with theſe humane diſcourſes, ſhe herein much laboureth to acquit herſelf from God, from the belief of judgement, of hell, and the immortality of the ſoul. Notwithſtanding ſhe cannot, (albeit theſe wicked ſpirits have ſcoffed at the myſteries of Religion with their companions, as if they would put on a bold fore-head, and an impudence ſtrong enough to endure a ſtroke ſo dreadful) but contend againſt the eſſence of God. Care findeth them in their bed, and is pinned to their ſilken curtains, the thoughts of a Divinitie, which they ſuppoſed to have totally baniſhed from their hearts in pleaſures, upon the leaſt afflictions return, and make themſelves felt with very piercing points, which head-long throw them into deſpair. The Prophet Iſaiah hath divinely propheſied of ſuch a ſoul: I will make her the inheritance and poſſeſsion of hedge-hogs. Verily the miſerable caytif hatcheth in her entrails a thouſand little hedge-hogs, which as they encreaſe, make their pricks and darts multiply a thouſand gnawings, a thouſand apprehenſions, as uncapable of repoſe as apt to afflict a conſcience.

Condition of Nero.

Such heretofore was the ſtate of Nero: for this barbarous monſter, who ſo often had dipped his hand in bloud, ſought out a bath of delights to bath himſelf in; he ran up and down to prie into all the inventions of the pleaſures of the world, to rid himſelf from the arrow which he had in his heart, and to diſpoil himſelf for ever of an opinion of the Divinitie. This was a matter for him impoſſible. When he was at feaſts, ſports, or Theatres, the apprehenſion of God ſtung his heart as a Bee, and there left the ſting. If he ſlept upon roſes, the ſhadows of dead men approached to his downie bed, to require an account of their bloud. He ſcoffed at religion, and feared it; one while he deſpiſed ſacred things, and at another time they made him tremble with horrour. He ſought out waters of expiation to waſh his ſins, and never opened his eyes to thoſe which S. Peter and S. Paul preſented to him. His ſoul was torn with pincers within it ſelf, as on a perpetual ſcaffold of exquiſite torments: when it would iſſue out of it ſelf, it was like a wild colt, courſed and chaſed by men and beaſts; or as a bull ſtung with a gad-flie, who fain would run for himſelf, yet ſtill findeth himſelf with himſelf. Judge (O Atheiſts) what a life this is?

Bruitiſh conſcience. Clemens Alex. pedag. Plotin. apud Phil. Ψυχαὶ φαυλότατον μέρος ἔχουσιν ἀνοήτου δρυὸς. Irreverens & infrunitus animus.

The ſecond cauſe of Atheiſm, is the ſenſual love of favours, pleaſures, eaſe, and delights of the world, which oftentimes degenerate into the meer bruitiſhneſs of a ſoul which ſleepeth in fat and greaſe, ſo intricated and confounded in earth, that it looſeth all knowledge of Heaven. Clemens Alexandrinus ſaith, that it happeneth to ſouls, which are great lovers of ſenſual pleaſures, to engroſs and thicken themſelves in ſuch ſort, that as Plotinus very learnedly writeth, they live not but as a plant. Theſe ſpirits are much enclined to Atheiſm. for as the Wiſe-man obſerveth, after the concupiſcences of the belly, cometh unbrideled irreverence, which ſerveth as a harbinger to impiety. God deſired not that in offering a bird (as a ſacrifice unto him) the gorge ſhould be preſented, which is the little magazin of the meat, but commanded to caſt it into the aſhes: which is to declare to us, that carnal men are moſt uncapable of celeſtial things, and very fit to be dragged to the dung-hil and aſh-heap. The more they are affected to things preſent, ſo much the more, yea even in deep draughts, they drink down the forgetfulneſs of Heavenly things. All thoſe ſay with Eſau, To what uſe will this goodly prerogative of primogeniture ſerve me? this title of the children of God, this happineſs of future life? If there be no ſenſual pleaſures nor carnal contentments in Heaven, I will have none. They become the true diſciples of Mahomet, who in his Alcoran, deſcribing the Turks Paradiſe, placeth there good water, good fruits, rings, carcanets, ſilken tapeſtrie hangings, and ſuch like. All theſe things they would enjoy but the water, which they willingly would change into wine. What ſwine are theſe.

The third cauſe, if not of formal Atheiſm, at the leaſt of weakneſs and faintneſs in matter of faith, is when a ſoul will proceed in matters of Religion by politick and humane ways, and ſuffer it ſelf greatly to be pleaſed with curioſitie, which inceſſantly moveth it to draw the curtain of holy myſteries, to enlighten them with the torch of reaſon, and to behold all that paſſeth there. Such ſpirits are not ſo malign nor ſtupid as the firſt and ſecond, notwithſtanding they are weak and very ignorant, ſince they fail in the firſt rule of wiſdom, which diſcovereth to us that it is an abſolute folly of a diſcompoſed judgement, to be deſirous to meaſure things divine, by the rule of ſenſe and humane experience. They turmoyl themſelves, and bate like a hawk upon the perch, and often ſay in their heart, that which the Apoſtle S. Peter obſerveth in the perſon of infidels: Where are theſe promiſes? Where is the coming of the Son of God? See you not that times revolve, men come and go, all things have their ordinary courſe; and we muſt expect no other miracle? They imagine that all the counſels of Heaven ſhould turn and roul according to the projects of their underſtanding, and that if God had his eye open, (as it is ſaid) upon the oeconomie of the world, both this and that would ſucceed as they have contrived in their feeble brain, which is a great illuſion. Such kind of men would willingly ſpeak with ſpirits, to hear them tell tales of the other life, they would know (as S. John Chryſoſtom ſaith) what habit, what clothing the Son of man weareth, covered under the ſpecies of the Sacrament, how the Angels are formed, of what colour the devils are, nothing would pleaſe them better than to talk with one really poſſeſſed, to know things future, to divulge predictions, to behold prodigies and miracles. Briefly, it ſeemeth they have no other purpoſe but to believe in God, by the devil. Such kind of proceedings are very exorbitant and unfortunate, for the reaſons which I will preſently produce.

Pet. 2. 3. Ubi eſt promiſſio? ubi eſt adventus ejus? ex quo enim dormierunt patres, omnia perſeverant ab initio creaturæ.

easons to ettle a ſoul. mpious curioſitie pulls out both it's eyes.

Firſt (O you wretched ſouls) who betake your ſelves to this way, ſee you not, that by this means you pull out the two eyes, which God hath placed within your ſouls, which are as the Sun and Moon in the firmament, to wit, the eye of faith, and that of natural prudence. You ſeem to your ſelves ſharp and clear-ſighted, and are more blind than moles. For tell me, for as much as concerneth the light of nature, can there be found a folly more groſs and abſurd, than to behold men (who are born and bred in Chriſtianity as in their proper element, after a thouſand and a thouſand witneſſes of the truth of their religion, which even the very marbles do ſpeak, and ſtones proclaim) to make themſelves ſo wiſe and able, as to ſeek out other proofs than thoſe which have won worlds to the Goſpel? You would have a God, that ſhould give you new ſigns & tokens, to confirm you in faith; a God which ſervilely will be captivated to pleaſe the ticklings of your curioſitie: Senſeleſs men as you are, this were not to have a God, but a lame Idol. Are you not very blockiſh to treat with God much more wickedly than one would do with a mean man? If you had paſſed your word to two friends, you would praiſe him with all freeneſs, that ſhould reſt ſatisfied therewith, and would condemn the other whom you ſhould find fearful, unconſtant, and ever upon miſtruſt, yet would you that God ſhould favour your infidelity by extraordinary ways? What apparency is there for this? All curioſity is damnable, it is an ulcer that ever itcheth, and which without ceaſing is iterated by continual ſcratching, it is as a hort-leech which draweth out all the bad bloud, and filleth till it burſt. It is a magpy, a byting worm, which taketh men by the ears as well as dogs. But above all it is moſt pernicious in matter of Religion. Sixtus an ancient Authour, cited in the Bibliotheke of the Fathers, hath ſpoken a thing very remarkable: When a man ſpeaketh of God, yea with all veritie, we muſt always therein proceed reſervedly, as if we trod upon thorns. It were better (ſaith S. John Chryſoſtom) not to know him, than to know him ill. Heſychius teacheth us, one muſt approach to him as to fire; too great a diſtance maketh us quake with cold, and over near approches burn us.

An unworthy way to treat with God.

Secondly judge, whether any bodie would not ſay, it were a great weakneſs of underſtanding, to be deſirous to proceed in matter of Religion by ſuch knowledges, as are common with bruit beaſts, and forſake thoſe of men? And yet this is it which you do, when leaving the eye of underſtanding, and the light of a rectified judgement, (which God hath given man by priviledge of excellency) you will hear ſee, and touch, begging a truth from bruitiſh ſenſe, which is abſolutely to raiſe them above their reach. See you not how the Moon, by her interpoſition eclipſeth the Sun, and when you in matter of faith interpoſe ſenſe, you obſcure the light of judgement (the true ſun of your ſoul) which dictateth to you, that it is a thing moſt reaſonable the creature ſhould ſubmit himſelf to the Creatour; that it carefully keep it ſelf from daring to comprehend him in the univerſality of his nature, and ſhut up this vaſt Ocean in a little cockle-ſhel. It is a pitiful thing to hear, that theſe curious ſpirits ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be ſurprized by a quack-ſalving impoſtour, who caſteth miſts afore their eyes by force of deluſions, and to contend with God who giveth them as many obligations and aſſurances of his promiſes, as there are letters in the Scripture. This is not onely to crack the eye-ſtring of a reaſonable judgement, but alſo to pull out the eye of faith, all pure and celeſtial as it is. You demand proofs of your Religion (frantick man) look back upon the birth, the progreſs, and ſtate of the Church. This is the great ſign, the Ladie clothed with the Sun, which one cannot be ignorant of without a prodigious blindneſs.

Perverſe proceeding of the wicked.

Deus tot & tantis voluminibus cavet, & debitor non tenetur. Chryſ. ſerm. 25.

Apocal. 12.

Admit it were nothing to have for proof ſo great, ſo univerſal, ſo conſtant conſent of all the Prophets, to preſage many Ages before the effect, the birth, life, death of the Meſſias, the eſtabliſhment of the Church, the converſion of the Gentiles, ſo determinately and punctually, that even the moſt diabolical ſpirits, who had from all times theſe Scriptures in their hands, ſeeing this conſequently to happen which ſucceeded in the oeconomie of Chriſtianity, were enforced to yield to truth.

Invincible proofs of ſtietie.

That it were nothing to have ſeen through all Ages, a thouſand and a thouſand miracles, in Heaven, in earth, on the ſea, done in confirmation of Chriſtianity, in the ſight of the moſt wittie and malicious, who bent all their endeavour to cenſure, reject, and contradict them. Notwithſtanding, the evidence was ſo palpable, ſo ſtrong, ſo invincible, that Tyrants, yea the moſt enraged bloudy executioners, convinced with the proofs thereof, let fall the ſword, which they had taken in their hand, for the ſlaughter of Martyrs, and ſtretched out their necks to the perſecutours to be beheaded. That it were nothing, to tell what a good Authour upon account taken, hath obſerved, that there hath been eleven millions of Martyrs of all ſexes, ages and conditions, who have ſealed the Religion which we profeſs, by effuſion of their bloud, and in this liſt an infinite number of perſons of eminent quality, who conſiderately proceeded in the leaſt occaſions, that have abandoned the eaſeful accommodations of their fortunes, their eſtates, dignities, yea their ſcepters and diadems, to deliver as a prey to moſt enormous and exquiſite torments, a moſt precious life which they might have led in honour, in reputation according to the world, in pleaſures, in delights, in wonders. That it were nothing to ſay, that after perſecutions there ſprung up an infinitie of brave ſpirits, intelligent, clear-ſighted, furniſhed with all ſorts of human knowledges, as the Juſtins, Tertullians, Cyprians, Auguſtines, and ſo many other of the ſame profeſſion, who after they had ſeriouſly and judiciouſly examined the ſtate of Chriſtianity, have embraced it, profeſſed it, defended it, ſome with their pen, ſome with ſweat, and ſome with their bloud.

The Heavens are not enameled with ſo many ſtars, as the Church hath had great men, the prodigies and lights of the world, who by their learned writings have illuſtrated the verities of our Religion. I leave you to think, if among ſo many great Suns, which have garniſhed Heaven and earth with brightneſs, one ſhould behold a ridiculous reeremouſe to creep out of a hole, and ſay it is not day, and that all theſe ſuns are but darkneſs, whether he deſerve not to be burnt, and ſtampt to powder? That all this which I have ſaid (being very ſtrong and ſpecious) enter not into the liſt of account: what may one anſwer to two things, which are very eminent in Chriſtianitie, the conſideration whereof is of power to ſettle the moſt wavering ſpirit, to wit, the marvellous proceeding which hath been held in the eſtabliſhment of our Religion, and the moſt pure ſanctitie of the doctrine thereof? What is there humane in this law, which is eſtabliſhed againſt all humane ways, by a ſucceſs ſo ſtrange and admirable, that it engulfeth all ſpirits in wonder? Where were in theſe beginnings, eloquence, favour of Princes, their revenues, their eſtate, their arms, their ſouldiers? Where were the promiſes of honour, reputation, dignitie? Where were the moving allurements of ſenſe, and all that which uſeth to feed and foment ſects? From whence cometh it, that the Church alone hath encreaſed under tempeſtuous ſtorms, in perſecutions, in the ſlaughters of three hundred years, during which time there was no engine, which hell uſed not, no torment which the devil invented not, no inventions which the Great-ones of the earth with powerful hand conſpiring, executed not? All the plaiſtered pretended ſects, which have ſeemed deſirous to take this away, are quite vaniſhed: From whence it cometh to paſs, that the Church alone hath maintained it ſelf in a bloudie tempeſt of three Ages, in the contradiction of a thouſand Sects: From whence it proceedeth, that the crueltie of Tyrants hath ſerved for encouragement to the faithful, and the bloud of Martyrs for ſeed to poſterity. Where can a Religion be found which with ſuch innocency cency and purity of life, ſuch humility, ſolidity, ſanctity, and which is more, with the arms of diſgraces, poverty, deſpicable contempt, auſterity and torments, hath changed the eſtate and face of the world, hath planted the Croſs in the capital Citie of the Empire, above the thunder-bearing Eagles of the Emperours, and the aſhes of a poor fiſherman maſſacred for this law, above the Diadems of Kings?

What would the ancient Cæſars ſay, if they roſe again from their graves, to behold in Rome, where all the Monarchies were eſtabliſhed and incorporated, where all the devils and furies were cantonnized, as in their laſt and ſtrongeſt fortreſs; in Rome from whence came all the fulminating thunders and bloudy Edicts againſt Chriſtians, where the ſword of perſecution was ſharpened to reap a harveſt of heads, where was a Pantheon, the magazin of all their falſe Deities, to ſee there the ſtate of the ſupream * Biſhop of Chriſtians, to ſee there a Church erected to Peter the fiſher-man, much more magnificent than ever was the Pantheon? Say human wiſdom, if the SAVIOUR of the world at the age of twelve years, when he began publickly to teſtifie he was come to redeem the Kingdom of his Father from violent and unjuſt uſurpers, had asked counſel of you touching the proceedings which ought to be held in this buſineſs, what had you adviſed him? Had you not demanded of him, where are your treaſures? Have you not inexhauſtible riches to oppoſe an Empire, which hath a hundred and fiftie millions of revenew? No, I pretend to have no other riches but poverty. Have you ſome five hundred thouſand men in pay, for ten years to maintain one army on Nilus, another on Euphrates, one on Rhene, another on the Ocean, another within the entrails of the Romane Empire? No, I purpoſe not to levie for execution of this deſign but twelve poor men, ſea-faring men, without ſtrength, without induſtrie, arms, or ſo much as a ſtaff. Have you a thouſand brave Oratours, men of great learning, eminent eloquence, who will endeavour by the charms of their flowing tongues, to attract the people and diſpoſe them to their wills? No, I have none but ſimple, ignorant people, ideots, that go out to preach the Croſs. What would you have ſaid thereupon? O folly, how do you think to come to honour by ignominie, to riches by povertie, to greatneſs by the infamious puniſhment of the Croſs, to immortalilitie by a bloudie death? And yet behold it is done. What ſay you? Is there in all this proceſs any thing that is human? Muſt we ſearch out other miracles for confirmation of faith?

Wonderful proceeding.

* Alii (nec minùs Chriſtiani) aliter ſentiunt.

Adde hereunto, that the devils craftily counterfeited wiſdom, power, force, by deceitful, violent, and bruitiſh ways, but never could they conſtantly feign humilitie, patience, purity, ſanctity. Sects which have taken this diſſembled mask, have not been able long time to keep it, they all have ſhivered, and broken with pride, preſumption, private and publick impurities, with ordures of execrable ſacriledges. The ſpirit onely of Chriſtianitie hath always appeared as a true ſpirit of piety, humility, patience, charity, continency, chaſtity, manſuetude, contempt of the world, virtues ſo noble, ſo elate, ſo heroick, that the life alone of a Chriſtian, being with conformity directed fairly to the doctrine of our SAVIOUR, is a perpetual miracle, able to convert worlds. All that which the great Philoſophers of this Univerſe could not attain with the flight of their feathers, the Chriſtian toucheth with his hand, he hath demonſtrated more in his works, than they have ſaid in their books; they have built Commonwealths on paper, and our religion hath raiſed Monarchies of real virtues. And if the wicked, who ſtagger in their belief, had addicted themſelves to the exerciſe of good works, never would infidelity have made prey upon their underſtandings, but for that they ſuffered themſelves to be tranſported with the overflow of pride, preſumption, curioſitie, of toys, vanities, and carnal ſenſualities of the world, God in juſt vengeance ſuffereth them to fall into a reprobate ſenſe.

Sanctitie an irrefragable argument.

Oh loſt ſoul, which giveſt way to this faintneſs and remiſneſs in thy religion, conſider a little attentively all that I have ſaid hereupon. And if truth content thee not, thou mayeſt well hereafter expect the lot of Cain, the abſence from the face of God, perpetually frightful anxiety, terrours and menaces from heaven, the indignation of the ſovereign Judge, the hatred of men, the ill ſucceſs of thy affairs, extraordinary maladies, deſolation, the life of a ſad howling wolf, a tragick death, and deteſtation of thy poſterity.

Even Atheiſts amongſt the confuſions of Paganiſm, have ſeldom or never found aſſurance therein: ſome have been ſacrificed to flames, as Diagoras; others eaten up with lice, as Pherecydes; others devoured by dogs, as Lucian; others thunder-ſhot in a bath, and turned to aſhes in the twinkling of an eye, as Olympius; others have ſuddenly loſt human ſpeech, and have bellowed like bulls, and in this roaring have yielded up their ſouls, as Simon Thuvan a wicked pedant in the year 1201. others have burſt in pieces in an infamous privie, infecting the ſinks and publick ſewers, with their ſouls (much more ſtinking) as did the wicked Arius; others have loſt their ſcepter and eyes, as a King of the Bulgarians; who was deprived and blinded by his own father Trebellius, as ſoon as he returned from a Monaſtery, where he had retired himſelf with armed power, to chaſtiſe the Atheiſm of his ſon. We are not yet in an Age ſo caytife, where brave and courageous Magiſtrates are wanting to bridle the impudency of thoſe, who would advance theſe deteſtable Maximes of impiety. We have ſeen in freſh memory, the Decree of that great and illuſtrious Parliament of Paris, that condemned to the fire the Authours of ſuch abominations, which powerfully ſtayed the violent courſe of black and beaſtly impieties, that diſpread themſelves under the maſk of goodneſs; which ſhewed an heroick zeal, both of the glory of God, and general integrity and maintenance of laws, for which God hath reſerved to them a crown of immortality. This Decree hath been attended with favours from heaven, which even in an inſtant hath ſweetened notably theſe puniſhments, and invited the bleſſings of all good men that have with thankſgiving lifted their hands to heaven. We had ſeen a little before the aſhes of ſome to flie in the wind, perhaps into the eyes of thoſe which imitate them in their doctrine. If they expect any other arguments, it will appear their frenzie would have no other remedies, but the ſearing-iron and fire.

Picus Mir. Ep. 1. Magna inſania Evangelio non credere, cujus veritatem ſanguis Martyrum clamat, Apoſtolicæ reſonant voces, prodigia probant, ratio confirmat, elementa loquuntur, dæmones confitentur: ſed longè major inſania, ſi de veritate Evangelii non dubiteres, vivere tamen quaſi de ejus falſitate non dubitares.

As for other Catholicks who believe as the faithful, and live as infidels, pronouncing JESUS CHRIST with their mouth, and renouncing him with their hands; I pray them to ponder a ſaying of one of the rareſt wits which the world hath a long time had (it is Picus Mirandula) expreſſed by him in theſe words to his nephew: It is a prodigious folly, not to believe the Goſpel, the truth whereof is ſealed with the bloud of Martyrs innumerable, teſtified by the Apoſtles, proved by miracles, confirmed by reaſon, publiſhed and declared by the elements and creatures inſenſible, confeſſed even by the devils: But it is a much more notorious folly, not to doubt at all of the verity of the Goſpel which one profeſſeth, and yet to live, as if he made no queſtion of the falſitie thereof.

Advice to cold Catholicks.

What a mockery it is, to carrie the name of a poor SAVIOUR, and to burn with enraged avarice? of an humble SAVIOUR, and ſuffer himſelf to be expoſed to tempeſtuous winds of exorbitant ambition, which breatheth nothing but breaches and ſhip-wracks? of a crucified SAVIOUR, and to live in a maſs of fleſh, wholly effeminated with delights and curioſities, even to the making their ſpittings to ſwim in gold? of a meek SAVIOUR, and to carry under the name of a Chriſtian, a Gorgons eye, the anger of an Aſp, the heart of a Tyger, a ſoul full of revenges, of gall, of bloud, of Monſters, of beaſtly bruitiſhneſs? O God, what Chriſtianity is this! Salvianus ſpeaketh a word very remarkeable: We cannot ſin without making our ſelves capable of ſpiritual treaſon in the higheſt degree; the ſins of Chriſtians are ſacrileges, the name which they bear condemneth their life, without any other form of proceſs. These colds of the north, this ycineſs which ſome Catholicks ſhew in their belief, is greatly ſcandalous and prejudicial to verity: becauſe the miſ-believing which ſee them live in ſuch exorbitancy, cannot perſwade themſelves they firmly believe the Goſpel which they profeſs, but that all their religion is but an exteriour countenance, and rather an idle amuzement of words, than a true liſt of virtue. This bringeth a horrible prejudice into the Church of God, which ſhould even rent our hearts, if we yet retained one onely vein of that noble bloud the Martyrs profuſely ſpent for the defence of the truth. The remedies for theſe eſſential impediments in the act of Chriſtianitie, are to take away and cut off the cauſes of this infidelity.

Salvian. 4. de guber. Dei. Omnis Chriſtianorum culpa Divinitatis injuria eſt. Atrocius ſub ſancti nominis profeſſione peccamus. Ipſa errores noſtros religio quam profitemur accuſat.

Remedies.

1. To prepare a conſcience chaſte and timerous, which never wil make it ſelf an hoſteſs for mortal ſin; and if by chance it give harbor thereunto, to diſlodge it preſently: for ſins heaped one upon another by a diſſolute deadneſs of confeſſion, make a ſavage and bruitiſh ſoul which ſeeketh nothing but to be freed from God, though it be a matter impoſſible.

2. Not to taſt the bleſſings, contentments, or honours of the world, with too much ardour; they eaſily enſnare our affections and make the forgetfulneſs of Heaven ſlide into an inſenſible ſoul.

3. To eſchew curioſitie, principally in matter of religion, as the canker of faith. We muſt reſemble the Cuttle, a very wiſe fiſh, who during ſtorms, fixeth herſelf firmly upon the rocks, without motion: amongſt the floating thoughts which a dark cloudy conſcience may ſuggeſt, always to hold ones foot on the rock of S. Peter, fixed and ſtable: to truſt the direction of the Church, and not to forſake our hold. It is the moſt palpable folly which can creep into the brain of man, to deſire wiſdom contrary to the wiſdom of Saints, which is humility.

Non plus ſapere quam oportet ſapere, ſed ſapere ad ſobrietatem. Rom. 1.

4. To exerciſe your ſelf diligently in good works, as prayers, abſtinencies, frequentation of Sacraments, and alms-deeds. Faith is given to you, as an inheritance of Heaven, whoſoever endeavoureth not to husband it, looſeth it.

The ſecond OBSTACLE.

* Errour in Religion.

Cauſe hoc caput & non niſi cum delectu adhibito legendum.*

Friendly and wholeſom counſel to the Nobilitie of the pretended Religion.

S. Hieroym the letter to Cteſiphon. Hæreſes ad originem ſuam revocaſſe, confutaſſe, Hæreticorum ſententias prodidiſſe ſuperaſſe eſt.

AN hereſie diſcovered, is a face unmasked. Take away the vizard, you diſarm her, pull away this ſemblance painted with hypocriſie, wherewith ſhe hath plaiſtered her face, you ſufficiently refute her; you need but to know her to overcome her, and when the head of her arrows are bare, they have no more force. Catholick Doctours have hitherto couragiouſly endeavoured to take from her this veil and adulterated colours: yea even ſhe at this time hath ſo favourably for you unmasked her ſelf, that a man muſt pull out his eyes, if he will not behold her deformity in her rebellion, juſtly deteſted by the ſage and moderate of her own ſide.

And I beſeech them to conſider that this egge which they abhor, is laid by the Raven that broodeth in their boſom, and it is a great blindneſs to break the egges of the Aſp, and cheriſh the ſerpent which hath laid them.

Good and generous ſouls, which yet retain ſome ſparks of a French ſpirit, do well ſee theſe proceedings are not according to Scripture, which ſo ſeverely recommendeth the honour of Kings, and therefore they ſound a retreat, they ſould up their enſigns, freely confeſſing they have erred as men, and proteſting not to perſevere in miſchief like devils. There are none but enraged ſpirits that will be healed by the experience of their own ill, and bury themſelves in their ruin; wiſe men always make a medicine for themſelves of others folly.

Optimum eſt aliena inſania frui.

Go to then, you who after ſo many voices from Heaven, do ſtill ſtagger, and adviſe if you ought to return to the Romane Church, which is the womb of your beginning and boſom of your repoſe, give me leave, that I may take this film from your eyes; grow not outragious, to what purpoſe ſhould you ſtand quaking in theſe frightful agonies? Exerciſe a little patience, I do not doubt but you will bleſs the hand which layeth hold on you, when you ſhall come to ſee the light. I come not with ſword in hand, to put a religion into your heads with main force; I come to you full of compaſſion of your miſery, full of affection for your ſalvation, full of the deſire of your eaſe, of your contentment, of your glory. Do you refuſe me? A truth doth not gall your ears: when you have underſtood and diligently conſidered it, if it pleaſe you not, you may reject it. But I beſeech God the Father of light and mercy may open your heart and eyes, to reſolve you herein accordingly to his holy will. It is a matter of no ſmall importance to handle the affairs of ſalvation. We well know we have an immortal ſoul, which ſhall ſurvive to all eternity, either in the boſom of the glory of Heaven, or in the flames of the damned; we well know by what gate it entered into this life, and where it at this preſent ſojourneth, but we underſtand not by what paſſage, when, or how it ſhall iſſue out. We have nothing here more certain than death, nothing more uncertain than the hour and manner, nothing ſo aſſured in the other world, as to find there a judgement of God, a Heaven for virtues, a hell for ſin: nothing ſo doubtful as the determinate ſentence of your proceſs, nothing ſo abſolutely confirmed, as that one cannot be ſaved without true Religion; and nothing ſo controverted by the malice of Satan, as the verity of religion. Notwithſtanding if you erre in the choice, you make ſhip-wrack before you weigh anchour, and ſo long as you remain in errour, nothing can ſave nor deliver you from eternal damnation. For it is a belief of all Chriſtianitie, witneſſed by Saint Fulgentius in the book which he compoſed of faith, that all thoſe who ſhut up the courſe of their life out of the true Church, although they have filled the world with hoſpitals, and ſhed their bloud for the name of Jeſus Chriſt, cannot free themſelves from the eternal torments of hel. See wretched ſoul, if at this dreadful hour of death and Gods judgement you find your ſelf miſerably deceived

Importance of the choiſe of religion, matters very conſiderable.

Truth worthy to be embraced. De fide ad petrum. Diacon. c. 48. Qui extra Eccleſiam Catholicam præſentem finiunt vitam, in ignem æternum ituros, Quantaſcumque elemoſynas fecerint, & ſi pro Chriſti nomine etiam ſanguinem fuderint, nullatenus poſſe ſalvari.

ceived by your Ministers under the pretext of Scripture, whither will you have recourse? Verily whatsoever is said to you, you well know in your conscience that dying in the faith of S. Lewis, S Bernard, S. Francis, who have directly opposed yours, you have all the possible assurance of a good religion: nor do I thinke you have so laid downe all shame, that you condemn so great and illustrious personages.

Assurance of the Catholick.

You are not ignorant that all innovation is dangerous, but principally in matter of faith. They that follow the main current and generality of a religion ancient and well-grounded cannot perish but by falling from heaven, cannot stumble in their belief but by intombing themselves in the ruins of Christianitie, which God neither can nor will suffer to be lost, according to his promises.

They which adhere to novelties, sail in a sea of monsters and tempests, without pole-star, without rudder, without Pilot, without any other guid than their own judgement, which cannot choose but very easily deceive them.

Danger of noveltie in religion.

If there be flames in hell employed in the punishment of sinfull souls, there is no doubt but they shall chiefly be inflicted on them, who have laboured to rend the garment of Jesus Christ, to break the connexions and seames of the Church, to strike at the lawfull powers ordained by God, to throw disorder, fire, and bloud into the state of their Prince. What horrour will it be in this great and general day, when you shall see your innocencie by association of religion, engaged to the enormitie of so many disastrous crimes, which you must expiate with paines, which shall have no other limits but eternity? Enter again into your self a little, and afford so much patience as to know your self. For if you desire to proceed with all security, I advise you three things.

Three things necessary to dispose ones self in religion.

First, to have a spirit throughly discharged of anticipations, bold animosities and apprehensions, which raise mistes even among the most resplendent lights of truth. It is said that heretofore at Smyrna a citie of Greece, there was a false mirrour kept in the Temple, which did represent the most beautiful and amiable faces, with notable deformitie, and on the contrary gave to creatures ugly and misshapen, a lustre of borrowed and wholly imaginarie beautie. Your Ministers in the false glasse of their Doctrine, represent the Romane Church to you, this lovely and chaste spouse of Heaven, as a monster composed of all sorts of abominations, you have your ears perpetually beaten, with the seven hills of Rome, with Antichrist, with the horned beast, with Idolatries and superstitions, which they maliciously obtrude to us. If you remaine fixed in these perswasions, how can you doe other but hate that which you know not?

First to avoid prejudice.

Mirrour of Smyrna. Pausanias.

On the contrary, you are made to behold a sect which you well know to have been begun by a general revolt from superiour powers, by scandalous sensualities, and an infinite number of cruelties as a celestiall Doctrine, beautifull, radiant, under the pretext of Scripture, which is a meer subject to fancie; and considering it under this veyle you love it, and as Nero, who through an emerald beheld the flames and bloud of his countrie, and found it a pleasant mirrour, so whilest you view the pretended Religion under a veyle, all seemeth beautiful and goodly to you. Take away for one hour at least this partiall prejudicate spirit, drunke with passion; and take another, calme, reposed, settled, which hath an indifferent care for each part.

Second disposition, to avoid the spr it

The second thing is, you must not too much stick upon petty curiosities of a thousand controversies and unprofitable disputations. Truth ordinarily is therein ill handled under the shadow of cherishing it, it is haled this way, and that way, with such boldnesse, that it seemeth every one would dis-member it, and each man take his share away with him. After so many stabs and stoc-adoes on this side, and that side, no other fruit is derived but yea and no, and the soul oft-times findeth it selfe as much void of peace and reason, as it is full of gall and darkness.

of quarrels and eager contentions. Indefiexo motu adversandi studium persistit, ubi non rationi voluntas subjicitur sed ibi quæ studemus doctrinam coaptamus. Hilarius. 10. de Trin.

You know what is written in the vision of the prophet Elias: God is not to be found in the rustling of impetuous winds, in boysterous stormes, in turmoyles, in fire; but in a gentle gale, which bringeth light and refreshment in its wings;

Truth in the calm. Non in commotione Dominus. In sibilo auræ tenuis. Reg. 3. 19.

Likewise, veritie fit to handle the conversion of souls, is not ordinarily in these ardent and contentious disputations, where the prizes of fast and loose are played, but in the repose of a quiet spirit, temperate, moulded in the hands of a prudent docilenes. For faith runneth a different course from humane sciences. To say, why this? and why that? to sift the causes, the effects, the tenents, the utmost bounds of a point, it is the vulgar track of inferiour schools. Faith which hath God himself for object, who is a bottomless abyss of light and perfection, cannot demonstrate all that it believeth, otherwise it would not be faith, nor God would not no more be God. He that seeketh faith, seeketh not reason. Athens hath nothing to intermeddle with Jerusalem, nor the Academie with the Church. Our schoole is the porch of Solomon, which teacheth us, we must search for God with simplicitie of heart, and not with frivolous curiositie. Faith moveth upon two poles, the first is to believe what God hath revealed; the second to believe, because he who is an eternal truth, hath revealed it, without any other restriction, specified modification, or humane distinction. What wrong doth the Creatour to us, if he would have us believe more of him than we are able to comprehend? It is not for the iron to ask of the Magnet or Load-stone, from whence those charms and secret influences come, wherewith he attracteth and captiveth him. It is enough that he follow. When God proposeth a verity unto thee by the voice and general consent of the Church, (poor man) thou kickest, thou friskest, thou dost appeal to human reason, to sense, to judgement, which have wings too short and insufficient to undertake such a flight.

A singular axiom of Chrysol. and Tertullian. Qui fidem quærit rationem non quærit. Quid Athenis, & Hierosolymis? Quid Academiæ & Ecclesiæ? Nostra institutio de porticu Salomonis est, quæ monet Deum in simplicitate cordis quærendum. Chrys. serm. 58. & Tertul. de præscrip.

Whilest thou therein proceedest in the manner, thy faith will be no true faith, but a phantasie which will entertain thee with false illusions, and leave thee real torments. It is a great science in matter of Religion to have a holy and conscientious ignorance. All Hereticks (saith Tertullian) promise reason and knowledge. All of them assail faith with human understanding. God teacheth us another way, which is to adore his mysteries with submission of spirit, and make of our own proper judgements a sacrifice on the Altar of faith.

Omnes tument, omnes scientiam pollicentur. Sapientiæ hæc veritas est interdum sapere quod nolis. Hilar. 5. de Trinit. initio.

Third disposition Purity of life.

The third thing which you are to have in great recommendation, is diligently to purge your conscience from the rust of sin. The spirit of God is pleased and fed amongst lilies, and nothing so much hindereth heavenly doctrine as impuritie of life. Pearls are dissolved in vineger, and truth in a heart made bitter with the corruption of vice. If you desire that it should come to you, observe three things exactly. First endeavour, as much as you can possibly, to free your self from a certain spirit of presumption, which puffeth men up and inebrateth them with the love of their own judgement, before they be throughly awakened, and from hence it cometh that they affectionately imbrace themseves, and make such esteem of their own thoughts, words, maxims, that all ſeemeth gold. This is a pernicious illuſion, and which ſtoppeth up all exceſs to our Saviour, who is much pleaſed to converſe with the humble.

Qui diligit cordis munditiem amicum habebit Regem, incorruptio facit eſſe proximum Deo. Prov. 2. 2. Sap. 6.

Secondly, live with great puritie of ſoul and body, carefully preſerving your ſelf from being engulfed in ſenſual affections, pleaſures and ordures of fleſh, which bury the ſoul in a puddle, and make it uncapable of all good. God hath not upon earth a more pleaſing hoſtels than purity of heart. 'T is that which procures for us the amity of the Sovereign King, and placeth us near the Divinity. Finally labour to adorn your ſelf with Charity, and the very bowels of pitie towards the poor and perſons afflicted, aſſiſting them according to the ability which you have; and when you, fortified with ſuch arms, ſhall daily knock at the gates of Heaven, by inceſſant prayer asking grace, ſpeaking and conferring oftimes with ſome Catholick Doctour, virtuous, charitable and peaceful, I have infinite hopes the Father of light will dart upon your heart his beams, and give you leave to know the truth.

Four very notable points to diſcover the falſhood of the pretended.

In the mean ſpace, ponder a little in your heart four notable points, which will make you diſcover the falſitie of the pretended Religion.

The firſt is, the beginning. The ſecond, the progreſs. The third, the foundation of the Doctrine. The fourth, the fruits. Behold four touch-ſtones to judge aright of Religion. If all this do well accord with reaſon and veritie in the pretended Religion, I give you leave to follow it; but if all therein be tottering and ruinous, I beſeech you open your eyes a little, and view your miſery, after you have ſo often ſhut up your ears againſt reaſon, and your heart againſt charitie.

Original.

Then firſt of all conſider, whether this Religion you profeſs be ancient or new. If it be ancient and the Religion of the Apoſtles, you ought to follow it; if new, you ought to condemn it; no man doubteth. Now, it is as new as noveltie it ſelf: which is proved, firſt by the name thereof, ſince every Religion which is called reformed, ought neceſſarily to have been deformed; for a thing is not reformed which never had deformitie. This is clear. And every Religion which is ſaid to be reformed in things eſſential, as are Sacraments, was then before deformed in matters eſſential, and ſo deformed, that in a word it was no longer a Religion.

For it is as impoſſible a Religion can ſubſiſt without the veritie of faith and Sacraments, as to ſay that a man can be a man without a reaſonable ſoul. Now this Religion of which we make queſtion, according to your ſaying, was deformed in eſſential things, to wit, in Sacraments, whereby it appeareth it was no more a Religion, than a lying truth, to ſpeak properly, is truth it ſelf.

Pretended religion new, and therefore none at all.

Wherefore we muſt conclude, that thoſe which boaſt they have reformed it within theſe hundred years, have made it wholly new: as if the Sun had been annihilated for a thouſand years ſpace, and that God came to reſtore it, it would be an abſolute new Sun; ſo is this Religion wholly new. Behold then, if every new Religion (as is moſt evident) carrie its condemnation, ſee you not, that this ſame which you profeſs, is falſe, ſince it proveth it ſelf to be new, and onely diſcovered ſince Luther and Calvin.

The proof thereof is evident.

And think not, this novelty is onely proved by reaſon. It is your own confeſſion in the 31. article, where you openly profeſs, the Church hath not onely been reformed, but abſolutely made new: this ſole innovation (if you judge aright of it) ſhould give you occaſion to ſuſpect it.

Novelties ever ſuſpected by the wiſe.

The ſage Common-wealth of the Lycians heretofore ordained, that all thoſe who would propoſe any noveltie in matter of law, ſhould deliver it in publick, with a halter about their necks; to the end that if their propoſitions were not found to be good and profitable, the authours thereof ſhould be ſtrangled in the place.

And what can one think of them, which have brought in ſuch huge noveliſm in matter of Religion, ſo diſaſtrous, and ſo prejudicial to Chriſtendom by the effuſion of ſo much bloud? Judge your ſelves, and weigh at leiſure the force of this argument; you ſhall perceive it is very hard to find evaſions againſt this veritie. For of two things you muſt confeſs one, either that the Church hath wholly been extinct the ſpace of about a thouſand years, and then was newly repaired according to the ancient model of the Apoſtles: or that it hath always been on foot, but inviſible and unknown.

Force of argument.

Weak evaſions of Miniſters.

Theſe two evaſions are very vain and frivolous, as you ſhall underſtand, thereunto a little applying your judgement. For, to ſpeak of the firſt, expreſſed in the 31. Article of your Faith, that the Church hath been newly reformed: Firſt, this is againſt the word of God, who to his Church promiſeth an aſſiſtance without interruption, even to the end of the world. Theſe are his words in S. Matthew: Behold I am with you all the days, even to the conſummation of the world. He admitteth not one ſole day of interruption, and you make one of a thouſand or eleven hundred years.

Firſt evaſion refuted.

1. Reaſon.

Matth. 28. 2.

Secondly, you make a Jeſus Chriſt diſarrayed, a Church reduced to nothing, for the ſpace of ten Ages, which is very intolerable, and ſhall never be, nay not during the time of Antichriſt's perſecution. Moreover were it ſo, you muſt deny the providence of God, ſo to have abandoned to a general deſolation, a work faſt cemented with the bloud of his Son; yea he, who hath a care even of the neſts of the little halcyons. Finally you muſt ſay, that Jeſus Chriſt was an Impoſtour, and unable: an Impoſtour to have promiſed a Church without interruption; unable in that he could not preſerve it: all which is blaſphemous.

2. Reaſon.

3. Reaſon.

Second evaſion overthrown.

To affirm the ſecond, that this Church hath always been, but yet unknown and inviſible, if all men were changed into beaſts, it might happen they would be thus perſwaded: But if they yet retain one dram of human capacitie, it were impoſſible; ſo impertinent is this propoſition.

For firſt of all, becauſe you will affirm nothing without proof out of holy Scripture, it is demanded of you, where is it ſpoken of this unknown Church, of this inviſible Church? Much otherwiſe, ſhe is compared to a Citie planted upon a hill, to the Light, to the pavilion in the Sun, as the Scripture teacheth us, and S. Auguſtine proveth it by the ſame Scripture, upon the 18. Pſalm.

In ſole poſuit tabernaculum ſuum: in manifeſtatione poſuit Eccleſiam ſuam. Auguſt. in Pſal. 18.

Secondly, if this Church were unknown, whither ſhould the Gentiles have addreſſed themſelves for their converſion? or thoſe that were doubtful for their reſolution? or all the faithful for their direction? God referreth them all to his Church. Is it not a meer mockerie to ſend them to a thing inviſible?

Thirdly, if there be no proof in Scripture which averreth this, ſome human reaſon at leaſt is required. Can a propoſition more reaſonable be made, than to ask of thoſe who maintain a thing to have been in former Ages, to produce ſome marks thereof? That they ſhew, how for a thouſand years of deſolation their Church hath been in being? That they ſet before us one ſole hiſtorie which witneſſeth how in the thouſand, two, three, four, and five hundred years, there was found a company of brethren who profeſſed an univerſal ſum of all the articles which theſe men now maintain?

The Phenix is very rare; but yet it is ſaid in ſuch and ſuch a year, a Phenix was ſeen in Rome. Do we find that any man ſaith the like of the pretended reformed formed Religion? There is not a word of it. We find the Waldenſes, Circumcellians, Gnoſticks, Borborites, and Beguins, who have held ſome piece of our Hereticks belief, and we likewiſe behold, that all have been condemned as Hereticks. But there is not one to be found, who hath framed this body of the pretended Religion, as it is at this day compoſed. What meaneth this? Is it to have one ſmall ſparkle of the underſtanding of man, to affirm ſuch a thing to have been, and not to know how to produce one proof?

Æſops Aſs.

Is not this to play Æſops aſs, that vaunted he had great ſecrets of wiſdom to communicate to other beaſts; and to authorize it, he hid himſelf a long time in a drie pit, from whence he came with a Philoſophers cloak, ſaying, That whileſt he had been inviſible, he had much addicted himſelf to ſciences, and the knowledge of truth. In the end it was known he was an aſs, and with many blows and baſtonadoes he was ſent back again to the pit from whence he came. This is the parable which Tertullian ſpake to the Hereticks of his time. You now come forth, as an Aſs out of Æſops pit, and you crie out: Tell me, who are you? From whence come you? who ſent you? What right have you upon us to extinguiſh the belief of our fore-fathers? Do you not behold a beginning of the pretended ſhameleſs and ridiculous Religion, which well proveth its nullitie?

A notable paſſage of Tertullian.

Aſinum de puteo modo venis, & jam exclamas: Dic qui ſis, à quo venias, & quod ſit tibi jus in nobis? Tertul. in Marc. l. 4. c. 23

Second point, progreſs and publication of the ſect.

The ſecond conſideration on which we muſt reſt, is well to ballance the progreſs, advancement, and publication of this ſect. If you find it conformable to the ancient manner of the Primitive Church, follow it: If it be directly oppoſite, have you not great reaſon to abandon it? Now Sir, ſo it is, and behold how.

The true Church from her infancie, hath had four marks moſt evident. The firſt is a profound humilitie. The ſecond a great love of virginitie, chaſtitie, and continencie, witneſs Athenagoras, a moſt ancient Authour, who maketh mention of this great puritie of bodie, and ſaith: It is the mark of the excellencie of our Religion. The third, a great obedience to Superiours, recommended by S. Paul to the Romans: Let every ſoul be ſubject to ſuperiour Powers. The fourth, a ſweetneſs and an admirable patience in perſecutions. Behold what appeared in the publication of the Goſpel. If you obſerve any thing like in the progreſs of the pretended Religion, then have you cauſe to have a good opinion of it. But if you therein do ſee all her proceedings oppoſite to the ſame, conclude it is not of God. And tell me, what are her proceedings in the fore-alledged points?

Reperire apud nos eſt permultos viros, & mulieres qui in celibatu conſeneſcunt. Rom. 12.

Conſider the force of this proof.

First mark.

It cannot be doubted, but that the virtue of humilitie is the foundation of faith, and one of the moſt noble characters of Chriſtian Religion. Where humilitie is (ſaith the Wiſe-man) there is wiſdom, and God is pleaſed to drie up the roots of proud people. Now all hereſie is inſeparably tied to a proud ſpirit, from whence it took beginning, derived nouriſhment, and receives increaſe.

Prov. 11.

Ezech. 10.

Epiphan. hæreſ. 19. Illebertus hæreticus ſub Zacharia.

We might alledge an infinite number of teſtimonies to this purpoſe. But we do not now tell you how two heretick women of the race of Elxay, did as it were, cauſe their ſpittle to be adored, nor how one Hildebert gave the paring of his nails to his ſectaries for reliques; ſo true is it, that hereſie being a ſprout of the evil ſpirit, ſtill retains the mark of that pride, which having once aſſaied to diſturb Heaven, never ſuffers the earth to enjoy repoſe.

Corvin and Florimon.

It is well known how in the laſt Age one called John Leyden, by trade a botcher, and ring-leader of Hereticks in Germanie, having firſt publiſhed a law of pluralitie of wives, went into the field, drawing along with him huge troups of unchaſte creatures; where, after he had played the prophet, he cauſed himſelf to be choſen King, took a triple diadem, erected a proud pavilion, wherein he gave audience, eſtabliſhed his Court and Peerates, chooſing out rogues and reprobates, at that time attired in cloth of gold and ſilver, and other coſtly ſtuffs, which having but a little before ſerved for ornaments on Altars, were now cut in pieces by the hands of theſe Harpies, and employed to cover infamous bodies, that rather deſerved to be involved in ſulphur and flames. When this King of Cardes marched through the Citie, you would have taken him for the great Duke of Muſcovia, or ſome antick King of Hieruſalem. A Page mounted on horſ-back, bare a Bible covered with plates of gold before him, another carried a naked ſword, willing thereby to expreſs he was born for the defence of the Goſpel. Beſides, he commonly had in his hand a golden globe, whereon theſe words were engraven: King of Juſtice on earth. Anne Delphonſe, the firſt of fourteen wives this Impoſtour had married, went along with him, covered with a mantle furred with ermines, claſped with a great buckle all of maſſie gold.

This would ſeem ſtrange, if we had not lately known the inſolence of rebels, and their imaginary regalities, which are mounted to ſuch a height of furie, that they draw very near to the like frenzie. Yet will we not at this time inſtance hereupon in any thing concerning this article. We onely ſay, that to ſeparate Religion from rebellion, and the manners of men from doctrine, the maximes of Sectaries make an abſolute profeſſion of the moſt enraged vanity that may be obſerved in the courſe of human life. For if the Scripture doth ſo ſtrictly recommend unto us in the practice of humilitie, not to make our ſelves over wiſe or able, not to reſt upon our own judgement nor proper prudence, to hearken to our fore-fathers, to obey Paſtours who have lawful ſucceſſion, to work our ſalvation with fear and trembling at Gods judgements, what may we think of a ſect, which authorizeth a peculiar ſpirit, which hath ever been the ſeminary of all ſchiſms and diſorders, which without diſtinction putteth the Scripture into all hands, to judge of points of faith, from whence have riſen amongſt them an infinite number of diviſions; which teacheth to account as dotages all that which the piety of our fore-fathers reverenced, all that the wiſeſt and moſt religious men of the earth decided, which teacheth to ſpit againſt light, and trample under foot the commandments of Paſtours and Prelates; to flatter ones ſelf with aſſurance of ſalvation and predeſtination, in the greateſt exorbitancies and neglects of life?

Verily it is an admirable thing to behold how the petty ſpirits of artificers and ſilly women buſie themſelves herein, and to what a degree of pride they come, when abuſed by I know not what imaginary texts of Scripture, they grow big with the opinion of their own abilitie. What pride more irregular, than to ſee men not content with the Religion of Charlemaigne and S. Lewis, nor of the Churches and tombs of their Anceſtours, to become ſo curious, as to think their Kings and Paſtours to be Idolaters, and all the better part of mankind beſtial, from whom they ſeparate themſelves as from people infected with a ſpiritual contagion, and do all they can to deifie their own opinions? What phariſie ever came near this height of pride?

If there were any the leaſt ſpark of humilitie, a good ſoul would ſay within it ſelf, What do I, or where am I? It is an old ſaying, He that too much believes in himſelf, is a devil to himſelf. I think I am grounded on the word of God: but have not all hereticks had the ſame foundation, which they in concluſion found onely to ſubſiſt in their own imagination? Why ſhould I ſeparate my ſelf from the main bodie of the ancient Church, to ſatisfie the itch of my peculiar judgement?

ment? It is not credible that ſo many men of honour and worth, who are clear-ſighted in all other things, ſhould be deceived in this, they may have had doubts and opinions as we, but they have overcome them by humility and reaſon, they have ſtuck to the bodie of the tree, they have followed the general conſent of people, which rather live in uniformitie than adhere to noveltie.

Let them not be figured to me as Idolaters, ideots, and men ſuperſtitious; they have far other aims than theſe. The wiſeſt and moſt temperate of our ſide, believe them not to be damned in their Religion. To what purpoſe then is all this, to handle a buſineß apart, to be ſeparated from our near alies, from Sacraments, Church, tombs, and to be the cauſe of ſo many diviſions, ſpoils, and bloud-ſhed? I plainly ſee we muſt hereafter live in re-union. It is the ſpirit of God which commandeth it. If I have beliefs in my heart different from the ordinary, I ought not divulge them to create ſchiſms and ſcandals. I ſhould inform my ſelf. I ſhould obey, it is fit I ſomewhat yield to the love of thoſe who look after me for my good, and the authoritie of ſuch as command over me by juſtice. I cannot periſh in making a ſacrifice of my proper will, for peace and the common good to thoſe whom God hath appointed me for guiders and ſuperiours. This is the great ſcience, which I will hereafter ſeek in the government of the inward man. Behold what an humble creature might ſay: but inſolency, the inſeparable companion of hereſie, proceedeth much otherwiſe.

2. Mark. And as concerning purity, let us not go about to ſpeak of the vices of particular men, which are exceſſes of nature, not laws of profeſſion. For to ſay there are vices in one bodie and in one ſect, is to ſay nothing; but to ſay theſe vices are confirmed and authorized by the maxims and examples of the ſame ſect, this is to ſay all.

Now this is it which we behold in the proceedings of the Pretenders. For it cannot be denied but we ought to keep promiſe with men, and by a much ſtronger reaſon, what we promiſe to God? Yet notwithſtanding the principal of the Pretenders have taught by word, and practiſed by example the doctrine of the whole bodie; which is, that one may break a vow of chaſtity, to wit, of a thing very good, for it is praiſed by the mouth of our Savour and S. Paul; of a thing very reaſonable, for millions of Saints have practiſed it in the beginning of the Church; of a thing moſt holy, for the ſcripture hath given it the name of ſanctity: to break a vow ſealed as with the ſeal of the invocation of the holy Trinity, and the bloud of Jeſus: to break it not by frailty but profeſſion, againſt the doctrine and practice of all antiquity. Is this a mark of the true Church?

Matth. 17. 2 Cor. 7. Theſſal. 4.

3. Mark. Take the third mark, obedience, moſt natural to the primitive Chriſtians and all juſt men, who are called a Nation of obedience, and you ſhall find in the infancie of the pretended religion, a revolt againſt all eccleſiaſtical and ſecular Powers, continued in all times, and in all the parts of the world, where ſhe might be introduced with ſuch cruelties, as we know by experience.

Eccl. 3.

4. Mark. Take laſtly the fourth mark, which is the dove-like ſweetneſs that ſhone in the firſt Chriſtians, even in the times of perſecution, and you ſhall find in the pretended Religion there is nothing but Conventicles, Conſiſtories of ſtate, factions, armies, ranſackings, and horrours, which make all good conſciences to tremble. Should I enlarge upon this diſcourſe, I could mention matters able to make marbles weep: but I will not labour to be eloquent in our evils, which I ſeek to ſweeten what I may, not intending to exaſperate any.

Publication of the pretended, how far from true Chriſtianitie.

Onely I ask, what will your prime Sectaries anſwer to the Church at the day of judgement, when ſhe ſhall ſay: My firſt Children bare neither rod nor ſtick to plant faith in the hearts of men, and you have publiſhed a Religion all briſtled with ſwords, and ſooted over with the ſmoak of Canons, all ſprinkled with the bloud of Catholicks. My lawful children at the publication of the Goſpel, ſpake not one bitter word againſt executioners, among the moſt exquiſite torments which might be inflicted. And you, what vein, I pray, have you ſpared in my bodie, from whence you drew not rivers of bloud to diſtain the lilies of France.

Your fore-fathers built Churches for me, and you have demoliſhed them: They erected Altars, and you have pulled them down: They advanced Croſſes to me, and you have broken them: They have conſecrated Prieſts for my ſervice, and you have maſſacred them in my arms. The Apoſtles taught me to place the bodies of Saints under Altars, and you have taken them from that repoſe, whereunto nature conſigned them, from that repoſe many times afforded to malefactours, you have divided them between fire and water; yea you have infected elements, making them as executioners of thoſe venerable bodies, whoſe foot-ſteps they honoured. And of what bodies? of a S. Irenæus burned at Lions; of a S. Hilarie at Poictiers; of a S. Aygnan at Orleans; of a S. Martin, and a S. Francis of Paula at Tours, not to ſpeak of others. The Apoſtles teach us to honour Kings, and you have loaden them with reproches, even to the figuring of King Charls the ninth, with marks moſt unworthy, in a coyn you ſtampt with croſſes and Church Chalices, yea to the diſenterring of the heart of Francis the ſecond, interred at S. Croſs in Orleans, and the waſting it in flames. See Monſieur de Saintes in the Book of ſaccage.

Judge now (O you Pretenders) whether a Religion which carried on the brow thereof, acts ſo barbarous, pollutions ſo hydeous, cruelties ſo execrable, can poſſibly have the leaſt ſpark of piety.

3. Point. Foundation of Catholick Religion. Auguſtin. contra ep. fun.

For a third conſideration, examine well the foundation of this new Religion, and you ſhall diſcover the deceit thereof. Catholick religion hath for foundation all that, which may ſettle a fair and generous ſoul, as S. Auguſtine obſerved. If the word of God ſhould hold the chief place, and ſerve as a baſis for this great building of the Church, (as is moſt reaſonable) we inceſſantly challenge Miniſters to ſhew us one onely text expreſs, formal, and irreproveable, contrary to the articles of our faith. For hitherto they have produced nothing but ſemblances to deceive inferiour judgements, being unable to make them good before underſtanding and capable men.

If a lawful ſucceſſion and miſſion of Paſtours be required, which is abſolutely neceſſary for the eſtabliſhment of an Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchie, we ſhew that from the Apoſtles hitherward, our Prelates and Biſhops do all ſucceſſively follow one another. If the authority of Councels demanded, which are the ſinews, the mouthes and living oracles of a true Religion, let them be looked on in the revolution of ſo many Ages, and they will be found altogether for us.

If the interpretations of Fathers and Doctours (who were the lights of their times, the inſtruments of the holy Ghoſt, and Secretaries of the Divinity) have any weight with a ſoul well compoſed to eſtabliſh a truth, then eſpecially when they all with one accord and conſent do ſpeak; they loudly condemn the errour and noveliſm of our Adverſaries.

If miracles, which were wrought in the ſight of all mankind, with ſo much approbation, that they have evicted confeſſion from the moſt incredulous, and reverence from the moſt ſtupid, weigh down the ballance, it is on our ſide. If the ſtudie of perfection and holineſs of life be infallible marks of true faith, you may as ſoon tell the ſtars in the skie, as reckon up the number of holy perſonages, who have flouriſhed through all Ages amongſt us, and who therein are daily noted with ſuch excellencies, that living as Angels, they ſpeak like true Oracles of the Divinitie. Finally, if we will give any credit to ancient monuments, the marbles in Churches and tombs of our Anceſtours ſpeak for us.

Moſt wholeſome adviſe how to reſolve on choiſe of Religion. Auguſtin. contra ep. fund.

Behold verily the powerful and invincible reaſons which made S. Auguſtine reſolve upon the Religion we profeſs. Many great conſiderations (ſaid he) with much reaſon keep me in the obedience of the Catholick Church: The conſent of people and Nations hold me: The authority of the ſame Church, which is riſen up by miracle, nouriſhed with hope, augmented by charity, eſtabliſhed by its antiquity: The ſucceſſion of Biſhops holds me therein, which beginning in the See and authority of S. Peter, to whom God recommended the care of the flock, is maintained to this preſent time. Laſtly the name of Catholick holds me in it. He addeth, he would not believe the Goſpel it ſelf, if he were not convinced by the authority of the Church.

Evangelio non crederem niſi me Eccleſiæ Catholicæ commoveret autoritas. Contra ep. Manich.

Moſt weake foundation of the Pretenders.

Let us now ſee whether you have better choiſe, and more conſideration than this worthy man, who is one of the prime wits of the world. Let us ſee what your Miniſters oppoſe againſt ſo many infallible proofs, to cover their want of antiquity, miſſion, ſucceſſion, miracles, ſanctity, judgement, and reaſon. They ceaſe not to buzze out every where a falſe pretext of Scripture, which verily is the greateſt illuſion that ever was. For theſe wicked ones, ſeeing themſelves battered on every ſide from the beginning of this reformation, knew well in their conſciences the Scripture was againſt them. Yet notwithſtanding (ſaid they, to mock at the faith of mankind, and lead them into Atheiſm) we muſt avoid the deciſions of a Power lively and lawful, we muſt onely take colour from the holy text, we will make it ſay what we liſt: we will maintain nothing is to be believed but what is written, and that which is written, we will diſguiſe with our gloſſes and conſequences, to catch thoſe, who think they have ſome wit. Behold the onely means to colour our pretences.

Reaſons which ſhew the nullity of this foundation.

1. Reaſon.

You then who are endowed with ſufficient and ſolid judgement, conſider a little how deceitfull, weak, and ruinous, this foundation is. Firſt it appears the devil and all Hereticks of former times have taken the ſame foundation, ever ſaying the Scripture was on their ſides, which is moſt untrue. Notwithſtanding behold to what paſs all hereticks came. Munter proved by Scripture he was the Prophet David; George, a diabolical man, that he was God; Eon condemned by the Councel of Rhemes, that he was the true Meſſias, even by the ſame Scripture.

Neque enim natæ ſunt hæreſes niſi dum ſcripturæ bonæ intelliguntur non bene. Auguſt. ad Conſentium. ep. 222.

2. Reaſon.

Secondly, the world having been two thouſand years and more without Scripture, the firſt were written in Hebrew by abbreviation with ſuch ambiguity, that every one following his own opinion, might frame a Bible to his own liking: Yea ſometimes ſuch diverſity was found in the Hebrew, Greek, Latine, and Chaldaick letter, that where one read David, another read a bowl, where one the liver, another a pillow, where one beauty another a ſavage beaſt; where one the word, another life, where one read the living, another the dead. And you who neither know Hebrew, Greek, nor Latine, on whom will you relie?

3. Reaſon.

Thirdly, upon paſſages written in every expreſs terms, as, This is my body; the ſpirits of men have forged two hundred opinions quite different, what then will become of difficulties more thorny? Julian Biſhop of Tolledo wrote a volumn of apparent contradictions in Scripture, which in ſubſtance hath none, but which notwithſtanding ſeem many times to ſay things directly contrary; ſuch obſcurity there is in ſome paſſages. Whom ſhould we believe? Do you not ſee this were a means to maintain eternal diviſions, if there were not Judges to decide differences in a kingdom, but that every one ſhould carry the cauſe according to the proportion of his loud crying, to make his texts and allegations to be of force? What would this come unto? And you would bring the like diſorder into the Church.

Juliani Dynamium.

4. Reaſon.

Fourthly, in the ancient law the Bible was in the Ark, and no man durſt open it, and turn it to reſolve controverſies upon this Rule, but did expect the deciſion thereof from the Prieſts mouth, who had a lawful ſucceſſion. The lips of the Prieſt are the ſtore-houſes of knowledge, and from his mouth you ſhall enquire the law, ſaid the Prophet Malachie. Malach. 2. 7.

5. Reaſon.

Fiftly, the wiſeſt men in the world after they had maturely thought upon it, found no other way to determin controverſies, but to have recourſe to the deciſion of a Head. Such is the opinion of S. Irenæus, S. Auguſtine. and S. Hierome, Vincentius Lirinenſis, and all other.

Ezech. 44. 24. A moſt juſt proceeding.

Sixthly, it is the commandment of God: When any controverſies ſhall be raiſed, my Prieſt ſhall hold ſeſſions, and ſhall judge: For of neceſſity we muſt have an authority commanding, magiſtral, and deciſive.

6. Reaſon.

For Concluſion, can one ſpeak any thing more juſt, than that in caſe any place of Scripture hath obſcurities in it, it were to much better purpoſe to hear thereupon the deciſion of ancient Fathers diſintereſſed from our controverſies, than to enforce our ſelves to paſs upon the judgement of a paſſionate Adverſary, without warrant or authority. When in the year 1523. hereſie began firſt in France, and that there was but one Miniſter, a wool-carder called John Clarck in the Citie of Meaux, where ſhould we find the interpretation of Scripture, in the mouth of this carder, or in a lawful Councel? Judge, behold what you go about: you may hereby ſee how much this pretext of Scripture is malicious, ſhifting, and frivolous.

7. Reaſon.

I adde, that they overthrow themſelves by thoſe ways wherewith they ſeek to eſtabliſh themſelves: For if we ought not believe any thing but that which is written, in what place of their Bible will they find, that twenty thouſand paſſages muſt be taken out of ours? In what place will they ſhew us the books of the Macchabees are not Canonical? In what place, that Sunday muſt be kept holy and not Saturday? In what place that vows muſt be broken? In what place that Jeſus Chriſt is eaten by the mouth of faith? and ſo many other places, which make us ſufficiently underſtand they ruin themſelves by their own hands.

4. Point. Math. 7. Effects of hereſie.

Finally, for the fourth conſideration, take the maxim from the Son of God: To judge well of a ſect, you muſt judge by the fruits and the effects. What fruits and what effects have we ſeen to come from this pretended Religion? The fear of God ſtifled in the hearts of men by a preſumption of their ſalvation, Chriſtian diſcipline oppreſſed by liberty, chaſtity trodden underfoot by unbridled luxury, the ſtandard of rebellion advanced againſt the ſacred perſons of Kings, a million of French expoſed to ſlaughter, four thouſand Church-veſteries pillaged, five hundered Churches demoliſhed, France ſo many times given over as a prey to ſtrangers, corruptions ſo ſtrange, deſolations ſo dreadful, acts ſo barbarous, that they make the hair ſtand an end on the heads of all good men, which have never ſo little underſtanding. A ſtile of fire were needful, or a pen of adamant ſteeped in bloud to expreſs them.

Monſieur de Sainctes in his Book of ſanctage.

Ah poore France! France the paradiſe of earth, eye of the world, pearl of all beauties! How many times by the means of this hereſie haſt thou ſeen thy boſom, heretofore crowned with ears of corn and guilded with harveſts, all briſtled with battallions? How many times haſt thou ſeen the land covered with blades, and the ſea with ſhips? How many times haſt thou felt the arms of thy children to encounter counter in thy proper entrails? How many times hast thou seen flames of brothers hostility slie through thy fat and fruitful fields? When hast thou not sweat in all the parts of thy bodie? When have not rivers of bloud been drawn from thy veins? but such bloud as was able to cement together huge bulwarks for the defence of our Countrey, or to serve for seed for flower-deluces, to make them grow and be advanced in the plains of Palestine, and they have been sactificed to furies.

Innocency seemed to afford infants shelter from the tempest, yet the sword of heresie found a passage into their tender bodies. Age rendred old men venerable, yet would no pardon be granted to their gray haits, moistned with the massacre of their children. Virgins were guarded in their mothers armis as a Temple of God, yet have they been dishonoured. So many personages of eminent quality have served as an aim for their impiety, their pains have been sport for them, and their deaths a spectacle. What hair would not stand an end with horrour, and what eye not weep forth bloud, when we speak of these disasters, which your selves detest? Nor can you sufficiently wonder at the crueltie of those, who have taken the liberty of such barbarous outrages, and so bloudy tragadies.

I pass over this discourse as over coles covered with ashes, and would willingly be silent, were it not that, as it was fit to expose massacred bodies to view thereby, to cure the madness of the Milesian maids, so must I discover some bloudy effects in the pretended Religion, to raise a horrour against it in good souls. Why also have you in this time renewed so many wounds, which were not well closed, and for want of a little obedience so lawfully due to the most just Prince of the world, do you make a civil war to exhaust France of gold and bloud after such expence, and so many bloud-lettings?

If these acts seem so base and inhumane to you, why abhor you not the sect which produced them? If God curse him who is the cause of scandals, were it not fit, if you have some belief estranged from common sense, rather a thousand times to stiffle it in the bottom of your conscience, than to divulge it with these disturbances, divisions and spoil of a Countrey, which you should love as men, and honour as true Children? Were there some stain in the house of our Mother (which never was) must you therefore call her whore, drag her along by the hair, and carry fire to burn her house, in stead of providing water to quench the flames? Is it not better to become patient, to sweeten the acerbities of times, spare wounds on ulcered bodies, or at least to be satisfied with silence, in a matter where you can pretend no right of correction?

What was that so exorbitant which the Church commanded, for which you separated your selves, and took arms to defend the wranglings of our Apostataes, made afterward your Apostles? What Maximes have we so rough and unreasonable, that they must be taken away with the sword, there to plant reformation? Consider a little the notable corrections and admirable policies, which Arch-hereticks have invented to introduce them into the Church. I will here with all sincerity, recite the Maximes of the chief Sectaries, of which some have afterward affrighted you, and you have disavowed them, as you daily do by others, God making you plainly see in the inconstancy and great diversitie of your Doctrine, the little confidence you should put therein.

Maximes of the Catholick and the Pretended.

The Catholick Church teacheth, that God would have all the world saved, as the Apostle hath expressed in the Epistle to Timothie; that he desireth good of which he is the source, and that he communicates himself to all his children.

1 Tim. 2. 4.

The Pretended say, that God absolutely desires evil, yea doth it willingly, predestinating men without any regard, some to life, others to eternal damnation, as if a father who had daughters, should cut the throat of one most innocent, and marry the other wealthily, having no reason for it but his will, which is most execrable impiety pronounced by the authour of this sect, in the book of his Institutions, and chapter 21. where he saith: Men are not all created to the like condition, but that life eternal is pre-ordained for some, and eternal damnation for others.

The Catholick Church speaks of our Saviour, with most profound and religious reverence. The Authour of the Pretended, makes him inferiour to his Father, calling him the second King after God, and attributing ignorance to him, despair on the Cross, and the pains of the damned, which are things most horrible. The Catholick Church holdeth Jesus Christ is the onely and sole Mediatour of redemption, and that there is no other name either in heaven or earth, in which, and by which we can be saved, and for that cause she honours it all she can, extending and multiplying the fruits of honour and praise not onely in his own person, but in his dear friends also, which are the blessed Virgin and the Saints, whom we pray unto as the fruits of his Cross, and take them for Mediatours of intercession, grounded therein on the word of God, which commandeth the friends of Job to take him for intercessour, though he were in this transitory life; and not at all doubting, if the soul of the evil rich man prayed unto Abraham out of hell, but we on earth may be permitted to call to our aid, souls so faithful, so much honoured by God, and whose praises he reckons his own greatnes.

Calvin in Evang. Mar. 27. Institut. 2. cap. 16.

Luc. 16.

We likewise reverence holy images, since it is an ancient custom in the Church, the marks whereof we yet behold in Tertullian, who might have conversed with the Disciples of the Apostles. The Pretended quite contrary, faigning they honour Saints, as one would Socrates or Phocion, perpetually mock thereat, break down their images, call them by the name of idols and false gods.

Tertul. de pudicitia. c. 7.

The Catholick Church holdeth man hath free wil, supported in this article upon so many passages of Scripture. The Pretended dispoil man of all liberty, which is to destroy the worth of his conditions, and to deprive him of the best part of his essence.

Genes. 4. Deut. 30. Eccl. 15.

The Catholick Church holdeth the bloud of our Saviour is a treasure infinite, and very able to purge away all manner of evil, and to merit all good, but that it is applyed to us by works of satisfaction and merit, and purgative pains in those who stand in need of it, as a medicine which profiteth the sick man, by the co-operation he bringeth. The Pretended teacheth, good works are not necessary to salvation, but onely faith justifies, which is to open a gate to the corruption of good manners, and to all kind of liberty.

The Catholick Church believes a Purgatory for souls, which going out of the bodie are not yet purified, grounded therein on 19. or 20. passages of Scripture, all understood by the ancient Fathers according to our belief. The Pretended, having disturbed the ashes of the dead, deprive them of the assistance and prayers of the living, contrary to divine and humane laws, and the manifest practice of all antiquity.

The Catholick Church makes a Sacrament of marriage according to S. Paul, and the interpretation of most eminent Fathers of the Church. The Pretended make their marriages like those of Barbarians.

The Catholick Church holdeth the reality of the body of CHRIST in the Sacrament of the Altar, and believe that under the Sacramental species, which are sensible and corruptible, our Saviour subsisteth ſubſiſteth with a glorious body, which is called by S. Paul a ſpiritual body, becauſe it is dignified with qualities and conditions of ſpirit, though it looſe not the eſſence of a body: She adoreth therein with all humility, that which ſhe cannot comprehend ſufficiently, after expreſs paſſages of Scripture, the deciſion of fourty Councels, the teſtimony of five hundred Authours, ancient, grave, and ſincere. Adding from the authority of the moſt illuſtrious Councel of Nice, that it is the unbloudy Sacrifice preſented for the expiation of the ſins of the world. The Pretended will place in ſtead of it chimæraes, imaginary figments, ceſſation of Sacrifices, and abominable deſolation.

The Catholick Church publiſheth confeſſion and remiſſion of ſins by the miniſtery of Prieſts, as the Son of God did inſtitute it in S. John. The Pretended ſhaking off ſo wholſom a yoak, hath made himſelf a way to liberty and diſſolution. John 10.

The Catholick Church acknowledgeth a viſible Head on earth, eſtabliſhed by the expreſs word of Jeſus Chriſt in S. Matthew, averred by all the holy Fathers, confeſſed by the continuation of a lawful ſucceſſion in the revolution of ſo many Ages. The Pretended ſeek to bring into the houſe of God an anarchy of the children of Belial. Matth. 15.

The Catholick Church is the bright ſtar of truths. The Pretended is a furious Comet, which throws diſorder and poyſon into all the parts of the world.

To ſay truly, ſhould an Angel have ſpoken to it, yea could it create a golden Age, never might this deſign be accompliſhed by ways ſo furious and turbulent. But having coſt France ſo much gold and bloud, what hath it done but that which is mentioned by the excellent pen of Cardinal Berule in the Preface of the greatneſs of Jeſus: A Church without Apoſtles, Apoſtles without miſsion, Paſtours without ſheep, ſheep without Shepheards, Faithful without Churches, Chriſtians without Baptiſm, Prophets without miracles, Temples without Altars, Altars without Sacrifices, a Religion without ceremonies, a Law without obedience, a Faith without works, and a Charity without effects.

Behold excellent pieces, and well worthy of a reformed Church.

Humanum fuit errare, diabolicum per animoſitatem in errore manere. Auguſt. de verbis Apoſt. ſerm.

In the name of God weigh at leiſure theſe conſiderations which would deſerve a whole volume, and ſince you are convinced by reaſon, kick no longer againſt the prick, go no more about to forge difficulties, nor ſay how ſhall I put this in execution? What means have I to do it? What will ſuch and ſuch ſay? What will our whole ſide ſay in general? Muſt I confeſs I have erred? and a thouſand other thoughts which are true illuſions. You ſhall no ſooner ſet your foot in the Roman Catholick Church, with ſo many men of note lately converted, but all theſe fantaſies will vaniſh, you ſhall live in peace of conſcience, and ſhall receive before God glory immortal.

O that we might quickly ſee that great day, wherein France may no longer ſpeak but with one tongue, wherein the names of Lutherans and Calviniſts may be baniſhed out of the memories of men, wherein all French-men reunited under one faith, one law, one Head, one Church, may eternally bleſs the name of Jeſus. What joy! what comfort! what embracements of both ſides! what conſolation for ſo much afflicted kindred, which waſte themſelves with grief and ſorrow for theſe poor ſtraglers! what ſatisfaction for the ſacred perſon of the King! what honour for France! what peace for the Church! what edification for all the world! what triumphs for Heaven! what bleſſings of God will fall upon their heads, who ſhall give example of this reunion, and ſhall conſent to the peace, ſafety, and honour of this Monarchy.

The third OBSTACLE.

To live by Opinion.

THE tree of the knowledge of good and evil doth alſo yield fruits which coſt us very dear: we labour here with too much application of wit, which goeth up and down ſearching and prying into all the objects of the world, often forſaking the better for the worſe. S. Thomas moſt judiciouſly obſerveth, that there is much difference between the natural appetite, the ſenſual, and the intellectual. The natural aimeth always at things which are really good for her and proportionable, the ſenſual is ſcattered, the intellectual much more, to deſire evil plaiſtered over with the ſemblance of good. The plant deſireth moyſture with which it is nouriſhed, and will never take a ſtone for the dew. Man having too much wit and ſenſe, not contenting himſelf with things that really are good and truly conſonant to his nature, forgetteth others in his idea which are good in apparance, and evil in ſubſtance. Notwithſtanding, apparence taketh upon her, when ſhe hath ſeduced the ſenſe, and conquered the imagination, to dive even into the Cabinet of the Prince, which is the underſtanding, and putting falſe ſpectacles upon his eyes, to make him believe that black is white, glaſs is diamond, and darkneſs light. It is neceſſary that the will ſhould dance to this tune, and purſue the good which is repreſented unto her by the underſtanding, be it true or falſe; from hence there glide into the condition of humane life a thouſand extravagant illuſions. It is even at this day, that truth hath loſt her garment, falſhood is clothed with it; and Opinion in this Court-like habit hath really and actually produced little monſters, but ſuch as yet holding and retaining the malice of their father, and levity of their mother, attire themſelves with certain veils, which make them ſeem beautiful; they flie up and down like little Cupids, they make a trade of deceiving, and practice with ſo much ſubtility, that they enſnare even the wiſeſt. Behold our unhappineſs; we are in this world as in the Iſland of dreams, whereof Lucian ſpeaketh. We dream broad-waking, and ſuch dreams which are by ſo much the more perillous, by how much we the leſs look into the danger. A man who hath dreamed all the night, as ſoon as he beginneth to open his eye-lids, mocketh at his own fantaſies, and ſaith they were dreams: we dream all the days of our life, and ſay they are verities. We run after the falſe imaginations, as children after butter-flies. When the great night of our death draweth near, we begin to diſcharge our ſelves from this waking ſleep, and from this ſleeping vigil, we find we have death at hand. And as for the butter-flies which we ſo eagerly followed, after we have broken our heads and ſhins in their purſuit, we neither have their legs nor wings in our hands. Behold one of the greateſt impediments of perfection.

Over much wit troubleth us.

But who will do it? Had not he anciently a notable ſubject hereon, who ſaid when he conſidered the eſtate of the world, the ſouls of men ſeemed to him to be all thrown headlong from the Palace of verity, into the torrent of opinion, all of them tumbled into the mercy of the waves, and few were to be found that would bravely ſettle themſelves to row againſt the ſtream.

by relation to the life of another, and from thence cometh that we fall one upon another by heaps, as blind men into a ditch.

Againſt the life of opinion.

To take away this confuſion, I produce onely three conſiderations, which are very preſſing and pregnant. The firſt, that this life which is ſo lead by opinion is very ridiculous. The ſecond, that it is baſe and ſervile. The third, that it boweth under a cruel tyranny, from whence it may with a little courage diſ-infranchize it ſelf. And firſt I demand, if it be agreeable to a noble and generous heart, to forſake the gravity incident to his nature, and to embrace idle toys and fopperies? No man will conſent hereunto, but he that will betray his reaſon. Now ſo it is, that all the opinions which at this day intoxicate the world, are not builded but upon the flying ſand, upon the giddy humours of windy brains, upon the paſſions and affections of a debauched and corrupted multitude. Where the ſheep feedeth that goeth before, they which follow muſt graze though they die for it. Every one attendeth his companion, as the wiſeſt, and he that venteth folly with the greateſt confidence, is the beſt welcom. What monſters, what prodigious fancies of ſcattered and uncollected ſpirits have not been received for laudable actions, being favoured and authorized by opinion? It is a thing ridiculous, and almoſt incredible, to ſee the chimerical conceits that it hath perſwaded, making them to be taken not by a particular man, or one ſole family, but by a whole and entire Nation for maxims of wiſdom.

The Tibarenes, as ſoon as their wives were delivered, bound up their heads with a kercheff, lay down on their bed, and made themſelves to be attended like the child-bed women. The poor women in the mean time were up and about the houſe, endeavouring to make ready bathes for their huſbands, and to dreſs and ſeaſon their viands, to tend and cheriſh them, as if they had born all the pain of feminine travel. Could you have any thing more ridiculous? And yet opinion made it appear very reaſonable. There are ſuch to be found, who place all their honour and glory in drinking hard and eating freely: to call a man a robber, a thief, an adulterer, were in this Countrey nothing, to ſay that ſuch an one were not a great gourmandizer, nor a great drinker, would be to do him an unpardonable injurie.

Aruncani. Lipſ. politic.

Others placed all the excellency and dignity of man in carrying a huge log of wood a great diſtance, and by this tryal choſe their Kings. The greateſt burden-carriers and porters were there great Lords. Others did kill and eat their aged parents for a ceremony of Religion. And opinion made this good. What alſo do not thoſe people of India, and other parts diſcovered in our days? Some think it is honourable to turn their back to ſalute one. Others thruſt their finger to the earth, and after lift it to heaven, to do reverence. Others gather up the ſpittle of their Prince, and ſpeak to him through a hollow trunk. Others offer to their gods their old ſhoes in ſacrifice. A man would laugh when he heareth ſpeech of it, and yet we ſee that the proudeſt Monarchs of the world, who ſuppoſed they had ſhut up all wiſdom in their laws and cuſtoms, trampled virtue under their feet, and placed Dragons, Bats, and Quartan-agues on their Altars. Behold what opinion can do. Theſe follies you will ſay are not now in practice. He that would well examine all the fantaſtick humours of apparel, all the giddy conceits of ſports and paſtimes, the folly of complements (which at this time reign amongſt men) ſhould find things as ridiculous as theſe: as it were to adore an humble, poor, crucified God, and yet to be mad after greatneſs, riches, and curioſities. To believe that one perpetually liveth under the eyes of God, yet to behave himſelf like a wild colt at his own fantaſie, neither knowing God nor man. To expect a judgement, and to live in continual injuſtice. To know that we muſt return naked to the earth, and yet to diſpoil the whole world to cloath our ſelves. To build as if one ſhould always live; eat and drink as if we ſhould never die; ſome men to trace up and down the ſtreets with a plume of feathers on their head, and fetters on their heels; women to beſtow a fourth part of their life time in dreſſing and beſmearing themſelves, to make themſelves groſs on one ſide, and little on another, to raiſe turrets on their heads, to put ſhackels on their heels, to be tranſported with ſo much ſollicitude about a ruff, as if they had a Venetian Common-wealth to mannage: Others to confound with curteſie whom they would gladly eat with ſalt: Others to kill one another about the interpretation of a word, and a thouſand ſuch like things, which are indeed moſt impertinent. Notwithſtanding opinion diſguiſeth them, opinion beſotteth them, and opinion giveth credit to all this. Do you then think it a matter worthy of your generoſitie, to ſerve follies under the ſhadow that fools approve them?

Do you not behold for the ſecond reaſon, that you being free of condition, and not having the power to diſgeſt ſome reaſonable ſervice, you not withſtanding undergo the baſeſt ſervitude that may be imagined? A young Lacedemonian, whom fortune had made a ſlave, rather choſe death than to carry a chamber-pot to his Maſter, ſaying, it was unworthy of his condition; and yet opinion maketh us to bear a fools bable, opinion maketh us carry, not in our hands but in the prime piece of man, the head, a ſink of old dotages, amaſſed altogether by light, idle, fantaſtick ſpirits, & afterward confirmed by laws, by the tyranny of cuſtom. What ſhall we call ſlavery if this be none?

I call your conſciences to witneſs, if you ſometimes ſhall begin to breath in a more free air, and ſee the bright day of the Children of God, you in your ſelves will blame all theſe inventions of the worldly life, which enforce you to feel tormenting racks in your attires, in your recreations, in the complements of converſation. O how often are verified thoſe ſayings of the ſage Roman inſerted by S. Auguſtine in the ſixth book of the Citie of God: When you ſhall come to conſider all the trayn of ceremonies and hypocriſies of Court, you will find them ill agreeing with honeſt minds, unworthy of free men, and not different from fools; and in effect you will confeſs, that no creature ſhould doubt to term them follies, if the number of ſots were leſs: the beſt veil they have is the multitude of fools. Do you not behold a goodly pretext? as if moles were the leſs blind, becauſe they have companions in their darkneſs. Behold a point of ſervitude extreamly unworthy of a noble ſpirit, to ſay that one condemneth in his conſcience an act which he putteth in practice, that he inſtantly may obey a vain opinion of the world. It is ſaid the Abderites after they had beheld the tragedie of Andromeda and Meduſa, became all frantick, even from the leaſt to the biggeſt, and ceaſed not to ſing, to clap their hands, to crie, to whiſtle through the ſtreets, and to have no diſcourſe nor thought of any thing but Meduſa and Andromeda. If then you had entered into their citie, you had played the fool for fear to be deſpiſed by fools. Is not this an intolerable weakneſs of ſpirit in a well-compoſed ſoul, to have good lights and knowledges of Almighty God which inceſſantly beat upon our underſtanding, and yet to play the fool, and to comply with anothers humours?

A notable ſaying. Auguſt. l. 6. de Civitate Dei. c. 10. Si cui intueri vacet quæ faciunt, quæque patiuntur, invenient tam indecora honeſtis, tam indigna liberis, tam diſſimilia ſanis, ut nemo dubitaturus fuerit furere eos, ſi cum paucioribus furerent: nunc ſanitatis patrocinium eſt inſanientium turba.

3. Reason. Tyranny of opinion.

For the third reason I say, this belief which is given to opinion, passeth into a wicked and scandalous tyranny over Christians: for by the force of cherishing and fomenting these maxims in the heart of the world, they are transferred into nature. Vices are not contented to be vices, but by this tyrannical law of opinion formed in the ideaes and lives of persons of quality, they make themselves to be adored under the colour of virtue.

A pretty observation of Cardinal Jacques de Vitry.

Cardinal Jacques de Vitry relateth that a Countrey-fellow carrying one day a young sucking pig to the market, certain pleasant wits who had agreed upon this sport, every one of them severally encountering him in divers cross ways of the streets, and asking him what was his purpose to carry a dog to the market, did so intoxicate his brain, that beaten out blow after blow with such like interrogations, he absolutely perswaded himself that to be true, which he first supposed was begun for sport, and cast his pig with shame upon the pavement, and thinking it a true dog, gave the other opportunity to gain by this sleight.

Behold what the tyrannie of opinions redoubled one upon another can do. They made this poor man believe that this pig was a dog, although all his senses suggested the contrary. And I leave you to think what this torrent of the false Maximes of the world doth not, falling with unresistable furie upon a dul and half dead faith. It weakeneth all that which is Christian in a soul, and planteth a wicked Idol of humane respects, which causeth, that all actions are measured by the rule of vulgar opinions. And if there be yet any reliques of a good conscience, this tyrant smothereth them, as a Pharao, and wholly perverting the nature of things, giveth boldness to sin and shame of well-doing to virtue. Behold a mean to drench all mankind in the gulf of confusion. Is not this then abominable? If these considerations of the folly, servitude, and tyranny of this life (which are spun according to the web of the opinions of the world) cannot serve for an antidote for our ill, at the least think the day will come, when truth shall take place, and vice vanish into smoke. It will happen unto you as to Tigers, for whom hunters, when they have taken away their whelps, affixe looking-glasses in the ways to amuse the savage beasts, and in the mean time they save their own lives by the help of flight. The Tigers forthwith most affectionately stay, thinking they shall draw their little captives from the reflection of this mirrour, and set them at liberty; in the end they strike it till it is broken, loosing together both their young ones, and the instrument of their deception.

Illusions of Tigers.

These opinions which you now adore, these dreams, these fantasies, which you behold in the specious glasses of the world, shall be lost at the hour of death, and you must render an account to the Sovereign Judge, for that you have against his laws erected that Idol of worldly respects, and always made Heaven bow under the will of the earth. What are you to do? Of necessity to cast away the opinions of the world contrary to the doctrine of Jesus Christ. You say, it is impossible to live in the world without pursuing the ways of the world, and accommodating ones self to the doctrine thereof. Forsake it then, break your fetters, enfranchize your self; when you no longer hope in it, you shall no more be in danger to fear it. What would it avail you to have in your life the whole world for an inheritance, and after death, hell for a prison? Why are you daily handling your sore, making it itch by your tenderness? You need but one blast of wind, one stroke of the air, to put your self into the assured haven of the liberty of the Children of God.

The fourth OBSTACLE.

Inconstancie of manners.

Mercur. Tris. serm. 4.

MErcury Trismegistus said, that the seed of Heaven was immortality, and the seed of the earth was inconstancy. All here below is filled with this grain, in every place it produceth its effects, but principally in man; he hath more in his heart, than all the rest of the world; it is the true image of instabilitie, as Aristotle affirmeth. And very well it is said, that inconstancie exiled for ever from the Palace of eternity, came upon the earth as to the real place of her inheritance, and would needs there cause herself to be painted. It was plainly told her there was no pencil so bold which durst undertake this work, because she was sometimes great, sometimes little, sometimes gross, sometimes slender, sometimes straight, sometimes crooked, sometimes white, sometimes black; finally, ever unsettled and uncapable of stay in any place; that notwithstanding she might addresse herself unto Time, for he was a notable work-man, who intermedled in all things. Time after he had well eyed and observed this Inconstancy, resolved to paint her, and at that season finding no table better primed for his purpose, he painted it on man.

Arist. μετα. τὰ φυσ. εἰ χαν.

Fable of inconstancy.

It is a goodly invention, which bringeth to us an undoubted veritie, marked and designed out as with a pen of adamant by holy Job, when he speaketh of man in these expresse terms: The flower which shutteth up his date in the course of one morning and evening, if it be not hayl-stroken at midday; the shadow which ever flieth from the hand that would grasp it, and all which you may imagine to be transitory is nothing in comparison of the inconstancy of man. Philip a good Authour, who flourished about the time of S. Hierom, and hath written a Commentary upon Job, searching out the causes of the instability of mans heart, hath these remarkeable words: Inconstancy is a chastisement of sin. The spirit of man would not rest it self with firm footing upon the foundation of contentments which God presented to it in the state of grace, and therefore the Sovereign Judge, for punishment, suffereth him to go continually floating as in a tempestuous sea of thoughts, without either finding bottom or shore. He is ever turmoyled with new desires and disturbances. If he be employed, he wisheth repose, and if he hath never so little repose, he is vexed and requireth businesse. And although all men resent the effects of this inconstancy, yet she notwithstanding oftentimes beareth sway in the Palaces of Great men.

Job 14.2. Quasi flos egreditur & conteritur, & fugit velut umbra, & nunquam in eodem statu permanet Animus hominis quia stare noluit cum potuit, jam non potest stare cum velit, sed semper desiderio variatur, ut quietus actionem desideret, occupatus quietem. Philip in Job.

There are to be found many Endymions, who embrace the Moon; hearts wheeled about in strange labyrinths, surcharged with quick-silver and changeable atomes; spirits which perpetually are upon turbulencies, gnawn with a certain itch of novellism, distasted with what is past, and always perplexed with what is to come, they hear all the minutes strike, but the hour of repose they know not. The causes of this exorbitancy are manifest, and the consideration is profitable, that remedy may thereunto be sought. To some it happeneth by a certain natural levity of a spirit, ever gliding and jumping upon all sorts of objects, as a butter-flie amongst flowers. To others by a certain facility which they have to take distast upon the sudden against all things, yea even the most delightful. To others by a certain greedinesse, which maketh them ever to have things present in scorn, and things to come in esteem. They resemble the dog in the fable, they no sooner have the substance, but forsaking it they reach at the shadow, and afterward passionately seek what they did forego. To others by a certain curiosity and impatience patience of too much repoſe. They do, as thoſe, who having no great deſire to ſleep, caſt themſelves upon a bed of eaſe, turning from one ſide to another, until they found ſleep by their own wearineſs. To others by a diſtemper of paſſions commixed together, which ſharply bite them like vermine. To others by certain timerous appetites, in ſuch ſort that they dare not do all they deſire, and cannot obtain all they dare wiſh for; this ever holdeth them with a throat open for prey, which by its flight leaveth them nothing but a meer illuſion. To others by a certain mouldineſs of a dul ſpirit, which cannot diſ-involve their thoughts, nor fairly accommodate their purpoſe to eſtabliſh them in any kind of a confident life. They reſemble that little bird of the ſea, called Cinclus, which during his whole life (as it is ſaid) uſeth no endeavour to build his own neſt, but goeth ever wandring up and down, if other for pure pitie do not contribute of theirs. All this inconſtancy of life is an eſſential obſtacle which totally hindereth the progreſs of perfection, the reaſons whereof are moſt evident.

Ælian. 12. de animal. Suidas Κιγκλος.

Reaſons againſt inconſtancy.

The firſt is, that one can execute nothing in matter of virtue, if he have not an aim and purpoſe well rectified, otherwiſe it is not to live, but to fright crows and pyes with fancie. Now ſo it is, that all thoſe who dance this jigge of inconſtancy, have neither but nor ſcope of aſſurance; they perpetually are tranſported where the ſtorm carrieth them; they are always ſtrangers in their own Countries, and gueſts in their proper houſes; you would ſay they had but one ſole motion, one ſole action in this life, which is to turn topſie-turvie all things, and to do nothing; and if they do good, it is when they leaſt think of it, and oftentimes they find they muſt leave to live, before they have once thought why they were born. S. Thomas ſaith: The property of a reaſonable nature, is to work for an end, otherwiſe it is a brutiſh action. And although the ends ſeem greatly different and ſcattered in the univerſality of creatures, notwithſtanding they are all recollected in God, as beams in the Sun, the center-light. 'Tis that at which neceſſarily we muſt aim, to find the Temple of repoſe. Quick-ſilver creepeth up and down and trembleth, until it hath found gold with which it may commix: in like manner the heart of man boundeth and skippeth here and there in its own diſturbances. There is nought but jumps and ſallies, but ebs and flouds, but acceſſes of fire and yce, until ſuch time as it is united to its Creatour, ſubmitting it ſelf to ſome conſtant and regular manner of life, thereby to ſerve his Divine Majeſty. Saint Auguſtine very lively explicateth the miſery of this wandring life which he had made tryal of, and the happineſs he enjoyned when he courageouſly ſettled himſelf to a ſtable ſtate of virtue. You would ſay hearing this ſpoken, that this ſoul like a ſmall current of water, ſeparated for ſome time from God his true ſource, gliding along by the ſenſes, as by ruſty and defiled pipes: There the ſoul is ever perplexed and involved, finding pain in repoſe, and thirſt in abundance, until returning to its original head, it cometh to reliſh moſt delicious contentments, which make it ſay to God: My God I now know, that no good can be had without thee, the true, onely, and Sovereign good; in every place where I am without thee, I never am without pain. All the good which is not God, ſeemeth unto me a meer penury. You manifeſtly behold, how this inſtability of life, for that it aimeth not at the ſcope at which our thoughts ſhould be levelled, not onely alienateth you from tranquillity, but expoſeth you to moſt thorny difficulties, and in the end to deplorable diſaſters.

S. Thom. 1. 2. quæſt. 1. Sine propoſito vagantur, quærentes negotia, nec quod propoſuerunt agunt.

2. Reaſon. He muſt like his bear.

The other reaſon, which maketh inconſtancy very prejudicial to all virtue, is, that one can do no great thing, unleſs he faſhion it as the Bear doth her whelp by licking. Time and frequent diligence are neceſſarily required, to make good habits bud in the heart of man. The plant which is often tranſferred from one place to another, ſeldom beareth fruit. Viands which the ſtomack doth not leiſurely entertain, are ill digeſted: remedies, perpetually changed one in the neck of another, kill the body: The wound, which continually is vexed, cannot conſolidate: The wandering ſcholler never becometh a good Clerk. We of neceſſity muſt break and tame our ſelves to the thing we undertake. He that is every where, is no where. And yet notwithſtanding, this is an inſeparable property of inconſtancy, never long to leave the mind in any honeſt exerciſe, that ſo it may take a perfect tincture, from whence it cometh to paſs, that all her child-beds are falſe conceptions, and her productions abortions.

Saint Anthonie adviſed a ſoul deſirous of advancement, three things. Firſt, to addict it ſelf much to the exerciſe of the preſence of God. The ſecond, to take the holy Scripture for the rule of his actions. The third, to hold firm footing in conſtancy. You will ſay, that Marcus Aurelius Antenius had learned this precept of the Chriſtians: for in the firſt book of his life, he caſteth out of the Temple of virtue certain people, which he calleth by a very ſignificant Greek word πλαστὰς. as one would ſay, balls caſt into the air, and he addeth, that it is needful to reclaim and accommodate ones ſelf to time and occaſion, to obtain our deſire, which rules Syncletions, famous in the deſerts, obſerving, was accuſtomed to ſay, If the hen brood not her egs, ſhe hath no deſire to make them diſcloſe. And not to ſpeak of Saints, a wiſe Hiſtorian hath well obſerved: The greateſt binderance which can come to the perfection of a good work, is to go pearching, as a bird from bough to bough, without ever ſtaying.

Why do you not then make a ſerious reſolution, to forſake all theſe weakneſſes, & devote your ſelf for ſome good time to conſtancy? You anſwer: It cannot be done, we are in the Court, we are in the world, we live in the kingdom of inconſtancy, what means have we to deliver our ſelves from theſe laws? If we were Heremits, our recreation would be to tell the hours of the day, and to make them ours by a prudent Oeconomie; but here we follow the wind of neceſſity, the torrent of ſociety tranſporteth us, we no longer are our ſelves. It is a lamentable thing, to put purpoſely the diſeaſe into deſpair, for fear of recure. How unjuſt are we to accuſe all that which is about us, and ever to ſpare our culpable heads: we complain of the time which ſlideth away from us; places and ſocieties do us wrong, which would be ever profitable if we would our ſelves; the buſineſſes kill us, which we might make the inſtruments of virtue; all things afflict us, we accuſe Heaven and earth, and have no burden more weighty than our ſelves. What neceſſity is there to lay the faults of your own levity upon things inſenſible? Your inconſtancy is your vice, it is your own nature. Were it not a goodly thing to behold the Tarand (a creature which Ariſtotle and Philo ſpeaketh of) who paſſing through a garden, taketh ſo many colours as there are divers plants; to complain that theſe hearbs, and not his own skin do wrong to him, who is mutable and penetrable with all ſorts of impreſſions? This happeneth not to any other creatures, why to him? Wherefore ſhould the Polypus and Camelion conteſt againſt objects? A thouſand gallant Courtiers, a thouſand perſons of quality have lived, and ſtill live all their days in aſſemblies, in affairs, with a life ſo regular, that all goeth in meaſure and compaſs: the days and nights have not more equality in the equinoctial, than they in all their mannages of affairs. nature, ſuffer your ſelves to run without bridle upon all occaſions, (changeable creatures) reſembling the various colours of the doves breaſt, which one knoweth not how to diſtinguiſh. See you not that this is to betray your own manhood? What ought you to do to avoid this Obſtacle?

Firſt, to enter into your ſelves to conſider what paſſeth there, to behold from what root, from what ſource this tumultuary life proceedeth, to take away the cauſe, to ſuppreſs the effect.

To apprehend ſeriouſly the end for which man is created, to bend all your ſinews and arteries to arrive thither, to uſe creatures as means and inſtruments of happineſs, by the way of uſe, not fruition.

To purge the ſoul from ſins, which oftentimes raiſe this ſtorm, by a good general Confeſſion, and ſeriouſly cut off thoſe paſſions which moſt ſeditiouſly aſſault you.

To accommodate all your daily actions by the adviſe of your Spiritual Father, and to make a good reſolution ſtrictly to obſerve it, as much as in you lieth.

To conſider, how many Pagans, to make themſelves eminently excellent in ſome facultie, have determined of their own meer motion to be confined to caverns, and ſhaved like fools, for avoidance of company, and retirement to that which they intended: ſo did Demoſthenes the Oratour; why ſhould not we to ſave our ſouls do that, which he did to refine his language?

If any weakneſs occur after theſe good purpoſes, not to diſturb your ſelf for it, ſuppoſing conſtancy impoſſible, becauſe it falleth out you are inconſtant, to correct what is paſt, to order what is preſent, to prevent things to come, and to fortifie your ſelf even by falls.

The fifth Obstacle.

Diſsimulation.

ONe of the greateſt obſtacles of virtue is, for that man liveth in the world as on a ſtage, perpetually with a mask on his fore-head; every one would ſeem that which he is not, and none will avow what he is. Thoſe which come neareſt to God, are the moſt ſimple, becauſe the divine nature is ſimplicity it ſelf. The moſt remote, are the moſt double and palliated. This ſimplicity, the prime virtue of Saints, which hath guilded the face of the golden Age with its rays, is ſo alienated from the cuſtom of our times, that not ſo much as the name thereof is known. It is taken to be ſopperie, although it be the quinteſſence of prudence. To be ſimple, is to make the heart accord with the tongue and hands: It is to have in all your deportments a natural and genuine ſincerity, exempt from fraud, from vanity, and hypocriſie. It is a thing almoſt as rare in Court as a white raven; the mask is better beloved than the viſage, the reſemblance than the eſſence, opinion than conſcience. The moſt part of Courtiers are monſters with two tongues, and two hearts; few are there which take not Amphiaraus deviſe the quite contrary way, who ſaid, he would be, and not ſeem. At this day in matter of virtue, men better love to ſeem what they are not, than to be what they ſeem. It were a ridiculous vanity ſaid Saint Gregory Nazianzen, if an Ant ſhould take an Ape for a Lion, and the poor Ape ſhould afterwards fall into the throat of the Wolf, it ſhould be ſmall contentment to be eſteemed by this little creature a Lion in fantaſie, and to be devoured by this other beaſt in verity. And yet notwithſtanding corrupt depraved nature doth elect all her virtues and felicities in picture, and puniſhments in eſſence. I have much wondered at an ancient medal, which Villalpand in his Epiſtle in the Frontiſpiece of his book which he dedicated to Philip the third, King of Spain, affirmeth to have fallen into his hands. In this medal was ſeen on one ſide the magnificent Temple of Jeruſalem, with certain Hebrew characters much deformed with ruſt; on the other ſide there was the figure of Mark Anthonie, well engraven with this inſcription; Solomon. This invention came from Herod, a great flatterer of Roman Princes, on whom he ſaw his fortunes depended, and verily he followed Mark Anthonies ſtandard while good ſucceſs waited on his colours, but afterwards beholding that all yielded to the victorious arms of Auguſtus Cæſar, he ſought and obtained his favour by all poſſible ſubtile endeavours. Howſoever he cauſed this beautiful medal to be made, which gave to the verieſt ſot among Princes, the name of the wiſeſt amongſt Kings, and Mark Anthony, who neither had piety nor religion in his ſoul, beheld himſelf even willingly ſtamped in this coyn, as the true Guardian and Church-warden of the Temple of God; ſo much man affecteth the very ſhadows of good, after he hath loſt the ſubſtance. At this day this paſſion outragiouſly predominateth even to furie; in all places there is nothing but counterfeiting and affectations. Hypocriſie reigneth in painting, in habits, hypocriſie is in complements, hypocriſie is in buſineſſes, hypocriſie lodgeth in all ages, all ſexes, all conditions; hypocriſie goeth even to Altars. Ambition, avarice, luxury, and other vices, although deeply rooted, forſakes man when he forſakes himſelf; it is onely hypocriſie which attendeth him to his grave, and will ſleep under his aſhes: ſo many golden lies are witneſſes thereof, which perpetually do enſhrine carkaſſes. Man is ſo made to ſeem what he is not, and to diſſemble that which he is, ſo double and ſo repleniſhed with mutable eſſences, that he himſelf is deceived in himſelf, and taketh himſelf for other than he is. Men are not contented to corrupt their apparrel, their language, hair, viſage, ſoul, body, ſciences, arts, but they alſo will violate virtues, the daughters of the Divinitie; they diſpoil them of their natural plumes to cloth vice. If there be exceſs of cruelty in the chaſtiſement of ſome crime, it is called juſtice; if choler be predominant, it is termed zeal; if effeminacy of heart creep in, it is entituled meekneſs; prodigality borroweth the name of mercy; niggardlineſs of good husbandry; cowardiſe of prudence; obſtinacy of conſtancy; inconſtancy of facility and circumſpection; weakneſs of courage, of humility; pride of liberty; lazineſs of tranquility, diſturbance of ſpirit, of vigilancy; precipitation of fervour; dulneſs, of good counſel; and not to keep promiſe with any man, is ſaid to be equal with all men.

Saint Gregorie the Great, excellently moralizeth this in the book of Job, where he ſheweth that the moſt part of men are all griſtle, which hath the reſemblance of bones, but not the ſolidity of bones; they have the appearance of virtue, but not the firmneſs. What remedy is there for this abuſe deep-rooted in nature? I will onely produce two reaſons, well worthy of conſideration. Firſt, that (ſpeaking to noble hearts) it ſeemeth to me it is to produce a moſt irrefragable motive of deteſtation of any vice, when the baſeneſs and ignominie thereof is diſcovered, for that is it which hath moſt power over generous ſpirits. Now ſo it is, this hypocriſie which maketh you (O Noblemen) always to live diſguiſed, is quite contrary to the condition of a brave and generouſly elated ſpirit. Becauſe if it be impreſſed with a good ſtamp, it naturally loveth the liberty and freedom, which unavoidably is oppreſſed in theſe palliations, crouchings, and counterfeitings. They are the tricks of Apes and Foxes, and in no

Hypocriſie confuted in the great book of the world.

Beſides, ſeeing God openeth unto us the great book of the world, as a piece of parchment guilded and traced with his pencil, for us therein to read that which is for our inſtruction, if we will conſider diligently the moſt ſublime things, we ſhall find they naturally ſtrike at this vanity which maketh you to diſplay apparences to the eyes of men outwardly, having nothing ſolid within. It ſeemeth that all the maſter-pieces of this celeſtial and elementary world, as it were by a common conſent, do hide all what they have of moſt eminency and worth, bearing for deviſe: I hide the better part. It is true, that Heaven ſheweth it ſelf wholly reluctent in ſtars and brightneſs, but covereth his powerful influences, which by their ſecret extent give motion to this great houſe of nature. It is true, the air maketh his meteors to appear to the view of the whole world; but this ſecret virtue which doth penetrate us even to the heart, and bringeth life and refreſhment to us upon its wings, who can tell me what colour it is of? The fire unfoldeth his flames to us, but this commanding heat which conquereth and ſofteneth the hardeſt mettals, do we behold it? The calm ſea delighteth us with his ſmiling countenance, at that time eſpecially when it becometh (as it were) frizled and curled by ſome gracious and gentle gale, and coloured with the beams of a bright Sun which beat upon it; but this luſtruous beauty, what is it in compariſon of the treaſures, which he conceaſeth in the ſtore-houſes of his abyſſes? The earth it ſelf likewiſe maketh her boaſt in the ſpring, varied and enameled with her natural pieces of painting, and ſparkled with a thouſand petty flowers, which ſtand as the eyes of the meadows; but theſe do eclipſe each evening and morning: Quite contrary, the mettals which the earth encloſeth, and as it were engulfeth in the entrails, after they are wrought and poliſhed by the artful hands of Lapidaries, retain a luſtre of a long date, which reſplendently ſhine upon cup-boards of Kings and the Great men of the earth. What leſſon of nature is this, to hide all which it hath of greateſt value? And what corruption of nature in man, to hold in the bottom of his heart ſtench and dung-hills, and to plaiſter it over with a vain hypocriſie?

Yarte fui meliore latent.

Hypocriſie condemned by the laws of heaven.

God hath not onely imprinted this verity of which I ſpeak, in the great book of nature, but he hath, as it were, engraven and ſtampt it with his hand, in the monuments of the old and new law. The paſtimes of Great men are Theaters, Tilt-yards, and Amphitheaters, and the ſport of the Divine wiſdom in this Univerſe, is to hide treaſures under the bark and mantle of ſome perſons, baſe and abject in apparence. In the old law a ſtammering ſhepheard is choſen to carrie the word to a Monarch, to ſhake and overturn with a poor wand, the pillars of his Empire, to divide ſeas, to calm billows, to open the bowels of rocks, to command all the elements, and fill the world with wonders. In the new law ſimple fiſher-men, almoſt as dumb and mute as the fiſhes themſelves, are choſen to catch in their nets Philoſophers, Kings, Cities, Provinces, and Empires. Behold the ordinary cuſtom of God to hold pearls in ſhels, ſweet perfumes in very abject boxes. The true mark of greatneſs in the judgement of God, is, at firſt bluſh externally not to appear great. On the contrary, it is the act of a flat, ridiculous and benummed vanity, to be deſirous to ſurprize the eyes with a counterfeit and captious beauty, which afterward appearing in its native colours, makes the deformity thereof the more diſfigured.

Sport of God, and what.

1 Cor. 1. Quæ ſtulta ſunt mundi elegit Deus, ut confundat ſapientes, & infirma mundi elegit Deus, ut confundat fortia, & ignobilia mundi, & contemptibilia elegit Deus, & ea quæ non ſunt, ut ea quæ ſunt deſtrueret.

Deformity of hypocriſie.

What a ſhameful thing it is to a heart which hath never ſo little reſentment of nobility, to erect a reſplendent ſepulchre, to boaſt exteriourly marbles, guildings, characters, titles, and to have nothing within but bones, putrefaction and aſhes; to caſt a certain luſtre through the ignorance and obſcurity of an Age, become bruitiſh, and then to be in effect but a ſilly worm; to live in the world as a ſnail, to make long ſilver traces, and to be nothing elſe but froth; to have the back covered with velvet like a cuſhion, and the belly ſtuffed with hay; to make oſtent of leaves and verdure like a wood, and to be repleniſhed with ſerpents! Is it poſſible, that a noble heart, when it hath no other ſuper-viſour but its own conſcience, can ſuffer theſe ſhames? A gentile ſpirit ſaid to an old man, who cauſed his griſly hairs to be painted with the luſtre of green youth: Poor fool, although thou couldſt deceive the whole world with thy hair, yet death well knoweth they are gray. So when an hypocrite ſhall happen to conceal his jugling from all thoſe who accompany him, which indeed cannot be done (men now being endued with penetrating eyes) yet one cannot deceive the eye of his conſcience, quick-ſighted to pierce ſuch falſhoods with bright reflection. I ſay nothing of the ſhame and ignomie that muſt be undergone after it is diſcovered and taken with the manner, like a cut-purſe: I ſpeak nothing of the racks, tortures, affrightments and perplexities, in which they live who deſire to entertain theſe ſeemings. A great wit hath well ſaid, that ſuch people are the oxen of Baal, who are cut for ſacrifice in little gobbets, but notwithſtanding receive not fire from Heaven; theſe miſerable creatures macerate and kill themſelves, to ſacrifice themſelves to the appetites of the world, without ever taſting the conſolations of God which they have renounced. Let us lay their pains apart, let us admit that with theſe laborious endeavours, they might always live cloked, always hidden from the eyes of the world, yea even from the all-piercing eye of their own conſcience.

Stephanus Edvenſis in Reg. 3. 18.

2. Reaſon.

It is moſt manifeſt, and conſiderable for the ſecond reaſon, that it is impoſſible to deceive God, whoſe eye repleniſhed with lightening flaſhes, tranſpaſſeth through the abyſſes, and maketh hell it ſelf confeſs it hath not darkneſs enough to ſhadow it from his face Now ſo it is, that God condemneth, reproveth, chaſtiſeth with the particular indignation of his heart this plaiſtered life, and therefore as the Interpreters of the Scripture obſerve, he rejected the ſwan, notwithſtanding the whiteneſs of her feathers, and the ſweetneſs of note which is aſcribed to her; nor would he ever admit her in the number of his victimes, becauſe under pure white feathers ſhe hideth a black fleſh. For the ſame reaſon he never would have the Oſtrich, who hath onely the oſtentuous boaſts of wings, and no flight, ſo much he deteſteth apparence fruitleſs and effectleſs. Firſt or laſt he will (ſaith holy Job) take away the maſk, ſo that the life of hypocrites ſhall be as the ſpiders web in the judgement of God; they ſhall think they have ſped well, but even to have hidden themſelves: all ſhall be reſolved into thing, to make them appear what they are, in a moſt ignominious nakedneſs. They now are Panthers, who have their skins ſpotted with mirrours, that ſearch out ſecret fountains to waſh away the ordures and impreſſions of their crimes, as it is related of this creature. But the day of God will come, when (as the Prophet Iſaiah ſaith) the Panthers waters ſhall wholly be dried and ſoaked up; that is to ſay, as Aikredus interpreteth it, that all the counterfeitings and diſſimulations of the world, ſhall find no more water to whiten them. We all naturally fear the publication of our vices, ſo ſenſible we are in the touches of honour.

Thoſe poor Miléſian maids, who moved with enraged deſpair, ran to halters and ſteepie precipices, could never be diverted from this fury, either by the ſweet admoniſhment of their parents, or rigorous menaces menaces of Judges: but when by decree the naked bodies of thoſe who had violated the law of nature, by this moſt wicked attempt, were caſt upon the dung-hill, the onely apprehenſion of nakedneſs, and of the nakedneſs of a bodie bereaved of ſenſe, ſtayed the courſe of theſe execrable frenzies. And without ſpeaking of ancient Hiſtories, William Biſhop of Lions relateth, that a certain Damſel painted, in an Age when ſimplicity was in great eſteem, as ſhe went along in a proceſſion, behold by chance an Ape came out of a ſhop, who leaped on her ſhoulders, and took off her coif, and made a little deformity appear, covered under painting and diſſimulation, whereby ſhe felt herſelf overwhelmed with dolour and confuſion. If the ſmall affronts and diſgraces which we receive in the world, have ſo much force, what will it be then when the Sovereign Judge ſhall take away the ſcarf, and make a cauterized conſcience appear? What will it be, when with as many torches and burning lights, as there then ſhall be of Angels and of the elect by his ſide, he ſhall penetrate even to the bottom of a loſt ſoul? Where then ſhall be his plaiſterings, where his diſſimulations and hypocriſies in the abyſs of this confuſion? It is a thing which we rather may meditate on in ſilence, than expreſs in words.

The ſixth OBSTACLE.

Ill husbanding of time.

A notable fable.

A Notable fable maketh the ſpider and the ſilk-worm to ſpeak together, telling their fortune in a pretty pleaſing manner, and greatly repleniſhed with moral inſtruction. The poor ſpider complaineth ſhe laboureth night and day to make her webs, with ſo much fervour and diligence, that ſhe unbowelleth herſelf, pouring forth her ſubſtance and ſtrength to accompliſh her work: yet notwithſtanding her endeavour ſo little proſpereth, as that after ſhe hath brought this her web to perfection, a ſilly ſervant comes with a broom, and in an inſtant undoes what ſhe could not produce perhaps ſcarcely in ten years. But if it happen ſhe eſcape from this perſecution, which ſeldom is ſeen in great mens houſes, yet all the fruit ſhe may expect from ſo much toyl, is but to take ſome wretched flie in her web. Behold you not herein ſufficient cauſe to bewail her miſery? The ſilk-worm quite contrary, boaſteth herſelf to be one of the moſt happy creatures which lives on the face of the earth. For (ſaith he) I am ſought after as if I were a precious diamond, I am exported from forreign countries, happy is he who beſt can lodge, breed, entertain and cheriſh me; men bend all their induſtrie to ſerve my eaſeful repoſe and commodities. If I travel, my pain is well beſtowed: but be it how you will (ſilly ſpider) that you take flies, I captivate Kings. The greateſt Monarchs of the earth are involved in my threeds; Queens and great Ladies make of my works the entertainment of their beauties; and the Potentates which will not depend upon any, are dignified by a little worm. The four corners of the earth divide my labours with admiration; and not being able to go higher, although I reach not to Heaven, yet I behold the Altars glitter under the embelliſhments which iſſue from my entrails. And verily there is great difference between the travel of the ſpider, and pain of the ſilk-worm. The induſtrie of theſe two little creatures do naturally figure unto us two ſorts of perſons, whereof the one laboureth for vanity, the other for verity. All men coming into this life, enter thereinto as into a ſhop of toyl, which is as natural to them, as flight for birds. A great man after he had well conſidered this ſentence of Job, cauſed theſe words to be inſcribed on his tomb, well worthy of ponderation, that is to ſay: Man entereth into being by the gate of not being, as he, who is as ſoon in ſin as in nature; his birth is a puniſhment, his life a travel, and his death a neceſſity.

Adamus de Sancto Victore. A worthy Epitaph. Conceptio culpa, naſci pœna, neceſſe mori.

And very well Tertullian obſerveth, that God the Creatour clothing man with skins after his fall, (which is the attire of ſlaves and ſervitours whom we ſend to delve in mynes) thereby would ſignifie to him, he ſhould enter into the world as into a myne to labour and dig, until he had found a tomb. This pain then being neceſſarily reſolved upon, one of the moſt important points for direction of life, is, to take a good employment, and well to beſtow your time, ſince through want of this good endeavour, life is filled with a buſie ſluggineſs, with unprofitable labours, with remorſe, with ſhame, which oftentimes draggeth after it an eternity of pain. It is one of the greateſt confuſions which at this day predominateth in the lives and actions of men of quality. Some are overwhelmed with affairs even from morning till night, and think upon every thing but themſelves. Others roul in a lazineſs full of moſt vain occupations, and never underſtand the principal buſineſs, which is the point of their ſalvation. We greatly fail either in knowledge or courage, to handle one of the chief paſſages of our life, which is the expence of time; we do as one in elder time ſaid: We labour in the main point, as if it were but an acceſſory, and we afterward take the acceſſory as if it were the principal. All the petty trifles which concern the eaſe and accommodation of our bodies, have their regular time, and ſeldom are forgotten, drinking, eating, ſleeping, ſporting, exerciſe that pleaſeth, be it never ſo painful, have their ſeaſon; the affair of ſalvation hath none at all, if it take not ſome ſmall time even by ſtealth. Behold how corruption is engendred, that may be remedied by the conſideration of two or three reaſons which I will propoſe unto you.

An excellent conceit of Tertullian. Homo pellitus orbi quaſi metallo datur. Tertul. de pallio.

Two great obſtacles of ſalvation.

Athen. l. 4. Ἔργον δὲ ἀναγκαῖον μὲν, ἀναγκαῖον δὲ ἐργαζόμενον.

First know, it is true what the Wiſe-man ſaid: You oftentimes complain of divers neceſſities of life, one ſaith he hath need of health, another of liberty, another of credit, another of favour, another of apparel, another of money: no man deploreth that he hath need of time, which indeed is the moſt precious merchandize. And yet notwithſtanding Zeno aſſured us, the thing which man moſt wanted in this life, was time. One cannot better approve the value which is to be ſet upon any thing, than by ſhewing the rarity and neceſſity of it. Time is not onely precious, but abſolutely neceſſary. Then think whether you ought to hold it dear or not. Time is very hard to be known, how difficult (think you) will it then be to poſſeſs it? All the brave ſpirits of the world have voluntarily put themſelves upon the torture, onely to diſcover what time was, yet could they not ſo much as touch the wings thereof. Pythagoras ſaid, it was the ſoul of the world; others, that it was Heaven; others, that it was motion; others, the meaſure of motion. S. Auguſtine a moſt admirable wit, ſtruggleth with himſelf upon this queſtion, as a bird in a ſtring: He ſaith he knoweth, and he knoweth not, what time is. He knows enough to hold his peece, and knoweth not enough to ſpeak. I leave for you to think, if this ſpirit all compoſed of fire and lightening, could not know time, how can you have it in your power? The Scripture compareth it to a moſt ſwift river, which cometh not but to paſs along, and creepeth not but to glide away. All mortals little and great, ſtand on the brink of this river, to fiſh for time. But do you know with what inſtrument? With a ſive; which is the cauſe that they hold nothing. One fiſheth ten years, another twenty, another thirty, another fourty, another four-ſcore. Out alas! All hath paſſed through a ſive, there remaineth nothing for them; yea even the little infant hanging on the teat of his nurſe, which he had ſucked but one day, as yet hath no more. There remains but a poor moment, which we hold as an eel in our hands: at every turn it eſcapeth from us; one moment driveth another, as the wave of the ſea thruſteth forward the wave. You ſee, this merchandize is very hard to be kept, and to recover ſuch a loſs, is a thing humanely impoſſible. To meaſure the wind, to weigh the flame, to call back a day paſſed, are three effects of like impoſſibility. God hath reſerved to himſelf the government of this great dyal of the world; he himſelf figureth out the hours, and will give this commiſſion to no man. If the Sun was ſtayed in the time of Joſuah, it was done, ſaith Saint Chryſoſtom, in reverence of the name of Jeſus, of whom this great Captain was the figure.

If it recoyled back ten degrees in the time of Ezechias, it was to ſignifie the myſterie of the incarnation, when the eternal Word abaſed himſelf under the nine Quires of Angels, even to the uniting himſelf to human nature, the tenth and laſt of reaſonable creatures. This large dyal of Heaven is not touched, but for the great and various motions of the world, and the principal myſteries of our faith: to think ſuch a change ſhould be made for you, were a great folly. Take time while the Sun ſtriketh on your line; if you will put the hand of the dyal upon the hour of the preſent day, you ſhall not depend upon the expected approach of to morrow. See you not if one rend a garment, it is made up again; if a jewel be loſt, it may be found again; if a houſe be burnt, it is re-edified again, many times much fairer than ever it was. There is nothing, ſave time, but returneth; you ſhall ſooner find the Philoſophers ſtone, than time loſt. All riches are but as chaff in compariſon of time. There is no worſe thief than he that ſtealeth from himſelf ſo unvaluable a merchandize, either in doing ill, or in doing nothing.

The ſecond reaſon, which maketh this eſtimation of time ſo recommendable, is the neceſſity we have of it. King Antigonus ſpake wiſely, when he ſaid his war was the warfare of time, as well as of arms. And very properly may we ſay the ſame. All our Chriſtian warfare, all our martial diſcipline, all our exploits conſiſt in laying hold of opportunity, and well husbanding of time. A little time well employed, which will be found at the day of our death, in our own hands, can put us in poſſeſſion of a happy eternity. If you have not time, well may you have rivers of gold, and magazins of pearls, but Heaven you ſhall never have.

Saint Gregory Nazianzen doth ſagely tell us, that life is an open Fare for all the world to trade in. And verily it is an admirable Mart, where the merchants, if they will be well adviſed, may barter a vale of tears for a Paradiſe of delicacies; earth for Heaven; and a moment for eternity. All conſiſteth in well uſing time; this is the onely merchandize in requeſt in the other world to which we go. Some infinitely labour to adorn themſelves with the mire and durt of the Indies, to wit, with gold and ſilver, which is as abſurd a folly, as if one to climb to Heaven, ſhould make himſelf wings of a ſcuttle filled with earth. Others hunt after glory and honour of the world, which is but a meer counterfeit ſemblance, in compariſon of the happineſs of Saints; yet they notwithſtanding would carry it to Heaven; as if one ſhould undertake to bring by wagon, a veſſel of ſtinking water an hundred leagues off, to make ſale of it, where ſtreams run of eternal fountains. Will you know the merchandize which is of ſale in Heaven? Tribulation, for there is none, and Time, for there is nothing but eternity. Carrie thither a little pain patiently born, a little time well employed, and behold you become rich for ever.

Judge now, if time be ſo eſtimable and neceſſary for your ſalvation, what value you ſhould ſet upon it, and whether it be not an intolerable thing to waſt it in ſopperies and trifles. Time is ill husbanded by three ſorts of people. Some employ it in doing ill; others in doing nothing; the reſt in doing too much. In doing ill, the vitious; in doing nothing, the idle; in doing too much, the vain and unhappie. All are as it were equal in looſing time, although unequal in the manner of looſing it, and in the reward for having loſt it. And not to ſpeak here at all either of crimes or negligences, (which are two dangerous rocks for the ſhip which tranſporteth time) ſome ſigh under a true lazineſs, but painful and ſtraitened; others are delighted with vanities and meer follies; many are involved in buſineſs up to the elbow, and yet becauſe they do not take their aim well (in that they do not travel for Heaven, and are wholly ignorant of the place and path of the rendevouz) all their life is a moſt labourſom loytering. They make much adoe, as little children about butter-flies. They run up and down like rats, who are infinitely buſie to carrie a rotten nut into their hole. They ſtrive as fiſhes in a pond, to take the bit one from another. They wander backward and forward, like ants upon the bodie of a tree. Others make fools of themſelves with meer bables, and it is a wonder to behold the childiſhneſs and apiſh tricks of employments, which are found in the lives of men of eminent quality. See in the ancient Hiſtories a Domitian, upon whoſe ſhoulders God had placed the burden of a vaſt Empire, yet laying aſide all other affairs, he every day reſerved ſome hours to himſelf, to ſtick flies through with a bodkin, and thereunto intended as to one of the moſt ſerious affairs of his Kingdom. Hartabus King of the Hyrcans, caught moles; Bias King of the Lydians ſtabbed frogs; Æropus King of the Macedonians made lanterns. Behold you not goodly employments for Kings?

Are not there (I pray) as very triflers to be found amongſt Chriſtian Nobility at this day? We ſee men even in this Age, who waſte all their time in combing their hair, waſhing their beards, in ſtriving to have their ſtockins ſprucely put on, to new hatch their ſwords, to draw on new boots, to enquire for rich garters, to make proviſion of girdles and hangers, to cheapen beaver hats, to buy feathers, to trample up and down the ſtreets, to hold a racket, to play at dice, to dance the cinque-apace, to gourmandize a banquet, to throw rotten orenges at one another, to prattle with women, to vaunt of that which they have never done, to envie the happy, to contemn the miſerable, to breath perpetually out of one and the ſame mouth, either calumnie or ſcoffs; never to utter a ſerious word, as if one had abjured all reaſon; and laſtly never to ſpeak well, but when they intend to ſpeak ill. What an unfortunate and travantly kind of life is this? When ſuch kind of men have ended their courſe, deſerve they not to have the Epitaph of an Ape inſcribed on their tombs, ſince they they servilely have thus betrayed their manhood?

On the other side, we behold women who have no other trade, but to think on new fashions for apparrel, to buy stuffs, to make thereof rich petty-coats and gowns, to bargain for jewels and precious stones, to raise their chopino's higher, to look in their glass above a hundred times in a day, to call a Councel upon one hair of their head, to have Angel-water, the powder of Cypress, to be ever learning some new invention of imposture to bear on their fore-heads, which God himself hath consigned with his own finger, to be the seat of shamefac'dness, to devise curiosities in their chambers, and to complain of all the world, to sooth their own impatience, to brave it through the streets in their coaches, to roam up and down to gossippings and child-bed women, to tattle with spruce Carpet-knights, to search through impertinent curiosity into all kind of businesses, to know nothing and to speak of all things, to deafen half the world with their chattering, and to hold the other in breath & study to do them service, to bestow a fourth part of their life in clothing and attiring themselves, another in babling, another in dancing and playing, the rest in sleeping; what remaineth for God?

Behold goodly husbanding of time, behold how the Exchecquer of God is mannaged, and then who will be amazed to see that a life spent in these goodly exercises and employments, is replenished with darkness, with confusion, with a sluggish and lamentable forgetfulness of the life to come? The remedy for this disorder is to consider,

Remedies.

I. How many damned souls do now groan in flames, which all the Oceans cannot extinguish, for having contemned time, which you yet enjoy at your ease. He that could onely grant to them one little moment of these excellent days which you prodigally waste, through what thorns, what fires, what yee would not they pass to explate the errours of their passed life? From what Scepters, what Empires, what Diadems, would not they voluntarily and freely dispoil themselves to purchase one hour of time, and employ it in the rigours of a most austere penance? Yet you suppose, it may be lawful for you to live in this childish stupidity.

II. How many think you at the very instant, when you read these lines, are there of souls newly dislodged from bodies, brought to the tribunal of God, condemned to flames for this ill expence of time? What know you at how little a threed the sword of Justice hangeth over your heads? And you notwithstanding resemble snails, which sing when their houses are on fire.

III. Take so much pain to avoid an eternal unhappiness, as to raise to your self a little treasure out of the thrift of time, by taking every day, be it never so little leisure, to retire your self within your self, to behold from whence you come, and whither you go, and what passeth within you; study in the book of your conscience, which must be laid open, and perhaps sooner than you think for.

IV. Prepare couragiously, by the advise of those who guid your conscience, a little oeconomy of all your actions in the day; keep them strictly, as much as you may possible, and if you happen to loose time, do not like spend-thrifts who loose and know not what they loose; see why, and how you loose, that you may seasonably give remedy thereunto.

The seventh OBSTACLE.

Intemperance of tongue.

THis super-aboundance of time and idleness which ordinarily is amongst Courtiers, doth undoubtedly cause in them so violent an overflashing of tongue, that now adays it swelleth like another deluge overflowing all mankind. Evagrius a good Authour cited by Melissa in the Bibliotheke of the Fathers, hath produced a passage very remarkable, to wit, that among trees the Almond blossometh first of all, and is the first that is pinched with frost; and amongst the parts of man the tongue first of all cometh forth to the field, and is the first surprized in the snares of Satan. If all those who at this present might be taxed for their tongues, should loose the use thereof, the world would be replenished with dumb men; but the evil spirit handleth his business much otherwise than the fowlers. These catch birds to bereave them of liberty: he layeth hold on the tongue, to give it a false freedom to speak all things. Three sorts of tongues at this day are most powerfully predominant in the occasions of the world; the vain, the slanderous, and the scoffing.

The tongue compared to the Almond tree.

The vain seemeth to me to have been mystically signified by the Prophet Isaiah, under the title of a feathered cymbal. The cymbal was an instrument composed of thin plates of brass, with certain small bars of iron fastened and cross billited in the plates, wherewith they made a great noise. Others think the cymbals are bells, which according to the opinion of some were consecrated to the service of the Church by Pope Sabinian. It is not at this day that bells are in request, but as for feathered bells, they are things unheard of. And yet notwithstanding the tongue is not onely a bell, according to the allegorical interpretation of the words of the Prophet, but a feathered bell. The bell goeth not out of its steeple, but the tongue cannot contain it self in its palate. She maketh herself wings by the help of feathers and paper, and after endeavoureth to pass the seas, and to bear fire very far into the world. A slight word spoken merily in the secret retirement of a closet, shall sometimes be told again an hundred leagues off, and shall enkindle in the hearts of many, a fire able to put all into combustion. The tongue of the cymbal, as it is a cymbal, is not the worst, it offendeth more through complacence than malice. It is a tongue truly vain, which feedeth it self with a petty affectation of discourse, with slight lies, with trifling flatteries, with prattle and tattle. In this predicament we ordinarily place the tongues of indiscreet women. The Gyants after the inundation of waters, would build the tower of Babel; but women in the deluge of tongues raise the turrets of babble; through an excess of idleness, indiscretion, and curiosity. In the same rank are the tongues of an infinite number of effeminate Gallants, who waste all their time in courting women, complements, affectations, meer fopperies: had they no other ill in them than never to pronounce a serious word, yet are they culpable enough; but lying and flattery wait on them, as the shadow doth on the body. A great note of the corruption of this Age, is the liberty of lying which reigneth even in the mouthes of many men of quality. It seemeth now adays that to lie is no longer a vice, but a necessity of nature. The Sages termed truth to be a sea which is never moved, a haven where no man suffereth ship-wrack, a way which wearieth not, a gate which never is shut against any: but at this present it is a sea where few merchants sail, a haven little frequented, a way which to many seemeth to be stopped up with thorns and briars, and a gate which almost is never opened.

Veritie.

It is said Augustus Cæsar, after a long enquiry into all parts of his Empire, found but one man who was accounted never to have told a lie, for which cause he was deemed capable and worthy to be the Sacrificer in the Temple of truth. If at this day the like inquisition should be made, I much fear feat the Altar of Verity would rather be without a Prieſt, than the ſhrine of lies without victims. Little Children in their beginning practiſe this trade; the ſpirit of impoſture openeth the way unto them by the tongue, making them in lies to find the key of all vices. In ſpeaking falſely one is ſo accuſtomed to lying, that he liveth therein as in his proper element. It is practiſed with as much boldneſs, as a man would deſire advantage to defend a juſt verity: the ordinary proceeding of theſe counterfeit ſpirits will make us henceforth believe, that to aſſure a thing with ſo much confidence is to affirm it is falſe.

Lying the key of vice.

Impertinent prattle.

Lies are moſt eſpecially every where predominant in pratlings and flatteries, which in my opinion are come to the height of extremitie, ſo exorbitant they are. And it is no wonder, ſince the ſpirits of men are ſo diſpoſed thereunto, that thoſe which have loſt all the marks and impreſſions of virtue, will yet retain the tribute, which is praiſe. They ſee themſelves voluntarily to babble, and ſelf-love hath veiled their eyes with ſo groſs an ignorance, that they may do it with much impudence, and yet it ſeem modeſtie. The malediction pronounced by the Prophet Ezechiel againſt thoſe who have little pillows of all ſorts for the nice to lean upon, may now well be renewed; never hath there been ſo many flatteries ſeen. The children of great men are ſoothed by all kind of tongues, and made drunk with their praiſes before they be throughly awakened, and ſeeing they are always bred in curioſity, it ſeemeth when any truth is propoſed them, a Phenix is brought from the other world. Servile ſouls, which bend themſelves like the fiſhers angling-line, ſeeing their preferment dependeth upon their impertinent prating, and that the Altars of this falſe greatneſs will be ſerved with ſuch ſmoke, ſpare it no more than one would water in a river. You ſhall find few or none that will tell the ape he is an ape; this liberty of ſpeech is extant in hiſtories, but not at all in our manners. The gout ſeeketh out the houſes of rich voluptuous men, and flatterie the manſions of the eminent: that is it which the Wiſe-man would ſay in the Proverbs according to the original tranſlation. The Hebrews literally underſtand it by the apes which Solomon cauſed to be tranſported by ſea; with thoſe apes came flatterers and buffons to the Court of this great King, which was the beginning of his unhappineſs. Thoſe which flatter, and thoſe which willingly are flattered are much of the nature of the ape, and all this tattle of Court is indeed a meer apiſhneſs. Behold why that learned Prelate Faius, whoſe manuſcripts have very lately been extracted out of libraries, doth moſt natively repreſent this verity unto us under the veil of a fiction.

Væ, qui conſuunt pulvillos ſub omni cubito manus.

Flattery inebriateth great men from their cradle.

Prov. 30. Simia manibus nititur & moratur in, domibus Regis

Apes in the Court of Solomon.

Faius in manipulo.

A prety tale of an ape.

He feigneth two men, the one an extream flatterer, the other juſt and a truth-ſpeaker, came to lodge in the houſe of an old ape, at that time encompaſſed with a plentiful race. The ape asked of the flatterer what opinion he had of him. This man accommodating himſelf to the time, gave him many ſpecious praiſes, ſaying, he was a vermillion roſe, and thoſe that environed him were the leaves; that he was a Sun, and thoſe that were about him were the rays, that he was as valiant as a Lion, and all his offspring was a race of young Lions. Behold ſaith the ape, it is well, and commanded a preſent to be given him. When it came to the truth-ſpeakers turn to ſay ſome what, he revolved with himſelf that he could not tell a lie, that his nature was always to be true, that if his companion had a reward for telling a lie, by much more reaſon he ſhould be wellcome delivering the truth. He thereupon freely ſaid to him, he was an ape, and all thoſe that attended him were apes like himſelf; for which cauſe the apes provoked, aſſailed him fiercely with their teeth and nails. Behold the condition of this Age: we cannot brooke a truth, our ears being always ſtopped with perfumed words, entertained with falſe praiſes and ſervile complacences. Truth findeth no admittance, and if happily ſhe hit upon it, her words are thorns, they tear the ſkin. The moſt indiſſoluble friendſhips in apparence are diſſolved by a little freedom of a friend. Then it is nothing ſtrange if prating and intemperance of tongue be in ſuch force, ſince the ſoft temper of ſpirits of this time cannot endure any the leaſt libertie of ſpeech. As we are exceſſive in praiſes, ſo we hold no meaſure in reprehenſion. Thoſe who are abſolutely ſenſible of the touches of honour, and cannot tolerate a truth, think that all other are inſenſible, ſo prodigal they are of another mans fame. They cut, carve, chop with the tongue on every ſide, and you may find a feaſt, where more raw fleſh is devoured than either boyled or roaſted. Calumny doth at this preſent reſemble the tail of the ſcorpion, which either ſtingeth, or ever is ready to tranſfix; it hath never been ſeen more fiercely enflamed. It is the wound of frogs deſcribed in Exodus. It was a great ſcourge to behold theſe ugly creatures iſſuing out of Nilus, to go crawling up and down the ſilken furnitures and golden plate of Pharao, as well as over the poor cottages of beggars. And a greater puniſhment it is at this day, to hear theſe ſlanderous tongues pour forth their venom upon all ſorts of perſons, and to aſſail, as well the Miters, the Diadems, and Scarlet, as the ruſſet coat. Every one ſheweth the ſtroaks of calumny; every one demanding oyl and balm for his wounds, doth notwithſtanding covertly hold a ſharp lancet to wound anothers eſtimation. The honour of Magiſtrates, of Ladies, of young virgins many times moſt innocent, is not ſpared, moſt faithful ſervitours are traduced by the wills of calumny; men are bold to ſpeak any thing, ſince many are willing to believe all. Verily behold the greateſt malignity that can be in the minds of men, which is, that they are pleaſed to diſſemble an evil, and that which hath no foundation of verity findeth colour and countenance from the mouth of a calumniator. Two evil ſpirits ordinarily breath out calumny: the one planteth himſelf in the tongue of the detractour, the other in the ears of the hearer. They are two ſundry winds, whereof the one cometh from the gate, the other from the window. When they toſs this tennis-ball one to another, you ſee terrible ſport.

After calumny cometh likewiſe ſcoffing, with immodeſt and wicked words, which are alſo put into the mouths of little children to make them witty and pleaſing. The little creatures doe not yet know whether they have a tongue or no, and we perceive they already are initiated in the work of Satan. This ſpirit of ſcoffing and impurity, which pleaſeth it ſelf with uncleanneſs of language, is a harbinger of Athieſm, that marketh him out a lodging: and as it is ſaid, that the ſea-rat goeth before the whale, in the ſame manner groſs and ſenſeleſs impiety ſuch as it is, maketh uſe I know not of what kind of ſilly ſcoffing ſpirits, which are taken to be the wiſe of the world, under the colour that they can compoſe ſome bald ſonnet, whilſt they themſelves readily give the word when to laugh at it. Theſe are the curioſities, the entertainments, the Idols of meetings. Aaron ſtriking the duſt with his rod made flies to ſpring up, the greateſt ſcourge of Ægypt: I cannot tell who it is that hath ſtirred up the aſhes of Rabelais, nor who hath been verſed in this putrefaction, but by a manifeſt vengeance from heaven we daily behold new vermine to ariſe, which endeavour to gnaw and diſſipate all that which hath any piety or fear of God in Chriſtianity.

what to destroy you. You have thorns in the middest of your feasts and recreations, which will pierce you even to the drawing of bloud. Take away the solaces of a Pagan, and present to God the alacrity of Christians; know you not, that the grashoppers of the Apocalyps have the visage of a virgin, and the tayl of a scorpion? All these rants and scoffs have the seeming apparence of generosity, but the poison is in the tail.

non advertit, advertat de cetero: atque ita non invenient quod advertat, ne Deus inveniat quod evertat. Sed tamen quia non quiescunt nasci spinæ in male exultantibus, advertamus jubilationem improbandam, offeramus Deo jubilationem coronandam.

Behold in part the disorders which at this day proceed from three sorts of tongues, the vain, the reproachful, the scoffing; without speaking at all of oaths, perjuries, blasphemies, which have the language of hell. What a deluge of corruption issueth from one small member of man? Alas! what remedy is there for all this, it being one of the greatest obstacles of salvation and Christian perfection?

Remedies.

The mischief is not onely in the tongue, it is in the heart, and thereto remedy must be applied, considering both the deformity and punishment of the like vices. The vain tongue which is practised in babble, lies, flatteries, and impertinent chatter, ordinarily proceedeth from a sleight, shallow, idle spirit. As it is sleight, it is full of foppery; as shallow, it is servilely subject to complacence; as idle, it seeketh employment in vanity, not being able to find it in virtue. This intemperance of tongue is an effect of ill-governed idleness, and there it is where the searing-iron must be applied to make it a serious soul, much pleased with entertainments worthy of a man, able to resist idle toys, and to settle it in a firm posture, in good employments, to the end it may have no leisure to diffuse it self in vain superfluities. The lips of the bride (as S. Thomas notably observeth) are compared to a carnation ribband, to inform us, that the ribband serves women to bind up their hair, and the discretion of lips ought to tie up our thoughts, least they be scattered in a thousand follies of speech. S. Ambrose interpreting these words of the Wiseman: Sepi possessionem tuam spinis (which admonish to make a hedge of thorns about our inheritance) saith: We have not any better possession than our soul, no better gold than our heart, no better silver than our words; it is about this treasure we ought to make our wall. Rivers are tributaries to the Ocean for all their drops of water, and you at the last judgement of God for every word. Is not this worthy of a little consideration to stay a vain tongue?

Lips of the spouse. S. Thomas in Cant. 4. Eccl. 18. Sicut vitta coccinea labia tua.

Possessio tua mens tua est, aurum tuum cor tuum est: Argentum tuum eloquium tuum est. Ambr. 1. officior. c. 2.

From whence calumny proceedeth.

As for the reproachful, the one proceedeth from a very stupid and gross inconsideration, from an ill liberty, from a dangerous custom, which maketh that one sometimes slandereth not purposely, and this must be corrected by prudence and careful observation: the other taketh birth from an enraged soul, full of gall and acrimony, which casteth its froath out by the tongue, finding torment and punishment in anothers happiness, and searching out its contentment in the diminution thereof: but it there encountereth a new torture, beholding its reproches as the foam of the sea, which beateth on the foot of rocks, and flieth not to the steepy top.

Horrour of calumny.

Great minds dissipate calumnies by the innocency of their life, as the chrystal current of rivers carry along the small flying dust. All the arrows of reproach return upon the calumniatour, who oftentimes liveth in this world as a solitary wolf, tormented with a thousand mortal affrightments of a wicked conscience, which make him to begin his hell in this world, and finish it in the other without end. For what mercy can there be for a calumniatour who dieth in obloquies? So many reproches are so many man-slaughters, wherewith (all bloudy) he goeth to the judgement of God, to receive the reward of his wickedness. Saint Clement witnesseth, that this is the doctrine of Saint Peter, who distinguisheth two sorts of homicides: The one of the hand, the other of the tongue, both punishable with one and the same pain. There is no other remedy but to take away brotherly hatred by charity, and seriously bridle this untamed tongue, until it be mastered.

S. Clemens ep. 1. ad Jacob. Sunt homicidæ interfectores fratrum, & sunt homicidæ detractores eorum.

As for the scoffing tongue, it proceedeth from a ridiculous soul, light, feeble, and languishing, in the relishes of God; and if it further pass on to mock at things sacred, it is a bud of the same impiety. Such goblins and pratling devils are not commonly cured by reason; their hearts are worm-eaten, and become rotten with infidelity; they are the sons of Cham, (unbridled and dissolute creatures) which will fall into a thousand disasters in this life, if they do not powerfully amend themselves, and shall in the other world find a heap of anger and vengeance for punishment of their crimes. Their laughter is the crackling of thorns, or song of snails in the flames. Flie (O Noblemen) such plagues, and well remember what a great person said: That your tongue is as the incensory of the Divinitie: use the matter so, that your words may be presented to the throne of God, as the true perfume of Heaven.

Tongue the incensory of the Divinity.

The eighth OBSTACLE.

Curiositie in the resentment of affronts and disgraces.

AS men are allured by vain praises, and bathe themselves in flatteries as in rose-water, so are they extreamly sensible of affronts, whether they be real disgraces, or have no subsistence at all but in the imagination. One cannot touch this string of point of honour so slightly, but it will eccho forth some sound. The least word of disdain raiseth a storm in the mind, a disgrace is a clap of thunder, and one scornful countenance of a Prince, breedeth more fear and terrour than a canon. These worldly respects cause a main impediment in the exercise of virtue, and a soul, which shall feed it self with such apprehensions, shall always live in fetters. It is good to observe the causes and remedies thereof, to draw consolation from thence.

Querelæ sunt nauseantis animi, in quas fere delicati & fœlices incidunt.

You (O Noblemen) apprehend injuries, obloquies, and disgraces; from whence suppose you do these apprehensions proceed? Of too much felicity ill digested. You have a stomach of paper which can concoct nothing, it is so inebriated with the tastful sweetness of some never-ceasing prosperities, that with the least disgust it is overthrown: and yet notwithstanding, to live now adays in the world, you must procure an Ostriches stomach, who swalloweth even iron it self.

From whence this niceness proceedeth.

Secondly, this proceedeth from a spirit proud and elate. We observe, that those who upon all occasions are ready to give affronts, are most tender in receiving any. They cut a large thong out of another mans leather, but if you prick them never so little, you even pull their skin over their ears. It is the course which was noted in the monster of nature Caligula: He had a tongue unbridled to scoff indifferently at all kind of objects. If any man challenged him for it, he was enragedly offended.

Caligula a great scoffer. Ferendarum contumeliarum impatiens, faciendarum cupidissimus.

Thirdly, these affronts oft-times are such as our fantasies make them; if we help them not out with our opinions, their arrow entereth not to make an affront. We must believe it to be such, otherwise all injuries are but as stones cast into the wind, which have no force. It is recounted, that Cornelius a Senatour shed many tears in full Senate, when Corbala called him bald Ostrich. Seneca admireth that such a man, who in all things else had shewed himself most couragiously opposite against other injuries, lost his his conſtancy for one ridiculous ſaying, which might have been ſmothered in laughter, whence it firſt tooke birth; becauſe this blow was rather given him by his own imagination, than by the tongue of his enemy.

Nimio otio ingenia natura infirma, & muliebria inopia verè injuriæ laſcivientia.

Fourthly this niceneſs in the reſentement of injuries ordinarily taketh its being from a ſoft and effeminat ſpirit, which knoweth not what an affront is, and had great need to encounter ſome true and real thing, that it may no more become haughty with vain ſhadows. This is it, which moſt judiciouſly that great Oracle of Latin Philoſophy hath obſerved. For remedie to this obſtacle I will produce two very conſiderable things.

Remedies.

The firſt is, that if a generous heart could once be perſwaded that the moſt noble revenge which might be drawn from affronts were to ſcorn them, and that ſuch is the manner of all great ſpirits, he would make unto himſelf a buckler of diamond againſt all theſe petty inferiour diſturbances. Now I affirm all the greatneſs of a fair ſoul fit to have heaven for a theater of its actions, ſhould reſolve to do good, and ſuffer ill: to know not onely how to tolerate an ingratitude but how to faſten benefits. S. Auguſtine upon the 93. Pſalm proveth this verity unto us by a fine induction, which he draweth from the ſtars. Injuries (ſaith he) are dayly done to the ſtars, One ſaith, behold the ſtar of Mercury, behold Saturn: is it not then a great wrong to theſe beautiful ſtars, enchaced by the hand of God in the azure vault of the heavens, to put them into the poſſeſſion of I know not what kind of petty pilferer, or of an old dotard who is ſaid to have devoured his own children? Theſe ſtars, which are as it were the eyes of the Omnipotent, to behold all that which paſſeth heer below, are they offended with the injuries which men doe them? Have they ever turned out of the way for that? Have they ever loſt one ſole ſtep of their regular motion? No aſſuredly. So you (O Noble men) whom God hath placed in the ſphere of greatneſs to enlighten men, what importeth it you if a perverſe and wayward people ſlander your reputation? Never ſhall you be great, if you know not the way of doing well and ſuffering ill. Do like the Sun and ſtars, ſhine and glitter in the firmament of ſanctity, and give detractious tongues leave in the mean time to lick up duſt.

The ſtudie of great ſouls ſhould be to doe good, and ſuffer wrong.

Auguſt. in Pſal. 93. Convitia fiunt ſtellis, cum dicitur illa ſtella Mercurii eſt, & illa Saturni: quid ille cum audiunt tanta convitia? nunquid moventur? nunquid non exercent curſus ſuos? Sic & homo qui in natione perverſa & tortuoſa habet verbum Dei, ſicut luminare eſt lucens in cœlo

Saint Cyprian, in the treatiſe which he compoſed of patience, mounteth yet a little higher, and after Tertullian pertinently declareth, that patience in injuries is a ray of the Divinity, and the true virtue of Nobility. What patience it is in God, ſo many Ages to have ſuffered Temples of Idols, erected to the contempt of his name? To make days and times ſtill to circumvolve, rivers to glide, winds to blow, autumn to put on a ſaffron robe, grapes to ripen, the elements to ſerve, and hold total nature in breath, for a thouſand and a thouſand ſacrifices to hell? To caſt flowers from heaven with a bounteous hand upon contumacious heads, who well deſerve the ſtroak of the thunder-bolt? What patience is it in the Saviour of the world to behold the Sun eclipſed all the ſtars to put on mourning weeds, the whole frame of this vniverſe to be troubled both above and beneath his Croſs, and he in the mean time to remain affixed in this chair of patience without motion?

Cypr de patientia. Eſt nobis cum Deo virtus communis, inde patientia incepit, inde claritas ejus & dignitas caput ſumit.

Patience the nature of God.

Admirable remedie of David. 2 Reg. 16.

This magnanimity in injuries, is the true ſtamp with which God for his imitation impreſſeth all Noble and great ſpirits. See (I pray you) what remedy King David uſed againſt the malevolent tongue of Semei: he fled from an unnatural ſon, and in flying fell into the violence of an enraged tongue, which darted againſt him ſhafts of fire, and transfixed him even to the heart. Behold his Captains ready to pull him down, like maſtives. But David replied, No: I will that he live, and what know you whether this be not now a powerful trial from the divine providence, who hath ſent this man for an exerciſe of virtue? My God, O that onely the odour of my Sacrifice might aſcend even to thy Altars! Saint Ambroſe admireth ſo much this greatneſs of courage, that he crieth out: O profound wiſdom! O bottomleſs patience! O what an invention it is to ſwallow one miſchief, and endure another! David made as it were a plaiſter of the reproaches of Semei, for the wound which his parricide ſon had fixed in his heart. If great men govern thus, and you ſo much love greatneſs, why do you not rather imitate them than play the ſilly mouſe, ſeeking to bite that which toucheth you, and drenching your ſelves every time in a glaſs of water, engulf your ſelves with ſadneſs in the leaſt petty injury?

Ambr. Apol. r. de David. c. 6. O altitudo prudentiæ! O altitudo patientiæ! O devorandæ contumeliæ grande inventum! Ecce verborum contumelia parricidii levavit erumnam.

The ſecond thing, is always to have an aſſured retreat in your heart, and in the ſweetneſs of a good conſcience. When a diſgrace happeneth to you, you are like an unfeathered bird, ſhamefac'd and dejected, for that you have believed with confidence that all theſe loans of fortune were your own. You are like a jack-daw trimmed up with the feathers of many birds; you have moſt imprudently thought in your heart that all theſe garniſhments were of your own body, and have neglected to make true and natural wings for your ſelf. When the birds come to peck at you, and take away their own feathers on all ſides, you then diſcover your ignominious nakedneſs; but had you preſerved the plumage which nature preſented to you, you had taken a ſtrong and confident flight even to the Temple of repoſe, not caring for theſe borrowed feathers, nor all theſe ſilly ſcriches of theſe fluttering and unruly birds. What a goodly theater is a good conſcience? And what a beautiful arcenal is it to have ſtill the arms of vertue in a readineſs? A good man goeth out of theſe extrinſecal favours and all this ſpecious train of fortune, as a fair iewel drawn out of a caſe. True it is, the caſe thereof may ſeem rich and well adorned with mean and ſlight embroderies, but it-ſelf is far more reſplendent than all that oſtent. Our eyes doe not penetrat ſufficiently through this trim of the worlds goodneſs. It is a golden veil, which may as well cover ſnow as a cole; as ſoon as this caſe is taken away, the radiance of this iewel is beheld in the dayes of brightneſs, refulgently ſhining with the rayes of a conſtant equality of ſpirit, of an invincible patience, and with an ineſtimable meekneſs of heart towards all the world. Happy night of diſgrace, thou haſt not darkened this fair ſtar, but rather made it appear ſuch as it was.

Retreat into the conſcience in affronts.

Greatneſs of an honeſt man.

One of the greateſt wits that ever was under heaven, the Emperour Antoninus, in the fourth book which he wrote of his own life, ſo much commendeth the retirement which a wiſe man maketh within himſelf, that he aſſureth us that in all the palaces, gardens, orchards, delicacies of all the Kings of the world, there is nothing ſo delightful as the houſe of a good conſcience. There it is where man is involved in his little ſhell, and retiring himſelf out of the ſalt of waters, liveth with the dew of heaven; there it is where the ſoul, which was wholly ſcattered in ſo overwhelming a multitude of affairs, foldeth it ſelf within it ſelf; there it is where it beginneth to ſuck in its own ſap; there it is, where it accommodateth, and prepareth its hive as a buſie bee, and endeavoureth to gather its hony; there it is, where it entereth into a new world, an intelligible world, a peaceable world, a world ſmiling with ſweet ſerenity of air and radiant lights, as S. Cyprian There it is, that we paſs into the ſociety of ſo many eminent and admirable perſonages, who have flouriſhed in the memory of all Ages, doing all the good they could, and receiving ill from the ungrateful with a pleaſing countenance, no more troubling themſeves then doth the Sun to behold the clouds which he hath drawn out of the mire mire and fens of the earth, to make him a scarff of. He knoweth he shall ever have the upper hand, and that they may take from him the aspect of mortal eyes, but cannot deprive him of his own light. It is in this Temple of repose, where we behold all the Saints as Eagles in a storm, surcharged with sufferings, but made invincible with the arms of patience. We behold one afflicted in the loss of his goods, another in the death of his kindred, another in his own body, another in his reputation, another in all, whom tribulation tormenteth in all his members. All that is mortal shrinketh under injuries; but all these arrows go no further than to the superficies of the skin, and touch not the constancy of a well-composed mind, which seeth them fall under his feet. O what greatness! O what felicity!

Temple of repose.

Certain ambitious Kings have sought the way to build an Heaven on earth, as Cosroes King of Persia, who caused a Palace to be built like a Heaven, which had the garnishment of a Sun, of a Moon and Stars artificially counterfeited: he also made below rain to pour down, the winds to blow, tempests to rage, he in this celestial throne beheld radiant beams over his head, and all this noise and clamour under his feet. That which this Monarch did for meer vanity, you may put in practice by a most solid verity. You may for the present with the exercise of prayer, the grace of Sacraments, and a generous contempt of all which is without you, raise a heavenly Temple of repose and tranquillity, where you shall not fear the bitings of calumny, nor the mutations of the world. A Pagan amidst the burning ruins of his Citie, unsheathed swords, bloud, and massacres, when the Temples fell upon their gods, and all was in confusion, could say: Behold me escaped from the ruins of my house, from the fires which shined on all sides, I have found my way through bloud and flames, I know not what is become of my daughters, perhaps there is somewhat worse put upon them than the sword or fire: behold me alone, despoiled of all my goods, and now become old, all hostilities raging round about me. Hap what hap may, I have whatsoever I at any time possessed: for I never esteemed any thing mine own but my self. Demand of rich men where their possessions are? Of the voluptuous, where their loves? Of the usurers, where their accounts? Of the ambitious, where their Court? All that is lost to them, because they thought it their own, because they presently sought it in the ashes of their Citie: As for my self, I will find all my possessions and all delights in the peace of my heart.

Brave words of Stilpho. Erepsi è ruinis domus & incendiis undique relucentibus, per flammas per sanguinem fugi, filiarum meum quis eorum habeat an pejor publico nescio, bona, & senior, & hostilia circa me omnia videns, habeo quicquid mei habui, quia nil quicquam meum, nisi me puto.

An Infidel to say and do all that, yet we after so many precepts of the eternal Wisdom, so many sermons, so many exhortations, so many supports, so many helps, so many examples, so many promises, so many recompences, so many obligations, and so many necessities, which force us thereunto, still to be curious, and not to be able to tolerate one silly disgrace! May we not well say we have great need of afflictions, which might a little instruct us to imitate the lives of Saints? For it is undoubted, we putrifie with long prosperities, as in a dead sea, which produceth nothing. It is necessary that God strike, and then, as Jonathan, we shall open our eyes, and suck in honey from the end of the rod which scourgeth us, when in the chastisement of a father, we shall find the consolation of true children.

The ninth OBSTACLE.

Carnal love.

IF at any time the powerful and health-giving hand of the Angel Raphael were necessary in the world, not to cure the eyes with the gall of a fish, but to tie and bind up in the desires, this loose and wanton spirit of carnality, which the Scripture calleth Asmodeus, it is principally in this Age that we have great need thereof, wherein dishonest and intemperate vice reigneth so prodigiously, that it seemeth not willing to make of the rest of this whole Universe but one element of fire. Asmodeus at this time triumpheth, and boasteth his Chariots covered with laurel to the weeping eyes of chastity: his horses curvett and bound without bridle, and with unspeakable insolence he daily transporteth an infinite number of souls to hell. If you desire to know the equipage of his detestable Chariot. Saint Bernard will tell it you, and you in his discourse may observe the causes which produce and cherish luxury, that you may hereafter apply profitable and convenient remedies.

Triumph of Asmodeus.

Bern. ser. 29. Cantica de curribus Pharaonis.

The Chariot of Asmodeus is a chariot of fire, from whence on all sides the sparkles of concupiscence flie to enflame unchaste hearts. This is not a common fire, but a fire enkindled with the flames of hell, the very image of that which devoureth damned souls, ceaselesly burning without diminution, and giving nourishment to its ardours with its proper damages. The first wheel of the Chariot (saith this great Saint) is called gourmandize; the second, titillation of the flesh; the third, excess in apparel; the fourth, idleness; which undoubtedly are the four vices that serve as principal instruments to this loathsom devil, and very well are termed the wheels of his Chariot. It is said the Chariot of War is moved with two arms, one of iron, and the other of silver; but this of Asmodeus rouleth about the arms of Ceres and Bacchus.

His wheels.

Gourmandize is attended by the wanton pleasures of the body: these pleasures then, which should be stifled with hayr-shirts and sack-cloth, are involved in linnen and scarlet; in stead of ready shaking off these sparkles, they are fomented and wasted in a lazie and idle life. Behold, how sin passeth along. To this chariot horses and Coach-man are necessary. S. Bernard appointeth onely two, whereof one is called prosperity, the other abundance. From this time forward Asmodeus becomes a much greater Lord, he augmenteth his train, harnessing also two other horses, wherof the one is called liberty, and the other impudence. Prosperity (always smiling) doth nothing but daily breath out, and evaporate new delights. Abundance supplieth him with all which is needful for the entertainment of this ravenous beast, although she cannot discharge all the expences thereof, so insatiable she is. The liberty of entertainments and conversations ceaseth not perpetually to blow the fire. If there be any shread of the veil of shamefac'dness as yet hanging about the brows, impudence teareth it away. All this equipage is lead along by a wicked Coach-man, which is called the forgetfulness of God. Then good leisure is had to run with full speed into the bottomless abyss.

His horses.

His Coachman. Sap. 4. Dei immemoratio animarum inquinatio.

Certain brave spirits of the world, pursuing as it were this way of Saint Bernard, to figure out a spiritual thing by corporal representations, have built the Palace of false love, (the plague, and frenzie of the soul) with admirable art. This Palace is all built on hopes: the stairs are of ice, made in such manner, that he who most ascendeth, most descendeth; the halls, chambers, and wardrobes, are all furnished and hanged with idleness, dreams, desires, and inconstancies; the seats and chayrs are made of false contentments. It hath affliction, torment, and fraud for engineers; uncertainty, fear, false opinion, and distrust for Guard. All this Court is composed of heartless, soft, and effeminate men, which are, and are not. His Chancellour, surmize; his Councellours, lying and deceit; the Steward of his household suspition; his viands apparences, his drink, forgetfulness, his Chamber-waiters, laughter and babble; his musick, sighs, despairs and revenges. Do you not behold a brave Prince? But without amuzing our selves with all these inventions of the brain, I say the greatest obstacle, which may be imagined, to seclude us from the happy access to life eternal, is to resign our heart as a prey into the power of this bruitish passion. The reason is most evident, because it is a true mark of reprobation, and we see by experience the souls which addict themselves to the sin of the flesh, not so much by frailties as by profession, become wholly carnal, stupid, beastly, and ordinarily pass out of this life through the gate of some notable disaster. I will here produce two or three causes of the undoubted condemnation of this sin, which seem to me very powerful to imprint in the heart of man a perpetual aversion, as it were with a branding-iron of fire. The first is, that it is injurious to the incarnation of the Son of God. Consider well what I say. This mystery of the incarnation wherewith God put on our weakness, took servile flesh, made himself our brother, transplanted our nature from a barren and cursed soil, into the delicious habitation of the Divinitie, is so great, so majestical, so marvellous, that it enforceth silence and admiration in the four quarters of the world, adoration in Thrones, trembling in the Seraphins, bowing in the Heavens, darkness, terrour, and amazement in all nature. Now this mystery being as it is, in all its height, greatness, latitude, inexplicable profundity, is personably betrayed and dishonoured by the sin of the flesh. Wherefore? Because, as S. Paul saith, other sins make their sallies out of the body, but this reposeth and subsisteth in the body, in the same specifical nature which God so puissantly and highly hath exalted, that he therein hath confined his whole power and greatness, not being able to create any thing greater than Man-God.

Sin of the flesh a mark of reprobation.

Injurious to the incarnation of the Word.

Quo altius carnem attolleret non habuit. Auguſt. de prædeſtinat. Sanct. c. 15.

Judge what a sacriledge it is to do a personal affront to the most immaculate and most virginal flesh of Jesus, sitting on the right hand of his Father Eternal, in the habiliments of glory; and yet carnal impurity would if it might, carry thither the effects of its malice. Before the incarnation of the Son of God, the sins of the flesh were simply sins, but after this ineffable union of the Divine nature with the humane, they became monsters. And you see likewise that the holy Fathers call some by this name, and by other termes full of execration.

Auguſt. de verbis Apoſt. Serm. 18. Parce in te Chriſto, cognoſce in te Chriſtum. ἀλογία.

The second reason which much augmenteth the enormity of this sacriledge is, that not onely it debaseth a nature which God hath exalted even to God, but also engulfeth it in an action sordid, blockish, bruitish, reputed so unworthy, that the Scripture disdaineth to name it. S. Epiphanius searching out the cause why the Holy Text maketh no mention of the Genealogie of Melchisedech, bringeth a reason from the Hebrews, which affirms this eminent man to be born of unchaste parents, as a rose from thorns, and that the Scripture useth not to name such men, in detestation of their sin. And verily you see the practice hereof. In Genesis Noe abstained from naming of Cham, though it were to curse him; it seemeth this name of a son marked out by these deportments of filthy sin, would defile the malediction it self, if it had been pronounced. For the same reason the Tribe of Simeon is not numbered, when question is made of blessing the Patriarchs in Deuteronomie, because from this Line, issued that wicked Prince who sinned with the Madianitesses. In the new Testament, in the Genealogie of the Son of God, Bathsheba is not called by her own name, but by her husbands. Magdalen in the time of her sin had no other name but of a sinner. It seemeth Isaiah hath truly prophesied of such voluptuous people: The race of the wicked shall be buried in perpetual oblivion.

Some other Interpreters subtilizing this passage of the 48. Psalm. Iniquitas calcanei circundabit me, say, luxury was called the sin of the heel, which was not improper: yet not for that reason which some in my opinion have without ground invented, affirming there is a vein which answereth to the heel, that serveth as a fiery match and an incentive to lust: but because this sin is low, and debased amongst other vices, as the heel under other parts of the body, and in respect it is tied to the heels, which is to say, that leaving high and elevated objects, onely worthy of the love of men, as are virtues and graces, it applieth it self to baseness and beggary, to a dung-hill covered with snow, to a beauty passing away like a dream, and which hath no other character of its merit, but the judgement of a mad man. So the pantables of Judith bewitched the eyes of Holofernes. This Ladie was beautiful as a star, and adorned as a Temple, yet notwithstanding this blind lover suffered himself to be inconsiderately surprized with the heels of a woman, to shew that lust is base in all its objects and pretences. Behold why some sage Hebrews have written, that certain infernal spirits remembring themselves of their ancient nobilitie, abhor to tempt men with the sin of luxury, as a thing unworthy their thoughts and industrie, giving this commission to some other more gross devils, and more terrestrial. Alas! what shall we say, if we go about to plant upon the forehead of a nature honoured with the hypostatical union of the Word, a sin which maketh even the devils themselves to be ashamed? May we not well say, if there be a mark in the world which plainly discovereth a reprobate soul, it is this, seeing it is so impudently opposed to the venerable mysterie of mans redemption?

Luxury the sin of the heel.

Judith 16.

Sandalia reſpuerunt oculos ejus.

The third reason, which maketh us believe this dishonest sin hath great alliance with hell, is, that it carrieth already the marks thereof in this world. What are they? Darkness, fire, stench, the worm, disorder. Behold the principal liveries of hell, all which are to be found in the sin of luxury. Darkness, because it maketh the soul dark, gross, clouded with black vapours of folly, which extinguish all the radiance of judgement, and very aptly it is said of those infamous fire-brands, who sollicited the chaste Susanna, that they turned away their eyes that they might not see the Sun. Saint Hierom hath very well relished this passage of Seneca: (a) Love and folly go hand in hand; it is a passion which never lodgeth at the sign of health; it turneth the spirit up-side down, it maketh man bruitish, unprofitable to all, and in the end to love it self.

Daniel. 13.

The fire of it.

(a) Amor inſaniæ proximus, ſedium & minime conveniens animo ſoſpiti vitium, turbat conſilia, omnibus inutilem, ipſi noviſſimum amori facit. Si digito attigero incendam ſylvam ſimul omnem.

Fire. All those unfortunate lovers speak of nothing else but of their flames, they are always in fire like the Salamander, they perpetually have the mount Ætna upon their shoulders: one of them saith, he will do nothing but touch a forrest with his finger, thereby to burn and wholly waste it. And verily it is a hell-fire, which hath gluttony for fewel, pride for flame, unclean words for sparkles, infamy for smoke, ordure for ashes, hell for center, as saith S. Hierom.

Noyſomneſs.

Noyſomneſs and dishonestly are inseparable companions of the sin of the flesh. The voluptuous cannot endure their like, and when passion hath cast its fire, they are troublesom and insupportable to themselves. Which well is witnessed by the many nasty and shameful diseases which never had been known in the world, if they had not entered by the gate of this infamous sensuality.

Its worm.

The worm. This sin is no sooner committed, but it hath its executioner attending thereon, it hath the worm of damnation, which diveth and pepetrateth even into the bottom of the heart of him that committeth it, and then especially when he findeth as yet some ſome reliques of a good conſcience remaining in his ſoul, remorſe to have loſt the incomparable treaſure of purity, perplexeth it perpetually. Concupiſcence of wicked love is full of anxiety, and ever in its ſatiety it finds repentance.

Appetitus fornicationis anxietas eſt, ſatietas pœnitentia.

Diſorder. You may as well tell the leaves of the trees, the ſands of the ſea, and the ſtars in the skie, as number the diſorders which have vomited and ſtill overflow upon the face of the earth, by means of the ſin of luxury. If there be poyſon to be diſſolved, love mingleth it. If ſwords be forged and fyled to transfix the ſides of innocent creatures, love hammereth and poliſheth them in his ſhop. If there be halters to be faſtened wherewith to ſtrangle, love weaveth and tyeth them. If there be precipices, love prepareth them. If there be maſſacres, love contrives them. If you go about to find little embryons even in the mothers womb, to be bereaved of the life which they have not as yet taſted, love is the authour and actour of theſe abominable counſels. All the miſchief and crimes which have in former Ages been perpetrated, love hath done them and daily invented them.

The diſorder of it.

It hath from all times puſhed and ſhouldred good order out of the world. It hath been the butt and aim of all the vengeances of God. It hath been ſtrucken with fire and brimſtone from Heaven, ſwallowed in the entrails of the earth, drenched in the waters of a general deluge. Yet it eſcapeth, yet it perpetually armeth, yet it walloweth it ſelf in bloud and ſlaughter, yet it holdeth the ſword of juſtice ever perpendicular over the head, and in concluſion it is eſteemed but as a ſport. Is not all this of power ſufficient to make it be believed, that this filthy vice is an infallible mark of reprobation? Flie (O Noblemen) this fleſhly peſtilence of mankind, and never ſuffer it to exerciſe its tyranny over hearts conſecrated by the precious bloud of the Lamb. All conſiſteth in flying far from the occaſions thereof. If you love danger, you ſhall periſh therein. If you had the beſt intentions which did ever bud in the hearts of Saints, yet if you ſeek out occaſions of doing ill, they become crooked and diſtracted. Nature being, as now it is, corrupted, the ignorance of vice better ſerves our turn, than all the precepts of virtue. Our affections attend on our knowledge, the abſence of objects maketh us to forget all our moſt enflamed deſires. To live in luſt and idleneſs, to have our eyes always in purſuit, unchaſte books in our hands, to hear comedies and impure ſtage-plays, to have gluttonous diſcourſe in our mouth, to frequent buffons and looſe livers, to converſe familiarly with women, theſe are not the inſtruments of chaſtity: it is rather to put oyl into the flame, and then to complain of much heat.

Remedies.

Petrarch in his books againſt vanity, giveth remedy to the wounds, which ſeem to have been inflicted in the time of his loves. Love creepeth into idleneſs; handle the matter ſo, that he may always find you buſied. Love is pleaſed with curioſitie of attire, give him hayr-cloth. He is entertained with feaſts, ſubdue him with auſterity. He will fall upon ſome object, ſcatter and confound him. He laboureth to find out a looſe and unbridled ſpirit, hold yours extended upon ſome good affair. He requireth liberty, private places, night, darkneſs, let him have witneſſes, and enlighten him on every ſide. He will be governed by fantaſie, keep him dutiful, both by admonitions and menaces. S. Cyprian found nothing more powerful to conquer a temptation of diſhoneſt wantonneſs, than to turn the other ſide of the medal; and as this ſin hath two faces, ſo not to ſtay upon that which looketh amiable and attractive to deceive us, but to behold that which under a black veil ſheweth it ſelf to be penſive, ſad, ſhamefac'd, deſperate and full of confuſion. The great Picus Mirandula ſaid, the moſt part of men yielded to temptation, becauſe they never taſted the ſweetneſs of glory, which is drawn from the victory over a ſin. Above all, it is behoveful to uſe the adviſe of a wiſe Arabian, who repreſented to himſelf perpetually over his head, an eye which enlightened him, an ear which heard him, a hand which meaſured out all his deportments and demeanours. The exerciſe of the preſence of God, joyned with prayer, frequentation of Sacraments, often invocation of the Mother of purity, and the Angels, Guardians of chaſtity, daily blunt a thouſand and a thouſand arrows ſhot against the hearts of brave and undaunted Chriſtian Champions. Adde hereunto, that it is good to live in a ceaſeleſs diſtruſt of ones ſelf, which is the mother of ſafety: that you may not fall into the fire, it is good to avoid the ſmoke, not to truſt ones ſelf too much to thoſe petty dalliances, which under pretext of innocency, ſteal in with the more liberty. Mother of pearls produce ſometimes windy bunches for true and native pearls; and the will, through complacence of paſſion ill digeſted, in ſtead of good love, bringeth forth ſilly abortions of amities, which are nothing but flaſhes and wild fantaſies, yet ſuch as may notwithſtanding diſpoſe an emptie ſoul to ſome ſiniſter affections.

Petrarch. l. 1 2. c. 22. de remediis. Occupatio & labor & inculti habitus, & vultus aſperior, & inceſſus, inque unum aliquid jugis intentio; aak æc teſtis charus & verendus, frequens admonitio, dulces minæ & ſi quando res exigat, aſperæ.

Cyprian de bono pudor. Ante oculos obverſetur deformis atque abjectus peccati pudor, nihil corpori liceat, ubi vitandum eſt corporis vitium. Cogite turquam honeſtum ſit vicciſſe dedecus, quam inhoneſtum vitium eſſe à decore.

The tenth OBSTACLE.

Exceſs in diet and apparel.

THE world was as yet in her cradle, & man was no more than born, when God making a Palace of juſtice, of terreſtrial Paradiſe, pronounced againſt him the ſentence of labour and pain, and afterward wrote it, as with his finger in the ſweat of his brow: Thou ſhalt eat thy bread with the ſweat of thy brow. Noblemen perpetually appeal from this ſentence as if they were not men; it ſeemeth labour is not for them. Let nature hold to the chain and labour thoſe groſſer bodies, which are moulded of the clay of Adam, they have forſooth bodies compoſed of I know not what kind of ſtarrie matter, which never muſt ſweat, nor take pains, but in a dance. What a folly it is? Ought not he to be diſſolved into ſweat, ſince he is to be reduced into aſhes? He cannot free himſelf from the ſentence of death, and why ſhall he decline pains-taking, ſeeing it proceeded from one and the ſame mouth in the ſame time, and upon one and the ſame ſubject? But behold the reaſon, which is, that to ſatisfie the ſentence of labour, ſureties are found: the houſes of rich men are filled with officers and ſervants, who take pains in their fields, prune their vines, carry corn to the mil, who go even into the ocean to fiſh for habits and attires for them, and moſt times live within four fingers of death, to give them means to flow in delicacies. Onely death it is, that taketh no ſuretie. For which cauſe man dieth in his own perſon, and laboureth by deputie. If death would a little give way, no Great man would die but by Attorney. Out alas! O the juſtice of God, how equally doſt thou ſtill hold the ballance! They that would not here labour as men, thou makeſt them take pain like infernal ſpirits, thou diſſolveſt the ſweat of poor payſants in the conſolation of their ſouls, and thou ſeaſoneſt the delights of rich men with care, melancholy, dolour, jealouſie, envy, anxiety, terrours, and remorſe, which are able to make them ſweat bloud.

Terreſtrial Paradiſe the chamber of juſtice.

Gen. 3. 19. In ſudore vultus tui veſceris pane.

Noblemen appeal from the ſentence of labour.

Were there no other proof, this manifeſtly enough declareth to us how odious this curioſitie of Great men is to the Divine Majeſty, and how puniſhable, ſince its own delights are change into chaſtiſements. Yet notwithſtanding, I will produce ſome reaſons, that the unworthineſs of this wicked exceſs may punctually be touched with the finger, which now adays overfloweth the whole face of the earth.

Remedies and reaſons againſt exceſs.

First I ſay, it is extreamly unreaſonable to be deſirous to live in the world with reaſon againſt all reaſon; to endeavour to put a reaſonable creature into a condition of life, where it of neceſſity muſt bely the law of God, and its proper nature. O Noble-men, God would that you enter into the world like other men, as into a vale of tears, and you will arrive there as in a garden of delicacies. He would that you come thither, as to the mynes to dig; and you go thither as to a dicing-houſe to play; he would that you make paſſage into a ſervile fleſh to obey, and you will command. Is not this a ſin againſt nature? To come into the world, is to come upon a croſs; to be man, is to ſtretch out the hands and feet to be crucified. The firſt bed that an infant maketh coming from his mothers womb, is on the croſs. He is as ſoon in a croſs, as in nature, and ſuffereth this puniſhment for no other cauſe, but for that he is born a man.

The purple chamber of Emperours. Anna Comnena lib. 6. Luitprand. de rebus Europ. Cyprian de patient. Procellas mundi quas ingreditur, ſtatim ſuo ploratu & gemitu rudis anima teſtatur.

The Emperours of Conſtantinople had in their Palace a ſecret chamber, which they called the Purple, in which the Empreſſes for a ceremonious formality were brought to bed and delivered, thinking by this means to aboliſh the acerbities which are as it were affixed to our condition. But theſe petty Porphyrogenites (ſo theſe children of Emperours were called, becauſe they were born in ſcarlet) were notwithſtanding born with a croſs, and ſaluted life as others with tears and groans. The children of Kings come al into the world through this gate of miſeries, they are born, as with a diadem on their fore-heads, and yet fail not to be natures little priſoners. It is accounted a goodly thing to give them guilded cradles, and ſilken ſwathing-bands. This is to adorn their chains, but not to break them; they are as well captive in them, as heretofore the priſoners in India, who rotted in poverty and calamitie, even in golden fetters. It is a decree of Almighty God (O Great-ones) that you muſt be born with the croſs on your back, and you will cancel it; if this yet might be practiſed, with ſome reaſonable evaſion and mediocrity, it would ſeem more tolerable: but now adays this exceſs is ſo enraged, that it will plant the tropheys of pride and voluptuouſneſs upon the calamities of mankind. What is not done upon tables? What is not done in apparel? Men cloath as if they were always to live, and eat as if they ſhould every day die. We prepare an Altar to a falſe Deitie, which at this day with unſpeakable violence ſwayeth in the world. It is a bruitiſh god (if you deſire to know him) for never had he an ounce of of brain: A blind god, who hath no eyes to behold the miſeries of the earth: A deaf god, who hath no ears to hear the complaints of the afflicted: A truantly god, who hath no hands to take pains: An immoveable god, who hath no feet to travel on: An effeminate god, who hath no heart to undertake any good, nor courage to ſuffer ills A gluttonous god, who gourmandizeth all: An unclean god, who polluteth all. This falſe god, according to the Apoſtle, is the belly. His temple (ſaith Tertullian) is the lungs; his Altar the paunch; his Prieſt the Cook; his holy Ghoſt the ſmoke of meats; his grace the ſauces; his propheſie, that which may not civilly be ſpoken. As he in his perſon is enormous, ſo is he no leſs prodigious in his tyranny. It is a wonder to ſee how he hath his officers in every place. For him war is waged againſt the air, and clouds; birds are diſneſtled from the Kingdom which nature hath allowed them: For him the face of the earth is turned into a ſhambles: For him ſeas are ſounded; depths are plummeted, ſhip-wracking ſtorms and direful tempeſts are ferried over. Man willingly would penetrate heaven, and delve even to hell to find out new ſacrifices for this fleſhly and carnal god, and himſelf being alive, he is made the ſepulchre of ſo many maſſacres, that it is a miracle how one man can live, who daily burieth ſo many dead creatures in his entrails. All this hurly-burly which emptieth the air, earth, and ſeas, is made for a ſtomach four fingers broad, for which a little bread and water would ſuffice in neceſſity, and in ſuperfluity the whole world is too little to ſatisfie. We know not what courſe to take to find out new curioſities for the palate. We ſup up oyſters alive, we ſeek out muſhromes; we will know what taſt hath the fleſh of tortoyſes and ſnails. Theſe poor little creatures had good cauſe to believe that their meanneſs would enfranchize them: but ſottiſh and ſordid gluttony draweth a tribute from all; and I think their taſt will ſhortly be taken with ſerpents and ravens.

Tyranny of the belly.

Philip. 2. Quorum Deus venter eſt, & gloria in confuſione ipſorum Tertul. adverſ. Pſych. Deus tibi venter eſt, & pulmo templum, & aqualiculus altare, & ſacerdos coquus, & ſpiritus ſanctus nidor, & condimenta charismata, & rubius prophetia vetus eſt.

But let us not onely accuſe the belly; the eyes devour more than it. They are delighted to behold fiſhes to ſwim in a ſea of ſugar, to ſee forreſts, nets, huntings, birds, wild beaſts, houſes, caſtles, fields, arms of ſugar; had licourouſneſs of taſt ſo much power as it hath little brain, it would make a world of ſugar, and then would diſſolve it, to be always ready to form new at his pleaſure. The ears will hold their part in this conſort, and therefore they muſt be tickled with the moſt exquiſite muſick both of voice and all ſorts of inſtrumenes, which ſerve as wings and chariots to immodeſtie. Then come the dances of the Corybants, the friſks, capers, ballets, courtings, liberties, impudencies, and all ſorts of voluptuous pleaſures, which make the body diſſolve into all corruption. With what conſcience can a Chriſtian expect Paradiſe, living in this manner? Doth he think hell hath no flames but for the rich glutton mentioned in the Goſpel; and that he purſuing the ſame ways, ſhall be freed from the like puniſhments? Hell caſteth up ſuch people who here waſte their life in delicacies, that they may no otherwiſe live than in the immortality of fire, of the worm of conſcience and darkneſs.

Ducunt in bonis dies ſuos, & in puncto ad inferna deſcendunt. Job 21. 13.

As concerning exceſs of apparel one cannot ſay too much, ſo great is this ſuperfluity, and ever ſhall the diſcourſe be unprofitable, the miſchief being ſo confirmed and uncapable of remedy. Therein it is that women diſplay all the vanity of their ſex, all the induſtry of their ſpirit, (being curious and inventive enough in their own intereſts) and all the preſumption of their nature, which is but too ambitious, and, as ſaith Tertullian, there it is where they bear all the glory of their ſex. I ſpeak not of thoſe who attire themſelves modeſtly, dutifully, and as it were neceſſarily for comely ornament; I ſpeak of thoſe miſerable ſacrifices of vanity, who ſtudie nothing elſe but to deck themſelves up beyond their condition, eſtate, and means, oftentimes with an ill intention, many times with the ſpoils of the poor. Masks of hypocriſie, who find no other employment in this life, but to counterfeit; no other deſire, but to ſeem what they are not. For verily, if you ſhould ſee all their jewels and trinkets in one heap, you would ſay it were the pillage of a citie. It is an admirable thing, that one little carkaſe ſhould drag ſo great a train along with it. They go adorned (ſaith the Scripture) as Temples, and certainly they are very like thoſe Temples of Ægypt, which hid a Cat or Rat under golden Pavilions. Is not this a ſin inexcuſable before God, to make all the elements take pains to cover a miſerable nakedneſs, which is nothing elſe but a meer ſcarre of ſin? Is not this a great illuſion to bolſter out a dung-hill (which perhaps we muſt carry to morrow to a grave) as if it were to be erected upon Altars? Oh, miſerable creatures, what have the worms to do, which ſhall gnaw your bodies, bodies, if your hair be of three or four pariſhes, your eye-brows pulled with little pincers, your eyes diſguiſed, your cheeks put in a vermillion tincture, your ſtench drowned in muskie odours, your garments plaited, bumbaſted, looſe hanged, ſurcharged with pearls, precious ſtones and chains, to ſerve as ſnares to catch ſome foundered lovers? It is not the ſolid beauty of objects which allureth you, but a meer opinion: becauſe ſuch an one hath it, you therefore muſt needs have the like. If you were perſwaded that the fat or dung of a Crocodile were fit to whiten the skin, you then would go even to Nilus for it. And if one ſhould tell you that two flint ſtones of the Moluccaes would become your ears, and that already ſuch and ſuch did wear them, you would rather hazard the killing of your own body, than deprive your ſelf of them.

Totam circumferunt in iſtis mulieritatem.

Indignity of exceſs in apparel.

Sottiſh jealouſie of exceſs.

You ſee the unreaſonable proceeding of this ſuperfluity? But I ſay much more: It is cruel and injurious to God and his Church. What rocky heart would not be cleft, and icy eye diſſolved into tears, if it did bend it ſelf to behold the exorbitancy of theſe wicked delights? To ſay that three parts of Chriſtendom lived perpetually on gall and tears, were drenched in a forſaken, miſerable, and neceſſitous life, were covered with bloud and oppreſſions, whilſt others glutted themſelves in ſuperfluity of palate-pleaſing curioſities, even almoſt to burſting, never deigning ſo much as to ſet a foot on the ground, making their excrementitious ſpittings to ſwim in gold, beholding themſelves in the vain-glorious oſtent of their bravery, always wantonizing, ſtill ſportively dallying. Woe to the rich men of Sion, who put their truſt and confidence in the mountain of Samaria. Woe to the Great-ones, who make boaſt in the houſe of Iſrael, who drink delicate wine in their cellars, and live involved in the moſt exquiſite perfumes, without ever caring for the affliction of the poor.

Riot cruel, and injurious to God and his Church.

Amos 6. Væ qui opulenti eſtis in Sion, & confidit is in monte Samariæ: Optimates, capita populorum, ingredientes pompaticè domum Iſrael. Bibentes vinum in phialis, & optimo unguento delibuti, & nihil patiebantur ſuper contritione Joſeph.

I know the belly hath no ears, but I know not what mouth it may have to defend it ſelf at the judgement of Almighty God, when the hunger of ſo many needy penurious wretches, conſumed with want before your gate, ſhall accuſe you at the Tribunal of this formidable Judge. I know theſe Courtiers want not prattle enough, but I cannot imagine what they can anſwer before the Judgement of God, if the Angels ſhould come to drain theſe inordinate habits to make bloud diſtil, & to ſpeak thoſe affrighting words of the Prophet Jeremie: Behold the bloud and life of poor men, which I have found in the folds of thy garment. Judge what Chriſtianity this is, and what hope you may have of future life, living in theſe delicacies, ſtrucken with the thunders of ſo many maledictions. Ah, if you adored a God crowned with roſes or pearls, it would be a matter nothing ſtrange; but to proſtrate ones ſelf daily before the * Crucifix charged with nails and thorns, you living in ſuch exceſs and ſuperfluity in fleſh, diſſolved in ſoftneſs, how can that but be cruel? The Chriſtians of the Primitive Church were ſcrupulous to bear coronets of flowers on their heads, according to the cuſtom of feaſts, remembring their Maſter had carried thorns; and Clemens Alexandrinus judgeth, that to ſeek out ſuch effeminacy is a meer mommery, and a manifeſt mockery of the venerable paſſion of the Son of God. With what eyes can you behold the Crucifix covered with bloud and wounds, holding it honourable to bear flowers, rubies, and diamonds, not for once, but to drench all your life, if it were poſſible, in the nice delicacies of the fleſh? How can one excuſe ſuch a manner of proceeding? By what mark would you be known for Chriſtians in the other world? The livery of Chriſtians is patience, and very well thoſe brave courages, which breed us to the Church by their bloud, may bear for their arms, a hand cleaving mountains with fire and vineger, crowned with this deviſe: No paſſage is ſhut up from virtue. Verily theſe valorous Champions ſparkling with the lightening rays of charity, lifted up their Chriſtian palms in the middeſt of hazards, and forced Heaven with a pious violence. Men were ſeen who obtained as many Martyrdoms, as they endured torments, and who ſuffered more tortures than they had members; their bodies upon the wheels armed with ſharp ſciſſers, under iron hooks, under burning pincers, flying in pieces were many times again gathered up by the faithful Chriſtians, and even then put into tombs, themſelves ſurviving their own funerals. In this ſtate they climbed upon the ſharp rocks of this painful way of heaven, carrying thither more wounds than members.

What anſwer you to this, you children of Saints? Your fore-fathers to purchaſe Paradiſe, have wandered in wilderneſſes, ſtrayed up and down mountains and caverns of the earth, clothed with goats-skins and camels hair, and you now adays have no heart to any thing, but to the vain-glorious humour of bravery. Tell me not, that in caſe of perſecution you will be moſt faithful to God: I will anſwer that which Tertullian ſaid: I fear this neck ſnared with wreaths and ropes of pearl and emeralds: I fear the ſword of perſecution can find no place there. Children of Saints, your Grand-fathers have heretofore paſſed ſo many lents, lying upon hard boards, eating roots, living in infinite frugality, and now forſooth the leaſt faſt ſtriketh you down. Of what complain you? Is it for that you ſtill ſwim not in ſugar, and therefore the Church is too hard to be ſerved? A thouſand diſpenſations muſt be procured under falſe colours and ſurreptions. You cannot faſt, you cannot do that which you never had a will to do. What a ſhame is it (you children of Saints) your fathers and mothers to gain Paradiſe, although they lived in riches as you perhaps do, put them under their feet to ſerve as ladder-ſteps to heaven, and you now adays place them over your heads, to ſink your ſelves even into the abyſs. How would you then that one ſhould know you in the other world? You ought to be aſhamed of the name which you bear, of your Baptiſm, of your profeſſion, you thereunto affording ſo little correſpondence. God hath made you for another end, and far otherwiſe; you no longer retain any mark, whereby you may be known.

What are you to do? I. To believe there is no Paradiſe for thoſe that will live in pleaſures, capital enemies of the Croſs of the Son of God.

II. If your birth have ranked you in an eminent ſtate, live therein, and entertain it, rather for a certain neceſſity of beſeeming comlineſs, than for the love of concupiſcence. Live therein as the bee on honey, well obſerving your wings: be not entangled therewith, which is very hard to do.

III. Make not unneceſſary expences above your means. What a ſhame it is daily to behold frogs deſirous to puff themſelves up like buls, even till they burſt? No man can keep a mediocrity: man will extend his wings beyond his neſt; his retinue, table, apparel, preſents, all is exceſs, what one poureth forth on one ſide, muſt be ſpared on the other. To entertain great profuſeneſs, great avarice is neceſſarily expedient, which cannot be maintained but by wretchedneſs, by rapines, by injuſtice, by oppreſſions, which abſolutely ſhut up the gate of ſalvation.

IV. Bear ever about you in ſecret ſome mark of mortification of Jeſus Chriſt, as the Apoſtle appointeth: ſuffering ſome incommodity in clothing, drinking, eating, ſleeping, and the like; diſdain not to exerciſe your ſelves in acts of humility, and love above all the viſits and conſolation of the poor afflicted. This is it will ſave you.

The eleventh OBSTACLE.

Envy.

WE likewise find in an excellent little book, entituled the Apothegms of the Hebrews and Arabians, a saying of those ancient Doctours of the law, which with much moderation must be understood: To wit, that three sorts of people shall never undergoe the judgement of God, nor pass through the flames of purgation. First, persons greatly necessitous: Secondly, those who are in publike office: Thirdly the ill married.

Persons necessitous (saith this Author) because poverty and misery are most ardent fires which purge and cleanse the rust of iniquity: Those who are in publicke office; for what need have they of judgement, since the whole world judgeth them? Those that are ill married, because a bad wife is a portative purgatorie. These words are spoken at random with too much extent and liberty. For it is most undoubted, that if these three kind of people live in integritie and make profit of their burdens, it will be a wholsom means for them to escape the rigour of Gods judgement; but absolutely to exempt them from the iurisdiction of this soveraign justice, is to speak over rashly. They have much better hitt the mark, who said, that two sorts of men anticipated their hell in this world; the lovers, and the envious. For in effects there is a hell of love, and a hell of envy. The hell of love is for those who inordinately, excessively, and with full fruition of creatures doe love to the prejudice of the Creatour. Out Alas! who can recount the shiverings, the feavers, the accesses of fire and ice, the gnawing worms, the biting vultures of these unfortunate ones, who having shaken off the yoke of soveraign beautie, have made themselves slaves of a putrified body, the spoil whereof the elements shall quickly share? It seemeth the Prophet Esay was desirous to describe their miseries in these termes: Their souls shall be as a land of pitch and brimstone, perpetually boyling in their own passions, and ever smoking with black vapours of a brutish ignorance. Yet notwithstanding this hell of love amongst so many rigors hath sometimes certain sparkles of hope, a sowr-sweet of pleasures, which kindle themselves like flying fires, and are wasted even in their birth; bubbles of water which are blown up and cracked in a moment; but the hell of envy is an admirable hell, for it is a voluntary hell, where nothing pleaseth, and each thing tormenteth: a hell which conteineth fire in it, and affordeth no light; a hell, which always hath the worm present, and never the remedy; a hell which surprizeth by the eies, and diveth even into the heart; a hell which incessantly devoureth and never consumeth; which hath mischiefs without hopes, toyls void of repose, and torments without mercy; which is as the common fever of all the gall of this universe, which exerciseth rage and fury, which hath the wanness of death without dying, and the cares of a disastrous life without life. To divert the hearts of men from it I can propose but two reasons, the first shall discover the malignity, and the other the calamity thereof.

Erit terra eorum in picem ardentem, nocte & die non extinguetur, in sempiternum ascendet fumus ejus.

It is true that all vices are steeped in the venom of malice, which should be a powerful motive for those to fly them who naturally love goodness: but envy hath I know not what kind of particular influence, which maketh it infinitely odious and execrable. S. Gregory Thaumaturgus saith it is a wasp of Satan, which stingeth men as the gad-flie doth oxen. S. Basil of Seleucia calleth it the mother of murders, S. Cyprian the moth of souls, and S. Gregory Nyssen a disease of nature, a poysoned gall, the root of vices, the mother of death, and a voluntary Phthisical consumption. All the ancient Fathers breath out fire & flames when they discourse of it, and indeed never can they speak enough of it. Besides their authority which is of great value, reason herein is very potent. For we must needs affirm, that by how much the more a vice participateth of the nature of Divels, who are as it were the patrons of it, by so much the more it is a vice, and envy is of the same condition, for it is the sin by singularity of denomination called the sin of the Divel. As in heaven the first was the sin of pride, so the first on earth was that of envy, committed by the spirit of impurity; and S. Augustine excellently saith, envy is a vice meerly diabolical, a sin which defileth the Divels, and irrecoverably damneth them. It shall not be said to Satan in the sentence of his damnation, that he hath polluted the beds of men by his adulteries, that he hath taken the goods of other men by his rapines, that he hath seized on demains and possessions, driving away the lawful owners, but that he hath envied the felicity of man. The same Authour saith on the Epistle to the Galatians, that this vice hath the property to pour into the heart of men the poyson of the enemie. Yea so it is, that particularly the infernal serpent, when he imprinteth the sin of envy in the heart of man, doth turmoyl his very bowels, and extreamly striveth as it were to vomit the blackest pestilence which hell conteineth.

Sap. 2. invidiâ diaboli mors introivit in orbem terrarum. Aug. l. 2. de doct. Christianâ.

Dicourse even with your self whether the envious be not tainted with a special malignity, since that beyond all other sinners they transcendently suck in the breath of the serpent. This black malice more easily discovereth it-self in this than in all the other mortal sins, which are verily great exorbitancies of nature, but they seem to have some pretext, which mollifieth the evill. The theif robbeth for his profit, the carnal man seeketh out his unlawfull lusts to extinguish the fire of his passion, the covetous man saith he is upon good husbandry, the ambitious flattereth himself with the thirst of honour, which hath heretofore born sway upon Altars, and so of other sins, their malice hath allways some heat of passion of apparence of good to excuse them. But the envious what can he propose but a cold malignity, a black cruelty, a will determinately ill without sembleance of good? Yea you shall find many that are in infinit abundanceas, dogs couched on hay, who will not eat thereof, for it is not their custome, nor are they willing other creatures for whom God hath ordained it, should come neer it. Many there are as Tantalus ever in the middest of fountains, yet drink not, and perpetually beholding him with a jealous eye that would tast therof.

The fable of the two envious men so celebrated, is not feigned; we too much approve it in our manners. For it being permitted them to choose what each would aske, on this condition, that his request being allowed him, his companions share be doubled; the first, who was extreamly covetous, had all his desires fixed in the earnest demand of gold and silver, but discoursing with himself that by asking, he should doe a pleasure to another, this onely consideration stayed him, and never would he afterward open his mouth to make such a request; the other made choise to loose one of his own eyes, that his companion might have it doubled, and be deprived of both.

How many are there at this day in the world, who embarked with their enemies in the same vessel, care not to perish, so that they dying may glut their eyes with the death of those whom they hate: A most strange malignity to forget the preservation of ones own person, to which we are by nature streightly obliged, to ruin another. The eyes of Gorgons, the hissing of serpents, the aspect of basilisks, are nothing in comparison of an enraged Courtier, tier, when he beholdeth him to be carried on the wings of favour whom he would gladly see utterly confounded without recovery. Doe we not behold the eyes of a dog, when the fortune of another is envied, and the heart of a stag, when question is made of the works of courage? Where are not men to be seen, who devour one another alive with mischievous aspects, and carry even on their foreheads, the gall of their envenomed hearts? Where are not such malign spirits to be fonnd, who play at fast and loose, thrusting him in an instant down to the lowest part of the wheel who was at the top. At the Court all things most commonly fall short but malice and envy. It is verily the extremity of misery, when great ones doe with an open ear too much grace the designs of the envious, making themselves as it were instruments of a furious panther, for the ruin of the innocent. If we ought to stop our ears with wax among the songs of Syrens, here we have need to have them all of diamond. What can the envious man expect from this diabolical malice, but the reward of Cain, in the separation from the sight of God and perpetual affrightments? O Cain, jealous Cain, Thou art amazed that God regardeth not thy sacrifice, & seest not thou art divided and severed within thy self, I shall have somewhat to doe with thy wicked sacrifice. It is to much purpose to turn thy hand to an act of religion, and thy heart to envy. This which thou doest is not to appease God, but to provoke him. It is to present him with sacrifice in the one hand, and a ponyard in the other, said S. Bernard.

Bern. ser. 24. in Cant. Quid miraris, ô Cain, si non respicit ad te qui ita divisus es in te? si manum devotioni, quid animum das livori? non conciliat Deum tibi discors tecum, non placat, sed peccat, & si necdum fratricida, jam tamen fratricida tenetur.

And truly to touch the second reason, although the diveliſh malice of this vice cannot gain conquest over hearts to divert them, yet ought the calamity it draweth along with it, to beget in our souls a perpetual horrour thereof. This sin is no sooner born but it hath its torments and executioners attending. All that which may truly be called miserable commeth to us from envy, and the hatred of our neighbour. First it bereaveth us of an infinit number of blessings which we might enjoy by the means of charity. Nothing is so rich as the love of God; all beauties, all riches, all possessions are tributary thereunto, Yea, love in loving, I know not by what kind of powerful alchymy, draweth all to it-self, changeth all into it-self, and maketh the whole world its own. This is the discourse which S. Augustin made of it. O prodigie! Will you know an effectual means how to become in a short time rich, wise, fortunat, and holy? You have nothing to doe but to love. Virginity pleaseth you, and have you it not? Love it in your brother and sister to whom God hath granted it, it is yours. This man hath more knowledge than you, and you perhaps more patience than he; love his knowledge, and be your patience, and you both shall be contented. Another is more watchfull than you, and you fast better than he; love his watchfulness, and let him love your fasting, and then behold you shall become watchfull, and abstinent. That which I say of virginity, patience, knowlege, industry, and abstinence is also to be understood of all other blessings, which we by loving make our own. Such was the exercise of David, who tasted the good of another as peculiar to himself: he sanctified himself in all Saints, he instructed himself in all the Sages; he enriched himself in all the rich, he participated with all the just. Behold you not here the admirable Philosophy of love?

Aug. l. quinquag. homiliarum homil. 15. tom. 10. Congaude illi cui Deus gratiam aliquam donavit, tua est. Habet ille forte virginitatem, ama illam, tua est. Tu habes forte majorem patientiam, dilige te, & tua est: ille potest satis vigilare, si non invides, tuum est studium ejus. Tu forte potes amplius jejunare amet te, suum est jejunium, quia tu per charitatem in illo es, & ipse in te est. Particeps sum omnium timentium te. Psal. 118. 63. Ex alienis bonis quæ si diligeretis vestra faceretis bona; non diligendo, vestra facitis mala. Grego. in pastoral.

This being true, as it is most evident, consider the evils and disasters which proceed from envy: So many blessings, as the Sun dayly discovereth to you in so infinit numbers of creatures, may by loving be yours, and in not loving every happiness, each prosperity of your neighbour is an iron lance in your side, a thorn in your heart, and a nayl in your eye. Have we so few misfortuns in the world, that we must seek them in the prosperity of others? The earth vomiteth up miseries, which dayly draw tears from our eyes, sighs from our hearts, and compassion for our most obdurate souls: yet not content therewith, insteed of searching out some lenitive for our wounds in union and charity, we envy our neighbour, thereby bereaving our selves of all comforts, and deep drenching us in all the miseries of the world. For what evil is comparable to that of envy; to be perpetually like a wretched owle, not able to endure the day-light of anothers prosperity; to be as a ravenous vultur, who flyeth from sweet savours and searcheth out carion, to imitate the fly which delighteth among wounds, and ulcers? What a life is it to run up and down taxing the imperfections of your brethren, and never to open an eye to the splendour of their vertue? What a life is it to make the evil of another, your good; to have his prosperity your executioner, his glory your punishment, ever to bear an ill disposition in your breast; to cary talons, nayls, and sharp combs of iron in your own proper entrailes, and never to end your sin, to make thereby your torments immortal? This is it which the eloquent S. Cyprian spake in these terms. Although through envy some profit or parcel of good might be drawn from the subject envied, by extenuating the honour or good of a neighbour, with some benefit applicable to ones self, yet God oftentimes permitteth, that by the means of envy, the glory of those who are so maligned, is made more illustrious. So the brothers of Ioseph in being desirous to make him a slave, gave him opportunity to become a Lord over all Ægypt. So the envy of Saul, when he least thought of it, set the crown on Davids head, and affording him matter of affliction, gave him occasion of triumph. So Maximian the Tyrant through the jealousie of the honours attributed to Constantine, contributed all that which a desperate envy could invent, and a great vertue surmount. He first made him Generall of an army which he sent against the Sarmatians (a people extreamly furious) supposing he there should loose his life. The yong Prince went thither, and returned victorious, leading along with him the Barbarian King enchained. It is added hereunto, that this direful Prince excited by a most ardent frenzy in his return from this battaile, engaged him in a perilous encounter with a Lyon, which he purposely had caused to be let loose upon him: But Constantine, victorious over Lyons as well as men, slew this fell beast with his own hands, and impressed an incomparable opinion in the minds of his souldiers, which easily gave him passage to the throne, by the same degrees which were prepared for his ruin. We must have an Eurisitheus to make up a Hercules. Envy many times layeth the first stone of the Temple of vertue, she beareth pusillanimity on her forehead, and the condemnation of her impotency in heart, to serve as a trophey of courage and a badge of valour.

Qualis est animo tinea in malum proprium bona convertere aliena illustrium prosperitate torqueri, aliorum gloriam pœnam suam facere, & velut quosdam pectori suo carnifices admovere, qui se intestinis cruciatibus, lacerent, & secreta cordis malevolentiæ anguis pulsent? Cypri. de zelo, & livore.

What course doe you then think to take for conclusion, both you who envy, and you who are maligned. If envy be a diabolical vice and a hell of calamity, why doe you not assume to you the bowels of a charity truly Christian, to love the guifts of God himself in your enemies? First accustom your selves to be contented with your estate, and that condition of life which God hath allotted you. For from thence springeth the envy whereby each one thinketh the field of his neighbour more fertile than his own, each one beholdeth with a jealous eye all above him, and hath no sight to contemplat what is under him. Every one would change that which he is, into that which he cannot be, but by mischief or injustice. The ox in the fable saith, if he were a horse well furnished and caparisoned as that glorious beast (who doth nothing but prance or curvett in a field or ſtreet) he would work wonders: none ſhould be more able nor fit to draw a coach than he; to go into the wars none ſhould be found more courageous than he: But behold him perpetually in the wain under the hand of a paiſant, what means hath he to do any brave thing? Yet admit you ſhould lay foot-clothes and rich abiliments on him, he would ever be an ox. Why do you diſturb your ſelf about the change of your condition, and not rather ſay: My God, thou guideſt lives, eſtates, and conditions; it is a muſick which thou compoſeſt of many accords; it is a table of many colours; it is a body of many members, why ſhould I make a falſe harmony, an extravagant colour, or a prodigious member? It ſufficeth me to be a party in this muſick, this table, this body: ſet me high, ſet me low, let me be white, let me be black, make me head, make me foot. My God it is in thee to give me my part, and in me to play it well. Why ſhould I kick againſt the ſpur like a jade? Why, being but a miſerable earthen pot, ſhould I argue againſt my Potter? If the man whom I envie meriteth this good fortune, I wrong thy juſtice to malign him, and if he deſerve it not, is he not more worthy of compaſſion than envie, ſince all his greatneſs will ſerve him but for a burden in this life, and a condemnation in the other. If all make for me in loving, why ſhould I through want of love deprive my ſelf of ſo great a power, which of all things is the moſt eaſie? Why ſhall I create a hell in my ſelf, where thou haſt a purpoſe to erect a Paradiſe.

You who are maligned, to oppoſe envie render your ſelves truly virtuous, know there are no ſhadows without light, nor envie without ſome gift of God. If the fagot ſmokes when it beginneth to burn, when the flame ſhal have gotten the upper hand, there will be no ſmoke at all. Natural Philoſophers obſerve, that the rain-bow in the Heavens is not eaſily formed at noon-tide in the ſcorching days of ſummer, becauſe the Sun vigorous in his exaltation diſſipateth, waſteth, and diſpelleth the clouds. When you ſhall be mounted to the higheſt pitch of heroick virtue, envie ſhall neither have bowe nor arrow to aſſail you; all ſhall ſtoup to your eminence, and calumny it ſelf ſhall crack, when truth ſhall dart reſplendent flaſhes into all eyes. Vinegar is ſaid to be uſed for precious ſtones, which have their fire frozen over, and their luſtre eclipſed: you muſt have a little touch of acerbity to enlighten your valour. The Moon ſeemeth for a time to darken the Sun when it is eclipſed, and yet ſhe daily tendereth the tribute of her light. Envie, which maketh a ſhew to eclipſe you, will make your praiſes multiply by its ſlanders, your repoſe by its battels, and your crowns by your humiliation. No man accounteth it ſtrange that cantharides fix themſelves upon roſes, they no leſs are roſes for being blaſted by this petty catterpiller: It is well known they are not ſatisfied but with the faireſt flowers; you have nothing to do but to ſhake them off; and thereby enjoy the odour of the beauty of the Queen of beauties.

Fear not to be deſpiſed, becauſe you are envied, if you do not before-hand debaſe your ſelf to envie through imbecillity of heart. Nay rather the moſt envied will be ſought out for a mark of an eminent virtue. The envious will be the more diſſipated, envie will be trampled under foot, and merit crowned by the hand of juſtice.

The twelfth OBSTACLE.

Ambition and avarice.

AFter ſo many rocks, after ſo many counterbuffs and perils, behold the ſhelf of ſhipwrack, Ambition, which is a furious avarice to be able to do all and to have all. It is an itch which great men bear upon them from their mothers womb, to ſtir up in them a perpetual ſcratching; an itch, the maligNity whereof oftentimes turneth their brain even to the making of Heaven to bow under the rules of the earth. Amongſt the difficult queſtions which the Angel propoſed to the Prophet Eſdras, one was to weigh the fire, and the other to meaſure the wind, the laſt to number the veins of the abyſs. Ambition is a devouring fire, who can poize it? It is a wind, who can fathom it? It is an abyſs, who is able to recount the ſources and iſſues thereof? A wiſe man ſaith very well, that the middle of the earth hath been found, the depth of the ſea hath been founded, the height of the Ripbean hills hath been meaſured, the remoteſt limits of the hollow caverns of Caucaſus have been diſcovered; the head-ſpring of Nilus hath not eſcaped, onely in the heart of man we cannot find the bounds of the deſire of commanding. This paſſion is no longer a mean folly, it is arrived to the height of rage, the evil is ſo great it is unknown. Man is ſo far from diſcovering the remedy, that he as it were deſpaireth of health. It is enough if ſome lenitive may be applyed. That great wit Hippocrates, wiſhed a conſultation of all the Phyſitians of the world, to adviſe upon the means how to cure covetouſneſs. It is now above two thouſand years ago ſince he had this deſire; after him a thouſand and a thouſand Philoſophers have employed their endeavour to recover this peſtilent feaver, all have loſt their labour therein, the evil encreaſing in the multitude of remedies, the ſick men are all frantick: when the wind of ambition hath raiſed them to the height of the wheel, they will never deſcend but by a precipice. It is a moſt particular favour of God, if it happen that an ambitious man doth once open his eyes to know himſelf, to meaſure himſelf, to put limits upon his deſires; and yet notwithſtanding the motives and obligations which he hath thereunto are more manifeſt, as I will make it appear in the ſequel of this diſcourſe.

Ambition an itch.

Angelical enigmaes. Eſdras 4.

Deſire of Hippocrates. Hippocrates Epiſt. ad Abderit.

First the Scripture ſpeaking of ambition, called it a forreign vice. Pride in man is not in its element, it always ſeeketh height, and man is even lowneſs it ſelf. What is man, if we conſider him in his own nature without the aſſiſtance of grace, but an excrement of impurity in his conception, a ſilly creature in his birth, a bag and ſponge of ordures in his life, a bait for worms in his death? The ſoul is in the body, as in a Chariot of glaſs: The days are the courriers, which perpetually run upon a full gallop: The four wheels are vanity, weakneſs, inconſtancy, miſery: The way is of ice; the goal is death; and the end oftentimes is a precipice. The pleaſures thereof (as ſaith Plato) are winged, and wholly armed with pricks and ſtings, to leave in flying a ſharp point in the heart; the dolour and diſcontents thereof drench it in a cup full of gall, and its feet are of lead, never to forſake it. Can then ſuch a creature be poſſeſſed with ambition, ſuch a dung-hill nouriſh pride? All that we behold both above and beneath, on the right, on the left hand, in this great houſe of nature, ſerves as a leſſon of humility for us. Heaven which circumvolveth over our heads enameled with ſtars, created in a higher place than we; the earth which we tread under our feet, which ſerveth us for a nurſe, afterwards for a ſepulchre; the little air we breath, without which we cannot live; the water which in its wonder hath ſwallowed up wiſdom; and afterwards the bodies of the moſt knowing men of the earth (as we read of Ariſtotle) beaſts, whoſe ſpoils we carry about us, our body which according to account, hath for its portion about three thouſand diſeaſes, our ſoul which knoweth not what ſhall become of her, and which cannot tell whether ſhe ſhall ſerve as an immortal fewel to thoſe devouring flames that have have no limits but eternity, or no; All preach to us our baseness, all thunder out the terrour and affrightments of Gods judgements; and amongst so many subjects of humility you (O Noblemen) have leisure to puff up your selves, and to fill your minds with the gentle breathing blasts of imaginary honour. At the least, if needs you must elevate your selves, if you of necessity must take a great deal of state upon you, choose the best way: but (insensible as you are) what do you take upon you, becoming ambitious? the life of a slave, the life of Cain. This is the second consideration which I propose, of power sufficient to instruct a soul that will give never so little predominance to reason. We all naturally love liberty, and suppose, that to be of ones self is an inestimable good.

Ambition the life of a slave.

Inestimabile bonum est suum esse. Senec. ep. 67.

Now the most captive Galley-slaves are not greater bond-men than the ambitious. The slave hath a chain and a captain who proudly insulteth over him; an ambitious man hath as many fetters as he hath appetites, as many servitudes as pretensions, as many slaveries as manners of ambition. His Captain is his unguided passion, which tyrannizeth over him day and night with all possible cruelty. The slave practizeth and tameth himself in his own condition: the ambitious is always savage, he always flieth before himself, and never overtaketh himself, to enter into himself. He is in no place, because he would be every where, and yet notwithstanding he is tormented every where, his feaver burneth him where he is not. The slave freeth himself with money, the ambitious man findeth gyves of gold and silver. The slave findeth no chain so straight, but that it sometimes giveth him leave to sing; the ambitious is never free out of himself: there are nothing but objects of frenzie, fire-brands of concupiscence; and within himself there is not any thing but worms, flames, and executioners. The slave findeth at least liberty in death, and death which carrieth the key of all close coverts cometh lastly to unlose all the bands of his servitude; an ambitious soul as soon as it is parted from the body, is consorted with devils in their tortures, as it imitated them very nearly in their passion. What a life, what a death is this? Find you any comparable, if not that of unfortunate Cain? The Scripture saith that he withdrawing himself from the sight of God, did inhabit the land of instability: and Procopius thereto addeth an ancient tradition, that he perpetually saw certain spectres with swords of fire, which brought horrible affrightments upon him. Is the ambitious man better used? Is not he perpetually separated from the face of God, seeing (as saith S. Hierom) man is divided from the Divinity, not by the degrees of body but of soul, which are the affections? And how much more the soul is scattered in the waste emptiness of ambition, which is indeed a meer vanity, so much more it strayeth from this sovereign Majesty, which is the onely verity. Is it not in the Kingdom of inconstancy? In every place where he setteth his feet, there is nothing but slippery yce or downfal. The saying of the Prophet is accomplished in his person: Let their way be made dark and slippery, and the Angel of our Lord persecute them. Behold all the most lamentable extremities, which may be imagined in a voyage; ever to go upon yce, and thereon to walk in the obscure darkness of the night, and to have behind you in the rere a Sergeant, who hasteneth you forward; and all this is found in the life of the ambitious. What passage is not slippery in the favours of the world, all which are feathered and full of mutable conditions? What darkness is there in a wretched creature, who hath no pitie at all of himself, who maketh a liberty of his fetters, honour of his ignominie, and tropheys of his torments? What Sergeant is more troublesom? What spectres, and what swords of fire more teribble than the pricks of this enraged passion, which as much and as violently forceth man, as a bull goared with a goad, rusheth through some headlong precipice? Where is it that the ambitious man can find place of stability and center of repose? If he be in quest of honour, (and when is he not?) behold him in a whirlpool, in fire; behold him in the feverish accesses of heat and cold, which afford him no intermission. Admit he obtain what he pretendeth unto, no sooner is he engaged in one way, but his feet itch to transfer him to another. If he be upon terms of repulse, behold him drenched in desperate and furious envie, which maketh him daily die as many deaths, as there are others more happy than himself. Verily the wheel of Ixion is a silly fable in comparison of the tortures of the ambitious. That was a sport which Heliogabalus did, when he took his Courtiers and commanded them to be tied and trussed fast to a great wheel, and then rolled and turned them up and down in the water, taking infinite pleasure to see them sometime aloft, sometime below, sometime to tast the sweetnes of the air and sometime to be deeply plunged in the water, where of necessity they drank more than enough. Ambitious men daily act the same play, but they personate it tragically: their life is wholly composed of leaps, bounds and skips; they are the very reeds, the very shuttle-cocks of inconstancy, they are meer wind-blown baloones, which are tossed this way and that way, sometime with the foot, sometime with the hand. They are enforced upon all occasions to bear the fools bable, and they miserable have drunk with so long and deep draughts of the water of forgetfulnes, that they cannot awaken themselves from their drunkennes, until death come to close up their eyes.

Misery of the ambitious.

Were it not a thousand times better to plant cole-worts, and roast chesnuts, than to live amongst so many servile complacences unworthy of a noble spirit, so many frustrated pretensions, so many illusions, so many scornful repulses, so many hopes, which crack like a cloud, and raise a tempestuous storm, where shade and sweet refreshment is expected? It is a wonder to behold men to betray their reason, to court the fortunes of Great men, to bereave themselves of comfort, repose, and liberty, to be surprized in a mill full of skreaking noises, in a confused turmoyl of difficult and thorny affairs, poorly to beg a little favour, which perpetually escapeth them, and oftentimes breaks as a glas is in the beauty of its lustre. Petrarch, well acquainted with these considerations, spake these most remarkeable words: Miserable ambitious men, every one hath so much trouble to spin the web of his own affairs, and to bring them to a good end, and thou with much chearfulnes of heart pryest into other mens busines, yea into the affairs of Great men, whom it is impossible to please without perpetual servitude, nor displease without most evident danger. After you began to serve others, you ceased to live to your self, life, virtue, renown, repose, safeguard, all is lost to thee. Great men love none but such who forsake all to make themselves slaves to their passions.

Captivity of charges.

Petrarch. dialog. 47. l. 1. de remediis. Sua negotia gerere laboriosum, quid censeas aliena, præcipue potentium quibus placuisse perpetua servitus est, displicuisse discrimen? Ex quo ambitioni servire cœpisti tibi vivere desiisti. Vilis tibi est anima, virtus, fama, quies, otium, securitas. Vix diligunt Reges nisi qui omnibus negotiis se eorum libidini servum fecit.

What swears of death, saith Monsieur D'Ancre, never to have one hour of rest, to be enforced to give audiences, troublesom, tumultuous and clamorous; to hear and receive suits and unjust supplications; to be embroyled in affairs replenished with knots and thorns; to make manual signatures devoid of conscience, that you may not displease a Great man; to grant unlawful decrees, wicked commissions, attended by infamous executions.

Although the pretensions of ambition were a whole world, can they deserve to be purchased with the prejudice of conscience? What would it avail man to be absolute Lord of the whole Universe for a time, and a sacrifice of hell for ever? But that which maketh the madnes of ambitious men much more ridiculous and deplorable, is, that they all their life life time take pains for wind, for ſmoke, for nothing. The world uſeth them as Laban did poor Jacob: after he had been roaſted, congealed, afflicted, hammered on all ſides, he thought to have a fair Rachel, and found a blear-eyed wench by his ſide. Every day a thouſand fair promiſes, a thouſand hopes, a thouſand fancies, and no effect. This fair Rachel, this pretended honour, after ſo many ſervices cometh not; diſgrace, much more ugly than was Lea, is to be found in the ſame bed of repoſe.

The ambitious travel for Rachel and find Lea.

It oftentimes happeneth, the greateſt men who have paſſed ſome thirty, ſome fourty years, to build a fortune with a thouſand diſturbances, a thouſand indignities, find, they muſt part with this world, and that they have heaped up nothing but a poor title to make a fragment of an Epitaph on their tomb: that is it which the Latine Philoſopher bravely pronounced. Yet are theſe the moſt fortunate. Others without ever ſetting foot into pretended greatneſs, fall piecemeal into ruin. They are tragical ſtage-plays, where the ſucceſſes of the ambitious may be read both in ſacred and profane hiſtories. An Haman hanged on a gibbet fifty cubits high, to be beheld a far off, and on a gibbet which he had prepared for a man whom he deigned not to rank amongſt the number of his ſlaves. An Abſalom after he had diſturbed the Court of his father, found ſnairs in the hairs of his own head to entangle him (as it is ſaid) to a fatal tree, and die transfixed with the ſharp points of three lances. An Abimelech, after he had made his enraged ambition float in the bloud of threeſcore and ten of his own brethren, cruſhed under a tyle, thrown from the hand of a woman. Nebuchadnezzar became a beaſt. Semiramis ſlain in a bruitiſh paſſion by the hand of her own ſon. Cæſar gored with many ſtabs of daggers in the Senate-houſe. Pompey after he had cauſed golden mountains to be carried in triumph, finding no more land to conquer, he having gained ſo much, wanted five or ſix foot of ground to make him a ſepulchre. Another who had taken for enſign a world, with the helm of a ſhip, and his Motto, Hoc opus, ſhewing that his ambitions tranſported him not to any lower pitch than the worlds conqueſt, found himſelf to be in a worſe eſtate than if he had been a ſwabber in a ſhip. Another favorite of Ptolomey King of Ægypt, mounted to ſo high a degree of honour, that he had but two diſcontentments in this life; the one, that he could grow no more, ſo great he was become; the other, that the King with all his revenues ſeemed to him too poor to adde any encreaſe of riches. Few days after, this miſerable creature was ſurprized by King Ptolomey courting a Miſtris of his, for which contempt in that inſtant the Ladie was enforced to drink poiſon, and the unfortunate Courtier was hanged before his own lodging. Another minion of the Emperour Conſtantius, after he had mannaged the affairs, wars, revenues, houſhold, and perſon of the Emperour, was diſgraced, and put to death, becauſe he preſented to his Maſter (at that time incenſed with choler) a pen ill made for writing, to ſign certain diſpatches withal. Macrinus a hunter, a fencer, a ſcrivener, became an Oratour, then a Fiſcal, next Pretour of the Palace, then Emperour, and laſtly was maſſacred with his ſon Piadumenus. Ablavius moſt powerful under Conſtantine, torn in pieces under Conſtantius as a victim.

What circumvolutions, what comedies, what tragedies, what examples to thoſe, who in this world have no other aim but to become great, caſting under foot all laws both divine and humane? Out alas! It is ſaid that Cambiſes King of Perſia, to teach juſtice to a certain Preſident of his, who newly then entered into office, commanded him to cover the chair of judicature with the skin of Seſamnes his father, put to death and flayed, becauſe he had been an ill Judge. What ſhould he do being ſeated on this woful Tribunal, upon the bloud of his father, but become wiſe by a dreadful experience? An infinite number of ambitious men are in office and magiſtracie mounted upon the ruins and bloud of their Predeceſſours, who have made moſt wicked and deplorable trials, and have purſued the ſame ways, without fearing the like event.

Concluſion of the Second Book.

That the life of a bad Courtier is a perpetual obſtacle to virtue.

TO approve good by words, and purſue evil in effect; to condemn the world, and adore it; to deſire heaven, and be fixed to the earth; to love ones ſelf exceſſively, and live perpetually contrary to the better part of our ſelf; to ſeek for peace, and live in an everlaſting warfare; to lodge in one ſame heart fire and ice, ſickneſs and health, joy and ſorrow, death & life. To command imperiouſly, and obey faintly, to be ever abroad, and never out of priſon, to dream without ſleep, and ſleep without repoſe; to be divided to all the world, and never within ones ſelf: To wiſh that which cannot be had, and contemn what is poſſeſſed: To ſeek after that which hath been deſpiſed, and hourly to change reſolution: To exerciſe no piety but by conſtraint, nor reaſon but by fits: Not to avoid one ſin but by another, and to deſcend into the precipice with open eyes: To take up the buckler after the wound received, and to be cured by the overthrow of health: To ſlake thirſt with ſalt water, and quench fire with ſulphur: To have no conſtancy, but for evil, nor amity for any thing but that which deſerveth it not: To have ſottiſh actions, and glorious pretexes; as much faith as the ice, and aſſurance as the wind.

To be the ſlave of a thouſand falſe Deities, and not to reflect on the true Divinity: To prefer the ſetters and onions of Ægypt, before the liberty and palms of the heavenly Sion. To leave Paradiſe to follow the gardens of Tantalus, and thoſe enchanted Iſlands which recoyl backward according to the proportion we think to approch them: To carry under a ſmooth countenance, a heart ſpotted as the skin of a panther: To joyn a voluptuous life to a penurious; avarice to prodigality; ſervitude to predominance; nobilitie to baſeneſs; pride to miſery; and envy to pitie. To promiſe without faith, ſwear without regard, command without reaſon, appoint without order, affect without choiſe, hate without cauſe, walk without a path, and to live perpetually baniſhed from ones ſelf, ſo to become too much tyed to ones ſelf. This is the life of a Courtier, who hath alienated himſelf from the life of God. Adde hereunto, that vice is commonly waited on with a moſt painful life, wherein if endeavour be not uſed to ſanctifie it by virtue, there is found a hell anticipated, where a Paradiſe is imagined.

Petrus

Epiſt. 4. Petrus Bleſenſis Chancellour to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, having ſome time attended in the Court of the King of England, recounteth the evils he there found by experience, in a letter which he addreſſed to the Chaplains of the ſame Prince. There he complaineth, the Courtiers many times ſuffer for hell all thoſe pains which S. Paul endured for Heaven: For they are expoſed to dangers both of ſea and land, rivers and mountains, thieves and falſe brothers, to faſting and watching, to wearineſs, and to all the incommodities of human life.

He hath ſeen (ſaith he) bread and wine ſerved up, which one could not put into their mouthes without ſhutting their eyes, ſuch loathing it enforced, and viands that killed men under the ſhew of nutriment. He hath known Lords draw their ſwords for a cabbin which deſerved not a battel among hogs: He hath ſeen a Prince who delighted to be attended by officers ſuddenly ſurprized, to whom he gave notice of his remove when they had phyſical drugs in their bellies, and made them oftentimes run themſelves out of breath through forreſts and darkneſs, and at other times to pine away in expectation of all that which would but fruſtrate their hope. He hath ſeen harbingers troubleſom before they received gifts, and moſt ungrateful after they had them, who made no ſcruple to put an honeſt man out of his lodging, and to pull him both from table and bed, that he might lie in the ſtreets. He hath ſeen at Court porters worſe than Cerberus, with whom the memory of a benefit laſted not three days, and who took pleaſure to make thoſe ſtand in the durt and rain that had obliged them.

Buffons and jeſters found ever free paſſage, nothing but virtue and honeſty had a wainſcot face ſhewed them. Finally, all the plagues of Ægypt dwelt there, frogs, flies, ulcers, rivers of bloud, a land of iron, a heaven of braſs: ſuch a confuſion of men and beaſts, of affairs and concurrences, of game and quarrels, that this kind of life ſeemed to be a little figure of hell.

I paſs under ſilence what Lucian hath written of the miſery of ſervitours and officers of great men, in the treatiſe which he to that purpoſe made for his friend Timoclas. There you behold one not yet become an arrant gull, who thruſts himſelf forward to make a fortune in the houſe of a rich man; he beginneth to get the favour of ſome ſervants, who make mops and moves at him behind his back, when they have taken his gifts: he clotheth himſelf in faſhion, and puts on the livery of him whoſe grace he ſeeketh; he multiplies his paces and viſits daily, never gaining one good countenance from my Lord nor my Ladie. In the end if it once happen he be looked on or ſpoken to, he is ſomewhat amazed, and maketh anſwer little to the purpoſe, which occaſioneth laughter: One obſerveth his reverences, another caſts an eye on his poſture; another takes account of his words: He is found to be ſomewhat ſottiſh, yet is he not out of hope, ſo that he may be favoured. Thereupon he muſt trot up and down the ſtreets, and employ his beſt friends to purchaſe his ſlavery: On the other part inquiſition is made into his life, as if they would chooſe him Governour of a Province, and in the end of the matter, it is found he is taken in but to keep a little dog. This is it which happened to Theſmopolis the Stoick Philoſopher, for a Roman Ladie that kept him in her houſe, after ſhe had called him aſide, and uſed much diſcourſe with him concerning his capacity, his virtue, and worth, ſhe reſolved to beſtow a great office on him, which was to take charge of her little bitch that was ready to whelp.

When all obſtacles and oppoſitions are diſſolved, if one enter into the houſe of this Lord, he ſeemeth to paſs into Heaven, ſo willingly the golden yoke is put on, which murdereth him under the ſhew of catching.

In the mean time the old ſervants look on this new-come gueſt, and if he be any thing lettered, or have ſome talents of wit or ability, they fear leaſt he ſhould grow too far into the good liking of the Maſter: Behold the cauſe, why they diſgrace him as much as they can, even to the framing of hiſtories upon his genealogie and life, which prove very prejudicial to him.

If bargain be to be made upon wages to be given him, they put into the liſt of account, the name, the quality, the titles of the houſe, and ſome ſuborned flatterer ſhall ſay, the ſervice he doth to ſo great a perſonage ought to be in the ſtead of recompence: yet notwithſtanding, they ſpare not to amuze him upon the hope of great gratuities yearly given, of favours, and imaginary courteſies.

For this (ſaith he) he muſt paſs over bloudy days, and reſtleſs nights, drop ſweats of death, live wretchedly, ſwallow affronts, praiſe all that which is blameworthy, and condemn what is laudable; flatter, lie, ſmile in looſing, and oft-times ſerve for a laughing-ſtock, as an ape tied to his clog: He muſt bear coronets of flowers, and titles, like an old pillar of a tomb, and in effect have nothing, no, many times not ſo much as the wages bargained for, wherewith he cannot be payed, but by breaking all hope of payment.

To conclude, the Court reſembleth thoſe craftie Courtizanes, who entertain witleſs amoriſts with words, and never afford what they promiſe, until thoſe fall into the inability of giving, and theſe into diſtaſt of receiving.

That man is in ſome ſort excuſable who takes pain to taſt ſome excellent viand: but to waſte ones ſelf with labour and travel, to ſee another man feed, under the colour that he will afford us ſome part of that he enjoyeth, how can it be but ridiculous?

If you will have the Court in a piece of painting, repreſent unto your ſelf (ſaith he) a goodly golden portal upon an inacceſſible mountain, all environed with precipices, where nothing is to be ſeen but arms and legs broken, but maymed and miſerable people. Within riches ſitting, all of gold, and very lovely: The Courtier beholdeth her with an eye full of admiration and aſtoniſhment: Hope clothed in a party-coloured garment, goes before him, and taking him by the hand, encourageth him to make his approach to this Divinitie. Then followeth deceit that delivers him over to ſervitude, ſervitude to travel, which perpetually toyleth him in an infinitie of moſt painful labours. Travel, when it hath throughly worn it out, gives him up to old age, already grilly pale, and invaded with many maladies. From thence ignominie ſeizeth on his perſon, and draggeth him along againſt his will into deſpair, which is the cauſe hope flieth from him, and vaniſheth into ſmoke. Then he is no more ſuffered to paſs through the golden portal, by which he entered in, but through ſome wretched back-way poſtern, that he may not behold the frightful ſpectacle of a poor decrepit old man, naked, gorbelled, and wan, who hideth his ſhame with one hand, and ſtrangleth himſelf with the other. He hath no better thing to meet withal at his going out, than repentance, which weeping waiteth on him in the way, the more to augment his miſery.

„ Happy he, who not being able to ſanctifie the mi-
„ ſeries of the world, at the leaſt ſeeketh for a retreat

The READER ſhall obſerve this Book, being compoſed for a more familiar inſtruction, is the leſs enlarged in diſcourſes and allegations, but (as is moſt convenient) more knit and ſuccinct in precepts. I have purpoſely made it deciſive and in manner of Aphoriſms, as the Ancients handled moral things, to make them the more compendious and profitable.

The first SECTION.

Devotion of Great men.

Nazian. in Iamb. ἄφωνον ἔργον μὴ σὺν ἀμφάκτῳ λόγῳ.

OF more worth (ſaith S. Gregory Nazianzen) is a good dumb work, than an eloquent oration without effect. A golden tongue and a leaden heart, never matched together. It is nothing for one to have the trumpet on his lip, who hath not the torch in his hand, according to the example of thoſe brave ſoldiers of Gedeon. The voice of great S. Athanaſius was a thunder-clap, and his life a lightening flaſh, ſaith the fore-alledged Authour, becauſe words never thunder well, if examples enlighten not.

To what purpoſe is it to warble like a lute, and to be deaf to the harmony thereof? To carry wherewith to ſhift and cleanſe others, as the aſs of the hot-houſe, and be himſelf perpetually bemyred and ſlovenly? To buzze up and down like a drone or humble-bee, and neither make honey nor wax? All the Devotion of a ſoul truly Chriſtian tendeth to practice, as the line to its center. Our wiſdom (ſaid S. Cyprian) is a prudence of works, not of words or paper. This is it, which hath given me occaſion, having treated of motives, obſtacles, and remedies, which men of quality may have in the way of ſpiritual life, briefly to prepare a little practice of virtues, which more concerneth their condition, to behold them afterwards appear in the hiſtory of Courts, which I purpoſe to begin in this preſent volume.

It much importeth at the very firſt entrance, to make a good idea of Devotion, which many plaiſter over in their own manner, and attire with their paſſion, making that ſometimes ſerve for vice which beareth the ſcepter of virtue. Some imagine devotion to be nothing but an ordinary practice of unſeemly geſtures and motions, ſuch as little puppets would make, if they were animated with ſome ſmall quantity of quick-ſilver. Others make uſe of devotion as Dionyſius the Tyrant did of Philoſophers, not that he loved them, but that folding himſelf in their clokes, he thought he ſhould be honored by the people. So ſhall you find ſometimes in the world, thoſe who for a vain intereſt of reputation, will cloth themſelves with the robe of falſe devotion, as if one ſhould ſeek to ſhelter himſelf under a wet ſack. I ſpeak not here of devotion which concerneth Religious men, nor that which is in the ſweetneſs of contemplation, but I affirm the virtue of devotion, according to S. Thomas, is nought elſe but a prompt will to the ſervice of God. Noblemen have cauſe to aſpire thereunto.

I. A good devotion in Great men, is to have a great and faithful feeling of the Majeſty of God, not ſerving him with exteriour ſemblances, but ſincerely, cordially, conſtantly, holding all the maxims of ſtate and condition under the rules of conſcience; and diſpoſing themſelves rather to hazard all, than to looſe God by one ſole ſin. True devotion of Great men. Sentite de Domino in bonitate. Sap. 1.

II. A good devotion, to clip the wings of the covetouſneſs of riches and greatneſs: covetouſneſs, which never findeth meaſure but in extremities, nor other period than a precipice. Take heed of a ſoul without bridle, without reverence. Note theſe points and examine them often. Animæ irreverenti & infrænatæ nè tradas me. Eccl. 23. 6.

III. A good devotion, not to reach at the goods of the Church by any falſe pretence, repreſented in the Court of Rome, by any black or covert deceits, ſowed together with white threed, nor afterward to charge a man with titles, like an old ſepulchre, and hold to himſelf the patrimonie of Jeſus Chriſt, therewith to fatten dogs and feed hawks, or ſuch other infamous creatures, which live on the ſins of others. Finally, theſe goods are Eagles feathers, which eat and conſume others: whileſt a ſoul is lodged there, it remaineth in a bitterneſs repleniſhed with gall, and in the perplexed intrications of ſin. In felle amaritudinis, & in obligatione iniquitatis. Actor. 8.

IV. A good devotion, not to incroach upon the poſſeſſions of your neighbour, nor enforce the good Naboth to ſell his land for the accommodation and content of your Lordſhip, but if he will leave it, to give him a good price, a reaſonable rate, a full ſatisfaction. Woe to you (ſaid Iſaiah) who annex houſe to houſe, inheritance to inheritance, as far as the land ſtretcheth. Would you dwell alone in the midſt of the earth? 3 Reg. 21. Iſaiah 5. 8. Væ, qui conjungitis domum ad domum, & agrum agro copulatis uſque ad terminum loci. Numquid habitabitis vos ſoli in medio terræ?

V. A good devotion, in things which one may rightfully exact, to be ſtaid, juſt, temperate, not covetous, no Harpy, no Tyrant, but to extend the bowels of compaſſion towards the poor, who are our fleſh and bloud, to open the eyes, not to invent new impoſitions that may draw the marrow from the people, but to take away or leſſen the old, that neceſſity requireth no more. Salvianus complaineth that in his time there were as many Tyrants as Lords and Courtiers. Diſſolve colligationes impietatis, ſolve faſciculos deprimentes. Iſaiah 58. 6. Salvian. l. 5. de guber. Quot Curiales tot Tyranni.

Courtiers. And that is the cauſe why God gave the Roman Empire as a prey to Barbarians, being Maſters more mild than the covetouſneſs of great ones.

Non morabitur opus mercenarii tui apud te uſque ad manè Levit. 19. 12. Diligite juſtitiam qui judicatis terram. Sap. 1.

VI. A good devotion, to diſcharge his debts and promiſes, and never ſuffer the wages of the poor hireling to lie hid in his coffers.

VII. A good devotion, to attend publick charges which you are to undergo, eſpecially thoſe that concern diſtribution of juſtice, with underſtanding conſcience and diligence: underſtanding, to know the affairs; conſcience, to handle them faithfully; diligence, not to draw out the expedition of cauſes in languiſhing delays, ſo prejudicial to the publick.

Tertul. de cultu fœminar. Diſcutiendæ ſunt delitiæ, quarum mollitie, & fluxu fidei virtus effœminari poteſt

VIII. A good devotion, in baniſhing ſuperfluitie of apparel and taſt, exceſſes, curioſities, houſhold-vices: To cauſe modeſtie, frugalitie, employment, and virtue to reign; and to be the firſt himſelf to light the torch to his familie You muſt neceſſarily expel delights; for their tenderneſs and exceſſes weaken and enervate all religion.

Attende tibi à peſtifero, fabricat enim malè. Eccleſ. 11. 35.

IX. A good devotion, to make choiſe of ſervants, to inſtruct, or make them honeſt, and to eſteem no man faithfull in your ſervice who is diſloyal to God: Not to be deſirous to keep a bad ſervant for ones own intereſt, though the whole houſe would be changed into gold by his hands.

In cujus manu eſt ut prohibeat, jubet agi, ſi non prohibet admitti. Salvian. l. 7.

X. A good devotion, to hinder diſorders and ſins, which are committed in publick, when you have authoritie in your hands, without ſhewing your ſelf inſatiable to revenge your own proper injuries, and more cold than ice in the quarrel of God. When a man hath the power in his hands to ſtay a ſin, to permit it is to commit it. Theſe are points of devotion, which we muſt hereafter more amply digeſt.

The ſecond SECTION.

In what all Devotion and ſpiritual life conſiſteth.

Three ſorts of man in us.

YOu who aſpire to ſpiritual life, know there are three ſorts of man in you alone, the Vegetal, Animal, and Intellectual; and that all your perfection conſiſteth in putting the Vegetal and Animal man under the feet of the Intellectual. A great number of men are now adays vegetals, that is to ſay, who ſo live as if they had no other ſoul but the vegetative as plants, and lead the very life of the muſhrome. Others are animal, who make their ſouls wholy evaporate in ſenſual love, in choler, rage, in brutiſhneſs. Few ſhall you find who are intellectual, who work with reaſon and underſtanding. And behold wherein conſiſteth our excellencie and repoſe, to wit, in raiſing the intellectual man, many times curriſhly trampled on under the feet of concupiſcence, to his proper ſphær, which is the knowledge and union with God.

Hugo miſcel. 2 codic. lib. 3. pag. 17. Notable doctrine of Hugo.

To arrive to this point, it is good to note a worthy doctrine of Hugo of S. Victor. to wit, that there is above us a creating Trinitie, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt; in us a created Trinitie, underſtanding, memorie, will; about us, a dangerous Trinitie, titillation, delectation, conſent; under us, an unhappie Trinitie, into which we fall by ſin, ignorance, weakneſs, impuritie. Reaſon falleth into a triple ignorance, of good and evil, of true and falſe, of ſuteable and diſproportionable. Memorie into three kinds of thoughts; affectionate, being ſuch as concern ſenſualitie; burdenſom, as appertaining to the toyls of life; idle, as all vain thoughts are. The will ſuffereth it ſelf to be ſurprized with three kinds of nets, which are concupiſcence of fleſh, concupiſcence of eyes, and ambition of life.

A man reduced to this ſtate, reſembleth King Nebuchadnezzar, who went out of his throne to eat hay with brute beaſts; ſo the miſerable man, after he hath forſaken the ſeat of reaſon, goeth into the ſtable with his beſtial paſſions. The true and onely means to free your ſelf from ſuch unhappineſs, and to return to your firſt dignitie, is to open your heart to the graces and lights of the Holy Ghoſt, and to diſpoſe your ſelf to practice of vertues, which directly reſiſt theſe three plagues of ſpiritual life, ignorance, weakneſſe, impuritie. Theſe are the three monſters which a ſpiritual man ought neceſſarily to ſubdue, that he afterwards may enjoy an aſſured repoſe.

Now to the end you may the more perfectly underſtand the difference between the carnal and ſpiritual man, I will in this diſcourſe following ſet their characters before your eyes.

The character of the carnal Man.

THis is a man who liveth according to man, that is to ſay, according to himſelf, who appliеth all to himſelf, and makes of himſelf his ſcope, his end, his Divinitie. He goes whither he liſt, he converſeth by humour and phantaſie, he ſleepeth when he will, and as much as he will; he eats, & drinks, & laughs, without rule or meaſure; he ſpeaks without diſcretion or reſervation. All that which is ſweet to the ſmelling, ſoft in touching, pleaſing to the eye, delicate to the taſt, charming to the ear, ſeems to be created for him. He paſſionately ſeeks after it, and hath no other law in his paſſions but the power of his bruitiſhneſs, nor maketh any diſtinction of things permitted and prohibited in the licence of all pleaſures.

A charitate ſui conditoris & illuſtratoris reſilit. Foras in exteriora ſic projicit. Senſatarum rerum imagines repreſentat

All ſpiritual actions are hatefull to him: his ſoul, after it hath loſt the good for which he were made, wandereth at random in the vaſt emptineſs of creatures, and iſſueth out by the gates of all the ſenſes, to glut its concupiſcence. If it happen he be deprived the contentments he purſues (as oftentimes the Divine providence frameth obſtacles enough againſt his depraved deſires) he entertaineth himſelf with the idea of his pleaſures, that he may leave nothing in his ſoul untainted with corruption, he makes his memorie guiltie by the repreſentation of his paſſed luſt; he heareth without voice, he ſmelleth without odour, he taſteth without reliſh, he ſees without colours, he toucheth without bodie, and createth imaginarie ſins to gain real torments.

Illa rudis eſt, illa dicacula, illa deformis, illa formoſa.

All his paſtime is onely among dogs, horſes, curioſities of the throat, or love. All women, who have made any impreſſion on his thoughts, are perpetually remembered in his diſcourſe: one in his opinion is fair, and another courteous, one is rude, and another wily; this is plain, and that painted: the head-dreſſing of one pleaſeth, the chopin of the other: behaviour is gracefull in this, diſcourſe in the other.

In the end this immortal ſpirit is fixed to fleſh, and ſold to luſt, to ſerve as an inſtrument for devils in this life, and to afford feuel for the flames of Divine vengeance in the life to come.

The character of the ſpiritual Man.

Partly drawn from the ſame Proſper l. 2. de vita contem. c. 21. l. 3. c. 1. & lib. 1. 12.

THe ſpiritual man is properly he, who treadeth in the paths which the Saviour of the world traced out unto us by his example: who contemneth the proſperities which Jeſus Chriſt deſpiſed, who feareth not the adverſities which he moſt couragiouſly hath endured, who freely teacheth what he taught, who doth what he did, who hopes what he promiſed, and followeth where he led the way.

This is he who meditateth how to ſatisfie reaſon, not ſenſuality, who more willingly affecth that which may edifie than delight; who rebateth the point of carnal deſires, by ſpiritual pleaſures, who ſubjecteth the fleſh to the spirit, who preferreth the present time before the future, who will do all which he will according to the rules of the will of God. He never slandereth, he never despiseth any man but himself, he knows not what it is to malign the prosperous, to persecute the miserable, to cure the rich, to seek out his proper interests, to enlarge his estate by unjust practices, to sooth his senses, to content his curiosity, nor to entertain his pleasures.

He is neither puffed up with pride nor precipated by ambition, tickled by vain-glory, nor enflamed with desire of honour, not overborn with delights nor gnawn by hatred, not troubled with contentions, not terrified by force, nor softened by pleasure. Boldness makes him not impudent, iniquity unjust, obstinacy of heart untractable, inconstancy variable, rigour opinative, fury witless, gourmandize curious, disobedience rebellious, vanity a vaunter, infidelity treacherous, easiness of nature fickle, cruelty harsh, perverseness jealous, revenge cholerick, nor malignity injurious. His whole life is admirably enterlaced between action and contemplation, which make on earth a figure of Angels ascending and descending, giving us in this life already a taste of the benefits which we hope in the other.

Active life makes him profit in the world, contemplative sheweth him the way how he may surmount the world: The one goes to it by degrees, the other flies to the top: The one makes him holy, the other perfect; the one causeth him to pardon injuries, the other placeth him beyond the sense of an injury; the one teacheth him to mortifie passions, the other establisheth him in the empire over all passions; the one directeth him to cloth the nakedness of the poor, the other makes him to be dispoiled of himself; the one unlooseneth the fetters of prisoners by his hands, and the other enchaineth him to God; the one giveth succour to the afflicted by his means, and the other voluntarily makes him afflict himself in the imitation of the sufferings of Jesus Christ; the one hasteneth to a neighbour, and the other abideth in God; the one hath exercise, the other joy; the one conquereth, the other possesseth; the one knocketh at the door, the other entereth in; the one despiseth the world, the other enjoyeth God.

Finally, the spiritual man is a man covetous of eternity, prodigal of life, little careful of the present, certain of the future. A man who seems no longer to have any commerce with the world, and who hath nothing so familiar as a life that is as it were buried in death, and who flieth above sepulchres like an Angel, who holdeth not of the earth, but by the slender root of natural necessities, and already toucheth heaven with a finger. A man who is as yet in flesh, though he hath made an eternal divorce with flesh, who is under-foot to all the world by humility, and above all the greatness thereof by contempt of it: who binds himself, to be at liberty; who crucifieth himself, to combat; who mortifieth himself to be the more vigorous, who withereth, to flourish again, and daily dieth, that he may never die.

(c) Five rays of the soul.

THe greater part of men have dexterity in delving the ground like moles, (a) and have no eyes to behold the Sun. Yet all evils proceed from ignorance and the want of the knowledge of God. (b) This is the first Monster which we must assault, the first obstacle we must take away. And for this effect observe a wholesom doctrine, to wit, that God is the Sun of all the Intelligences, and that from this Sun five (c) rays of a lively and quickening light are diffused over the darkness of our understandings. These five rays are faith, understanding, counsel, wisdom and prudence. The first and most excellent light is faith, because the other rays do well enlighten the soul in those operations of which it is, as it were the fountain, but faith alone raiseth him above himself to his beginning, which is God. (d) Faith is a virtue bold and urgent, which attains to that the understanding cannot reach unto, mounteth above Cherubins, and flies above Seraphins, though they have six wings. A man without faith is as the Pilot of whom it is spoken in the Proverbs (e) that fell asleep and lost his rudder. What virginity is to the body, the same is faith to the soul. It is the first-born of virtues, the beginning of spiritual life, the life of the understanding, as charity is the life of the will, the pillar of the cloud (f) which hath two faces, the one dark, because it believeth the things which are not apparent, the other lightsom, for that it believeth with an infallible assurance.

Dignity of faith.

The fourth Section.

Practice of Faith.

THat you may well practice the acts of faith, you must know the nature, object, and motive thereof. Faith (saith S. Paul) is the foundation of hope, and the proof of things not apparent. The foundation of hope, in regard all whatsoever we hope in matter of Religion, is grounded upon faith, as the statue upon its basis: the proof of things not apparent, because it is an infallible argument of truths whereof we have not as yet evident notice. S. Bernard addeth, that it is a first-tast certain and voluntary of truth yet not manifested. The Gold-smith laboureth upon gold, silver, and precious stones as upon his proper object: and the object which employeth faith are the mysteries revealed unto us by God, and proposed by his Church. Such mysteries ought to be believed for no other motive, but for that God the eternal Truth hath revealed them. The arguments which are drawn from the prophesies, miracles, numbers of Martyrs, purity of the evangelical law, from the correspondency thereof with reason, from the admirable success and consent of all the mysteries, from the conversion of the world, from the means which the Church hath used to establish it self, from her firm constancy amidst persecutions, from the wisdom & sanctity of the professours of our law and such like things, which I have produced in the first obstacle of the second book, are most powerful considerations to introduce us to faith, and to make easie and familiar to us the acts thereof: but they are not properly motives of faith. In the same manner, as the soul draweth knowledge from sense, and yet notwithstanding is above sense; so faith, though she serve her self with these considerations which are able to command the most contumacious spirits, yet is she admirably raised upon a more supereminent sphere, and will abide no other touch but of the eternal Verity, which darteth a forcible lightening-flash into the soul, able to dazle, enlighten, and surprize the most prosperous liberty that may be imagined. Thence the soul cometh to believe, not by humane discourse, by miracles, by doctrine, by sanctity, but because God speaketh inwardly unto it and giveth it so powerful a touch, that she judgeth infallible whatsoever is revealed and proposed unto her by the Church. Behold to what point the good S. Elzear Count of Arian was arrived, when he said he tasted matters of faith with such certainty and resolution of understanding, that, when Monsieur Miron (held for a prodigie of knowledge in his time) and all the most famous Doctours would have perswaded him the contrary of what he had embraced in the the simplicity of his heart, all their subtilties could not be able to give the least shock to his spirit. This admitted, the acts of faith are,

Touch-stone to know whether one have faith.

I. To submit proper judgement to God with all simplicity and humility of spirit, who speaketh unto us by his Church, by Scriptures, by Traditions, by Councels, by Canons of the sovereign Pastours of the Church.

II. To believe firmly all the Articles of faith which are proposed to us, as well those concerning the Divinity as the humanity of our Saviour; those which concern the Sacraments and ceremonies, as those which appertain to the order and government of the Church.

III. Throughly to retain the summary of the Christian doctrine, to inform your self of the explication of every Article, not for curiosity but duty. To read, repeat, meditate, ruminate them very often: To teach them to the ignorant in time of need: But above all to give direction to your family, that they may be instructed in those things which belong to the knowledge of their salvation. It is an insupportable abuse to see so many, who drag silk at their heels, and have Linx's eyes in petty affairs, to be many times stupid and bruitish in matter of Religion, and in the knowledge of God.

IV. To abhor all innovation and liberty of speech, which in any the least degree striketh at the ancient practices of the Church.

Judicious notes of S. Ignatius concerning sincere faith. * Hæc Authoris σφάλματα notanda, non probanda.

V. And therefore it is necessary, as our Father S. Ignatius hath observed, to praise and approve Confession which is made to a Priest, and the frequent * Communion of the faithful, interpreting the devotion of others in a good sense.

VI. To recommend the Sacrifice of the Mass, to love, practice, perswade others to the laudable custom of being present thereat, as much as may be. To esteem Church-musick, prayers, Canonical hours, Supplications, Processions, and such like.

VII. To praise the Orders of Religion, the vows of poverty, chastity, obedience, works of supererrogation and evangelical perfection, ever generally preferring virginity and continency in discourse before marriage.

VIII. To esteem of Reliques, to recommend the veneration and invocation of Saints; to be much affected to the service of the most blessed Mother of God; to approve of pilgrimages, which are orderly performed, Indulgences, and Jubilies, which the glorious King S. Lewis recommended to Philip his son in his last words.

IX. To have a religious opinion of the abstinences and fasts instituted by the Church, and of the manner of penances and mortifications which religious and other devout persons piously practice.

X. To maintain the commandments of the Church and ordinances of Superiours, both by word and example; and though their lives should not be conformed to their doctrine, yet not to detract nor murmure at their actions in publick or private, thereby to alter in the peoples belief the reverence and respect to their dignity: but as much as shall be expedient privately to admonish them of their defective carriage in their charges.

XI. Highly to esteem the doctrine of sacred Theologie which is taught in schools, and to make account of the great Doctours, whom the Divine providence hath raised in this latter Age valourously to oppose heresies.

XII. Not to insist in ordinary discourses upon exaggerations, comparing men who live in this Age with the Apostles, Doctours, and Saints of antiquity.

XIII. To fix our selves upon the resolutions of the Church, that what our own peculiar reason would judge to be white, we to esteem it black when the decrees of the Church it self shall be so; always preferring the judgement of the Church before our private opinion, knowing that humane reason, especially in matters of faith may easily be deceived, but the Church guided by the promised Spirit of truth, cannot erre.

XIV. Not inconsiderately to be embroyled in the thorny controversies of predestination: Highly to commend grace and faith, but warily without prejudice of free-will, and good works.

XV. Not so to speak of the love and mercy of God that one may seem thereby to exclude the thoughts and considerations of fear and divine justice.

Behold the ordinary rules to preserve your self in faith. If you now desire to know how this virtue is purified and refined in mans heart, and in what consisteth the excellency of its acts, behold them here. You must carefully take heed of having onely a dead faith without charity or good works, which S. Augustine calleth the faith of the devil. It is a night-glimmer, obscure, and melancholy; but lively faith is a true beam of the Sun. The acts of a strong and lively faith are:

Heroick acts of faith. Matth. 8.

I. To have great and noble thoughts of God, as that brave Centurion of whom it is spoken in S. Matthew, who supposed the malady, health, death, life of his servant absolutely depended upon one sole word of our Saviour, and thought himself unworthy he should enter into his house. Cassius Longinus a Pagan so learned, that he was called the Living Library, one day reading Genesis, could not sufficiently admire the sublime speculations which Moses had of the Divinity, when he wrote of the worlds creation, & that God at the sound of one sole word made the great master-pieces of this universe to rise out of nothing, as heaven, earth, water, the Sun, and Moon.

Cassius Longinus libro. de sublim.

II. To believe with great simplicity, removed from all manner of curiosity and nice inquisition. God would not the point of the knife should be lifted up on his Altar to cut it. So likewise the point of humane spirit must not be raised on the Altar of faith, nor the curtain drawn to enlighte the mysteries with the torch of reason. S. Lewis was most perfect in this degree, who would not stir a foot to behold a miracle in confirmation of his belief.

Si levaveris cultrum tuum super eo, polluetur. Exod. 20.

III. To believe with great fervour, esteeming nothing impossible to your faith, as did that simple shoemaker, who under a King of the Tartars, removed a mountain in the sight of the whole world, by the fervour and simplicity of his faith.

Paulus Venetus l. 1. c. 18. de reb. orient.

IV. Not to stagger nor be afflicted when you ask any thing of God in your prayers, holding it undoubted that it will be granted, if it be for the greater glory of the Sovereign Master, and your more advantageable profit. You must always hold your hands lifted up in some kind as Moses did, even to the setting of the Sun, to vanquish our Amalekites.

Exod. 17.

V. To have a generous heart and full of confidence in adversity, not to admit distrust during the storm; but with firm footing to expect the consolation of heaven, even when we shall be in the shades of death, as said the Prophet.

VI. Little to prize temporal goods in comparison of eternal: To be ready to dispoil ones self from all the pleasures and commodities of the world, if there be any danger of faith, as that brave Courtier Moses, who forsook the contentments of Pharaohs Court, to be afflicted with his own people.

Hebr. 11.

VII. To give alms liberally, with a firm belief, that the hand of the poor is the treasury of God.

VIII. To employ even life it self, as so many Martyrs have done, and to seal your faith with your own bloud. This is the most heroical act; but yet it ought to be guided by discretion.

Now to make easie the acts of faith.

I. It is good oftentimes to consider how reasonable, glorious, and full of merit this act is. Reasonable, to submit the creature to the Creatour; glorious, to see the Sovereign Lord so served and honoured, that for the defence of one sole word but once pronounced by his mouth, a thousand and a thousand good servants are ready to bestow their lives; full of merit, in as much as we give a free consent, voluntary, and pious, and not being enforced by manifest evidence.

How acts of faith may be made easie.

II. To be often confounded in the weakness and incapicity of our understanding, which is found so short in the knowledge of many petty things. There needeth no more but the foot of an Ant to slay it, and a glass of water to drown it. What stupidity then is like this, to be desirous to make ones self overwise, and to judge that impossible which cannot be comprehended in matter of Religion?

III. To apply your mind to the consideration of motives, which may form in your spirit a probability of that which is proposed unto you, as are those I have noted before, and which will give good enterances to the inspirations of God.

IV. To retire from the toyl of senses, which do nothing but disturb when you consult with them in things spiritual; and to raise your soul above flesh to be illuminated by the Sun of Intelligences.

V. To take away the obstacles of all sorts of impurity, and namely of pride & all disordinate affection.

VI. To strike at Heaven gate with prayer, seeing faith cometh unto us from treasures of the Father of light. Faith so planted, fortified, and manured by good works, illuminateth a soul. All the savage and cruel beasts, all the bruitish passions, chimæraes, dreams, irresolutions, which went roaming up and down in this great forrest of confusions, amongst the shadows of night, are scattered so soon as this radiant Sun beginneth to dissipate darkness with his divine rays. Then is it, that a soul wholly clad with the clear lights of hope (which causeth it to expect the blessings of the other life) goeth on with a great and constant resolution, as one who hath for support the infinite power of God, who is as faithful in his promises, as rich in rewards.

Behold how this monster ignorance is overthrown by the arms of light.

The fifth Section.

Of four other rays which serve to dissipate ignorance.

Beam of understanding.

BEsides the torch of faith, God also gives us the light of understanding, of counsel, wisdom, and prudence, which are as unvaluable riches, wholly repleni shing the soul with splendour, as saith the Prophet Isaiah. The gift of understanding doth free us from a certain bruitishness, which is the cause that men tying themselves onely to external and sensible things, are perpetually out of themselves: at which time understanding calls them back again, and makes them to re-enter into their house, to see the beginning, progress, and end of the life of man; from whence he cometh, whither he goeth, what will become of him.

Of counsel.

Counsel enlighteneth us in things doubtful, to take a good way.

Of wisdom.

Wisdom putteth us out of an apprentiship, and draweth us from a certain childishness, which maketh men as little ones and carnal, mutually entertaining themselves with temporal things. And the knowledge of God raiseth and causeth them to turn their faces directly towards Eternity.

Of prudence.

Prudence considereth good and evil, according to the quality and quantity thereof. It examineth the circumstances of actions, and sheweth us what ought to be done in such a time, such a place, and such occasions.

The sixth Section.

Twelve fundamental Considerations of spiritual life, partly drawn from that worthy man John Picus Mirandula.

Note, that it is good often to meditate these maxims, either one a day, or all together.

FRom the five rays explicated before, proceed great and goodly lights by direction of which a life wholly new is begun. John Picus of Mirandula, a great and remarkable man, held for a prodigie of wit, much tasting the content of spiritual life, enlightened by the rays of a wisdom absolutely celestial, establisheth twelve Considerations which we ought continually to meditate on, for the practice of the knowledge of God.

1. Consideration nature and dignity of man.

I. The first, the nature and dignity of man, to wit, that the first and ceaseless endeavour of man should be of man himself; to see what he hath been, what he is, and what he shall be. What he hath been, nothing; what he is, a reasonable creature; what he shall be, a guest of Paradise or of hell, of an eternal felicity, or of an everlasting unhappiness.

Greatness of the soul.

What he is according to nature, a master-piece, where many prerogatives meet together; a body composed of a marvellous architecture; a soul endowed with understanding, reason, spirit, judgement, will memory, imaginations, opinions: A soul which flieth in an instant from one pole to the other, descendeth even to the center of the world, and mounteth to the top; which is found in an instant in a thousand several places, which embraceth the whole world without touching it, which goeth, which glittereth, which shineth, which diggeth into all the treasures and magazines of nature, which findeth out all sorts of inventions, which inventeth arts, which governeth Common-wealths, which disposeth worlds. In the mean time she beholdeth about her self an infinite number of dogs, that bark at her happiness, and endeavour to bite her on every side.

Tyranny of passions.

Love fooleth her, ambition turmoyleth her, avarice rusteth her, and lust enflameth her, vain hopes sooth her, pleasures melt her, despair over-bears her, choler burns her, hatred filleth her with gall, envie gnaweth her, jealousie pricketh her, revenge enrageth her, cruelty maketh her savage, fear frosteth her, sorrow consumes her. This poor soul shut up in the body, as a bird of Paradise in a cage, is altogether amazed to see her self assailed by all this mutinous multitude, and though she have a scepter in her hand to rule, she notwithstanding oft suffereth her self to be deceived, ravished, and dragged along into a miserable servitude.

From thence behold what man is through sin; vanity, weakness, inconstancy, misery, malediction.

What he becometh by grace, a child of light, a terrestrial Angel, the son of a celestial Father by adoption, brother and coheir of Jesus Christ, a vessel of election, the temple of the Holy Ghost.

What he may arrive unto by glory; to be an inhabitant of Heaven, who shall see the stars under his feet, which he hath over his head, who shall be filled with the sight of God, his beginning, his end, his true, onely, and original happiness.

2. Benefits of God.

II. The benefits received from God considered in general, as those of creation, conservation, redemption, vocation, and in particular the gifts of the body, of the soul, of nature, of capacity, ability, industry, dexterity, wariness, nobility, offices, authority, means, credit, reputation, good success of affairs, and such like, which are given to us from Heaven, as instruments to work our salvation. And sometimes one of the greatest blessings is (that which few esteem a benefit) not to have all these

theſe advantages, which lead a haughty, weak, and worldly ſpirit even into a headlong precipice; but quite contrary, good diſadvantages (in the opinion of the world) put him into the eſtimation of heavenly things. Man beholding what he hath been, what he is, what will become of him, from whence he proceedeth, whither he goeth, and how the union with God his beginning is his Scope, But, and Aim; if he doth that which reaſon dictateth to him, he inſtantly takes a reſolution neither to have vein, ſinew, nor artery, which tendeth not to his end, to conquer his paſſions, and no longer to ſerve creatures, but ſo far forth as he ſhall know them profitable to lead him to his Creatour. Everie creature ſpeaketh theſe words to man: O man keep what is given to thee, expect what is promiſed thee, and avoid what is forbiden thee.

Bernard. de gradibus humilit. Serva commiſſum, expecta promiſſum cave prohibitum.

III. The third conſideration is the paſſion of the Son of God; a bottomleſs abyſs of dolours, ſcorns, annihilations, love, mercy wiſdom, humility, patience, charity, the book of books, the ſcience of ſciences, the ſecret of ſecrets, the ſhop where all good reſolutions are forged, where all virtues are purified, where all knots of holy obligations are tied, the ſchool where all Martyrs are made, all Confeſſours, all Saints. Our weakneſs, our faintneſs, come not but for want of beholding this table of exceſs. Who ever would open his mouth to complain of doing too much, of ſuffering too much, of being too much abaſed, too much deſpiſed, too much turmoyled, if he conſidered the life of God delivered over and abandoned for him to ſo painful labour, ſo horrible confuſions, ſo inſupportable torments? O my God, my wounded God! As long as I ſhall ſee thy wounds, I will never live without wound.

S. Bonav. in ſtimul. Nolo vivere ſine vulnere cum te videam vulneratum.

IV. The examples of all Saints, who have walked in the royal way of the croſs. When we conſider the progreſſion of Chriſtianity, and the ſucceſſion of ſo many Ages, whereſoever our conſideration ſetteth foot it findeth nothing but the bloud of Martyrs, combats of Virgins, prayers, tears, faſtings, ſack-cloth, hair-cloth, perſecutions, afflictions of ſo many Saints, who have as it were won heaven by main force. Such have been found, who had heretofore filled ſepulchers with their members torn with engins and ſwords of perſecution, and were yet alive to endure and ſuffer in their bodies, which had more wounds then parts of body to be tormented. Is it not a ſhame to have the ſame name, the ſame Baptiſm, the ſame profeſſion, and yet to be always deſirous to tread on roſes? To be embarked in this great ſhip of Chriſtianity with ſo many brave ſpirits, which even at this day hourly do wonders in the world, and to go under hatches to ſleep in the bottom of the veſſel, as needleſs outcaſts, and the very ſcorns of reaſonable nature?

4. Example of Saints.

S. Zeno homil. de Sancto Arcadio. Remorabantur in luce detenti quorum membris [laniarent tumuli.

V. The peace of a good conſcience (the inſeparable companion of honeſt men) which ſugareth all their tears, which ſeaſoneth all their acerbities, which diſſolveth all their ſharpneſs; a perpetual banquet, a portative theater, a delicious torrent of inexplicable contentments, which begin in this world, and which many times are felt even in chaines, priſons, and perſecutions. What will it be when the conſummation ſhall be made in the other world, when the curtain of the great Tabernacle ſhall be drawn, when we ſhall ſee God face to face, in a body impaſſible as an Angel, ſubtile as a ray of light, ſwift as the wings of thunder, radiant as the Sun, when he ſhall be ſeen amongſt ſo goodly and flouriſhing a company in a Palace of eſtimable glory, and when one ſhall lead no other life, but that of God, of the knowledge of God, of the love of God, as long as God ſhall be God? What will this life be, nay, what will this life not be, ſince all the goods thereof either are not, or are in ſuch a life of lights, which place cannot comprehend; of voyces and harmonies, which time cannot take from us; of odours, which never are ſcattered: a feaſt which never is finiſhed; a bleſſing which eternity well may give; but of which it never ſhall ſee an end?

5. Inward peace.

Auguſt. Neſcio quid erit, quod iſta vita non erit, ubi lucet quod non capit locus, ubi ſonat quod non rapit tempus, ubi olet quod non ſpargit flatus, ubi ſapit quod non minuit edacitas, ubi hæret quod non divellit æternitas.

VI. It is to be conſidered on the other ſide the condition of this preſent life: A true dream, which hath the diſturbances of ſleep, but never the repoſe; a childiſh amuzement; a toyle of burdenſom and ever-relapſing actions, where for one roſe a thouſand thorns are found, for one ounce of honey, a tun of gal, for bleſſings in apparance, evils in ſubſtance. The moſt happy there count their years and cannot reckon their griefs. The carriers of the greateſt honours are there all of ice, and oftentimes are not bounded but with headlong ruines. Its felicities are floating Ilands, which always recoyl backward at that time when we think to touch them with our finger. They are the feaſts of Heliogabalus, where there are many invitations, many ceremonies, many reverences, many ſervices, and at the end thereof we find a table and a banquet of wax, which melts before the fire, and from whence we return more hungry than we came. It is the enchanted egge of Oromazes, wherein this impoſtour vanted to have encloſed all the happineſs of the world, and in breaking it there was found nothing but wind. All theſe pleaſures flatter our ſenſes with an impoſture of falſe colours: why do we ſuffer thoſe eyes to be taken in the ſnares of errours, which are given to us by heaven to behold the light, and not miniſter to lying? Yea, that which greatly ſhould diſtaſt us in this preſent life, is, we live in an Age ſtuffed with maladies, as old age with indiſpoſitions. We live in a world greatly corrupted, of which may be ſaid, It is a monſter whoſe underſtanding is a pit of darkneſs; reaſon, a ſhop of malice, will, a hell; where a thouſand paſſions outragiouſly inſult over it. Its eyes are two conduit-pipes of fire, from whence flie ſparkles of concupiſcence; its tongue, an inſtrument of malediction; its viſage, a painted hypocriſie; its body, a ſponge of ordures; its hands, the tallons of harpies: and finally it ſeemeth to have no other faith but infidelity; no law but its paſſion; no other God but its own belly. What contentment can it be to live with ſuch a monſter.

6. Condition of this life wel deſcribed

Lamprid. Heliogab.

S. Eucher. in paræneſi. Omnia hæc conſpectui noſtro inſidioſis coloribus lenocinantur: vis illa oculorum attributa lumini, non applicetur errori.

VII. If there be pleaſures in life, they do nothing but a little ſlightly overflow the heart with a ſuperficial delectation: Sadneſſe diveth into the bottom of our ſoul, and when it is there, you will ſay it hath feet of lead never to forſake the place, but pleaſure doth ſooth us onely in the outward parts of the skin, & all her ſweet waters, run down with full ſpeed into the ſalt ſea. Behold wherefore S. Auguſtin ſaid, when any proſperity preſented it ſelf to his eyes he durſt not touch it. He looked upon pleaſure as on a fleeting bird, which ſeemeth as it were ready to be ſeyzed, and flieth away as ſoon as ever ſhe ſees her ſelf almoſt ſurprized.

7 Quality of worldly pleaſures.

Auguſt. Conf. l. 6. cap. 5.

VIII. Pleaſures are born in the ſenſes, and like abortives are conſumed in their birth: Their deſires are full of diſturbances, their acceſs is of violent, forced, and turbulent agitations: Their ſatiety is farced with ſhame and repentance: They paſs away after they have wearied the body, and leave it like a bunch of grapes, the juice whereof is extracted by the preſs, as ſaith S. Bernard: They hold it a goodly matter to extend their fulneſs: They muſt end with life, and it is a great hazard if during life it ſelf, they ſerve not their hoſt for an executioner. I ſee no greater pleaſure in the world than the contempt of pleaſure.

8 Their ſhortneſs.

vests which time presented to him are passed, and the rust of a heavy age furnisheth him with nothing but thorns, sorrows to have done ill, and inabilities of doing well: what then remains to be said, but that which the miserable King said, who gave his scepter for a glass of water: Alas! must I for so short a pleasure, loose so great a Kingdom?

Lysimachus.

10. Difficulty of penance

X. Evil always beareth sorrow behind it, but not true penance. It is a most particular favour of God, to have time to bemoan the sins of our passed life, and to take occasion by the fore-lock. Many are packed away into the other world without ever having thought of their passage, and such suppose they shall have many tears at their death, who shall not have one good act of repentance They bewail the sins which forsake them, and not God whom they have lost. True contrition is a hard piece of work: How can he merit it who willingly hath ever demerited?

Facilius inveni qui innocentiam servarent, quam qui congruè pœnitentiam agerent. Ambr. l. de unica pœnitent. c. 10.

11. Death.

XI. In the mean time death cometh apace; it expecteth us at all hours, in all places, and you cannot attend it one sole minute, so much this thought displeaseth you. The decrees thereof are more clear and perspicuous, than if they were written with the beams of the Sun, and yet we cannot read them. His trumpet soundeth perpetually more intelligibly than thunder, and we understand it not. It is no wonder that David in the 48. Psalm calleth it an ænigma; every one beholdeth the table, and few knoweth the sense of it. Notwithstanding it is a case concluded, we must take a long fare-well from all things which appertain to life, that can be extended no further than life it self: and it is a case resolved that serpents and worms must be inherited in a house of darkness. It is a goodly lesson, whosoever can well learn it. To know it well once, it must every day be studied. Nothing is seen every where but watches, clocks, and dyals, some of gold, some of silver, and others enchased with precious stones. They advertise us of all the hours, but that which should be our last: and since they cannot strike that hour, we must make it sound in our conscience. At the very instant when you read this, a thousand and a thousand perhaps of souls unloosened from the body, are presented before the Tribunal of God, what would you do if you were presently to beat them company? There is but one word: Timely despise in your bodie the things of which you shall have no need out of your bodie.

Psal. 48. 5. According to the Hebrew. הידות

12. What followeth death. Apoc. 14. Tertul. de anima. c. 53. Hug. l. 4. de anima.

XII. Your soul shall go out, and of all the attendants of life shall have none but good and bad by her sides. If she be surprized in mortal sin, hell shall be her share; hell, the great lake of the anger of God; hell, the common sewer of all the ordures of the world; hell, the store-house of eternal fire; hell, a depth without bottom, where there is no evil but we may expect, nor good which may be hoped.

Behold the twelve considerations which this most worthy man used to direct himself in the course of a virtuous life; and they so far had prevailed upon his soul, that he resolved after he had finished certain works which he then had in hand, to distribute all his goods among the poor, and go bare-foot through the cities, towns, and villages, carrying a Crucifix in his hand, to preach the cross & the blessings of the other life, employing his whole talent which God had given him to his service. But death prevented him.

The seventh SECTION.

Twelve Maxims of Wisdom, which arise from the twelve precedent Considerations.

Often examine your life by these maxims.

FRom these Considerations twelve goodly Maxims of wisdom arise, greatly necessary for any who would enjoy true happiness.

I. The first is, to give to every thing its estimation, since the beginning of our unhappiness proceedeth from a false value which we set upon creatures. It marvellously importeth to estimate every thing according to its worth. That good man Epictetus, said more than one would think, when he gave this advise: My friend if thou lovest a pot, remember thy self to be a pot. For want of the knowledge of the price of what we love, we put God under the Altar, and vice above, to allow it the best part of the incense.

1. Good value.

Μίμνησο, ὅτι χύτραν εἶρι- ας τὸν θεὸν χύ- τραν εἶναι.

II. For this cause it is necessary daily to endeavour to enfranchize our selves from the opinions of the world, and to use, not the ballance of wicked Chanaan, of whom the Scripture saith, Chanaan in manu ejus statera dolosa, but the ballance of Jesus Christ, which is the Cross. There we ought to weigh the pleasing and the profitable, good and evil, sowr and sweet, time and eternity, and to proportion our judgements, resolutions, designs, actions, proceedings, to this great ballance which cannot deceive us. And as we are exteriourly to resist this torrent of popular opinions, so we interiourly have our passions which we must necessarily extirpate, that we may give a judgement upon every thing with full liberty, otherwise they cast chaff into our eyes, and so blind us

2. Light of mind in the choice.

Osee. 12. Ballance of Chanaan.

III. To live here as a pilgrime of the world, disarrayed of all: To esteem nothing our own but our selves. All that which maketh us defie, quarrel, contest, accuse God and man, is, that we have thought our selves to be proprietaries of those things of which we have but onely the use. We must (saith Epictetus) take all the blessings and honours of the world as a passenger, who going out of a Ship, gathers cockle-shels upon the sand, yet ever hath his eye upon the ship to which he is engaged. Saint Chrysostom maketh such account of this maxim, that he saith, There is but one virtue in the world that causeth all other virtues, which is, to carry ones self as a pilgrim of this world, and a Citizen of Paradise.

3. To live a pilgrime.

Epict. Ench. ri. l. c. 12.

IV. To have a very good opinion of the providence of God, who covereth as it were under the shadow of his royal mantle, all creatures. S. Augustine saith, that God hath not made the world, afterward to leave it, like a Carabin who hath shot off his pistol. He governeth and defendeth it, as the good nurse who driveth away the wasp from her infants face whilest it securely sleepeth. He yieldeth himself accountable for all the hairs on our head. And dost thou then (saith S. Augustine) fear to perish, confiding in God? One hair taken from thy head without thy knowledge or feeling, shall not perish; and shall thy soul be destroyed which is the root of all thy thoughts, and of all thy understandings? If God so preserve thy superfluities, what will he do to thy treasures? Trust with confidence in the providence of God, if you desire always to live content. If your life be a feast, the Divine providence is the salt which seasoneth it. If that be a pilgrimage, this is the staff. If that be a night, this is the break of day. If you will fight, it is a steely buckler. If you sleep, it is a bed of repose. Our life is composed of three shadows, which are time past, time present, and the future. Will you have a good share in them all? said that admirable Emperour Marcus Aurelius: Dispose time past to forgetfulness, the present to sanctity and justice, the future to providence.

4. Opinion of providence. Non fecit & abiit.

Aug. hom. 14. tom. 10. pag. 103. Times ergo ne pereat, cujus capillus non peribit? Si sic tua custodiantur superfluа, in quâ ta securitate est anima tua?

Non perit capillus quem cum tondetur non sentit, & perit anima per quam sentit?

Marc. Aurel. Anton. l. 2. de vita sua.

V. To know the ways of this sacred providence, we must take heed not to be too wise, like some arrogant and scattered spirits, who boast to wander and alienate themselves from the way which all Saints have held, and searching out new paths, find every where illusions and precipices. All these lovers of innovation and proper judgement, are Pharaoh's Counsellours, who have drunk in the cup of giddiness.

5. To flie evil innovation.

There

Interrogare sapientem dimidia sapientia est. Homo sapiens est quãdiu quærit sapientiam: ubi putat se adepsus culmen pervenisse, desipit.

There is likewise found a little book of Apothegmes, translated out of Arabick into Latine by Drusus, which hath these remarkeable words: To consult with the wise, is to be already half wise. A man is wise so long as he seeketh wisdom, but when he supposeth he hath throughly attained it, then he becometh a fool.

6. An assured butt.

VI. To have an assured scope to aim at, not onely in general, which is to seek in all things the greatest glory of God, and ones own salvation, but also in particular to make and propose to your self a regular and well-pondered course of life. Some have so many affairs that they have not leisure either to live or die, others have nothing to do, and are perpetually wandering, and as it were looking for the key of their house, and never entering into it. We must take in hand some employment and moderate retirement, therein following the inspiration of God, an intention pure to live in the place which shall be most proper for us, to unite our selves to him according to our capacity, following withal the consultation which we ought to make with our own natural constitution, the direction of those who know and govern us, provided they be dis-interessed from their own passions. It is a business of no small importance to have good success herein. Some find without thinking thereof, conditions which seem made to their nature, as the nest of the Halcyon is fit to his body. Others, for that they have made a false step, are enforced to bite the bridle all their life time, if by patience they do not correct the defects of their carriage. Above all things it is convenient here to purifie your intentions, and if you must be embarqued in the Court life, not to come thither as a Janniſary or a Mamaluck, to make a fortune, and do nothing else.

Vacation.

7. Solid piety.

VII. To embrace a true and solid piety, such as our Fore-fathers have consigned over to us in all simplicity, and such as the Church instructeth us. Not to plaister nor disguise it for the accommodation of these petty ends: Such a practice is a great abomination, and cannot in conclusion avoid dreadful and dangerous accidents. You must serve God interiourly with great sincerity of heart, and most pure thoughts of his Majesty; exteriourly applying your self to ordinary services and ceremonies with most sincere freedom, without superstitions, scruples, vanities, presumptions, singularities. Behold (saith Synesius) the basis of the estate and total greatness of man.

Synesius de regul. ad Arcad.

Κρῆ σισὰ φαῦλε ἰφ ᾗς ἀσὶξει τὸ ἄγαλμα ἡμῶν.

8. Honesty.

VIII. To frame to your self a soul which is in a certain temper of integrity, consisting in well following the light of nature, and the touch of Heaven, which teacheth us we must do to another all that which we would have others to do unto us, and not to offer to another what we dislike in our selves. Behold the road-way of honesty, which whosoever forsaketh to become craftie, ever byassing to his pretended advantages, shall in the end of his account, find himself deceived. That great forementioned Emperour Antoninus saith, the wisdom of man consisteth in three points: well to behave himself towards God, which is done by Religion; with himself, which is done by mortification of his passions; and with men, which is effected by sparing and tolerating them, every where doing good, and after he hath done good, to have his ears prepared to hear evil.

Antonin. l. 5. de vita sua.

9. Government of pretensions.

IX. To govern his desires within the limits of his capacity and modesty. It is a great note of folly to attempt all things, and do nothing; to be tumoyled with the present, and to have always the throat of an enraged concupiscence gaping after the time to come; to be vexed with himself, and not to be of power to repose within himself; to make the steps of honour the degrees of his ruin; to raise a fortune like a huge Colossus, to make it fall upon his own shoulders, and to leave no other witnesses of his greatness, but the prints of his fall. It is a thing very difficult to have much, and impossible to have all, but it is so easie a matter to despise all, that it consisteth in nothing but in a bare refusal.

10. Tranquility.

X. To procure such an equality of spirit, so even, so regular, that he scarcely feel the approach of happiness, and when it is lost, not to make any shew of it. To behold the good of another as his own, and his own as another mans. To hold riches and honours as a river that glideth to day for you, to morrow for another. It is the nature thereof always to run gently; what wrong doth it to us? When prosperity laugheth on you, look back upon adversity which cometh in the rere, and remember you have seen tall ships lost in the harbour, even as it were in jest. S. Augustine pleased to repeat that verse of Virgil:

Mene sali placidi vultum, fluctusq; quietos
Ignorare jubes?

Augustin. ep. 113. & alibi.

desirous thereby to signifie to us, that we should no more confide in the prosperities of the world, than to a still sea, which in his over-great calm oft-times presageth the near approaching tempest. Brave and valorous Captains heretofore made a Sacrifice to war in the midst of peace, and in the midst of war dressed Altars to Peace; to declare that in good, we should live in distrust of ill, and in evil, in hope of good, but in both the one and the other ever in equality. This verily is one of the master-pieces of wisdom, which God imparteth to spirits greatly refigned, and who have passed through the most thin and slender searces.

11. Discretion in affairs.

XI. To behave ones self prudently in all kind of occasions, to examine the tenents and utmost bounds, the original, progress, end. Never to judge, till you have seen the bottom of the business, and therein to carry your self so, that if success cannot wait on your desires, you may not justly accuse either any crooked intention, or want of discretion. We are masters of our wils, but God hath reserved to himself the command over events.

12. Meditation of death.

XII. To be always ready to depart from hence cheatfully, when death shall sound the retreat. Saint Chrysostom saith finely: This life is a nest framed of straw and morter: we are the little birds, shall we putrifie in the stench of this filthy nest? If devotion hath made us wings, why are we slothfull? Let us bravely mount and take that flight which our Eagle tracked out unto us in the day of his Ascension. Remember, the quintessence of al wisdom is the meditation of death. It is a business we should learn all our life time to exercise it once. The faults therein committed are irreparable, and the loss without recovery. This consisteth in three things, resignation, dis-engagement, and union. As for resignation be not too faint-hearted, nor suffer your self to be called upon to pay a debt, which so many millions of men have discharged before you, and which so many millions shall likewise pay after you: shew to those who visit you, patience in your sickness, resolution at your last hour, and not to desire any thing but spiritual assistances.

Chrys. hom. 2. in epist. Pauli ad Coloss.

As for your departure, go out of the world as the chicken out of the shell.

I. Dispose of your temporal goods in time by making a just, clear, and perspicuous will. 2. Restore the goods of another. 3. Pay your debts as far as you can. 4. Lay open your affairs. 5. Give pious legacies, to charge the Altars of mercy with the last victims. 6. Reconcile your self, and above all things beware you carry not with you too much confidence and inordinate affection into the other world 7. Take order for the education of your children. 8. Dispose of offices, if you have any, with an upright conscience. 9. Forget not the labours of your poor servants. After this diſengagement draw the curtain betwixt your ſelf and all creatures. By a good confeſſion unite your ſelf to your Creatour, by the ſacred viaticum, extream unction, by acts of faith, hope, and charitie, by good ſuffrages of the Church, good admonitions, good purpoſes, good remembrances of the death of our Saviour, yielding your ſoul up upon a Crucifix, as a child who ſleepeth on the breaſt of his nurce.

The eigthth SECTION.

The Practice of Devotion and Prayer.

ONe of the ſhorteſt ways to gain wiſdom is to be devout. Devotion is as it were the flame and lightening-flaſh of charitie: and it is properly a prompt and affectionate vivacitie in things which concern the ſervice of God. It principally ſhineth in prayer and in the exerciſe of the works of mercy. Prayer, as ſaith the great Saint Dionyſius the Areopagite, is as it were a chain of ſilver, which from heaven hangeth downward to draw man up from earth, and unite him to God. It is the mount Tabor, where an admirable transfiguration is made of the ſoul into God: It is the ſpirit which ſpeaketh to God, which poureth it ſelf on God; in concluſion it is coloured by God, even as Jacobs ews did denote their burden to be of the ſame colour of which thoſe wands were that they ſted faſtly beheld. It is it which the Apoſtle pleaſed to ſay, Beholding the glory of God, we are transfigured into the ſame image from brightneſs to brightneſs, as by the ſpirit of God. Prayer is the conduit of grace. It is (as very well S. Ephraim hath ſaid) The ſtandard of our warfare, the conſervation of our peace, the bridle of our impatience, the guardian of temperance, the ſeal of virginitie, the advocate of offenders, the conſolation of the afflicted, the ſepulture of the dying. For the juſt are buried in prayer as the Phenix in perfumes. Prayer doth all. A Chriſtian without prayer is a Bee without ſting, who will neither make honey nor wax. It is to little purpoſe to propoſe unto you the myſteries of faith and the maxims of Chriſtian wiſdom, if you uſe not meditation to ruminate them. It is as meat caſt into a ſtomack without digeſtion, which will do more hurt than good, not of its own nature, but by your indiſpoſition which is bad. From hence proceed the deſolations of the earth. From hence are derived ſo many fals, ſo many miſeries, for that men apply not themſelves to taſt the things of God in prayer.

That which ought to incite us to this exerciſe, is, firſt the neceſſitie, which is ſo great, that in matter of ſpiritual life, it is as requiſite to pray, as in the animal to breath. We are choaked with fleſh and fat and the flames of concupiſcence, unleſs we upon all occaſions open our mouthes to take the gentle air of God.

Secondly, the pleaſures we therein take, in proceſs of time, is verily that which the prophet Iſaiah calleth Sabbatum delicatum, the delicate Sabbath. As much as to ſay, the delicious repoſe of the ſoul. The corporal eye (as ſaith the learned Prelate William of Paris) maketh its repaſt upon the beauty of the fields, the flowers, the heavens, the ſtars, and on all the objects which are found in this univerſe. But the eye of contemplation by the means of prayer nouriſheth it ſelf with the excellencie of God and the perfections of Jeſus.

Thirdly, the puritie and perfection of the ſoul, which is derived from this exerciſe, ought to ſerve us as a ſpecial ſpur. There it is (ſaith Albertus Magnus) where we carrie our mouthes even to the ſource and wel-ſpring of virtue. There it is where God is known, and knowing him that we love him, and in loving him we ſearch him, in ſearching him we take pains, and in taking pains we find him.

In the fourth place, we have the example of our Saviour who for our inſtruction ſpent the nights in prayer, the example of the Apoſtles and all Saints, who have practiced and recommended this exerciſe to us.

The ninth SECTION.

The neceſsitie of Confeſsion.

MEn reſemble ſnails, every one carrieth his own houſe with him, a houſe wholy repleniſhed with darkneſs, although it ever ſeem lightſom: A houſe, which hath neither door nor window, though therein be a thouſand witneſſes which ſee all that paſſeth with as many eyes as heaven hath ſtars: A houſe compoſed of labyrinths, yet cannot the Hoſt hide himſelf in it: A houſe whereinto the ſun peepeth not, and yet may even the very leaſt atoms be ſeen: A houſe, wherein there are perpetual pleadings, yet never any iſſue of proceſs but with iſſue of life. Finally, a houſe which hath two faces altogether different, the one called hell, the other Paradiſe. In a word, this houſe whereof I ſpeak, is the conſcience. It is full of darkneſs, for the thoughts of men are involved in ſuch a cloud of obſcuritie, that neither the devils nor Angels themſelves ſee any thing therein, yet is it lightſom, for ever the eye of propet conſcience reflecteth thereon. There is no door nor window, for all is very cloſe ſhut up; yet do a thouſand witneſſes fix their eyes thereon, for the conſcience alone is called a thouſand-witneſſes. It is compoſed of labyrinths, for there are all flexibilities and ſubtil mazes: in this labyrinth the hoſt cannot hide himſelf; for it is ever day-pierced by the eye of God, before whom neither the abyſs nor hell it ſelf hath darkneſs enough to hide it. The ſun peepeth not in there, for in effect its light which diſplayeth all the objects of the world before our eyes, cannot diſcover the ſimpleſt of our thoughts; yet may the very leaſt atoms be ſeen, for there is not any thing ſo ſubtil which can free it ſelf from the eyes of God. They perpetually plead there; for every moment the conſcience chalengeth us even upon the leaſt ſins, and the iſſue of the proceſs concludeth not but with the end of life, becauſe at that very hour the deciſive ſentence of our eternitie is given.

In fine, this houſe hath two faces, whereof the one is called hell, to wit the evil conſcience, and the other Paradiſe, that is the good and innocent, which we cannot throughly ſettle in this great corruption of the heart of man but by a good confeſſion.

Too much ſhade hurteth ſeeds which begin to grow, darkneſs duls them, and the eye of the ſun ſerves them as a father. Aſſure your ſelf the buds of virtue hold the ſame courſe, there muſt be day to bring them into the light, and he who will hide his life, ſhall looſe all the fruit he may hope thereof. Confeſſion is the price of our immortalitie, the citie of refuge given us by God: but if it be once ill managed it is not a confeſſion, but a double confuſion, for feigned miſerie excludeth true mercie, nor did ever preſumption well accord with pitie.

Among the moſt eſpecial exerciſes of devotion are confeſſion, communion, meditation, ſpiritual lection, and the fruit we derive from the word of God. Concerning the practiſe of confeſſion we will onely ſpeak with much brevitie thereof, for at this preſent there are great ſtore of books which teach this method. works, is the accusation of our evil. If you desire utterly to forsake the animal life to submit to the spiritual, put in the fore-front a good general confession. Confession (saith S. Ambrose) is the price of our immortality: It is the tribute of Heaven, signified by the piece of coyn which S. Peter found in the mouth of a fish.

Gulielm. Paris. de Sacrament Pœnitent. l. 12. Matth. 17.

General confession the beginning of spiritual life.

Necessity seems to require it, for the reasons which follow. First, how many sins are left by the way, how many by culpable ignorance, sometimes through fear, and shame, and other reprehensible manner? Secondly, what invalidities and nullities of confession may happen, now by the defect of the Priest, who perhaps hath not sufficient jurisdiction, sometime through your own indisposition, who neither will have sorrow nor good purpose of amendment, and sometime for other circumstances? Thirdly, who seeth not that the foundation of a life truly Christian, is humility? And we know not how better to attain this virtue, than by representing to our selves, no longer by piece-meal, but wholly in gross, the youth, follies, the slackness, negligences, infidelities, and impurities of our passed life. All that coming to pour it self upon our consideration, like a great squadron, necessarily stirreth in us a great confusion and dolour for our ingratitude. In the fourth place, we ordinarily see those who duely make this act, unfolded and delivered in all its particulars, do come as it were out of the furnace, sparkling with radiant brightness, to form a life absolutely new. You therein observe a conscience most curious, intentions better rectified, actions more purified, a promptness better awakened for the service of God, a modesty more regular in prosperity, a heart more elevated in adversity, a more generous contempt of the world. Briefly, although one should reap but this onely good which is the peace and tranquility of conscience, it would always be a matter marvellously recommendable. And we know by experience, many consciences tormented with divers remorses and scruples, have after a general confession, found themselves wholly pacified, and have begun to breath a more benign air of the mercies of God. To proceed therein, it is good well to sound your heart afore-hand, and to descend into the knowledge of your self, which is a work of no small importance.

Its utility.

heavy correction upon us, leaving us to our selves. It seemeth we now have our heads turned backward, never to know what passeth in our hearts. But God in the day of judgement will turn it before, and, if we take not very good heed, to our confusion. S. Augustine triumpheth upon this passage: That which thou hast put behind thee, I will place before thine eyes. Thou shalt see thy impurities, not to correct them, but to confound thee. Turn thy face, go behind thy self, and set thy self before thy self.

August. in Psal. 49. Qua post dorsum posuisti ante faciem pônam: videbis fœditatem tuam non ut corrigas, sed ut erubescas. Tolle te à tergo tuo, & constitue te ante te.

The manner will be after an humble and serious invocation of the Holy Ghost, to call to mind all your life, according to the course and progress of ages, remembring your self of the places where you have made abode, the persons with whom you have conversed, the affairs which you have handled, the sins to which you have been most inclined, and which most afflict your conscience. Observing also (if it be possible) the number of those which are most heinous, which if it cannot be done, do not search them out with pensiveness and anxiety.

The order which ought to be observed, is, to run through the law or the ten Commandments of God, and those of the Church, taking every one in his place. As upon the first Commandment, to examine the sins of infidelity, of contempt of holy things, of impiety, sorceries, divinations, magick, dreams, superstitions, distrusts of the mercy of God, presumptions of ones own ability, languishment, coldness, hypocrisies, impurities, sacriledges in the service of God; speaking distinctly upon every word, wherein and how, by what motive and to what purpose.

II. Upon the second, unnecessary oaths, false oaths, blasphemies, execrations, profanation of things sacred and words of Scripture.

III. Upon the third, the exercise of labour, traffick, of civil and criminal justice, and other works forbidden on Sundays.

The irreverence committed on this great day, in neglecting to hear the whole Mass, or some notable part thereof, and employing all your time in excess of tongue, dances, masks, follies, sensualities.

IV. Upon the fourth, contempt, hatred, distast, ingratitude, irreverence, disobedience towards father and mother, kindred, and Superiours: Neglect towards your subjects, vassals, and houshold-servants.

V. Upon the fifth, the clamours, enmities, quarrels, violences, faithlessness, injustices, oppressions, poisonings, abortions, slaughters, malice, outrages, cruelties committed against your neighbour. The ill usage of your own person, by perplexity, despair, or impatient desire of death.

VI. Upon the sixth, fornications, adulteries, incests, whoredoms, ravishments, secret marriages, sacriledges, self-softnesses, pollutions, ill use of marriage, and other infamous luxuries, which Tertullian termeth monsters. Adde all that which attendeth on wantonness, as dishonest thoughts, unchaste words, lascivious glancings, kisses, touches, books, pictures, comedies, love-letters, dancings, masks, too free conversations with evident danger of sin, and sometime charms, love-potions, or other attractives, characters, and witch-crafts.

VII. Upon the seventh, thefts, pilferies, robberies, connivence with thieves, falsification of instruments, of letters, seals, wills, contracts, scedules, obligations, false purchases, false buyings, false sales, false coyns, deceits, defraudations, surprizes, usurpations of the goods of the Church, simonies, usuries, delays of reasonable payments, injustices, litigious wranglings, excessive expences, foul play in game, cruelties toward the poor, and such like things.

VIII. Upon the eighth, false witnesses and sollicitations thereof, calumnies, diffamatory libels, lies, impostures, hypocrisies, dissimulations, flatteries, treasons, confusion of your neighbour.

The Practice of Confession.

Heart of man Pravum cor hominis & inscrutabile. Hier. 17.

THe heart of man is a little abyss which seemeth neither to have bounds, bottom, nor shore. It is malicious and inscrutable, said the Prophet. The Hebrew readeth in the same place, that it is a supplanter, who escapeth from us like an eel, when we think to hold it, and oftentimes it overthroweth us. The great S. Macarius assureth us it is a little vessel, but full of caverns, labyrinths, precipices, lyons, serpents, and other venemous beasts. Moreover self-love, which oftentimes like a wicked watch-man placeth himself at the gate of our heart, will not suffer truth to approach. It maketh him think, it is too crude, drie, austere, old, wrinckled to be presented to such a Prince. In the mean time it relateth all things to the heart to its own advantage, and entertaineth it with a thousand curiosities of conceits. It maketh all vices to be beheld therein in full proportion, and virtue in eclipse.

Macar. hom. 43.

Knowledge of ones self very hard.

Self-love.

This admitted, necessarily the assistance of God is to be implored in a very particular manner, to obtain the knowledge of our selves, and to labour therein couragiously and stoutly without flattering our selves. God threateneth in the Prophet, he will lay a

IX. Upon the ninth, enterprizes and designs contrary to marriage, by seducing the parties with words, signs, gestures, letters, gifts, attractions, with deliberate purpose and unbridled desire of sin.

X. Upon the tenth, disordinate thirst of riches, principally to the prejudice of your neighbour.

Upon the commandments of the Church, the omissions of Mass, or notable negligences and distractions in hearing it on feasts commanded. The sin against abstinence from meats and fasts appointed; against the use of Sacraments of confession and communion; against the observation of times fit for marriage, against faith and sincerity in the payment of tythes.

Amongst the sins against the law of God and ordinances of the Church are comprehended the seven sins, which we call mortal and capital. As against the first Commandment, the sin of pride, in the great opinion of your self, the obstinacy in your own judgement and will, the disobedience to Superiours, the ambition of honours, vanities, vaunts, follies. The sin of sloth, in slackness, ill expence of time, negligence, remissness of courage, pusillanimity. The sin of gluttony, in making a god of ones belly. The sin of avarice upon the seventh. The sin of wrath and envy upon the fifth. The sin of luxury upon the sixth. Behold an abundance of matter to be examined in a general confession. All is proposed which may have happened. I do not say that we must rest upon every point scrupulously, to search into that which never hath been, and (as they say) shave an egge.

Particular sins.

Every one ought more particularly to descend into the vices of his own nature and profession; as Lords and Gentlemen to examine the sins of pride, tyranny, curiosity, delights, in looking after their pleasures more than the profit of the publick, in exacting things not due, in usurping the pains, goods, sweat, bloud of vassals, and, being men, to have served themselves with men in all prodigality. In neglecting the keeping of peace and justice, the duty, charges, and reparation of places to which they stand obliged. In giving estates, offices, benefices, to vitious and uncapable persons. In violating ecclesiastical rites. In notably damnifying, for the pleasures of hunting and hawking, the fields and possessions of others. In stopping the course of justice by favour. In vexing, tormenting, imprisonning, condemning through passion, without lawful proof. In overlashing, in ambition, lust, bragging, excessive expences and such like things.

Judges and Magistrates, of ignorance, malice, negligences, as being intruded into their places without capacity, by favour and money. In behaving themselves carelessly, without serious study of that which is their profession. In not soundly, seriously, and solidly examining processes, but contenting themselves with superficial notice. In giving sentence for money and favour, and many times against men unheard, without order or form of justice. In going out of the circuit of their jurisdiction, to encroach upon the authority of others. In bearing themselves with passion in affairs. In entertaining bad officers, in prolonging processes by cautelous references or affected laziness. In solliciting the wife and daughter, who plead upon promise of favour. In exercising on festival days acts of judicature without necessity. In neglecting the government and weal-publick, for the accommodation of his own affairs. In tollerating scandalous sins against the honour of God.

Practice of ordinary confession.

Women, about their pomps, curiosities, excesses, dissolutions in apparel and dressings, pride, fierceness, boldness, impatience, quarrels, loves, jealousies, courtings, idleness, and so of the rest.

For those who often confess in ordinary confessions, it sufficeth to examine their thoughts, words, deeds, omissions. Of thoughts, some are burdensom, some affected, some bitter, some vain. The burdensom, as those which proceed against faith and honesty, to persons who much are alienated from ill affections; and such thoughts ought rather to be despised than examined. The affected, as those of complacence, of curiosity, of our own commodity, and of some passion a little exorbitant towards creatures. The bitter, as those of suspitions, jealousies, disdains, aversions, choller. The vain, as those which are brought forth at all moments in the childishness of a scattered uncollected heart, and flie therein as birds do in the air. It is as impossible as unnecessary to take an account of them. It is sufficient to confess in general, and to declare the habitudes and dispositions of his heart.

Thoughts of four sorts.

Words are the interpreters of our soul, and the chariots which carry our senses and affections: Some carry rice, others honey, the rest vineger. They carry rice, who are over-joyous, recreative, impertinent, idle, facetious. They carry honey, who have petty affectations, courtships, lies, exaggerations, complacences, flatteries, soothings, boastings. And they bear vineger, who are somewhat rude, fierce, disdainful, biting, riotous, and ill-spoken.

Words the chariot of the soul.

Deeds concern God, your neighbour, and your self. For that which appertaineth to God, you must first accuse your self of defects in the exercises of devotion, as prayer, vocal, mental, meditation, examen, spiritual reading, the Sacraments. For that which appertaineth to your neighbour and your self, you have four horses in the chariot of imperfection, which transport many of your actions, to wit, vanity, impatience, curiosity, negligence.

Works.

Vanity intrudeth it self into all parts, saith Cassianus: into apparel, going, speech, into watchings, prayers, into abstinencies and fasts. It combateth in the midst of virtues, to triumph over virtues. It presenteth it self as well to the victorious, as to the assaylant. Impatience, in so many contentions and encounters with your neighbour, and if one have no other adversary he strugleth with himself. Curiosity, in too much seeking his own commodities and ease of body. Negligences in offices, in mannaging of affairs and charges: omissions, as of good resolved purposes of prayer, and laudable actions, which one ought to do either by justice, or by charity, or by vow, or by rule, or by promise, or necessity. One may upon this choose seven or eight imperfections which most molest him, to be therein short.

Behold as it were the matter of Confessions. For the form to unfold ones self, no man should make strange, if some for the comfort of their memory, having run over the abridgement and summary of matter of Confession, do make an extract of that which concerneth them, principally in general Confessions. The wisest of the Roman Emperours, Augustus, was so considerate, that treating upon some affairs with his wife, he spake to her by writing, to avoid mistaking. Can a man take too much consideration in an affair of so great importance, which passeth with God?

When the principal points are marked out, they must be explicated in intelligible terms. There are some large consciences who have nothing to say, some scrupulous, who desire to say all, and some reasonable, who proceed therein with mediocrity. To say he is a great sinner, that he hath broken all the branches of mortal sins, that he hath not served God so well as he should, and that if he have done such or such a thing, he asketh pardon, that is to say nothing. You must specifie and descend to particulars, propose the act, deliver it with lawful and necessary circumstances, touch the motive without extravagancies, and the intention which hath excited us to do it, and continuance of the sin, to represent the state of the soul to the life. Yet for all this you must not so much think upon this preparation nor the means to unfold your self, that thereby the principal part of penance be neglected, which is contrition.

Contrition. This contrition is a sorrow to have offended God, not principally for the deformity of sin, and the fear of punishment (for that is nothing but attrition) but for that this sin is committed against God, infinitely good, and infinitely amiable; and for that one maketh a firm resolution to be confessed, and to preserve himself from sin in time to come. Behold the point of contrition, which to attain you must seriously and advisedly represent to your self the greatness, goodness, power, wisdom, justice, love, mercy, benefits of God; opposed to your malice, weakness, baseness, ignorance, presumption, misery, ingratitude, and well figure to your self the hostility of mortal sin, to obtain an eternal detestation against it. To consider how it ruineth riches, honours, credit, reputation, posterity, and Empires. That it soyleth the glory of an innocent life, and leaveth a character of infamy. That it overthroweth bodies, health, good grace; that it openeth the gates of sudden and unexpected death. That it maketh man blind, dumb, deaf, wicked, senseless, stupid, savage, and many times furious and enraged by the remorse of conscience. That it dispoileth a soul of all the graces, beauties, excellencies, priviledges, love, favour of God, hope of life and salvation. That it killeth it, and rendeth it more cruelly than a tiger or panther. That a life of God was needful to take away such a blemish, and that if a soul be spotted at the hour of death, an eternity of flames cannot deliver it, and such like.

Hostility of sin.

In sins which seem least, you shall always have great cause of contrition, when the benefits of God shall be represented unto you, which he particularly and personally hath conferred upon us, opposed to our childishness of heart, tepidity, slackness, infidelity, negligence, ingratitude. As for the proceeding to confession, the preparatives being well made, it is needful to choose a Confessour who hath four qualities, jurisdiction, reputation, knowledge, discretion, and after you have confessed to him entirely, faithfully, sincerely, to accomplish the penance enjoyned you with obedience, promptness, and punctual diligence, afterward to take a new spirit, to resist temptations, and to busie your self in good works with more courage than ever.

Proceeding in confession.

The eleventh SECTION.

The Practice of Examen.

Necessity of examen. THe practice of Confession is made more easie by the examen of conscience, as well general as particular. Think not too much is required of your profession, if there be speech used to you of the examen of conscience. Not onely the Philosophers have made it, as Pythagoras, Seneca, Plutarch, but poor barbarous Indians, by the relation of Apulejus, took an account every evening of the good and evil they had done each day. This is it, which is required of you. Prepare daily a little Consistory of justice in your conscience; see what passeth within your self, acknowledge your defects, and amend them to prevent the justice of God.

It is said the eclipse of the Sun causeth the earthquake: and the eclipse of reason by ignorance of the interiour man produceth great disorders in the soul. For the wicked spirit (saith Procopius) upon the first of Kings, endeavoureth to use us as did the Ammonites the inhabitants of Jabes: They seek to pull out our right eye, and to bereave us of the sight of our selves, to bury us in great and deep confusions. But let us make use of all the lights which God hath given us, to cast reflections into the bottom of our thoughts. The conscience is an admirable Tribunal, where Justice pleadeth and Mercie sentenceth. All that which the one writes, the other blotteth out, putting as it were the point of the pen upon the heart of the penitent.

Cuilelm. Parisiens. c. 12. Sacro pœnite. In hoc Tribunali sedet misericordia, assidet autem justitia, ubi quicquid contra pœnitentem inscribit justitia, totum delet misericordia, acumen stili velut figens in corde pœnitentis.

A good Interpreter of the Scripture relateth the vision of a wise man, who on a day sought for the house of conscience, and it seemed to him he beheld a Citie built with goodly architecture, beautified with five gates, which had as many narrow paths ending in one larger way. Upon this way stood a Register, who took the names of all passengers to record them. Beyond that he saw two Tribunes, attended by a great concourse of the common people, who governed the inferiour parts of the Citie: above was beheld a Cittadel, wherein a great Princess commanded, who had a sceptre in hand and crown on her head.

Delrio ser. de Conscientia.

By her side was a Ladie very ancient and venerable, who in one hand held a torch with which she lighted this Queen, and in the other a goad wherewith she pricked her, if she governed not according to her direction.

The wise man amazed, asked in his heart what all this train meant, and he heard a voice within, which said unto him: Behold thy self ere thou art aware, arrived at the house of conscience, which thou soughtest for. These five gates thou seest are the five senses. The way where they all meet is common sense: All the people which enter in by heaps, are the objects of the creatures of the world, which first touch our senses before they pass into the soul. This Register who writeth down the names, is imagination, that keeps record of all things: These two Tribunes are the two appetites, the one is called the appetite of concupiscence, which is ever in search after its desires, the other the appetite of anger, extreamly striving to strike at all obstacles which oppose its good, either real or pretended: This mass of people thou seest, are the passions, which make ill work in the inferiour parts of the Citie: This Princess in the Cittadel with crown and scepter, is reason: The ancient and venerable Ladie by her side, is conscience: She hath a torch to shew the good way, and the goad to prick those that wander: In a word, if thou desirest to know what conscience is, it is a sovereign notice of good and ill, which God impresseth on our hearts as with a hot iron, and is very hard to be taken off.

Dictamen rationis, spiritus corrector, & pædagogus animæ. S. Thom. 1. p. q. 79.

Happy he who often visiteth this interiour house God hath given him, and pondereth all his thoughts, his words, and actions, to adopt them to the measures of the eternal law.

You know a general examen hath five parts: Thanksgiving, invocation, discussion, petition, resolution. In thanksgiving, we thank God principally for the benefits received that day. In invocation the light of heaven is required to know our sins, and amend them. In discussion an account is asked of our soul, running through the hours of the day, of thoughts, words, works, and omissions. In petition pardon of our sins is implored. In the up-shot of all, good purposes are made to correct ones self by the assistance of grace. If you think to live in such purity, that you may find nothing more to examine, it is for want of light or application of mind. Know there are six things ever to busie the most perfect in their examen.

Parts.

The first, to ponder the roots of our defects, errours, imperfections. The second, to see the remedies which may be given thereunto. The third, to distinguish true and solid virtues from those which are no other than virtues in apparence. The fourth, to pick out in all our works the intentions and motives which transport us, and what the affections are which at that time govern our soul. The fifth,

Six things in examen to employ the most perfect.

to

to see what wanteth of perfection in good works which we do, and how they may be performed with the most accomplishment. The sixth, to compare our gains, our losses, our encrease, our decrease in matter of virtue.

Particular examen.

A particular examen is made, when one undertaketh to wrastle with one vice alone, and to extirpate one sole imperfection. For he that will sometime strike at them in gross, resembleth the souldier of Sertorius, who tugged at a horses tayl, by strength of arm to pull it quite away: Another more wise pulled it off hair after hair, and so prevailed. The like happeneth in our vices and defects. He must pull them away by little threads, who will effectually correct them. Wherefore one riseth in the morning with a thought not to fall that day into such an imperfection, and to oppose it in every place, as some enemy which one would vanquish. After dinner retiring himself apart, he doth three things. The first, to ask an account of his soul of the relapses which have been made into this imperfection. The second, to note the number, making so many pricks with a pen. The third, to purpose to arm himself for the rest of the day. After supper the like exercise is made, and so one findeth out from day to day, from week to week, from moneth to moneth, what profit is made. There is no imperfection so deeply rooted which is not pulled away by the grace of God, you remaining in the constancy of such an exercise.

corde meo quasi ignis exæstuans claususque in ossibus meis, & defeci ferre non sustinens.

The mother of young Tobie sighing said: My son, all our treasures, our riches, our honours, our contentments, our delights were in thy person, and therefore we ought never to be separated from thee. But it is verily in this subject, we have true cause to speak these words. All is in the sacred Eucharist; the body, the bloud, the soul, the life, the humanity, the divinity of Jesus Christ, all that which he hath derived from the Eternal Father, all that which he hath taken from our nature, he yieldeth us in this blessed Sacrament, and doth as the bee who robbeth the flowers of his Masters garden, to restore all again in honey. All the perfections which our Lord hath conferred on his own Person, are seasoned to us in this high and majestical mysterie, as in a honey-comb. It is an extension of the Incarnation of the Son of God: He was once hypostatically united to one sole man, but here he is united to all men as oftentimes as they receive him by a visceral transfusion of himself, as one should melt one piece of waxe within another (as saith S. Cyril.) And then who would not desire such an union of a Saviour so merciful with a sinner so miserable? of a sovereign Physitian with a sick man so remedilesse? of a King so powerful with a vassal so wretched? of a Father so benign with a son so refractary? May we not well say, that they which tast not this celestial viand have their rellishes much dulled with the leeks and onions of Ægypt? May we not affirm that they lead no other life but of a mushrome? Ought we not al the night before to make our hearts sparkle in good desires and jaculatory prayers, when we go to the bed of our celestial bridegroom.

Tob. 10. Omnia simul in te uno habentes non debuimus demittere te.

Greatness of the Eucharist.

Endeavour then to awaken and cherish your desire with a thousand aspirations and elevations of heart, and have always in your mouth some good words, which may be the pledges and earnest-penies of your intentions. Behold the first leaf of the lilie.

The twelfth SECTION.

The practice of Communion.

ALl those who dispose themselves to a life more Christian, know they have not a means more wholesom nor effectual to acquire and preserve the grace of God, than the Sacrament of the Altar, and for this cause it is fit both often and duely to have access thereunto. But a beautiful looking-glass in a golden frame in the house of a blind man; an excellent lute in the chamber of the deaf; a goodly diamond in a truss of straw; a honey-comb in the throat of a dead lyon, what availeth all this? The blind man seeth not, the deaf heareth not, the diamond sparkleth not, the honey-comb nourisheth not. And what profiteth likewise the blessed Sacrament in a faint, languishing, and indisposed soul? Imagine according to that which the learned Rupertus saith, that the Blessed Sacrament is the fountain of terrestrial Paradise, which watereth the whole Church with its delicious refreshings.

Communion without preparation, what it is.

Eucharist the foundation or Paradise.

All the faithful draw from thence, but all come not with the same disposition. Some bring thither a heart of paper, that is to say, a childish heart which padleth in the water and no whit profiteth. Others, a heart like a sive, that lets all go through, and retaineth nothing but a little moysture. The rest a heart of a sponge, which is abundantly replenished with the favours and mercies of God. If you desire to communicate fruitfully, make a present to your celestial spouse (who is pleased to feed among lilies) of a lilie of six leaves. There are six remarkable qualities which must be had to accomplish this exercise. Two before communicating, desire and puritie: Two in communicating, humility and charity: Two after communicating, thanksgiving and renovation of the inward man by the oath of fidelity.

Three sorts of hearts.

Lilie with six leaves to communicate

You must then endeavour from the eve of the day you are to receive, to make a furnace of desires in your heart, that so you may say with the Prophet Jeremie: I feel in my heart a burning fire, which fixeth it self even in my bones, and the violence thereof is such that I cannot bear it. Let us go to this sacred table as the thirsty Hart to the stream of waters, as an hungry creature to a feast, as the bridegroom to the wedding a thousand times desired, as the covetous to a myne of gold, as the conqueret to spoils. Is not there matter sufficient to serve as a spur to your desires, since there is our beginning, our origen, our treasure, our sovereign good?

Desire.

Jer. 20. Factus est in me.

Second leaf of the lilie, puritie.

The second is called purity. I speak not of that which concerneth the purging of mortal sins by confession, which is wholly necessary, and cannot be omitted without sacriledge; I speak of purity more subtile and fine, which consisteth in faith, affections, and intentions. You ought first to have a singular faith, and a most worthy and serious understanding of the mysterie, not onely in believing what the Church teacheth us of this Sacrament, either of the reality of the precious body of our Saviour, or of transubstantiation; but to believe it sincerely, clearly, firmly, without curiosity, restriction, or hesitation; not as those who convinced, and as it were confounded with reason, do in some sort believe, and upon the least occasion repent in their faithless heart what they have believed, & make to themselves a faith floating and racking up and down, like clouds under the breath of the winds. When you go to receive the Blessed Sacrament, you must do as Abraham did in his Sacrifice, hold the bond-men and ass, which are your senses, at the foot of the hill, and let your will and understanding ascend, lightened with the torch of faith, even to the height, to sink it self down into those resplendent nights of the wisdom of Heaven.

What ought to be the faith of a good communicants.

Intention.

For purity of intention, which is the character of our actions, I would have nothing side-ways nor bearing upon any byas: I will not that you communicate for some humane respect, some civil decencie, or to please those whose favour you desire, nor nor for some trifling vanity, and sometimes hypocrisie, or other ends and aims which are far estranged from the ways of God. You must communicate with intention to unite your self to God your beginning, to whiten and guild your self with his sights, to enkindle your self the more in his love, to retain the memory of that Sacrifice which he offered on mount Calvarie, that is to say, of his most venerable passion; to appease the anger of God for as many sins as are committed; to implore the assistance of Heaven for the necessities of the Church, as well for the living as dead; to obtain for your self and persons of whom mention is made, some victory over temptations, some new virtues, some temporal grace, in as much as shall concern the spiritual state. Briefly, for thanksgiving for the benefits which we receive from his Divine Majesty, both in general and particular.

Purity of affection.

Purity of affections consisteth principally in two points: To banish from your heart all animosities, revenges, quarrels, punctillioes, and readily to reconcile your self before you come to the Altar: The other is to free your self, not onely from affections dishoneſt and unlawful, but also a little exorbitant, which one may have to any creature whatsoever. It is convenient your heart be then as a chrystal-vial filled with clear water, wherein the least moat of uncleanness may be seen. It is to put Adonis in the crib of Bethleem (which heretofore the infidels did) when we communicate still retaining impure passions with a deliberate purpose.

Adonis in the crib of Bethleem.

Germanus Patriarch of Constantinople in his Theory saith the pixe, which is the vessel and resting-place where the Blessed Sacrament is put, is called Ciborium, as one would say the Ark of lights, to teach us that at the onely sight of this Sacrament, we must dispel all thoughts of darkness which have possessed our soul. And for the better obtaining this purity, it is good to practice some devotions in the eve of receiving, as mortification of tongue by retirement and silence, as abstinence, or some other exercise of humility or work of mercy. When the day cometh, run to this heavenly Manna in the morning: Amuze not your self too much in decking and accommodating your body, nor in scattering and disordering your mind in vain cares and sollicitudes, but keep the vessel of your heart as a well stopped pot, to pour it out at the table of your spouse. It is at the instant of receiving that you must imitate the Seraphins of the Prophet Isaiah, to hold all your wings still but onely two, which are humility and charity: These are the two wings on which you ought to poyze your self at your pleasure. First, grounding all in reverence before the eyes of this ineffable Majesty, abasing your self even to the center of your nothing, treading under foot all presumptions, vanities, follies, by a most perfect humility of spirit. Secondly, to stir up lively and ardent affections with all the endeavour of your heart, and if that suffice not, offer all to God in the union of his onely Son, and merits of the most Blessed Virgin Mary.

Moving wings.

To cherish the affections of these holy virtues, you must have your prayers, meditations, and considerations upon the Blessed Sacrament well prepared and digested with variety, that you may still hold your devotion in breath, as:

Exod. 3. Considerations for Communion. Moses before the burning bush.

I. To represent Moses in the bush burning, seized with a holy fire, who heard these words: Put off thy shoes, take away thy sensual affections, the land here is holy, yea it is the Holy of Holies: This is the noble fire which enflameth Angels in heaven and pure souls on earth, which is enchaled within the species of the Sacrament. What ought you then to do?

Solve calceamentum de pedibus tuis, locus in quo stas terra sanctaest. Reg. 44. The Hostess of Eizeus.

II. To represent unto your self that your soul is as the Hostess of the Prophet Elizeus, the good Shunamite, who prepareth her heart as a lodging for the King of Prophets, thanksgiving as a table, humility for a seat, and charity for a candle lighted.

Ruth. 2. 8, 9. Unde mihi hoc ut invehirem gratiam ante oculos tuos? & posse me dignarerin peregrinam mulierem?

III. To represent to your self that it is a Ruth, who accounted it a great favour to be esteemed by Booz, and to have leave to glean in the fields after his harvest men, and acknowledging with gratitude so small a benefit, she laid with her face prostrated on the earth: From whence cometh this favour which I have gained in your presence? From whence proceedeth that you deign to know me who am but a poor forraigner? What ought you to say?

Esther. 7. 3. Quæ est petitio tua, Esther, ut detur tibi? Et quid vis fieri? Etiamsi dimidiam partem regni mei petieris, impetrabis.

IV. That it is as the humble Esther before Ahasuerus, and that it kisseth the golden rod, and moreover that it understandeth these words: What is thy demand, Esther? Tell me, to the end it may be granted. What wouldst thou have me do? If thou askest me the moity of my Kingdom, thou shalt have it. Answer, you would have nothing but the King, and that he alone sufficeth you.

Mephibosheth 2 Reg. 9. Et tu comedes panem in mensâ meâ semper. Quis ego sum servus tuus, quoniam respexisti super me canem mortuum?

V. That it is as Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, to whom David spake these words: My meaning is, you shall eat at my table all the days of your life. What answered this little son of the King thereupon? Alas, Sir, who am I your poor servant that you please to cast your eye upon me, a dead dog, such as I am?

1 Reg. 1. Jonathan.

VI. That it is as Jonathan, who extreamly tired, dipped the end of a wand which he carried in his hand into an honey-comb, and lifting it to his lips, at that instant behold his eyes, before heavy and oppressed, became clear again, and his body reassumed new and fresh vigour. There needeth but a little consideration to a well composed spirit, both to cast it presently down by humility into the center of nothing, and to raise it by love even above the emperial Heaven. One may likewise every time he receiveth, prepare divers meditations to entertain himself more at large, either before or after the mysterie.

Other considerations.

I. As meditation upon the history, considering 1. The eating of the lamb. 2. The washing of feet. 3. The institution of the Blessed Sacrament.

II. The names, as Eucharist, Communion, Sacrifice, Bread, Viaticum, and other such like, practising your self to search out the reason of every one, with application of spirit, to derive from thence things agreeable to the name which one meditateth: As upon the name of Communion, the resolution of peace, concord, and charity.

III. The figures, as the bread and wine of Melchisedech, the Paschal Lamb, Manna, the bread of Elias, meditating upon the histories and conformities which they have with this Divine mysterie, and the fruits we ought to draw from thence.

IV. The causes of the institution. 1. As to serve us for a memory of the Passion. 2. An incitement of love and charity. 3. For spiritual nourishment. 4. For Sacrifice. 5. For a pledge of beatitude, considering whether we answer to the intention of the Son of God in this action. After receiving you must rest upon the two last leaves of the lilly, which are thanksgiving, and renovation of spirit. You then must adore this great guest whom you have in your heart, with all the powers of Heaven and creatures of the earth, to play your part as if you were a little string of the great harp of the world. To offer to God the whole world as a votive-table hanged on his altar, collected in the perfections of his onely Son, who is wholly yours, being so freely given to you, so solemnly, so irrevocably, as he whose Divinity, soul, life, flesh, and bloud you have in this incomprehensible Sacrament. To give him thanks for the infinite riches he hath placed in this sacred humanity which you enjoy, and for that he hath given you his Son for father, brother, Master, Leader, Redeemer; for the good he communicateth to all faithful people by the means of this inexhaustible fountain of grace, for the special favours he hath done to you and yours, for the natural talents with which he hath adorned you, and likewise for the various change of comforts and discomforts with which he hath enterlaced your life. Briefly, for the present visit which he hath made in the house of your heart, so ill prepared.

After adoration and thanksgiving, followeth petition for the faithful and unfaithful, whose conversion we desire: For the Church and all the Prelats which govern it, namely him whom he hath appointed to be our Pastour: For the person of the King and all the Realm: For his kinred, friends, benefactours living and dead. To ask for your self seven gifts, which a holy Virgin (by the relation of S. Bonaventure) daily begged of God. 1. Effectual grace to accomplish the law of love. 2. To love all that God loveth. 3. To hate all he hateth. 4. Humility, chastity, obedience, contempt of the world, garnishment of all virtues. 5. That God would make his true Temple of our soul and body. 6. That he would give us his vision in beatitude. 7. That he may be divinely served in this place where you receive the Blessed Sacrament, and in all the other parts of Christendom. To conclude, to make in the end a renewing of the oath of fidelity, which we have sworn to our great Master, and to employ our time in his service with more diligence than ever: and since we are upon the palm-tree, let us gather the fruits, which are spiritual food, strength against temptations, heavenly alacrity, light of understanding, flames of charity, union with God, augmentation of virtues, hope of glory, renovation in all our faculties and functions, and namely let us often stay upon some particular object of virtue, which we would ask of our guest in favour of this celestial visitation.

Fruits of Communion.

The third is, to divide the Mass into certain parcels; and behold a very considerable manner. Represent to your self five great things in the mystery of the Mass, from whence you ought to draw so many fruits. These five things are, representation, praise, Sacrifice, instruction, nourishment.

Representation, because the Mass is a perfect image of the life and passion of our Saviour, and therefore the first fruit you ought to gather from thence, is, daily to imprint more lively in your heart the actions and passions of the Son of God, to conform your self thereunto.

Five notable things in the mystery of the Mass.

Radicati & superædificati in ipso. Col. 2. c.

Praise. So many words as are in the Mass aim at this purpose, to give praise unto God for this ineffable mystery of our redemption; and to conform your self to this action, you ought to bend all the endeavour of your heart to praise God, whether it be by vocal or mental prayer.

Sacrifice. It is a most singular act of Religion, by which we reverence and adore God for the infinite glory of his souereign Being. And the Mass is a true Sacrifice by eminency, where the life and bloud of beasts is not offered, but the life of a Saviour, which is more worth than the life of all Angels and men. Cedrenus recounteth that the Emperour Justinian caused an Altar to be made in the Church of Saint Sophia, wherein he used all sorts of mettal, of precious stones, of the richest materials which might be chosen out amongst all the magazins of nature, to incorporate all the beauties of the world in one sole master-piece. And verily this Sacrifice is the prime work of God, in which he hath as it were locked up all that which is great or holy in all the mysteries of our Religion. It was the custom daily to proportion the Sacrifices to the benefits of God. When in the old law he gave the fat of the earth, they offered the first-fruits to him: But now that he hath granted to us the dew of Heaven so long expected, his onely Son, we must render to him his Son again, which is done in the Sacrifice of the Mass. And the fruit you should derive from this consideration, is, at the elevation of the host, to offer Jesus Christ to God his Father by the ministery of the Priest, and to offer it. First, for a supream and incomparable honour of the Divine Majesty. Secondly, for thanksgiving for all benefits received and to be received. Thirdly, to obtain protection, direction, and prosperity in all your works. Besides offer up all your powers, faculties, functions, actions in the union of the merits of Jesus.

Mass a Sacrifice.

Cedren. in Compen. hist. Wonder of Justinian.

Instruction. Those who understand the words of the Mass, may draw goodly instructions from reading the Epistle, the Gospel, the Collects. All in general teach us the virtues of honour and reverence towards the Divine Majesty, seeing this Sacrifice is celebrated with so many holy, sacred, and profoundly dutiful ceremonies. Of gratitude, since God being once offered in the bloudy Sacrifice of the Cross, will also be daily presented to God his Father, in the title of gratitude: And that ought to awaken in us the memory of observing every benefit of God, with some remarkable act of devotion: Of Charity towards our common Saviour, and towards our neighbour, since we see a life of God spent for our redemption, and all faithful people.

Instruction. 4. of Mass.

Nourishment. The eye liveth by light and colours, the Bee by dew, the Phenix by the most thin and subtile vapours; and the soul of the faithful by the nourishment which it receiveth in the Blessed Sacrament, which is purely spiritual. This nourishment is not onely derived from the Sacramental Communion, by the real presence of the body of our Saviour, but also by the spiritual Communion which is made, when in the Sacrifice of the Mass, at the time of the Priest his communicating the same dispositions, apprehensions, and affections are entertained, Nourishment. 5.

Spiritual Communion.

The thirteenth SECTION.

* The practice to hear Mass.

 Parcè hac & in transcursu tantùm delibet Lector, ut Canis è Nilo.*

TO hear Mass is verily one of the most serious actions of all spiritual life. Had one all the understanding and reverence of Angels to be present thereat, it would never be enough. Saint Dyonys the Areopagite saith, that exactly to discharge this duty we must purifie our heart, Usque ad extremas imagines, so dispoiling it, that it may be free from all imaginations and humane representations: and that is it which Saint Bonaventure hath more clearly expressed, principally speaking of Priests who celebrate: That the time when they ought to approach, is, when they feel themselves wholly changed and become divine, in such sort that they behold not any thing but God. Philo the Bishop addeth, that the Sacrificers are as the ivory neck of the spouse, which must serve as a chanel for the Holy Ghost to make his graces distil upon the rest of the members that are present at this Sacrifice.

Dyonis. de Eccle. Hierarch. c. 6. Usque ad extremas imagines.

An excellent saying of S. Bonaventure. Cum fuerit totum alteratus, & divinus effectus, ita ut nihil videat nisi Deum, tunc accedat.

The first practice and most ordinary to hear Mass for those who understand the words there spoken, is, to follow them with application of spirit, and to accompany the silence of the Priest with some meditations or vocal prayers.

The second is, to stay ones self upon the signification of all the parts of the Mass: As at the Confiteor, to represent to your self man banished from Paradise, miserable, suppliant, confessing, deploring his sin. At the Introite, the enflamed desires of all mankind expecting the Messias. At the Hymn of Angels, Glory be to God on high, the Nativity. At the Prayers, thanksgiving for such a benefit. At the Epistle, the preaching of the Præcursour S. John. At the Gospel, truth preached by the Saviour of the world, and so of the rest.

as if really and actually one did receive. For this purpose it is fit to do three things. First, to excite anew in your self the acts of self-dislike, and contrition for your wretchednes and imperfections. The second, to take spiritually the carbuncle of the Altar, not with the pincers of the Seraphin, but with acts of a most lively faith, a most resolved hope, and a charitie most ardent, to open boldly the mouth of your heart, and pray our Saviour to enter in, as truly by the communication of his graces and favours (which are the rays of this Sun) as by the real imparting of his body and bloud, he gives himself to those that communicate. The third, to conclude all your actions with a most hearty thanksgiving.

The fourteenth SECTION.

Practice of Meditation.

OF four worlds which are the Architype, Intelligible, Celestial, and Elementary, prayer imitateth the most perfect, being a true image of the oeconomy of the holy Trinitie, which according to the maxims of Divines cannot pray to any (having no Superiour) yet affordeth a model for all prayers: For prayer, as saith Tertullian, is composed of reason, words, and spirit: Of reason, as we may interpret by the relation it hath to the Father: of words, as it is referred to the Word; of spirit, by the the direction it hath to the third Person. Now this principally agreeth with meditation. For it is that divine silence & delicious ravishment of the soul which uniteth man to God, and finite essence to Infinite.

Exod. 22.29. It is that plenitude and that tear spoken of in Exodus, according to an ancient translation: Plenitude, because it repleniſheth the soul with the splendour of consolations and sources, which distil from the Paradise of God: Tear, yea tear of myrrhe, because it distilleth under the eyes of God, as doth the tree which beareth myrrhe under the rays of the Sun. It is a wonderful thing to behold this little shrub, which doth not perpetually expect to be cut with iron, that it may drop forth its pleasing liquor, but the Sun reflecting on the branches thereof, becomes as it were a mid-wife, and maketh it bring forth what is sought after; which caused an excellent wit to say, that it drew life out of its blows, and made a dug of its wounds.

Oh happy soul that resembleth this generous plant, and which repleat with pious desires, holy affections, and sincere intentions, produceth apprehensions and works a thousand times more precious than myrrhe, when in the meditation the rays of Jesus Christ (who is the true Sun of justice) strikes the heart!

Necessity and easines of meditation. The practice of prayer consisteth in mental, vocal, and mixt. Mental is that which is exercised in the heart; vocal which is formed in the mouth; mixt participateth of both. Think it not to be a new thing not severed from your profession, to meditate. It were so if one would make your brain serve as a lymbeck for subtile and extravagant raptures, disguised in new words and forms. But when one speaketh of meditation, he adviseth you to ponder and ruminate the points and maximes which concern your salvation, with all sweetnes, that fruit most agreeable to your condition may be derived from thence. The faintnes, weaknes, infidelity, ignorance, drines, which reigneth in your souls, cometh from no other source, but the want of consideration. Take this worthy exercise couragiously in hand, and you shall feel your heart fattened with the unction of the Holy Ghost, and your soul of a wildernes to become a little Paradise of God. Be not affrighted hereat, as if it were a thing impossible for you: use a little method, and you shall find nothing more easie and familiar. What have you so natural in vital life as to breath? And what more proper in the intellectual than to think? Your soul hath no other operation, for night and day it is employed in this exercise. The Sun casteth forth beams, and our soul thoughts. Gather together onely those wandering thoughts which are scattered amongst so many objects into your center, which is God: Employ one part of the spirit, industrie, invention, discourse, which you are endowed withal for the mannaging of worldly affairs: Employ them I say in the work of your salvation, and you shall do wonders.

I undertake not here to raise you above the earth, nor in the beginning to plunge you into the seven degrees of contemplation, whereof S. Bonaventure speaketh in the treatise he composed thereof: I speak not to you of fire, unction, extasie, speculation, tast, repose, or glory, but I speak that in few words which you may read more at large in the works of so many worthy men, who have written upon that subject. First know what meditation is, secondly how it is ordered. What you must understand to meditate well.

Definition of meditation. Meditation properly is a prayer of the heart, by which we humbly, attentively, and affectionately seek the truth which concerns our salvation, thereby to guid us to the exercise of Christian virtues. That you may meditate well, you must know the causes, degrees, matter, and form of meditation. The principal cause thereof is God, who infuseth himself into our soul, to frame a good thought, as the Sun doth upon the earth to produce a flower. It is a goodly thing to have the spirit subtile and fruitful. It is to work without the Sun (saith Origen) to think, to do any thing here without the grace of the Holy Ghost. Causes.

The first degree which leadeth to good and serious prayer, is a good life, and principally purity of heart, tranquility of spirit, desire to make your self an inward man. Saint Augustine reciteth a saying of Porphyrius very remarkeable, which he deriveth from the mouth of this perfidious man, as one should pull a thing stoln out of a thiefs coffer: God the Creatour and Father of this whole Universe, hath no need of our service, but it is our good to serve him and adore him, making of our life a perpetual prayer, by a diligent enquiry of his perfections and imitation of his virtues. Observe then, the first degree of good prayer is good life.

Aug. l. 9. de civit. Dei. c. 23. Deus omnium Pater nullius indiget, sed nobis est bene cum eum adoramus, ipsam vitam, precem ad eum facientes, per inquisitionem & imitationem de ipso.

The second (as well this Authour hath noted) is the perquisition, to wit, the search of verities by thinking on the things meditated, which are the sundry considerations suggested to us by the spirit, in the exercise of meditation.

The third is the affection which springeth from these considerations: Our understanding is the steel, and our will the flint: As soon as they touch one another, we see the sparkes of holy affections to flie out. We must bray together the matters of prayer as Aromatick spices with the discussion of our understanding, before we can extract good odours.

The fourth is the imitation and fruit of things we meditate on. It is the mark at which our thoughts should aim, otherwise if one should pretend nothing else but a vain business of the mind, it would be to as much purpose to drive away butter-flies, as to meditate. Good meditation and good action ought to be entertained as two sisters, holding one another by the robe.

Matter of meditation. As for the matter of meditation, you must know that all meditations are drawn from three books. Three books of meditation. The first and most inferiour is the book of the great world, where one studieth to come by knowledge of the creature to the Creatour. The second is the book of the little world, where man studieth himself, his beginning, his end, qualities, habits, faculties, actions, functions and the rest.

The third is the book of the Heavenly Father, Jesus Christ our Saviour, who verily is a guilded book, limmed with the rays of the Divinity, imprinted with all the characters of sanctity, and from thence an infinitie of matter is drawn, as those of benefits, of four last things, of the life, death, and passion of Jesus, and of all the other mysteries. You must digest every one in his time, according to the opportunity, tast, and capacity of those who meditate. Some appropriate meditations to every day of the week, others make their circuit according to the moneth, others follow the order of the mysteries and life of our Saviour, as they are couched in so many books written of these matters.

Practise and form contained in six articles.

The practice and form of meditation consisteth in six things. The first, to divide the subject you would meditate on into certain points, according to the appointment of some Directour, or the help of a book: As if you meditate upon the knowledge of ones self, to take for the first point, what man is by nature. For the second, what he is by sin. For the third, what he may be by grace.

1. Article.

2. Article.

The second, a little before the hour appointed for meditation, to call into memory the points which you would meditate on.

3. Article.

The third, after you have implored the light and assistance of the holy Ghost, that he would be pleased to direct this act to his glory, and that you have framed to your self a lively thought of the presence of God, and that actually you may meditate to select the points and articles proposed, sweetly, attentively, affectionately: and not to want matter for every point, it is good to weigh the causes, the effects, the tenents, and utmost limits of the mystery we meditate on.

Seven ways to dilate ones self in meditating in abundance upon sundry thoughts contained in this third article.

As in the first point of the knowledge of your self, What man is according to nature? A reasonable creature, intelligent, capable of the knowledge of God. Who made it? God himself: He would that his Divine hands (saith S. Basil) should serve him as a womb. What are the essential parts thereof? A soul, a body, an understanding, a memory, a will. What are the accidentals? A general mass of so many little parcels, as have their names and entertainments. O the powerful hand which hath composed such a master-piece! Where was it made? In the earth, and not in Heaven, to teach him humility. And to what end made? To praise God and serve him, and to save himself in praising and serving him. Who hath concurred to its creation? God. Hath he made use of Angels? No: He would attribute the honour of such a work to himself. And how did he make it? He was not content with one single word, as in the creation of the world, but he put his hand thereto, to shew it was a more supream effect of his power. And when did he make him? After other creatures, to prepare the world for him, as a cradle, as a Temple, as a Hall to banquet in, and such like things. You see these circumstances, who, what, where, what help, wherefore, when, and how, in every subject of what kind soever will lead you along.

The second manner to dilate your self when you meditate history, is, to represent the divers persons with their words, actions, and passions. As in the mysterie of the Resurrection. The souldiers shivering for fear, the Person of our Saviour all enlightened with splendour, saying: Courage, I have overcome, all power is given to me in Heaven and earth; I come to wipe away your tears, to make your faces bright-shining, to put you into possession of an eternal felicity, and such like things. On the other side Magdalene who seeketh her Master, and not content to behold the Angels, speaketh these words, which Origen prompteth her: All these goodly comforters are burdensome to me: I seek the Creatour, and therefore I cannot see any creature without anxietie. I seek not Angels, but him who hath made both me and Angels.

Oneroſi ſunt mihi omnes conſolatores, quæro Creatorem, & ideò mihi gravis eſt ad videndum omnis creatura. Ego non quæro Angelos ſed eum qui fecit me & Angelos.

The third, to represent things to your self by certain images, figures, and similitudes: as Hermas cited in the Bibliothec of the Fathers, who meditating on the joy of worldlings, imagined to himself a delicious meadow, enameled all over with flowers, where certain fat and plump sheep cropped the grasse, and skipped to and fro with many jumps in the delights thereof: And in an instant this meadow became vast, plain, drie, lean, parched, and barren, and the same sheep appeared starven, scabbie, and full of botches, a rude surly shepherd driving them to feed among thorns and brambles. Afterward he applied all that to the voluptuous, and made to himself a perfect representation of their life, to avoid their unhappiness.

The fourth, to extend your self by comparing of one thing to another, as did Saint Gregorie Nazianzen, meditating upon the love of God. Tell me confidently (O my soul) what thou desirest? for I will please thee. Thou wouldst perhaps have Gyges his enchanted ring to gain a kingdom. Thou wouldst have all that which is in thy hand changed into gold (the desire of the fabulous Mydas.) Thou wouldst covet palaces stuffed with gold and silver; rich possessions, curiosities, boundless honours. Poor distracted man, dost thou not see thy God is all that, and above all that, and incomparably more than that? Thy God is the true riches, the true glory, the true repose, without him all thy blessings would be curses, and with him all thy afflictions may be turned into felicities.

S. Gregory in his Hymns.

The fifth, to make sometimes a dialogue, God, and the intellectual creatures, sensible, & insensible enterchangeably speaking, as did S. Aug. meditating upon the perfections of God. He went wheeling round about the world, and asked in heaven, in earth, sea, and depths, addressing himself to every one in particular, Are you God? And these creatures answered, No, those have lyed who deified us. And after he had run all over the world, he entereth into himself, and saith to himself: Who art thou? From whence cometh this creature (my Lord and my God) from whence, but from thee? By these ladder-steps he mounteth to the knowledge of his Creatour, and plungeth himself in the abysses.

Aug. Solil. 31 Circuibam omnia quærens te, & propter omnia derelinquens me. Interrogavi terram, ſi eſſet Deus, & dixit mihi quòd non. Tu quis es? unde hoc tale animal, Domine Deus meus, unde niſi à te?

The sixth, to make sometimes a gradation ascending from degree to degree, as in meditating on these words of S. John: God so loved the world that he gave his onely-begotten Son. If God should onely appoint a bird to bring the news of thy salvation, would it not seem to thee to deserve many thanks? But what if a reasonable creature? What if a man endowed with all manner of excellencies? What if an Angel? What if an Archangel, a cherubin, a Seraphin? What if all the angels and all the blessed spirits? But all these in comparison of his Son are but as a little drop of water to the vast Ocean. And he hath given thee his Son. O prodigie! O superabundance of love!

The seventh, easie and fruitfull, is, to ponder that which you meditate on with application to your self, attentively considering the actions and words of our Saviour to form ours. To examin carefully your deportments, and see how oftentimes they wander from this rule of perfection; to repeal them, to square them, to level them as much as you can, according to the model which is set before your eyes.

4 Article of the manner of meditation.

After the discussion of every point, the lights follow in the fourth place, which are maxims and conclusions drawn from the discourse we have made. As if we have meditated upon the knowledge of our selves, to derive this fruit from thence: That

We

Lights. we have nothing of our ſelves, but ignorance, weakneſs, vanity, miſery. That we are wholly Gods. That it is a ſacriledge to live for our ſelves. That we cannot have a worſe Maſter than our own liberty and ſcope, and ſuch like things.

5. Article. Affections. In the fifth place come the affections, which are flaming tranſportations of the will, bent to purſue and embrace the good it acknowledgeth, as when S. Auguſtine having meditated upon the knowledge of God, brake forth into theſe words: Alas! I have begun very late to love thee, a beauty ever ancient, a beauty ever new. Too late have I begun. Thou wert within, and I ſought for thee without, and have caſt my ſelf with ſuch violence upon theſe created beauties, without knowledge of the Creatour, to defile and deform my ſelf daily more and more. To this it much availeth to have by heart many verſicles of the moſt pathetical Pſalms, which ſerve as jaculatory prayers, and as it were enflamed arrows, to aim directly at the propoſed mark.

Aug. Solil. 11. Serò te amavi, pulchritudo tam antiqua, & tam nova: Serò te amavi, & tu intus eras & ego foris, & ibi te quærebam: & in iſtâ formoſa quæ feciſti ego deformis irruebam.

6. Article. Colloquies. For concluſion you have colloquies, which are reverent and amorous diſcourſes with God, by which we ask of him to flie the evil, or follow the good diſcovered in the meditation. And of all that which I ſay, diſcuſſion, light, affection, a colloquie may be made upon every point, but more particularly at the end of the prayer. And note, in every prayer, eſpecially in colloquies, you muſt make acts of the praiſe of God, in adoring him with all the Heavenly hoſt, and highly advancing his greatneſs and excellencies. Of thankſgiving, in thanking him for all benefits in general, but particularly for theſe moſt eminent in the ſubject we meditate. Of petition, in asking ſome grace or favour. Of obſecration, in begging it by the force of holy things and agreeable to the Divine Majeſty. Of oblation, in offering your ſoul, body, works, words, affections, and intentions; afterward ſhutting all up with the Pater Noſter.

Another manner of meditation more plain & profitable. Behold briefly the practice of meditation. If you yet deſire one more plain, more facile, and greatly profitable, often practice this ſame. As the true meditation of a good man is (according to the Prophet) the law of God, and the knowledge of ones ſelf, meditate the ſummary of your belief; as ſometimes the Creed of the Apoſtles, ſometimes the Pater noſter, ſometimes the Commandments of God, ſometimes the deadly ſins, ſometimes upon the powers of your ſoul, and ſometimes your five natural ſenſes. The manner ſhall be thus. After you have choſen a place and time proper, and a little ſounded the retreat in your heart from temporal affairs.

Firſt, invoke the grace of God to obtain light and knowledge upon the ſubject you are to meditate.

Secondly, if it be the Creed, run over every Article briefly one after another, conſidering three things, what you ought to believe of this Article, what you ought to hope, what you ought to love: How you hitherto have believed it, hoped it, loved it: How you ought more firmly to believe it hereafter, to hope for it more confidently, to love it more ardently.

If it be the Pater Noſter, meditate upon every petition, what you ask of God, the manner how you ask it, and the diſpoſition you afford to obtain it. If the Commandments of God; what every Commandment meaneth, how you have kept them, and the courſe you will preſently hold, the better to obſerve them. If the powers of your ſoul and five ſenſes; the great gift of God, which is to have a good underſtanding, a good will, a happy memory; to have the organs of eyes, ears, and all the ſenſes well diſpoſed for their ſeveral functions. How you have hitherto employed all theſe endowments, and how you will uſe them in time to come.

Thirdly, you ſhall make oblation of all that you are to God, and ſhall conclude with the Pater Noſter and Ave Maria. Another manner very ſweet for thoſe who are much affected to holy Scripture, is mixed prayer, conſiſting in three things. Another way

The firſt, to make prayer to obtain of God grace and direction in this action, as it hath been ſaid above.

The ſecond, to take the words of holy Scripture, as a Pſalm, a text of S. John, S. Paul, and ſuch like things; to pronounce it affectionately, pondering and ruminating the ſignification of each word, and reſting thereon with ſweetneſs, while our ſpirit furniſheth us with variety of conſiderations.

The third, to make ſome reſolution upon all theſe good conſiderations, to practice them in ſuch and ſuch actions of virtue. Laſtly, to end the meditation with ſome vocal prayer.

The fifteenth SECTION.

Practice of vocal prayer, ſpiritual lection, and the word of God.

THE practice of vocal prayer conſiſteth in three things; to obſerve whom we ſhould pray unto, what we ought to pray for, and how to pray. For the firſt, we know what the Church teacheth us, how next unto the Majeſty of the moſt Bleſſed Trinitie, incomparably raiſed above all creatures, * we pray to the Angels and Saints, who are as it were the rays of this great and incomprehenſible Sun, from whom all glory reflecteth. Above all creatures we reverence the moſt holy Mother of God, who hath been as a burning mirrour, in the which all the beams of the Divinity are united. Origen calleth her the treaſure of the Trinitie: Methodius, the living Altar: Saint Ignatius, a Celeſtial prodigie: Saint Cyril, the Foundereſs of the Church: Saint Fulgentius, the Repairer of mankind: Proclus of Cyzike, the Paradiſe of the ſecond Adam, the ſhop of the great Union of two natures: Saint Bernard, the Firmament above all firmaments: Andrew of Crete, the image of the firſt Archtype, and the Epitome of the incomprehenſible excellencies of God. Practice of vocal prayer three ways. To whom to pray. * Præmonitus, præmunitus. Praiſe of the Bleſſed Virgin.

All that may be ſaid redoundeth to the glory of the workman who made her, and advanced her with ſo many preeminences; yea that alone affordeth us a ſingular confidence in her protection. The devotion towards this common Advocate of mankind is ſo ſweet, ſo ſenſible, ſo full of conſolation, that a man muſt have no ſoul not to reliſh it. Next, we honour thoſe Angelical ſpirits, who enamel Heaven with their beauty, and ſhine as burning lamps before the Altar of this great God of hoſts. We have a particular obligation to our holy Angel Guardian, whom God hath deputed to our conſervation, as a Celeſtial Centinel that perpetually watcheth for us. We behold in Heaven with the eyes of faith, an infinite number of choſen ſouls, who read our neceſſities in the boſom of God, written with the pen of his will, and enlightened with the rays of their proper glory, who apply this knowledge to their beatified underſtanding. Behold the objects of our devotion. As concerning that which we ought to pray and beg for, our great Maſter hath abridged it for us in our Lords Prayer, a true Epitom of the celeſtial wiſdom; as if one would comprehend all this great Univerſe in the round circuit of a ring. From thence it is that all prayers are derived, as all waters flow from the Ocean. Angels. Lords prayer.

From the union of this excellent prayer with the Angelical ſalutation, the Roſary is compoſed; a prayer as ſingular as familiar to the whole world, whether it be ſimply recited, or whether one proceed therein by the way of meditation upon the myſteries, Roſary.

steries, as many pious and devout books do teach.

Psalter. We have besides this the Psalter of the Kingly Prophet, which operateth that in the Church which the Sun doth in Heaven: It illuminateth, heateth, and makes fruitful all the good desires and devotions of Christianity. Consequently there follow many well digested offices, many Collects, Litanies, Prayers, collected from holy Scriptures and Fathers. You have a plentiful treasurie of them compiled by Henry Kippenbigius, able to satisfie the most curious devotions. But all is not in multitude. The Breviaries, Hours, and Manuels of devotion say enough. Those who have obligation of saying some office ought seriously to think of the discharge of their consciences upon this point. But you which have it not, it is reason, with the advise of your spiritual Father, you task your selves upon some daily exercise seasoned with some variety, that every day you may repeat it with exact diligence: and moreover you have many jaculatory prayers drawn from the psalms or other books for all manner of necessities, as well spiritual as temporal, and a list of the persons as well living as dead, for whom you are to pray.

Government of vocal prayer.

The form. When you have the matter digested, it remaineth your self adde form thereunto, a serious attention, a profound reverence, a fervent love. You must imagine with your self, that with those holy old men of the Apocalyps, you stand before the throne of God, with a vial or cup in the one hand, (which is your heart replenished with holy thoughts as with odoriferous balm) and a harp in the other, which is the collection of so many notable prayers. Serve your self well with this celestial harp. Do not as one Neanthus, who having inherited Orpheus his harp, thought to do wonders, and played so ill that dogs affrighted with his untuneably skreaking noise, tare him in pieces. It is not enough you have so many holy prayers which sound like the string of Gods harp, consigned to you by Jesus Christ himself and so many holy personages: you must use them well, lest you find your punishment even in the sacrifice of propitiation. Take heed you sacrifice not (as S. Gregory saith) the calf without flower, which is, to make prayer with lips without application of heart.

Cup and harp in prayer.

Neanthus. To use it wel.

To sacrifice the calf without flower.

Remedies against distractions. Four things will greatly serve you to resist distractions and driness which happen in prayer. The first, before prayer, and in the time of prayer, frame to your self a lively and strong idea of the presence of God, and when any distraction occurreth, recal your thoughts into their center, by often renewing your intentions in the beginning of every part of prayer.

The second, not being charged with any office by obligation, make a few vocal prayers, and stay upon every word the space of a breathing fit, in the mean time pondring both the word which you pronounce and the person to whom you speak, and your baseness and unworthiness. This manner is very sovereign and available to pray.

The third, to follow the counsel of Cassiodorus, to take this vocal prayer which you rehearse, as if it were particularly made for you, or that it originally had born the very like sprouting buds in your heart. So ought you to connaturalize it, and punctually espouse all the affections which the Authour of this prayer had when the Holy Ghost did dictate it unto him. You must rejoyce, bewail, hate, and love upon David's harp, as by a certain divine inspiration.

The fourth, often to ask of God the gift of prayer, to offer him all your devotions in union with those of our Saviour, and to chastise your neglects by some voluntary satisfaction. To water and moysten your prayers, and retain them in full vigour, it is needful that as you speak to God in the exercise of prayer, he speak to you in books, and by the mouth of Preachers. Wherefore make a resolution to employ daily some part of your time in the reading of some devout book, as well that which containeth precepts as examples. Go not as it were boothaling with an unsteaddy curiosity, which swallowweth all and ever remaineth hungry; but fixe your thoughts and affections upon that which you read, in such sort that you may be imbrued and coloured with a firm tincture. Good books are as the cave of Sibylla. Cassius Longinus saith, the inhabitants of that cave had a certain rapture of propheſie; and in often revolving the writings of Saints, the spirit of Saints is acquired.

Good books the cave of Sibylla.

Spiritual reading and Sermons.

And as for Sermons, take heed of that canker of worldly spirits, who hear Preachers as Athenian Oratours, or as one would a curious lute-player, or a Comedie in the Burgundian hostery. If he who preacheth to you have no other intention but to please you, nor you any other purpose but to sooth your own curiosity, he hath wearied his lungs, and you in the mean space have had the itch in your ears; the time will come when he shall have the worm in his heart to gnaw him, and you the tingling in your ears for your punishment. The seller and the buyer shall be paid with the coyn of reprobation. Who speaketh not, and who heareth not, to do and become better, abuseth a word signed with the bloud of Jesus Christ, the loss whereof is most dangerous and the account inestimable.

The sixteenth Section.

Of the second combat of the spiritual man against weakness.

ALl that on which I have before very largely discourſed, serves to dissipate the darkness of ignorance, and to replenish a soul with the knowledge of God, with good maxims, good desires, and good purposes: and doubtless nothing would be found more easie and familiar than to do well, were it not temptations come athwart us, which are the remoraes as it were and hinderances of the soul. And therefore it is necessary to frame to your self an undoubted courage, high, and resolute, to resist with an invincible hand, and to strike at an infinite number of obstacles which present themselves in all sorts of occasions, and which bring upon our souls accesses of fire and yce: fire of concupiscence, yce of pusillanimity, to form in the end an absolute inability of virtue. This inability is vanquished by the grace of God and virtue of fortitude, which warranteth courage to undertake, and strengtheneth it to bear what reason dictateth. And although to undertake seem a thing very glorious, it is notwithstanding the hardest task to endure a temptation, to oppose it with unmoved foot, to wraſtle with it, to trample on it, and in the end by virtue to erect tropheys over it.

Temptations remoraes, of the soul.

Sufferers more courageous than undertakers.

Saint Thomas very judiciously yieldeth the reasons. 1. Because he who is assaulted seemeth ever in worse state than he that assaulteth: for encountering he always presupposeth himself to be stronger. Now it appeareth, he who undergoeth some brave action of courage is the assailant, and he who withstandeth a temptation, is opposed, and sometimes shaken without thinking thereof; which is far more troublesom and hard, and therefore draweth after it much more resolution in case a good and generous resistance be made against it. 2. The assailant beholdeth the peril as future, and he who is tempted seeth the temptation even almost within his gates, in his heart, in his bowels. 3. The assailant often dis-dischargeth his pistol like an harcubusier before he have leisure to know the danger, and readily retireth: The other who suffereth, burneth as with a gentle fire, and in the mean space if he be patient, he long time stayeth with a reposed rest, yet not striking at all; which is a thing worthy of an eternal crown. The Alexanders, the Cæsars, who flew like Eagles to the conquest of worlds, oftentimes yielded themselves up to the least temptation. Their strength was disguised, not real.

The seventeenth SECTION.

The arms against temptation, contained in twelve Maxims.

The means to resist temptations.

THE means to resist temptations, is not to frame to your self a spiritual insensibility which feeleth nothing: It is hard to obtain it, so sensible self-love is, and when one hath it, he rather is a stone than a man. It is not to drive away one temptation by another, and do one mischief to be freed of another. For to pursue such courses, is like washing ones self with ink. It is not to hide one from all kind of encounters, and never to do well for fear to have occasion of a combate against ill: but to resist it couragiously in that sort as I will shew. That great fore-mentioned John Picus Mirandula hath collected twelve notable maxims, the practice whereof is most profitable to enable your self in spiritual combate against impotency.

Thesal. In hoc posui sumus. Temptation our trade.

I. Maxim. That you must be tempted, on what side soever it happen. It is our profession, our trade, our continual exercise. The Eagle complaineth not of her wings, nor the Nightingale of her song, nor Peacock of her tayl, because it is by kind; and it is as natural for man to be tempted, as for a bird to flie, to sing, to prune her feathers. If you forsake not the way of spiritual life fearing to be tempted, and turn head to worldly contentments, hold it for an infallible verity, you therein shall be much more engaged; and which is worse, without comfort, honour, merit, or recompence: you shall leave a paper-Cross, which if you knew well how to manage, would load you no more than feathers do the bird, you will forsake it (say I) to take another, hard, uneasie, and bloudy, which would invest you in the Confraternitie of the bad thief.

Sidon. Apol. l. 2. c. 1.

That great Prelate of France, Sydonius Apollinaris relateth, that a certain man called Maximus, being arrived at the height of honour by unlawful and indirect ways, much grived from the first day, and breathing out a great sigh, spake these words: O Damocles, I esteem thee most happy to have been a King onely the space of a dinner time. It is now a whole day that I have been so, and can no longer endure it.

A remarkable speech of Maximus. Felicem te, Damocles, qui non uno longius prandio regni necessitatem toleravisti.

II. Remember that in the affairs of the world we fight a longer time, we travel more painfully, we reap more fruitlesly. The end of one toyl is the beginning of another. In pains taking there is no hope, but ever to labour. A temporal toyl draweth after it an eternity of pain.

Travel of worldlings.

III. Is it not a meer folly to believe a Paradise, an eternal life, a Jesus Christ, who made unto himself a ladder of the cross to ascend to the throne of his glorie, and you in the mean while to be desirous to live here with arms a-cross? To see the Master open the way of Heaven through so many thorns, and the servant not to be willing to tread but upon flowers? To see under a head, all wasted and worn with suffering, delicate members, as one should make to a Colossus of brass, feet of flax.

Indignity of curiosity.

Greatness of temptation.

IV. Were there no other fruit in temptation, but the conformity which we thereby have with Jesus Christ, the sovereign Wisdom, it would be highly recompenced. A brave Captain said to a souldier who died with him: Although thou hadst been unknown all thy life time, it is no small honour for thee to die this day with thy Master. And who would not hold it for a great glory to have the Son of God for Captain, for companion, for spectatour, for theatre, for guerdon in all his afflictions and tribulations? Who would not account it a great dignity to be daily crucified with him? To distend his hands and arms upon the Cross, in withholding them from violences, rapines, ruins, wherewith the spirit of lying transporteth us? To fetter your feet, and hinder them from running after the unbridled desires of your heart? To make bitter your tongue in subduing the pleasures of taste? To cover your body with wounds, in suppressing the incitements of flesh by a holy mortification? To lessen your self by the contempt of honour, according to the example of him, who being able always to walk upon the wings of Cherubins, would creep amongst us like a little worm of the earth? What a glory were it to say what Saint Paul said: I bear the marks of my Saviour Jesus on my body?

conformity to Jesu Christ

Galat. 9. Ego stigmata Domini Jesu in corpore meo porto.

V. Not to confide in humane remedies when you undertake to overcome a temptation. It is not a thing which dependeth meerly upon us. It is necessary God go before, and we thereto contribute our free will. If he watch not over our heads, it will be a hard matter for us to keep centinel. No creature is so feeble as he who holdeth himself for strong, being onely armed with his own confidence. Many good things are done in man, which man doth not: And man doth no good, which God doth not. Who thinks to resist temptations without his help, is like him, who hasteneth to the Wars, and stumbleth at the threshold of his own door. And therefore an effectual means in this battel, is to insist much on prayer, especially at the first entrance of a temptation.

Distrust of ones self.

Concilium Arausicanum. Multa in homine bona sunt, quæ non facit homo bona: Nulla vero facit homo bona quæ non Deus præstet ut faciat homo.

VI. When you have vanquished a temptation, take very good heed you leave not your rank, and wholly slacken your courage, as if there were no more enemies to be opposed. As distrust is the mother of safety, so over-much security is the gate of peril. If your enemy still roam up and down like a roaring lyon, become you on the other side a watchful lyon in the centinels of the God of hosts.

To stand always upon your guard. Isaiah 21. 8. Super speculam Domini ego sto.

VII. Content not your self onely to be beaten, but assail your enemy. When Satan lays a snare to entrap you, make it an instrument of merit. If he present a good work to you, which glittereth in the world, thereby to tempt you with pride, make a good work of it, and leave vanity, referring all to the greater honour of God.

To combate your enemy.

VIII. When you are in combate, fight with alacritie, as if you already were certain of victory. Turn away the eye of your consideration from what you suffer, and hold it perpetually fixt upon the reward. A great unhappiness, which maketh many to fall head-long into temptation, is, that they have their minds so stretched and bent upon the thought of pain, they cannot abide to behold the reward which waiteth on them. When the fourty Martyrs were in the frozen lake, thirty nine of them looked back upon the future crown, and one of them unhappily thought of nothing but his punishment. All of them remained victorious except this wretched creature, who toyling the glory of his patience, came out of the pool to die presently after in his infidelity. Do you not think that which comforted our Saviour on the Cross, in that bottomless abyss of calumnies and dolours, was a mirrour of glory, where he saw all his sufferings in crowns? Behold the course which is to be held. To stay a little on the present, and rest in a strong apprehension of the future: And ever to have these words of S. Paul in your heart:

What is the cause that many yield.

2 Cor. 4. Momentaneum & leve tribulationis noſtræ, æternum gloriæ pondus operatur in nobis.

A ſhort moment of our tribulation worketh in us an eternal weight of glory. Fight then with courage, as if it were the laſt temptation which ſhould aſſail you, and be perſwaded that herein is the extent of your predeſtination. When you have overcome it, govern your ſelf like a man readily preſt to enter again into the liſts, and make one victory the degree for another.

Not to tempt temptation.

IX. Though you be valiant, brave not danger, tempt not temptation, caſting your ſelf into the occaſions thereof through preſumption of heart. He that much affecteth hazard, in ſtead of finding glory therein, ſhall trace out his own tomb.

A ſovereign means.

X. A ſovereign means to conquer temptations, is, ſeaſonably to diſcover the countenances of them, to open your heart freely to your Ghoſtly Father, to declare your thoughts, to know them well, to conſider their nature, and to ſee their power they have over your ſoul. It ordinarily happeneth what the good Epictetus ſaith: It is not the thing that troubleth us; it is our fantaſie. How many temptations would be vanquiſhed by ſleighting them, if one took but a little leiſure to laugh at them? We make Elephants of flies, and of little dwarfs who by ſtealth pinch us, we frame Gyants. We reſemble young children, who for fear of a vizard, hide themſelves with tears in their nurſes boſomes: but take away the maſk, and give them it to handle, and they will make ſport with it. How many things ſeem terrible and impoſſible to us, which we find ridiculous and eaſie to overcome, if we never ſo little touch them with our finger? In temptations of puſillanimity, it is good to repreſent to your ſelf theſe falſe Gyants as dwarfs: But in that of luſt, you muſt not deſpiſe any thing, rather lay hold of little threads, as if they would become huge cables. Both in the one and the other there is nothing to be done, but to daſh theſe little Babylonians againſt the ſtones. Withſtand beginnings, and ſuffer not your enemies to fortifie themſelves to your diſadvantage.

Sweetneſs of victory of a temptation.

XI. The ſtone of offence and ſcandal to many, is, that they lively preſent to their imagination the ſweetneſs of ſin, and never conſider the pleaſure which is derived from the victory over ſin. As ſoon as man is plunged in the puddle thereof, behold a bluſhing ſoul, drenched in penſiveneſs, melancholy, and deſpair, whom a loathſom pleaſure, which paſſeth away as a dream, furniſheth from a dream with a heap of ſcorns, ſorrows, and confuſions: But quite contrary, that ſoul which hath reſiſted, findeth herſelf content, generous, advanced, ſatisfied with holy comforts, which come from the Paradiſe of God. Few men revolve this thought, which Saint Cyprian much recommendeth: Behold why the number of the damned is very great; and yet notwithſtanding doth it not ſeem to you very reaſonable, that man, who a thouſand times hath yielded to temptation, ſhould once in his life time taſt the ſweetneſs which is in the victory over a temptation, to rejoyce for ever? Many have been diverted from a great and manifeſt precipice, by conſidering theſe words: Well, go to: To yield to ſin, what will be the end thereof? To purchaſe repentance at ſo dear a rate! To render up a renown of ſo many years, as a prey to a moſt unhappy moment of pleaſure! Where is the faith promiſed to God? Let us at leaſt ſeek out ſome place where he is not: And where is he not? So many ſtars, ſo many Intelligences wherewith the world is repleniſhed, are ſo many eyes to behold thee: Himſelf looketh into the bottom of thy conſcience. Ask leave of him if thou wilt ſin. But how ask, and how obtain? Exerciſe a little patience, and this temptation will vaniſh away as a cloud. Thou goeſt about to commit a ſin, the pardon whereof is very uncertain, but it is doubtleſs through all eternity, when thou haſt committed it, God himſelf cannot make it to be undone.

XII. Think not you are the leſs acceptable to God when he ſuffereth you to be tempted, yea with diſhoneſt thoughts, which to chaſte ſouls are extreamly irkſom. Alas, why? If S. Paul, that Cherubim, ſcorched with celeſtial ardours, who fixed his foot upon the front of the ſtars, if we follow the opinion of S. Ambroſe, Theophylact, and Oecumenius, felt the ſtings of concupiſcence in a fleſh rapt to the third Heaven, think you for having ſome good diſpoſitions of well-doing, you ought to be freed from wars of nature, which ever keep in humility your ſoul a little too indulgent to it ſelf?

The eighteenth SECTION.

Remedies againſt paſſions and temptations which proceed from every vice.

I.

TO conſider that paſſion is a motion of the ſenſual appetite, which proceedeth from the imagination of good or evil, with ſome agitation of the body.

II. That there are eleven paſſions, ſix in the appetite of concupiſcence, which are love, hatred, deſire, averſion, joy, ſadneſs. Five in the appetite of revenge, which are hope, deſpair, boldneſs, fear, anger.

III. That there are two means to vanquiſh all paſſions, whereof the firſt is a precaution of mind againſt the occaſions and vain apparences of all things of the world; and the ſecond a ſerious entertainment of the mind in better things, as prayer, ſtudy, labour, affairs: But above all you muſt beg of God the light and ſtrength of his holy grace, which infinitely ſurpaſſeth all humane remedies.

We here adde ſome preſervatives againſt paſſions and the moſt ordinary vices.

Againſt carnal love.

I. To conſider the barrenneſs of worldly loves, which are the true gardens of Adonis, wherein nothing is gathered but wretched flowers environed with many thorns.

II. To ſet a true eſtimate upon things, and not to be deceived with apparences.

III. To keep watch over your ſenſes, to avoid the opportunities and occaſions of ſin, and above all to have recourſe unto God, upon the firſt impreſſion of your thoughts.

IV. To free your ſelf by main force from the preſence of objects, to be delighted with ſerious purpoſes and good employments.

V. To preſent to your ſelf very often, the defect, ingratitude, levity, inconſtancy and treachery of creatures, which we moſt ſervilely love.

Againſt averſions, hatreds, and envies.

I. To eſteem nothing great in this life, is the way to envie nothing.

II. To love onely the great inheritance of the land of the living, which never becomes leſs by the many and ſeveral diviſions made to thoſe who poſſeſs it.

III. To conſider attentively the motives which excite us to love our neighbour, as the participation of the ſame nature, ſame life, ſame bloud, and like profeſſion, and ſuch other reaſons, which are as ſo many knots of amity.

IV. The wretched life of Cain to live in envie, troubles, troubles, diſturbances, and rage of a diſtempered ſpirit, which cauſeth the immortality of its being to contribute to the eternity of its pains.

V. To behold how envy ere it is aware, ſerveth many times to the advancement of thoſe who are envied.

Againſt coveteouſneſs, worldly hope, and joy.

I. The diſquiet of an hungry mind.

II. The unſatiableneſs of deſires.

III. The wars and battels we muſt oft-times undergo to ſatisfie one ſole deſire.

IV. The diſhonour of denial inſupportable to a generous ſoul.

V. The dependence and ſlavery we muſt endure, to pleaſe thoſe from whom we expect the accompliſhment of our deſires.

VI. The frailty in offending God through too much greedineſs of temporal things

VII. The poor and ſhort pleaſure taken in things we moſt ardently deſire.

VIII. That God many times affordeth us the accompliſhment of our deſires as a puniſhment of our imperfections.

Againſt ſadneſs and deſpair.

There is a holy ſadneſs, as that we entertain upon the paſſion of our Saviour, or for our ſins, which is a gift of God, and not a puniſhment.

There is another furious, which hath no ears, and which is rather cured by miracles than precepts.

There is one natural, which proceedeth from humour, and another vitious, foſtered by evil habits and neglects of ſalvation.

I. Againſt this laſt, we muſt conſider our deſires and affections oft-times make up all our ſadneſs, and that the true means to leſſen the cares which conſume us, is to ſweeten the ſharp and ardent love we bear towards worldly things.

II. The ſmall account we make of God, is the cauſe we many times are troubled at frivolous things, either diſtantly threatning us, or already happened. He that would truly love this great God, who deſerveth all the love both of Heaven and earth, ſhould not ſuffer fear or ſadneſs for any thing, but the loſs of the love of God, which no man looſeth if he be not willing to forgo it.

III. Nought but tears of the damned is remedileſs. He that may be in the way of Paradiſe, ſhould not make a kind of hell on earth; and who may hope this great All, ſhould never be ſad for any thing.

Againſt evil confidence.

I. That to be confident in evil things, is to have a deſperate inſtrument of ones own miſery, which entertaineth all exorbitancies of the heart to make them the more puniſhable.

II. That there is no aſſured confidence againſt the power of God, which in an inſtant ruineth the poſterity of the greateſt Tyrants.

III. That the ſtrongeſt things are waſted by the weakeſt. Lyons have been eaten up by flies, and ruſt (though contemptible) conſumes the hardeſt mettals.

IV. That to be confident through preſumption of ſtrength, is the high-way to become ridiculous in enterpriſes, and unfortunate in all ſucceſſes. We muſt not go about to ſoar to the ſun with the wings of a Reare-mouſe, nor ſail on the Ocean in the ſhell of a Tortoiſe.

Againſt fear.

I. Neither to deſire nor love any thing inordinately, is the path-way to peace, where fear never harbours.

II. To have a ſtrong charity towards God, and to love him fervently, with perſwaſion of his reciprocal love. This is the means to enter into a firm confidence. For what evil may we fear againſt us when God is with us.

III. We many times fear evils which are the ſources of great bleſſings, ſome are not truly evils, other much leſs than we make them, and many will never happen. Why will you abide where you are not, and put your ſelf on the rack in your imagination.

IV. He who reſolves to ſuffer all that God will have him, takes in hand a powerful remedy againſt all ſorts of fears: For he who is a Maſter over ſorrow, commandeth terrour, ſince the evil preſent is much more troubleſom than the future.

V. There are natural fears much tied to fleſh, unleſs they be vanquiſhed and ſweetened by frequent cuſtom with the things which are feared, and converſation with men confident and couragious.

Againſt anger.

I. To conſider how it depriveth us of ſix things very precious, to wit, of wiſdom, juſtice, civility, concord, truth, and the ſplendour of the ſpirit of God.

II. How it ſuddenly transfigureth a man into a little monſter.

III. How it is hurtful to the ſtate of health, which we ſo tenderly love.

IV. That it abaſeth the perſon ſurprized with it, and eſpecially if he be in ſome eminency of life and dignity.

V. That the effects thereof are cruel, the ſpoils pernicious, events ſhameful, and falls for the moſt part irrecoverable.

VI. The contentment to have kept back an evil word, which had deſtroyed a good affair.

VII. The abſtinence from curioſities and niceneſs of life, cutteth aſunder the ſinews of anger. The leſs curious a man is, the more humble he is, and the more humble, the leſs ſenſible is he of the croſſes which happen to things without us.

VIII. We muſt prevent occaſions, and not afford them too much power over our hearts in all thoſe things, the loſs whereof may trouble us.

IX. To eſchew the occaſions of places, of perſons, recreations and affairs, which uſe to diſturb the peace of our minds.

X. If one feel himſelf inwardly moved, to bridle the tongue, that ſo the apprehenſions of the heart may not break forth. To reenter into your ſelf.

To ask truce of your paſſion, ſtedfaſtly believing that you ſhall pardon many offences, if you begin to underſtand before you grow angry.

Againſt vanitie.

I. To repreſent to ones ſelf very often the extream vanitie of all worldly things.

II. The miſery of the preſent ſtate, wherein all things invite us to humility.

III. The vanity of opinions, which afford us nothing but wind.

IV. The blindneſs, incapacity, inconſtancy, perverſeneſs of mens judgements, who often love and admire all that which is the moſt vitious.

V. The frailty of honour and reputation, which is ſought by unlawful ways.

VI. The tortures and torments of a vain ſpirit.

VII. The oſtentation in good ſucceſſes, the diſcouragement in bad

VIII. The ſurprizal of his practices and imperfections, which cannot be hidden from the moſt judicious.

IX. The

IX. The worm which gnaweth all good works by the means of vanity, and the ſhameful deprivation of eternal comforts to attend the ſearch of earthly ſmokes.

Againſt gluttony.

I. Repreſent unto your ſelf the miſerable ſtate of a ſoul bruitiſh and bemired in fleſh.
II. Hardneſs of heart.
III. The dulneſs of underſtanding.
IV. The infirmities of body.
V. Loſs of goods.
VI. Diſreputation.
VII. What a horrour it is to make of the members of Jeſus Chriſt, the members of an unclean creature.
VIII. What indignity it is to adore and ſerve the belly as a beſtial and baſe god.
IX. The great exceſs of ſins which proceed from this ſource.
X. The puniſhments of God upon the voluptuous.

Againſt intemperance of tongue.

I. To conſider that it is the throne of vain-glory.
II. An evident ſign of ignorance.
III. The gate of ſlander.
IV. The harbinger of ſcoffing.
V. The Architect of lying.
VI. The deſolation of the ſpirit of piety.
VII. The diſſipation of the hearts ſafety.
VIII. The inſeparable companion of idleneſs, as ſaith S. John Climacus.

Againſt Sloth.

The indefatigable labour of all creatures in the world both civil and natural.
II. The facility of good works after grace given by Jeſus Chriſt.
III. The anxiety of an inconſtant and fleeting ſpirit.
IV. Shame and contempt.
V. The confuſion at the day of Judgement.
VI. The irrecoverable loſs of time.

Of three temptations which hinder many in the way of perfection, to wit, ſhame of well-doing, over-much affection to ſome creature, and penſiveneſs in well-doing.

The nineteenth SECTION.

Againſt the ſhame of well-doing.

MAny would quickly be in the way of a life truly Chriſtian, having ſouls of an excellent temper, and pious reliſhes of God, but that they have one temptation; who would believe it? it is the ſhame of well-doing. Their ſouls are big with good deſires, reſembling the Eagles ſtone which ever hath another in it, and never brings it forth. So have they in their hearts (according to their own opinion) a good reſolution ſeriouſly to embrace devotion: but the fear of what men will ſay, ſcattereth as many good thoughts as the heart can conceive. What practice of remedies will you have againſt this puſillanimity, effeminate ſoul? Onely conſider what you do, and if you be aſhamed, it can be of nothing but of your ſelf.

Eagles ſtone.

Unworthines to be aſhamed of wel-doing.

Firſt I aſk, who maketh you bluſh in the ſervice of your ſpouſe? Do you bluſh at his poverty? At his deformity? At his ignorance? Or tell me, what decay have you obſerved in him to imprint a bluſhing vermillion on your face? Poor? How can he be ſo, ſince he maketh all rich? Deformed? How can he be ſo, ſince he is original beauty ſpred over all the creatures of the world? Ignorant? How can he be ſo, ſince he is the Eternal Wiſdom? Tell me then, what have you to be aſhamed of? Some will ſay, that you would ſeem to be virtuous and devout. Do not ſo, but be ſo indeed. If you have not cauſe to bluſh for Heaven, why ſhould you bluſh for virtues, which are the daughters of Heaven? Behold what ſacriledge you commit: Shamefac'dneſs is made for vices. It is the veil wherewith nature covereth them when they endeavour to hide themſelves, and you will ſhadow virtues. Alas! the Martyrs have become red with bloud to preſerve devotion, and you bluſh with ſhame to betray it. A feaveriſh reſpect towards ſome creature which paſſeth away in the turning of a hand, hindereth perhaps thirty or forty years of virtue. O miſery!

Secondly, what have you ſo much to excite and drive you forward in well-doing? Think you your ſelf to be at this preſent the onely creature in the world which taſteth devotion? A thouſand and a thouſand well qualified have advanced the ſtandard of piety. If the number of the bad authorize wickedneſs, why ſhould not ſo goodly a troup of honeſt men furniſh us with confidence enough to vanquiſh one impious fantaſie, which verily is nothing, nor hath any ſubſtance, but what your remiſneſs affordeth it?

Number of the devout ſhould ſettle you.

Then tell me in the third place, what is it you ſo much fear, to addict your ſelf wholly to devotion? The twinkling of an eye, a ſilly ſmile, a breath of words, which quickly paſſeth and hurteth none? And behold why you forſake God. What is more eaſie to be overcome than all that? A little ſilence anſwereth all. It is not required of you you ſhould oppoſe your arms againſt the violent ſtream of a torrent. Silence onely is demanded, and to hope well, which are the two eaſieſt things of the world. Will you put a great affront upon a babler, who flouteth at your devotions? Anſwer him not. All he ſaith is to put you into paſſion; your impatience pleaſeth him, your ſilence confounds him. In the end he cannot ſay ſo much, but that you may hear much more. He hath but one mouth, and you have two ears. Let Michol revile, and perſiſt you in dancing before the Ark, your patience ſhall ſtop all mouths, and in the end purchaſe all crowns. But you fear you cannot perſevere in the way of virtue, and that many changes may caſt ſome aſperſion of inconſtancy upon you. You do well to fear your ſelf, if you ſo much expect perſeverance from your ſelf. But if you look for it from God, ought you not to have more hope of his goodneſs, than fear from your own infirmities? You are not adviſed to make your devotions eminent by ſome notable alteration, extraordinary in the exteriour, accompanied with ceremonious enforcements inſupportable to your condition. No: But undertake a devotion ſweet, facile, and conform to common uſe, which hath leſs of outward ſemblance, and more of inward worth: So ſhall you the better preſerve it, and it ſhall be the more profitable for you.

Doubt and childiſhneſs of this ſhame.

Iſai. 11. In ſilentio & ſpe erit fortitudo veſtra.

2 Reg. 9.

What you ſhould fear.

The twentieth SECTION.

Love of creatures.

AFter ſhame, cometh likewiſe a ſnare much more dangerous, to wit, the love of creatures. Many ſouls ſeem already to poyze themſelves and Adhering to creatures marreth all.

and soar into the skie, but there is some little thread, wretched, and weak, which fettereth their feet. One cannot forsake such a lodging, another such an exercise, a third such a custom, a fourth such a company, which in the mean space dissolveth the course of his good purposes, maketh his heart become childish, and sometimes dull and stupid to the relishes of God. Amongst all encounters this is the most powerful which proceedeth from the passion of love, and sometimes among persons who have their souls most pure, and such as are in their own opinions far removed from this mischievous passion, yet are not without peril. If this should come like some other gross and carnal love with an arrow and torch in hand, one might more easily defend himself; but it approcheth with a little sting, subtile, slender, and as it were wholly spiritual, that one cannot well perceive it in the beginning. It resembleth those little flying worms which Phædon speaketh of, that unperceivably sting: When they have fixed their sting, we do not know they have stung us, until we see some swelling rise upon the skin. So in such petty love-daliances we see not the wound nor sting, we know not what we suffer, what we do, what we undertake, what we desire. One doth hardly know that he loves: notwithstanding the soul is puffed up, and goeth out of its limits, and is dissolved into an Ocean of disturbances, which are very prejudicial to puritie. It were better to have as it were some kind of leaprousie, than such a passion: For that would infect but the body, but this diveth in the end even into the bottom of the soul, weaveth its web in the marrow, forrageth all over that which hath vigour in our inward parts, leaveth meagerness and sterility, and maketh our heart like to those abortions of pearls which have been blasted with lightening, having in stead of a bright substance, nothing else but an exterior film.

Passion of love.

Love is like to infects.

Phædon. apud Sencec. ep. 49. Adeo tenuis illis & falleus in periculis vis est, tumor indicat morsum.

The danger thereof.

What shall one do in this case? It is a very easie matter to give a preservative that may keep us from the blow, but it is very difficult to draw the soreness from the wound. You need sometime but the very wind of your hat to turn away a thunder-clap, that it may not strike where it seems to be aimed; the thunder maketh his claps as remedilesas suddon and violent: even so this passion in the beginning may be dispelled with a very little heed and dexterity, but when passage is made for it into the heart, it raiseth a tempest. But in conclusion, what means is there to stay it? It will be told you, you must have recourse to prayer, to meditation of the Cross, the day of Judgement, the invocation of the Blessed Virgin and Saints, the frequentation of Sacraments, fasting, the austerities of penance, and these are good remedies: Yet you notwithstanding will say, what prayer can one make when he is enguifed in a passion which perpetually buzzeth in his brain? Do like Jonas, crie out of the Whales belly, call from the bottom of the abyss with many jaculatory prayers. But to what use will austerities serve? the bodie is subdued, it is true; but yet passion remaineth still in the bottom of the soul. It nought importeth: the weakness of flesh by little and little cutteth the sinews of passions which are inherent in the flesh. All this, you will say, is likewise feasible, provided I be not thereby separated from the company of such a one. And behold the inconveniency; you will perpetually put oyl into the flame, and not have it burn.

Preservative.

Ordinary remedies.

Sovereign remedies.

I. The most sovereign remedy, is, what you least desire, though you make shew of desiring health. All that which cherisheth the maladie, is the presence of the object. Our passions resemble ecchoes: Do you not see that ecchoes the further you go from them, the less repercussion there is, they lessening and loosing themselves in the air. This affection, that speaketh so loud by reflection of the countenance which you daily behold with so much contentment, will quickly vanish by a little absence. But one day alone of separation is an Age to you: Suffer this Age, and the time will come it shall not last an hour with you.

Passions are ecchoes.

II. Verily all well considered, the play is not worth the candle. Must you inflict so many pains upon your bodies, so many torments on your mind, loose so much time, make so many ill tongues talk, to please I know not what petty, wicked, and foundered desire, which you know not what it is, nor to what it tendeth?

Folly of this passion.

III. If you knew what you desired, you would be ashamed of your self, you would have cause to be amazed that so noble a spirit should suffer it self to be transported with such follies. The notable Raymond Lullius, who passionately was enamoured of a Ladie, wife, and honest, when purposely to cure his frenzie, she shewed him one of her breasts eaten and gnawn through with a canker, and extreamly hydeous to behold, Stay simple man (said she) behold what you loved; he at that instant coming to himself, spake: Alas! was it for this I lost so many good hours, that I burned, became entranced, that I passed through fire and water? All lovers would say the like were the scarff taken from their eyes.

Cure of Raymond Lullius.

IV. It well appeareth you want some great affront, some real pains, some serious employment. It is the superfluous excess of idleness which dissolveth your heart into these effeminacies. You were better have some mischievous process against you, than all these trifling entertainments. Frame some good employment to free your self from a bad. Remember that which was said: When one hath no leisure to live, he hath no leisure to love.

Want of employment.

Hier. ad Rustic. Vivere non licet, & fornicari licebit?

V. Represent to your self that a thousand undaunted courages (for that they have twice or thrice resisted passion constantly) have found themselves free, at liberty, in peace and tranquality of spirit, wholly admirable, and you for want of a little resolution daily tumble and involve your self in your fetters. Make a little resistance, cast away I pray all these little urchins which afflict you. Is an absence so troublesom, that to avoid it you must torture your body, vilifie your spirit, and yield your reputation up as a prey to slander? You shall no sooner put the wedge into the block, but it shall be done; you shall have a soul victoriously elevated over passion, which shall rejoyce amidst the tropheys thereof.

Strength of reason.

The one and twentieth SECTION.

Against sadness.

HAve you never represented to your self the poor Elias lying under the Juniper tree, oppressed with melancholly, and saying to God with an effectionate heart: My God it is enough; take my soul. I am no better than my fore-fathers? This passion often happeneth in persons who are entered into the list of a life more perfect. Anxiety crosseth them, sadness gnaweth them, melancholy afflicteth them, and Satan (willing ever to fish in a troubled water) serves himself with this disturbance of mind, to make them return back again to the false pleasures of the world. What remdy, what practice shall we confront this mischief with? Let us use Davids harp to charm this dangerous devil of Saul. You are sad, say you: It much concerneth you to sound your heart, that you may know from whence this pensiveness proceedeth, and apply fit remedy thereunto. Sometime sadness cometh from an indiscreet zeal, when one will of his own accord undertake dertake austerities, neither ordered nor digested by counsel. He cannot find good success, yet is ashamed to go back again, which is the cause he is tormented between the hammer and the anvile. Sometime it proceedeth from a great immortification of passions, which at the entrance into a spiritual life (he beginning to pick quarrels with them) put themselves into the field, assailing and turmoyling the mind. As it is said, a little fish called the wasp of the sea, in the dog-days stingeth and disquieteth the repose of other fishes. It is perhaps as yet in your soul: neither day nor night, winter nor summer, cold nor heat, but good and evil struggle who shall get the upper hand, and this war troubleth you. Sometime it proceedeth from a great tenderness of heart, and a passionate love of ones self. It seemeth to a little girle who weepeth in the nook of a chamber, that the whole world is interessed in her sorrow, and that every body should bemoan her. Nothing is like to her unhappiness, her burdens are of lead, and all others are as light as feathers; or if you weep not with her, she becometh the more melancholy, and if you do sorrow with her, she taketh a higher tone to deplore her grievances. There is many times much niceness in our sorrows, and oftentimes our tears are nothing else but meer fopperies. From this self-love proceedeth vanity and complacence, which serve us with worm-wood to season our morsels withal.

Reg. 3. 19.

Sadness the snare of Satan.

Causes of sadness. Immortification

Tears of self-flatterers.

Self-love.

The man who is over-much pleased with himself, necessarily displeaseth many, and to gain too great a friend within himself, he purchaseth sundry enemies without himself. All things cannot happen to his wish, and as good successes inebriate him with contentments, so evil torture and immoderate contristate him. Briefly, bad melancholly often riseth from a jealous and envious eye: The good hap of another is a straw in his eye, which ever will trouble him, if charity bring not her helping hand. Behold here a lamentable mischief. All the perfections of another are ours when we love them in another, and when we hate them they are thorns in our eyes, which extreamly torment us. Have we not pain enough within our selves, but we must plant crosses in the prosperity of others? Sound your heart, and see whether your sadness proceeds from one of these five sources, or from many of them together. Take away the cause by the favour of Gods grace, by the help of your endeavour, courage, and resolution, you shall have the effect, and enjoy a peaceable soul, like Heaven smiling in a bright serenity.

Jealous eye.

Parum alicui est si ipse sit felix, nisi alter fuerit infelix. Salvian. de gubern. Dei. lib. 5.

My sadness, say you, cometh not from this occasion. Would to God it were so. You were already sufficiently happy, if all I have said were not of force to make you sad. From whence cometh it then? From the accidents which befal me on every side; and if nothing happen to me, I am unquiet with mine own self. If you think to live wholly without sadness, you must frame a new world for your self. Sadness is a bitter plant which groweth in your garden: you must know at one time or other what tast it hath. To think wholly to free your self, is to make your self a King in the cards, and onely to brave it in paper, like the ancient Philosophers who had their hands shorter than their tongues. Our Saviour was contristated in the dolorous garden, watered with bloudy sweats, to teach us the perfection of a Christian is not in being sensible of sorrow, but to moderate the same with resolution.

Sadness a plant of our own growing

The best remedy is that which Jesus Christ hath shewed to us, to wit, Prayer. It is a wonderful contentment to speak to God, and to tell him your afflictions. Behold you not in a garden-bed how those poor tulips are shut up with melancholy under the shadie coldness of the night? And you may well say the Sun within his rays beareth the key to open them: For so soon as he riseth and courteth them a little with that eye which exhilarateth total nature, behold they unloose themselves, dilate themselves, and witness their joy for the arrival of this planet. The like happeneth to your heart, it sometimes long remaineth benummed and frozen for want of having recourse to prayer. Learn a little to talk with God by jaculatory prayers. Learn to complain your self to God, and to seek the remedies of your wounds in his mercies, and you will find a great lightening and alacrity.

Remedies.

The second, to have a spiritual Father or a discreet and faithful friend, to whom one may unburden his conscience with all confidence and security. The cloud, how dark or surchaged soever it be, in that proportion it emptieth it self, cleareth, and the heart unburdening its calamities in the ear of another, becometh more bright and lustrous.

Thirdly, some spiritual Fathers advise a discipline, to suppress interiour sadness by exteriour sorrow: But this remedy is not for all sorts of men. Saint Hierom is a better Physitian, who ordained for certain melancholy men, rather to use the fomentations of Hypocrates, than to afflict their bodies, and distil their brains in other practices. You must take very good heed you make not your self a Timon, and hate men and life, entertaining your self in hypocondriack humours, which throw a mind into the gulf of disturbance. God willeth us to take moderate pleasure in creatures, which he hath made for our content and ease, that we may enjoy them in time and place, every one according to his condition, profession, and rule of wisdom. Synesius saith, the Creatour hath given the feeling of pleasure to sense to serve as an arrest to the soul, and to hold it in good quarter with the body. Saint Thomas among the remedies of sadness, prescribes sleep and bathing. The Scripture it self counselleth us to give wine and other fitting draughts for them to drink, who have their hearts oppressed with bitterness If one think to make a great sacrifice to God, resting perpetually, stretched and involved in a pensive austeritie of spirit, as being desirous to avoid all pleasures of life, he deceiveth himself: It hath happened, that many running in their own opinion to Paradise by this path, according to peculiar fancie, have found themselves on the borders of hell.

Remedies of Hypocrates.

Pleasure lays hold of the soul.

Somnus & balnea dolorem mitigant. S. Thom. 2. q. 38.

Date siceram merentibus, & vinum iis qui amaro sunt animo. Prov. 2.

Fourthly, to remember our life is a musick-book, seldom shall you find there many white notes together in the same line: black are mixed among them, and all together make an excellent harmonie. God gives us a lesson in a little book which hath but two pages, the one is called Consolation, the other Desolation: It is fit for each of them to take its turn. In the day of adversity think of prosperity: In the day of prosperity remember your self of adversity. That great Prelate of Cyrenum said, that the Divine Providence hath mingled our life, as one would do wine and water in a cup; some drink the purest, some the most compound, but all tast a commixtion.

Our life is a musick-book.

Synes. in hymno.

Fifthly, if you exactly compare our condition to that of an infinite number of miserable creatures, who groan in so many tedious and disastrous torments, you will find your fardel but a dew. But we have a certain malignity of spirit, which ever looks back on the good it hath not, to envy it, and never considers the evil from whence it is freed, to render thanks to God. Behold some are in the bottom of a dungeon in fetters, others are bowed in painful labours from the rising to the setting Sun, to get their bred. Some have the megrim in their head, the gout in their feet and hands, the stone in their kidneys. Others are overwhelmed with business, loss, misfortunes, strange and portentous accidents, yet carry it out with courage. Your heart is nipped nipped with a little sadness, and behold you despair; what effeminacie of spirit is this? It is said hares seeing themselves pursued on every side, had one day resolved to drown themselves, but coming to the brink of a river, and beholding frighted frogs who cast themselves at all adventure in the water to escape: Courage (said they) we are not yet the most miserable creatures of the world, behold those who are more fearfull than we. Ah how often should we say the same, if we saw the miseries of others!

Unworthines of sadness.

Sixthly, is it not a goodly thing to behold a man, who probably speaking is in the favour of God, who is here nourished with Sacraments, with Christs body and bloud, with the word of his Master, who liveth among so many helps and comforts, spiritual and temporal, who expecteth a resurrection, a Paradise, a life eternally happy and happily eternal, in so beautifull a societie of Saints, to frame pensiveness and scruples to himself of his own head, to afflict himself like a Pagan or a damned soul, that hath no further hope? It is related that God one day, to give an antipast of beatitude to a holy man turmoiled with sundry cogitations, caused an unknown little bird to chant in his ear in so melodious a manner, that instantly his troubled spirit became clean, and pure, and held him rapt many years in the most tastfull delicacies may be imagined. O if you often had strong imaginations of Paradise, how your melancholy would melt and dissolve, as snow before the Sun-beams!

Noble tears.

Lastly, sing spiritual canticles, labour, employ your spirit without anxiety, and if needs you will weep, lament your imperfections, bewail the miseries of the poor, sorrow for your curiositie, lament the passion of your spouse, grieve and sigh at your impatience, after this glory of Paradise, weep over the deluge on the earth, look back like a chast dove on the ark of your good father Noe, the father of repose and consolation: Then will I say of such tears with S. Ambrose: O the delicious tears, O the pleasing complaints, which extinguish the fervours of our mind, and make our affections sweetly to evaporate!

Dulces lachrimæ sunt ipsi fletus jucundi, quibus restringitur ardor animi, & quasi relaxatus evaporat affectus.

The two and twentieth Section.

The third combate of the spiritual man against impuritie.

Joan. 2. Three sources of impietie.

All impuritie of life, ariseth from three sources (whereof S. John speaketh) concupiscence of the flesh, concupiscence of the eyes, and pride of life. Let us now see the practice of virtues which oppose these three sorts of impurities. Against concupiscence of the flesh, temperance, chastitie, modestie do wage war: Against the concupiscence of eyes, to wit, the unbridled desires of temporal blessings; povertie, justice, charitie, mercie, gratitude: Against pride of life, humilitie, obedience, magnanimitie, patience, clemencie.

The three and twentieth Section.

Practice of Chastitie.

Chastitie is a virtue which represseth the impure lust of the flesh, a celestial virtue, an Angelical virtue, which maketh heaven and Angels descend upon the earth, and in this kingdom of mortalitie planteth the image and titles of immortality. Clemens Alexandrinus maketh mention of certain enchanted mountains, at the foot whereof was heard a voice as of people preparing themselves for battel; a little further, the encounter and conflict, and on the top, songs and triumphs. Behold as it were the condition of three sorts of chastitie. With some it beginneth with labour and uncertaintie; there is at the first toil and resistance against lust, but the even thereof is not known. With others it is become more manly, as being already practiced in combats. With others it triumpheth after a long habit, yet notwithstanding whilest here on earth it abideth, it is never absolutely secured.

Three sorts of chastitie.

Clemen Alex. stromat.

The acts thereof are,

Acts.

I. To renounce all unlawfull voluptuousness of the flesh.

II. To abstain from carnal acts, not onely those which are unlawfull, but sometime such as are permitted among married folk upon just occasion, or for some certain time, which is very ordinarie; or perpetually, which is singular and remarkable in the lives of some Saints. So Martianus lived with his wife Pulcheria, and Henry the Emperour with the Empress Chunegundis.

III. To repress all the desires and concupiscences of flesh, and if one have any feeling thereof, not to give consent thereunto.

IV. Never to stay at all upon thoughts and imaginations of things dishonest; but so soon as they present themselves, to chase them away and extinguish them in your heart, no otherwise than you should quench a burning hot iron in a fountain.

V. To mortifie your senses, which are most commonly the fore-runners of sin, and above all to restrain your eyes, which according to the opinion of S. Isidore, are as dishes wherein luxurie serveth up the viands of voluptuousness. They are the windows, the alurements, the snares, the conduits of love: It buddeth in the eyes, that it may at leasure blossome in the heart. And therefore it is fit to stand upon your guard with so subtile and vigorous a sence, which often filleth the soul with appetites and flames. I do not say that one should look upon nothing, and always live as if the soul were buried alive in the flesh; but I affirm, you must divert your sight from objects which dart a sting into a mind sensible of such penetrations. As for the ears, there is no doubt they may serve as handles for love, and that it hath taken many that way. An evil word hath fingers to incite the flesh: He who heareth it, and he that willingly speaketh it, is not innocent before God. Smelling blasteth chastitie, and tast roughly assaulteth; but kisses and unchast touches cut her throat.

Eyes.

Oculi patellæ luxuriæ. Isidor. apud S. Bern. tom. 1 serm. de luxuria.

Salvian. l. 3. de gubernat. Oculi tui videbunt extraneas, & cor tuum loquetur perversa. Prov. 23. 3.

VI. To flie idleness, reading of love-books, comedies, stage-plays, immodest pictures, feasts, private familiarities, loose companie, and all occasions of sin.

VII. To have in detestation even the shadows of impuritie. To speak, to proclaim in every place the praises of chastitie, and for this purpose to love penance, mortification of the bodie, labour, rough and harsh apparel, modestie, even to the seeming somewhat wayward, the Sacrament of the Eucharist, the meditation of the four last things, devotion towards the most blessed Virgin, and all that may conduce to the maintenance of honestie.

VIII. To remain firm in great and forcible temptations is verily the trophey of chastitie. Since (as Plato hath said) the triumph of virtue is to have the power, not the will to sin. It was a notable act of continencie in Charls the eigth, ardently to love a maiden endowed with an exquisite beautie, to have her at his dispose, and yet to abstain for one sole word which this poor creature spake to him, brought even into his chamber: For she by chance perceiving the picture of our Ladie, cast her self at the Kings feet, shewed him this image, crying out with a face all bathed Chastitie of Charls the 8.

Lyps. in monitis politic. lib. 2. cap. 17. Exemplo 12. addit datos puellæ 500. aureos.

bathed in tears: Sir, I beseech you for this Virgins sake preserve the honour of a silly maid. At this word spoken for a young King enkindled with love, and absolute in power, to conquer the motions of lust, is it not a matter that meriteth much applause?

Johannes Moschus in prato. A couragious Ladie.

IX. To contemn great rewards and high advancements of fortune, for the preservation of chastitie: As did that noble Lady of whom John Moschus speaketh, who seeing her husband consume in perpetual prison for debt, not able any way to relieve him, was reduced to terms of extream and miserable want, and besides pursued by a man of prime note, with all sorts of allurements, offers, and accommodations, which might shake and stagger an afflicted heart, and enforce her to condescend to a sin, which seemed to have necessity for a patroness; she notwithstanding stood firm like a rock, preferring chastitie poor and patient, before a rich and delicate dishonour. I could also nominate creatures as pure, as strong, adorned with most excellent natural parts, more chaste, more wise, more fortunate than Lucrece, who with as much industry as courage, have refused powerful and passionate men, that sought them with such excessive benefits, as would have overwhelmed any inferiour chastitie. But they, not to commit one onely sin, covered under the curtain of the night, have despised treasures, to guard another jewel in an earthen vessel, who for this act deserve to be raised above the stars.

Abraham the Hermite.

X. To withdraw the chastity of others from this sink, with liberal alms, great labour, infinite incommodities: As that worthy Hermit Abraham did, of whom Surius speaketh, who loaden with years and merits, went into a brothel-house in disguised habit, to reduce a Niece of his that went astray: as at this day many honest matrons, worthy of eternal memory, spare nothing to gain poor abused doves out of the faulcons tallons, and dedicate them to Altars, where soon after they work wonders in matter of virtue.

Hieron. in vita Pauli & Sabel. l. 5. c. 6.

XI. To suffer in your body great torments, yea death it self for the defence of chastity, as many holy virgins have done. As that youth, reputed the son of a King of Nicomedia, who fast tyed on a bed of flowers and wooed by a Courtizane with intention to corrupt him, spit out his tongue like a dart of fire and bloud in the face of this she-wolf. A tongue, which in dumb eloquence speaketh to all posteritie, and proclaimeth the honour of chastitie.

Lingua silet, clamatque silens loquiturq; pudorem, Sanguine quæ vixit sola pudicitiam.

A bold attempt of Didymus.

XII. To expose your self to great sufferings for the preservation of others chastitie: As that brave Didymus, a young beardless Gentleman, who beholding a poor Christian maid, named Theodora, thrown into a brothel, caused her to escape by giving her the habit of a man, and himself remained for pledge in the attires of a woman, expecting the fury of executioners who gave him the crown of Martyrdom. Saint Ambrose makes him speak to the maid to this effect: Sister, I am come hither as an adulterer, and if it please you I will go out a Martyr: Let us change habits, I pray you: We are as I perceive both of one stature: My apparrel very well fitteth you, but yours will set much better upon me, and both will agree in the service of Christ Jesus. My attire shall make you a virgin, and yours me a Martyr. You shall be most fortunately clothed, and I more happily despoiled. It was so done. Didymus was apprehended, and Theodora understanding it, run back like a lyoness amidst the swords to die with him.

Ambr. lib. 2. de virgin. Quasi adulter ingressus, si vis, Martyr egrediar. Vestimenta mutemus; conveniunt mihi tua, & mea tibi; sed utraque Christo. Tua vestis me verum militem faciet, mea te virginem. Bene tu vestieris, ego melius exuar.

The twenty fourth SECTION.

Practice of temperance.

S. Thom. 2. 2. quæst. 141.

TEmperance, taken in general, is a virtue which represseth the appetites of concupiscence in things that please the senses, especially of touch and tast. The temperance of touching consisteth in chastitie; that of tasting is properly abstinence and sobrietie. It is the first virtue which God seems to have required of man from the worlds infancie; the first tribute of sanctitie and innocencie, which our first parents could not leave without loosing themselves and all posteritie. A virtue, which is the horizon that separateth vegetative man from the intellectual: A virtue, which raiseth us from the earth, and bringeth us near to heaven: A virtue which makes a noble soul shine in a mortal bodie, as a torch of odoriferous wood in a Christaline watch-towet. On the contrarie, a bodie surcharged with kitchin-repletion holdeth the soul as one would a smoking snuff of a candle in a greasie lantern.

Temperance the first tribute of sanctitie.

The acts of this virtue are,

I. In refection to have no other rule but necessitie, no other aym but the glory of God, and entertainment of the bodie for the service of the soul. Saint Augustine after his conversion came to meals (as himself saith) as into an infirmarie to take a medicine.

Refection of bodie. S. Aug. Conf. l. 31. Hoc me docuisti, ut quemadmodum medicamenta sic alimenta sumpturus accederem.

II. To take all the necessities of bodie as the Ægyptian dog doth the water of Nilus, running, thereby saving himself from superfluous excesse. To take them as the souldiers of Gedeon drank at the fountain, in the hollow palms of their hands, cheerfully, not prostrating themselves on the ground; or as the dove taketh grains of corn, pecking her meat up with her bill, and turning her eye to heaven.

III. To eat and drink with all civilitie, decencie, discretion; and seeing we must use this necessarie trade of a beast, to do it at least like a man.

IV. To abstain from prohibited meats in times limited by the Church, exactly to observe fasts devoutly ordained by the same authoritie, and practiced by our Ancestours, not becoming nicely curious, nor repining at Lenten abstinencies. To prescribe also a law to your self of some fasts of devotion upon certain dayes of the week, and especially friday, as many noble personages have done, and daily do. Gallen that great Physitian advised to make a fast from ten days to ten, in the manner of a physical prescription, affirming it was an excellent mean to defend ones self from great and dangerous maladies.

Fast of Gallen Joann. Sarisb. Policr. lib. 8.

V. To be very sober in drinking, to take little wine, and mingle it well. Drunkennes (saith Saint Ambrose) is a superfluous creature in the world: It is the scorn of nature; it is an old shoe soaked in water. A man is no longer a man, but a bottle perpetually filled and emptied: He lives like a But, which doth nothing but leak and roul up and down; and when the head thereof is knocked out, you find nothing there but lees and dregs: wine is a familiar or spirit which possesseth him, and is the milk of Venus which nourisheth his concupiscence. All his life is an enterlude, and drunkennesse his tomb. All men truely great are sober. It is utterly to degenerate from Nobilitie to be addicted to this infamous vice. You who serve Kings, who are in their Royal seats as the Sun in the heavens, remember your selves that heretofore in the Sacrifice of the sun hony was offered, not wine.

S. Ambros. de Elia & Jejun. A drunkard what.

Væ qui potentes estis ad bibendum.

VI. To be very temperate in the quantitie of viands: For it is a very great shame to make ones self as it were a living sepulchre of all sorts of butcheries, and build to your self a tomb of fat, with excesse in eating, as did the wretched Dionysius spoken of by Ælian, who had grooms of his chamber about his bed ever readie night and day to prick him with needles, with distances between, lest his fat conspiring with sleep should suffocate him. On the other side, it is dangerous to destroy your stomach by scrupulous and extraordinarie observations of your own inventing, which may put you into a course of providing providing pain for your self and attendance for others.

VI. Not to be so curious in the choice of delicate meats, but to take them indifferently according to your quality and profession. It may happen, that a Noble man feeding on a curious dish with sobriety, may observe temper, and another cracking his guts with beans fall into a nasty superfluity of gourmandise. The virtue of temperance is not so much in the matter as the manner. It is written, that a great Roman Lord, being retired into the deserts of Egypt to attend contemplation, was one day visited by an Egyptian Monk, who had all his life time been a gross peasant bred among cows and cattle, and had an iron stomack, which in excessive quantity devoured the most lordid and despicable meats. This man much scandalized to see the Roman Monk feed on that which seemed delicate to him, and to drink a little wine at his repast, forsook his Cell with small account of his host, and much presumption of his own temper, when the other miraculously penetrating into his thoughts reprehended him, and he at that time easily acknowledged himself very short of his perfection whom he despised.

Shameful law of the Sybarites

VIII. Not to have your mind employed on sauces and kitchin-cookeries, as those lasy Sybarites, who made such account of a new kind of broth found out, that by an express law they permitted the authour thereof to enjoy it alone one whole year, before the invention should be communicated to any other.

Strang greedines.

IX Not to enlarge your thoughts upon viands with a greedines and profusion of spirit, as if one would swallow the sea and fishes therein, as Epicharmus writeth of a certain gentleman, who bowed his whole body in eating, crashed his teeth, made a noise with his chaps, blew his nose, rubbed his ears, made a certain sound in his throat, all his body went a long with it. A true mediocrity of feeding, is, to be neither too greedy and gluttonous, nor too abstinent or transported; but modest in your countenance, prompt to help, prudent to see what is done, and to prevent want in others. It would ill become a Noble man so to abstract his spirits at the table, as those good religious men of whom it is recorded in the history of the Anchorets of Ægypt, that they took capon for cabbadge: They were at Theophilus the Patriarch of Constantinoples table, and did eat like mad men, thinking they still had been in their Monastery. It happened the Bishop carving to the eldest of them, gave him the wing of a capon, and courteously said unto him: Father eat hereof, doth not this capon seem good meat to you? He comming as it were out of a trance: How? is this capon then, Sir? I pray you pardon us for we took it for cabbage, else verily none of us had touched it.

Notable distraction.

X. Not to out-run the hours of repast through impatience: not to be so addicted to serve our curiosities and delights, that thereby we leave not a good dinner to do a good work. Is it not a shameful thing of one Huguccbio, who lost two towns as Jovius relateth) for fear he should loose a good meal, so that it being at the same instant in his power to give order for a revolt which was plotted, he rather chose to sit out his dinner, and by this means forsook a fair opportunity?

Huguccbio lost two cities for a dinner.

XI. To content ones self with a little upon occasion, as the young Theodosius, who thought he had made a good meal when he had eaten certain sops of bread steeped in water, within the Cell of an Hermit. The wise Hebrews have a proverb, which saith: Man is known by three things, by anger, by his purse, by his glass. It is a note of a well mortified spirit when complaints are never made of wants that happen in service for the mouth

Man known by 3. things.

XII. To speak willingly of sobriety, yea even in a feast, like the Persians; or frame some other honest discourse which may give refection to the soul while the body taketh his, and beg perpetually of God to deliver us from the necessities of the body, and that he weaken in us these base concupiscences of the flesh, that we may preserve for him this his tabernacle in all purity.

The five and twentieth. Section.

Practice of Modesty.

Modesty is important.

MOdesty is a branch of temperance, a goodly and eminent virtue, which seemeth as it were to incorporat our soul, and make her visible in her actions, whose office is to guid the motions, gestures, words, mirth, habit, gate, and garb, and all that which appertaineth to the exteriour ornament of the body.

Her actions are.

To speak, what?

I. To govern the tongue, to speak truth in time and place, roundly and freely, without deceit, palliation, boasts, impostures, detractions.

II. Never to have a bitter and furious silence, prying into anothers words, nor to use a tattle unmannerly, clamorous, and tiresome, catching the word out of another mans mouth, as little chickens do, who snatch bits one from another, It was the comparison which father Gontery of happy memory used.

III. Not to be magistral, with a counterfeited gravity, nor riotous, haughty, fierce, rude, no buffon, nor loud laugher: A fool (saith the wiseman) crackleth in laughing, as thorns in the fire.

Tone of voice.

IV. Not to have your tongue either of too high or low a tone, but moderat, distinct, in sweet, honest, ordinary, intelligible accents.

Countenance.

V. To have the composition of your countenance, pleasing, gratious, modest, without crabbedness or affectation; the carriage of your body native, comely, free from extraordinary gestures: Not to have a giddy head, like a linnet, always shaking, no wrinkled brow, nor crumpled nose, no perplexed visage, nor eyes wandring, wanton, or proud.

Habit.

VI. The apparel neither superfluous, fantastik, nor dissolute, without too much affecting new fashions, nor peremtorily out of your own conceit tying your self to the old; but to attend your own condition, and remain in the lists of the modesty which is most practised by the wisest. Above all let women beware they set not to sale to carnal eyes that nakedness of their breasts, which may serve for baits for sin. The Scripture saith, Whosoever shall cause sparkles of fire to flie into another mans corn, shall be accountable for all the dammage which the flames shall make.

Means to acquire modesty.

VII. To acquire modesty, it is good to represent to your self often before your eyes our Saviour conversing upon earth, and to pray him he will give us a soul pure and radiant, like a star, which impresseth his rays upon the body as the Sun on a cloud, in, and through all, to edifie our neighbour.

The six and twentieth. Section.

Practice of prudence and carriage in conversation.

Isidore. Uranoscope.

HAve you observed a fish in the natural history, which the Greeians call Uranoscopus, as one would say the beholder of heaven? This admirable creature, contrary to the nature of others, hath but one eye which is as it were a vertical point fixed directly in the top of his head, ever elevated, and perpetually open, to discover so many labyrinths of snares and treacheries as commonly are in the sea. Some will say it is Tobias his fish, a notable creature, which not onely contributeth his gall to illuminate the eyes of the body, but his example to enlighten the eyes of the mind. It is a true Hierogliph of prudence, which telleth us we should at this day converse in the world as in a sea full of monsters, tempests, rocks, perils, surprises, and that we must have the eye of prudence throughly awakened and purified, to preserve and maintain it among so many hazards. This prudence in a word (according to S. Bernard) is nothing els but the knowledge of good and evil, which sheweth how we should demean our selves, and the ways we should tread, in the course of our life and affairs. It is one of the principal virtues, because all our actions depend on it. Yea prudence holdeth them as it were enfolded in the plaits of her robe, and unfoldeth them according to place, time, persons, occasions, which to know, is to know all.

S. Bernard. serm. de Vi-lico.

Importance of prudence.

It is said, a French King enquiring one day of a man, who was held in great reputation of wisdom, after divers instructions to govern himself and guide his Kingdom, this wise man took a fair large sheet of paper, and for an infinite number of precepts which others use to produce upon this subject, he onely wrot this word: Modus, Measure or Mean, thereby inferring, that the whole mysterie of our wisdom and felicity consisteth in doing things with grace, fashion, and measure, and that is it which prudence teacheth. We speak not here in particular of the Religious, oeconomical, military, politike, monarchical, but in general of the direction of life in ordinary conversation: For that seemeth annexed to the virtue of modesty. Imagine to your self that prudence, as antiquity hath presented it unto us in their Hierogliphs, is a hand enchased with eyes, which hath five remarkeable fingers, wherein all discreet actions are contained. These five fingers are memory, understanding, circumspection, fore-sight, execution: which is to say, that for the practice of this virtue,

All wisdom reduced to one word.

Prudence a hand sprinkled with eyes.

Five fingers of prudence.

Memory.

I. A good memory is necessary, to remember things passed, as well what one hath read in books, as those which are observed by proper experience; for that much conduceth to inform the judgement: And besides, he that in all actions hath not memory, when there is occasion to manage some affair, oftentimes findeth he hath not well called to mind all particulars, which putteth him into confusion. Behold why (as all men have not servants for memory, as had the Kings the great men of Persia, and Romans) it is necessary to have recourse to registers, records, and table-books to help your self. Some are of so happy memory, that they go (as it is said) to gather mulberries without a hook, to the well without a pitcher, into the rain without a cloak,

Understanding.

II. To be intelligent and able to judge well: and for this purpose he must endeavour to know the men with whom he converseth, their nature, humour, their capacity, intention, and proceeding, to penetrate affairs even to the marrow, not contenting himself with the outward bark and superficies. To consider them in all senses, all semblances. To put a tax upon things according to their worth, not to run into innovations, and cunning inventions, which disguise objects. To take counsel of the most understanding, faithful, and disinteressed men, to condescend to good counsels by docility of spirit after they are well examined, even to rest upon that which hath most honestly, integrity, security.

Docibility.

Choice.

III. In every deliberation which one makes upon any occasion to preserve ones self from four very dangerous rocks, which are passion, precipitation, self-conceit, and vanity. Passion colloureth all businesses with the tincture it hath taken. Precipitation goeth headlong downward into ruin. Self-conceit, not willing to forgo some hold, gnaweth and consumeth it-self. Vanity maketh all evaporate in smoke.

4. Rocks of prudence.

IV. To have a great circumspection and consideration not to expose your self but to good purpose. To doe like that sea-crevis, which hideth himself till he hath a shell over his head, and striketh no man. To spie occasions out, and mark how the little hedg-hog doth, into what quarter the wind changeth, to alter the entrance into his house. To stand always upon your guard, to discover the ambushes and obstacles which occurre in affairs. To hold the trowel to build with one hand, and the sword in the other to defend your self. Well to observe these four precepts: To have your face open, but your thoughts covered from so many wiles, which perplex our affairs: To be sober in speech: Not lightly nor easily to confide in all men, nor on the other side to shew too much diffidence.

Circumspection. Pagnin. Junius.

V. To be very vigilant in affairs, to fore-see what may happen in occasions, and prompt to find out means which may forward the execution of a good design. You find yet to this day in some old medals for a Hierogliph of prudence, a mulberry-tree having a crane upon his branches, and on the stock thereof a Janus with two heads: To teach us, that one proceedeth in matter of prudence, first, by not precipitating, no more than the mulberry, the wisest of all trees, which is the last that blossometh, to enjoy them with the more security, and thereby to avoid the pinching nips of frost; In watching as the crane doth, who abideth in an orderly centinel: In casting the eye upon what is past, and fore-seeing the future, as this ancient King of Italy, to whom for this cause is given a double face.

Fore-sight & vigilance.

Hierogliph of prudence.

VI. To use dexterity, promptitude, and constancy in the execution of things well resolved on; that is the type and crown of prudence. Many brave resolutions are seen without fruit or effect, which are like egs full of wind: All is but a shadow and a meer illusion of prudence. Seasonable time must be taken, for as Mithridates, one of the greatest Captains of the world, saith: Occasion is the mother of all affairs; and time being well taken, you must execute warily, effectually, constantly. Ferdinand Duke of Bavare seems to have made a recapitulation of the principal actions of this virtue upon a piece of coyn, where was to be seen, prudence like a wise virgin seated on the back of a Dolphin, and holding in her hand a ballance, with this motto in three words: Know, Choose, Execute quickly. The virgin bearing the ensigns of wisdom, said, you must know: The Ballance, that you must ponder and elect with mature deliberation: The Dolphin with his agility, that you must set a seal upon your businesses by a prompt execution.

Execution.

Occasio omnium gerendarum rerum mater.

A notable medal.

Cognosce, elige, matura.

VII. In the conclusion of the whole, the best wisdom is to distrust your own judgement, and to expect all from heaven, often asking of God not a wisdom humane, crafty, and impious, which is condemned; but the wisdom of Saints, which investeth us with the possession of a true felicity. The thoughes of mortal men are fearful, and their providence uncertain. My God, who is able to know thy meaning, if thy self give him not wisdom? Behold the virtues which guid the senses and conversation of man, against the disorders of flesh and bloud, the chief plagues of nature. Let us now survey those which oppose the second impurity, to wit covetousness.

The ſeven and twentieth SECTION.

Poverty of rich men.

Three ſorts of poverty.

THere are three ſorts of poverty; poverty of neceſſity, poverty by profeſſion, poverty of affection. Poverty of neceſſity, is that of the wretched, a conſtrained, needy, and diſaſtrous poverty. Poverty by profeſſion, is that of Religious, profeſſed by their firſt vow, which is meritorious and glorious. Poverty of affection, is an expropriation from the inordinate love of terrene goods.

We ſpeak not here to you (O Noble men) of the poverty of rogues, which is infamous, nor of that of the Religious, which to you would be inſupportable, and to your condition unſutable; but of the poverty of affection, the practiſe whereof is neceſſary for you, if you deſire to be Cittizens of Heaven. The practiſe is,

Practice of the poverty of affection.

I. To acknowledge all the goods and poſſeſſions you have, are borrowed, which you muſt infallibly reſtore, but when, you know not. You live here like birds, who are always hanging in the air, where either fortune diſpoileth, or death moweth the meadow, and then it never groweth again. It is a great ſtupidity of ſpirit, a great unthankfulneſs to God, if you account that to be yours which you may dayly loſe, and which in the end you ſhall forgoe for ever. Think not you have any thing yours, but your ſelf. If you love riches, put them in a place aſſured for eternity.

Auguſt. ep. ad Armentar. & Paulinam. Divitiæ ſi diliguntur, ibi ſerventur, ubi perire non poſſunt.

II. If you be not poor, live in riches like the poor. Oftentimes place your ſelf in thought, even in that ſtate you were born in from your mothers womb, or in that ſtate you muſt return unto in the earth. You then will have no cauſe to become proud of your riches, when you ſhall ſee your ſelf encompaſſed with falſe feathers, faſtened together with wax, which with the firſt rayes of the other life will ſcatter and flie away.

Non ſublime ſapere, & nec ſperare in incerto divitiarum. 1. Tim. 6.

III. Never ſuffer gold and ſilver to predominate over you like a King, but hold them under obedience like a ſlave. All theſe things come from the earth, and are made for the uſe of an earthly body: What eſteem can a Soul make of them, unleſs ſhe become terreſtrial? If you regard neceſsity, you have but very little need of them: if your own ſenſual appetites, you ſhall never ſatisfie them. Leave concupiſcence, and ſerve neceſsity.

IV. Live in ſuch a manner, that if you did know it to be purely and ſimply the will of God, you ſhould from this day be deſpoiled of all your wealth, and nothing left you but ſo much as would ſuffice to entertain life, you notwithſtanding would ſhew this change to be acceptable to you, ſaying with holy Job: God hath given it to me, God hath taken it from me, his name be praiſed. Theodoret makes mention of a very rich man, a Perſian by nation, and a Chriſtian by profeſsion, called Sames, from whom the King of Perſia took all his plentiful poſſeſsions, depriving him of gold, ſilver, garments, ſtock, revenues, and retinue; and not contenting himſelf with that, gave his wife and houſe to a ſervant of this holy man, further enforcing him to ſerve as a ſlave to this varlet, moſt ungrateful and barbarous to his good Maſter. Behold herein whither humane miſeries may arrive. Notwithſtanding Sames, a rock of conſtancie, was never a whit ſhaken, having this maxime well imprinted in his heart, that for acceſſories, we muſt never loſe the principal.

Martyr of poverty. Sames.

V. Govern your houſe in all frugality and modeſty: Make the expences which you know to be neceſſary and agreeable to your eſtate, not as a poſſeſſour, but as ſteward, and know you ſhall be accountable of the poors portion before God. Apprehend not ſo much the future time, either for your ſelf, or children, nor afflict your ſelf for preſent or paſſed loſs. Likewiſe when you have good ſucceſs in your affairs, paſs over it as a wary Bee over honey, not clamming your wings, according to the notable ſentence of S. Auguſtine in his Epiſtle to Romanian. Living in this manner, although you have Cræſus his wealth, you ſhall live happily poor. It is ſaid, that a great Pope with all the riches which he had, and dayly diſtributed for ſupply of needy mankind, was thought to be poorer (and as I may ſay, more expropriated) than a ſilly Hermit, who had nothing in his Cell but a Cat, he now being become a Maſter over his own affections.

Divitem te ſentiant pauperes.

Auguſt. ad Romani. ep. 113. Non fruſtrà in mullis copiâ pennæ habet apicula, nectit enim hærentem.

The eight and twentieth SECTION.

Practice of Juſtice.

Neceſsity of Juſtice.

THat which the air is in the elementary world, the ſun in the celeſtial, the ſoul in the intelligible, juſtice is the ſame in the civil. It is the air which all afflicted deſire to breath, the ſun which diſpelleth all clouds; the ſoul which giveth life to all things. The unhappineſs is, it is more found on the paper of Writers, than in the manners of the living. To be juſt, is to be all that which an honeſt man may be, ſince juſtice is to give every on what appertaineth to him.

It's Actions are,

First Juſtice.

I. To ſubject within us the body to the ſoul, and the ſoul to God: For the firſt actions of injuſtice are to place paſsions upon Altars, reaſon in fetters, and not to ſearch for the Kingdom of heaven, but in the ſway of our own private intereſts.

II. Concerning him who ſits in place of magiſtracy, to have an ardent zeal for the maintenance of lawes, to bend all his endeavours, to apply all the forces of his mind and courage to authorize juſtice, to ſtrengthen his arme againſt the torrent of iniquities, and to put all his peculiar intereſts under the diſcharge of his employments. He muſt have a great ſpirit to carry himſelf in that manner, and eſpecially in a world of corruptions. A good and perfect juſticer, like unto Job, is a Phenix. Ages as ſcarcely produce him, and when he dyeth he contriſtates the whole world. Where ſhall you find him who can attribute to himſelf this rare commendation couched in the books of this worthy man: I am clothed with juſtice as with a garment; I am adorned with righteouſneſs as with a diadem; I have been an eye to the blind, a foot to the lame, a father of the poor, I brake the jawbones of the unjuſt man, & took the prey out of his teeth.

Job. 19.

Juſtitiâ indutus ſum, & veſtivi me ſicut veſtimento diademate, judicio meo. Oculus fui cæco & pes claudo: Pater eram pauperum, contrebam molas iniqui, & de dentibus illius auferebam prædam.

III. Not to know the favour either of parents, friends, fleſh, or blood, when there is occaſion of doing an act of juſtice, as Canutus King of Denmark did, who after he had examined the proceſs of twelve theeves and condemned them, found one who ſaid, he was extracted of royal blood: It is reaſon (ſaith the King) ſome grace ſhould be done to him, wherefore give him the higheſt gibet. So the famous Zeleucus to ſatisfie the law, pulled out one of his own eyes, and the other of his ſon. So Andronicus Commenus cauſed publiquely to ſet one of his favourits on the pillory, and commanded all thoſe who wrought miſchief under the hope of his favour, either to leave injuſtice, or life. So the Emperour Juſtine ſuffered one of his greateſt minions to be apprehended at his own table by the Provoſt, and thence dragged to execution.

Helmodi Chronicon. Admirable Juſtice without favour.

Peremptorium est in principe vel auram adorari munerum, vel favorem quaerere personarum. Cassiod. Ignis devorabit tabernacula eorum qui munera accipiunt. Job. 15.

IV. To abhor those who betray justice either for money, revenge, love, or any other passion as monsters of nature, murderers of mankind, to hold them anathematized with the great excommunication of nature. Not to admire their fortune, nor in any sort to participate in their riches, to become a companion in their crimes, holding this undoubted, that the fire of Gods judgement will devour their Tabernacles who practise these corruptions. In the form of an oath exhibited under the Emperour Justinian, the Magistrates sware to maintaine Religion and justice, according to their power, and in case of corruption they wished upon themselves by way of execration the trembling of Cain, the leaprosy of Gehezi, the lot of Judas, and all that which may astonish man.

Oath of Magistrates under Justinian.

V. To have ears always open, and bowels of compassion ready to hear the complaints of widdows, orphans, afflicted, and forlorn people, who endure all the torments of the world to break through the press to manifest their miseries. The Emperor Trajan hath done many brave and eminent acts, but none of his atchievements were so resplendent as the justice he readily afforded to a virtuous widdow. Her son had been slain, and she not being able to obtain justice, had the courage to accost the Emperour in the midst of the Citty of Rome, amongst an infinit number of people and flourishing legions which followed him to the wars he was then going to take in Valachia. At her request Trajan, notwithstanding he was much pressed with the affairs of a most urgent war, alighted from his horse, heard her, comforted her, and did her justice. This afterward was represented on Trajans pillar, as one of his greatest wonders. And it is said, he was highly commended and admired by S. Gregory the great.

Notable act of Trajan.

VI. To doe good and to execute justice with expedition, not stretching the leather with the teeth, as said the good King Lewis the 12. taxing the delayes, reverences, and neglects of Judges. The Chronicle of Alexandria relateth an admirable passage of Theodor. King of the Romans, to whom a widdow named Juvenalis made her complaint, that a suit of hers in Court was drawn at length for the space of three years, which might have been dispatched in few days. The King demanded who were her Judges, she named them; they were sent unto and commanded to give all the speedy expedition that was possible to this womans cause, which they did, and in two days determined it to her good liking. Which done, Theodorick called them again: they supposing it had been to applaud their excellent justice now done, hastned thither full of joy. Being come, the King asked of them: How commeth it to pass you have performed that in two days, which had not been done in three years? They answered: The recommendation of your Majesty made us finish it. How? replieth the King, When I put you into office did I not consign all pleas and proceedings to you, and particularly those of widdows? You deserve death, so to have spun out a business in length three years space, which required but two days dispatch. And at that instant commanded their heads to be cut off. The good Juvenalis was so strucken with admiration for such an act, that she came to the King to render thanks, and to offer candles to him as to a holy Saint. And would to God Theodorick had still persevered in such integrity.

Strange act of Theodorick. Chron. Alexandrinum.

VII. Not to be contented with conscience alone, but to have science also, well to examine matters, and to observe the formes of right: Not to cause any body to be punished or tormented by precipitation without sufficient proofs. It is a lamentable thing, when through a desperat hast an innocent is bereaved of that in a moment, which never can be again restored although he should live an hundred years. But it is to be wickedly unjust, when that is also confirmed by malice and cruelty, which was begun by mistaking: As happend to Piso, who rashly condemned a poor soldier to death, wrongfully suspected of the murder of his living companion. As the innocent man had now his neck under the sword of his executioner, this camerado of his, supposed to be slain by him, appeared living and in health. The Centurion, who attended the execution, brought them both back again with much concourse of people, to present them to Piso. This furious judge enragedly ashamed of the first sentence which he overhastily had given, commanded they should both be put to death, and that also the Centurion should be added to them: One because he was already condemned, although guiltless, another because he was thought to be dead, and the third, because he would preserve in the Judge wisedome and innocency. This Barbarian shortly after paid for this fault joyned with many others, by a merveilous turn of Fortune, and a most shameful death.

Mad cruelty of Piso. Senec. de ira. lib. 1. c. 16.

VIII. To be more inclining alwaies to mercy than severity; yet notwithstanding well to take heed, least this mercy degenerate into a softnesse very prejudicial to the maintainance of justice. Also to visit prisons, to see what is fit to be done, and not suffer prisoners to consume in a tedious and irksome misery without true cause of delay.

IX. To extend the hand, that honest men may be maintained, protected, recompenced for services done to the Common-wealth, and Malefactours punished, and used according to their demerits, since reward and punishment (as Democritus said) are the two Divinities of Weals-publike, and the two poles on which the affairs of the world do move.

X. As for the justice of particular men, it is to obey Laws and Magistrates, keep peace and concord among their neighbours: To wrong no man in his honour, body, goods, allies, reputation, nor any thing that appertaineth to another, either by word, deed, or by sign.

Justice of particulars.

XI. To be true in words, loyal in promises, faithful in proceedings, to handle the affaires which one manageth roundly and freely without dissimulation, deceit, treachery, to avoid usury, and all unjust gain, to pay debts, not to withhold servants or hirelings wages, to be ready to satisfie those whom one hath offended, often to beg of God that in the day of his great Assises we may appear in the robe of Justice, to expect with all confidence the benigne breath of his mercies.

The twentie ninth SECTION.

Practise of Gratitude.

Beneficia pulveri, si quid mali patimur marmori insculpimus A singular saying of Sir Thomas More. Amb. l. 6. Hexan. c. 4. Tobies dog.

ONe Of the noblest acts of justice, is the acknowledgement of a benefit. A virtue very rare in this Age, where (as well Sir Thomas More said) good turns are written in sand, and injuries and revenges on marble. Saint Ambrose assureth us it was not without mystery young Toby took a dog for the companion of his voyage: God would he should learn acknowledgement of benefits in the nature of this creature, the Hierogliph of gratitude.

The acts of acknowledgement, are,

Gratitude of Hebrews. Joseph. Anti. l. 4.

I. Not to deny, dissemble, nor ever to forget a benefit, but to acknowledge it, retain it, praise, extol it, as the ancient Hebrews did, who set marks on their armes, and ensigns at their gates, for the remembrance and acknowledgement of a benefit received. It is a great shame to be ashamed to owe a benefit, and to avoid the sight of a benefactor, as if his presence upbraided either our ingratitude or disability.

II. To

II. To be thankfull, not onely in the presence of the benefactour by some little vain ostentation of acknowledgement, but to publish it to others in time and place, and to retain it as it were engraven in a respective memorie.

III. To recompence him according to power, not onely in proportion but superabundantly, which that it may be the better effected, to consider what is given to us, from whom, when, and how. A benefit is ever best accepted from a friendly, frank, and free hand, and many times from whom it is least expected, in a pressing necessitie. A benefit from a harsh man, given as it were frowardly, is a stonie loaf of bread, which necessitie enforceth us to take, not free-will. It is no gift, when that is given which can no longer be withheld; as Emanuel the Emperour, who seeing his full coffers in the hands of the Persians, said to his soldiers: Go take them, I give them to you. It is a negligent and remiss giving, when the extream want of a poor man is expected: As the fountain of Narni, which never distilled its streams but on the eve of a famin. A small courtesie seasonably done deserveth much, and that was the cause why King Agrippa made a poor servitour, named Thaumastus, the second person of his kingdom, for that he had given him a glass of fair water in his great necessitie, when under Tyberius he was tied to a tree before the Palace of the Emperour, and endured a most ardent thirst.

Sordid liberalitie of Emanuel Comenus.

Leander in umbriâ.

Joseph. lib. 18. antiq. Thaumastus the second man in a kingdom for having given a glass of water.

IV. As it is not good to suffer a benefit to wax old, so it is not always expedient to recompence it so readily, as if we bear our obligation with impatience, and that we had an opinion this benefit came to us from a hand besmeared with bird-lime, with intention to grasp another. The best way is to let your observances creep into credit, in time and place, with so much the more precaution as they ought to have the less of ostentation.

The thirtieth SECTION.

Practice of Charitie.

Eminentissimum charismatum. S. Iren. l. 4. c. 63. S. Maximus Oeconom. cent. 1. 38. Reg. 4. c. 2. Plenitudo legis Charitas. Aug. tract. in epist. Joan. Dorotheus 5. Bibliothec. PP. Doct. 6.

SAint Ireneus (as we have said) calleth charitie a most excellent present from heaven, the top and zenith of all virtues, gifts, and favours of God. Saint Maximus saith, it is the gate of the Sanctuarie, which leadeth us aright to the vision of the holy Trinitie. It is the double spirit which Elizeus required, wherewith to love God and our neighbour. Behold the whole law, behold all perfection. You are not much to afflict your self (saith S. Augustine) to become perfect. Love God, and then do what you will: For if you desire to know whether your love towards God be real and not counterfeit, mark how you love your neighbour. By how much the lines draw nearer one to another, so much the more they approch to the center: By how much the nearer you approch to your neighbour in love, by so much the nearer you are to God.

Acts of Charitie.

The Actions of this Royal virtue are,

I. To have an affectionate delight in God, for that he is God, all-wise, all-good, all-powerfull, all-amiable, all-just, all mercifull; the original fountain of all wisdom, goodness, power, beautie, justice, mercie. Most heartily to rejoyce that he sitteth in the throne of glorie, as in an abyss of splendour, adored without intermission by all the celestial powers, by all the Saints, by all the exalted Spirits. To desire that all the creatures in the world might adore and serve him, that all understandings were replenished with the knowledge of him, all memories with his benefits, all wills with his love. Such was the affection of that good Fryer Giles, companion to Saint Francis, who was much moved in beholding the beauties of God, and afterwards wept bitterly because, as he said, love was not beloved enough.

Amor non amatur.

II. To be sensibly sorrowfull for the impieties, heresies, infidelities, errours, sins, dissolutions, which have covered the face of the earth. To resent the injuries done to God, as one would the rebukes of a good father, of a loving brother, or of some person most tenderly affectionate, as the apple of your eye. It is an admirable thing to see in Scripture a poor Princess, daughter in law of Heli, falling in travail upon the news brought her of the taking of the Ark of covenant, and death of her husband and neighbours; for her neither to think of father, brother, husband, no nor the pains of her child-bearing, nor to complain of any thing but of the surprisal of the Ark, and to have dying these words on her lips: Farewel the glory of Israel, since the Ark of God is taken away; what zeal is this in a woman? And now adays one cannot loose a greyhound, a curtal jade, a bird, but all the house is filled with noice and outcries, whilest for injuries done to God the hearts of men are very insensible.

Mervelous zeal of a Lady. 2. Reg. 4. Translata est gloria de Israel, quia capta est Arca Dei.

III. To love all mortal men as creatures made to the image of God, but above all, the faithfull, in the qualitie of persons destined to the sovereign beatitude: to wish them true blessings, as justification, grace, virtues, spiritual progression, glory. Moreover to desire they may be fortunate in riches, honour, credit, good success in their affairs, if such comforts may conduce to procure them beatitude.

IV. Never to despise, never to judge rashly, never to interpret other mens actions in an ill sense; but to compassionate their infirmities, bear their burdens, excuse their weaknesses, make up and consolidate the breaches of charitie happened by their fault, to hate imperfections, and ever to love men, yea even your enemies. Therein the touch-stone of true charitie is known. The means to preserve one from his enemies, is to pardon enemies, said S. Augustine. One of the goodlyest spectacles, able to attract Angels to to the gates of heaven to behold it, is neither Theaters, Amphitheaters, Pyramids, nor Obelisks; but a man, who knoweth how to do well and hear ill, and to vindicate himself from ill by doing well.

Discè diligere inimicum, si vis carere inimicum. Aug. in Ps. 99

Cardinal Petrus Damianus relateth, how he being a student at Faenza, one told him of an Act of charitie happened (as I believe) in his time, at the same place, of which he made more account than of all the wonders of the world. It was a man, whose eyes another most trayterously had pulled out, and this accident had confined him in a Monasterie, where he lived a pure and unspotted life, yielding all offices of charitie according to the abilitie of his person. It fell out this cruel creature who had done this mischievous act sickened of a languishing maladie, and found himself enforced to be carried to that same place where he was whom he had bereaved of sight. His heart said within him, he would never endure him, but for revenge would put out his eyes. On the contrarie, the blind man made earnest suit to do this act of charitie to him withall the most fervent endeavour, as if he had sought some great fortune from the hand of a Prince. Behold he prevailed, he is deputed to the service of the sick man, and he dedicated to him all the functions of his bodie, except the eyes which the other had pulled out. Notwithstanding (saith the Cardinal) he wanted not eyes, having those of supreme charitie and patience. You would say this good blind man was all eyes, all arms, all hands, all heart, to attend this sick man, so much consideration, vigour, diligence, and affection he used. And what should they here say, who upon the least affronts burn with a revengefull spirit.

An excellent passage of charitie.

V. Not to have a lazie and languiſhing charity, which is onely in idea, but to be diligent, cordial, ſtrict; not for particular ends, but the taintleſs maximes of virtue. It was a great folly in thoſe Philoſophers called the Contemplators, who placed perfection in ſitting with arms a-croſs, without doing any act to aſſiſt in the ſociety of men. Witneſs the prime Prince among them, named Pirrho, who beheld the ſtars whileſt his companion Axaquus falling into a ditch cried out for help: They both were found, the one in this miſery deſpairing, and the other contemplating. It was ſaid to the Maſter: What do you here, my friend? Why endeavour you not to draw your companion out of this ditch? No other anſwer would he make: Let me alone. I meditate how to become an honeſt man. And behold him a lazy truant, without any further ſearch in giving aid to this miſerable man. In the whole hiſtory of Pliny the beſt word is this: It is a Divinity for one man to do good to another, and behold the moſt aſſured way of eternal glory.

VI. For this purpoſe you ought to know not onely at your finger ends, but to have both in heart and hand the works of mercy ſpiritual and corporal. You muſt diſpoſe your ſelfe with eſpecial endeavour to alms-deeds. There is the ſchool of rich men, it is their leſſon, their philoſophy, their heavenly Alchimy, their juſtification, their ſalvation, their glory. The practiſe of almes is not now to be required. It is eaſily found. There are as many waies of mercy, as there are miſeries in mankind, which are every day expoſed to our eyes: A thouſand fold happy are they who ſeriouſly bend themſelves to comfort ſuch, every one to the proportion of his power. How many brave and noble ſpirits are induſtrious in that kind? Some (as the Emperour Titus) thought they had loſt a day wherein they had obliged no man. Others daily fed ſome poor creature, in whom they acknowledged the perſon of Jeſus Chriſt. Others went up and down into publike ſtreets, to find out the neceſſities of men, to relieve and conſolate them. Others humbled themſelves continually to the ſervices of the ſick and indigent. Others taught this practiſe to their little children, almoſt from the nurces breaſt; as ſoon as they began to ſtutter out words, they were made oratours for the poor. Others diſtributed their revenew in equal portions to Churches, needy perſons, and for their own maintenance. Others gave the firſt fruits of all their increaſe of profits. Others founded and inſtituted a thouſand excellent works of piety. Behold good life herein, fair hope, and generous charity. And is it not to be the ſcorn and ſcandal of mankind to amaſs riches for worms, for moths, for children many times wicked, drunken, looſe Libertines, who will play and diſport upon their parents tombs? It were a notable inſcription if one ſhould put theſe words upon your monument, which Valerius gave to one called Gillias:

Almes.

QUOD GILLIAS POSSIDEBAT, OMNIUM QUASI COMMUNE PATRIMONIUM ERAT: HIC IPSIUS LIBERALITATIS PRÆCORDIA HABUIT, ET DOMUS EJUS QUASI QUÆDAM MUNIFICENTIÆ OFFICINA. What Gillias had, was the poſſeſſion of all mankind. This man had his heart and entrals compoſed even of Charity it ſelf: His houſe was a ſhop of bounty.

Of Virtues that oppoſe the third impurity, which is pride of life.

The thirty firſt SECTION.

The practice of humility and magnanimity.

TO ſay that Noble men and perſons of quality have no need of the virtue of humility, is to ſay that ſick men have no need of health. Humility is the element and orb of virtues. It is the gate of Chriſtianity (ſaith S. Cyprian) and we ought not to think that man will be loyal to faith, who is unfaithful to the virtue of Jeſus Chriſt, to wit, humility. It is neceſſary for all men, but eſpecially great ones, who are more roughly aſſaulted by the ſtorms of pride: And if this virtue be a contempt of it's own excellency, where ſhall you find out this excellency to find out the contempt thereof? Shall it be in mean and inferiour ſpirits? They naturally are in their own way of baſeneſs, but not therefore in the path of humility. The moſt exact humility is that, which hath more of honour, and leſs of the ſenſe of honour, ſaith S. Bernard. The ſtars are beheld in the bottom of a pit, and profound humility maketh the moſt radiant ſplendours appear in greatneſs. The ſun diſpelleth the groſſeſt vapours, and draweth the thinneſt and ſubtile to himſelf: How much the more you leſſen your ſelf, ſo much the nearer you ſhall approach to the Sun of true glory. If you deſire to practice this celeſtial virtue, behold the actions.

Primus Religionis introitus. Ciprian. de Nativitate Chriſti. Humility of great men. Magna virtus eſt humilitas honorata.

I. Do not intoxicate your brain with a mad vanity of noble race, which cauſeth many to dig out and diſentomb their Grand-fires, as it were from the aſhes of old Troy: and as Auſonius ſaith, in ſo carefully ſearching out uncertain parents, they many times give occaſion to think they have none certain, Nobility is not to be blamed, ſince it is the happineſs of good extraction, but to be vauntingly puffed upon this occaſion, is a meer folly. He that ſhould revolve and riffle the whole maſs of mankind (ſaith Plato) ſhould find there is no King, which commeth not from ſervitours, nor ſervitour who commeth not from Kings.

Acts. Pride of Nobility reprehenſible.

II. Not to affect, nor ſeek after humane praiſes, flattery, complacence, ticklings of reputation, which inebriate all ſhallow brains. Nor through affectation to diſplay a large liſt of titles and qualities. The time hath been when men named lands; at this day lands denominate men. So many abject villages, boroughs, hamlets, brave it in paper, and ſet our memories on the rack to name one man, who ſhould rather be named and renowned for virtues, which are the inheritance of men. Our Anceſtours, who raiſed their titles upon noble actions, were men of heaven: but now when we ſo paſſionately ſeek to acquire names of the earth, we well thereby declare we are men of the earth.

Names of land.

III. When one is arrived by virtue to ſome fortune and condition eminent, not at an inſtant to turn his brain as with a voluntary drunkenneſs, and forget not only his poor parents but himſelf alſo, affecting wry-mouths, crabbed looks, diſdains, ill countenances, and much exteriour ſeeming, to blot out the memory of his extraction. The good Primiſlaus being come from the fortune of a peaſant to the Sovereingty of Bohemia, cauſed his country-caſſock and high ſhoes to be kept in the Church, and yearly repreſented to him, to renew the memory of his bloud, and thereby cheriſh his own humility. Pope Benedict the eleventh, the ſon of a ſilly peaſant, his mother being brought unto him in a rich and ſumptuous habit, with intention much to pleaſe him, turned his eyes away, and ſaid he could not acknowledge this woman for his mother. But ſhe afterwards returning to him in her ruſtick attire, he acknowledged her, and yeilded all the duties of a good ſon. Their hearts were deep in humility, & not of theſe petty ſpirits, who are aſhamed of their beginning, and reſemble thoſe beaſts, which think they are well hidden if their heads be covered, ſhewing the reſt of their bodies.

Modeſty in it's exaltation. Humility of Primiſlaus and Pope Benedict the 11.

IV. Neither to make your ſelf Fierabras, nor the Knight of the burning ſword in matter of valour. Thoſe who moſt brave it in words, are found very ſhort

Rodomonti. short in performance. The world is full of Rodomonts, who onely are transported with arrogant and sudden furies, as Rabsaces in the Scripture; but few are found truely valourous. When Homer maketh his brave Captains march, he gives them silence for guid. Contrarywise he maketh cowards to babble and chatter like cranes. The one pass along like great rivers, letting their streams glide softly with silent majestie; the other do nothing els but murmur like little brooks; A sign of not being valiant at all, is to strive to seem valiant.

Vanitie of beautie. V. To boast the beautie of bodie, is to have a great defect in the judgement, which is the beautie of the soul. It is verily a desperate vanitie, when a Lady, under the colour that some scribling Rimer hath given her the locks of Aurora, the eyes of Venus, the port of Juno, the feet of Thetis, makes her self the Queen of Antioch, and glorifies her self many times with a beautie meerly imaginarie. Queen Stratonica, wife of Seleucus, had not one hair upon her head, yet notwithstanding gave six hundred crowns to a Poet, who had celebrated her in his verse, and sung, that her hair had the tincture of the Marigold. I know not how this soothing flatterer meant it, but this Queen became very proud, which made her so much the more ridiculous. Although this beautie were true, it is but white and vermillion skin distended over a carkase, which covereth many ordures: It is a dung-hill blanched with snow, an Idol of fools, a flower of the field, which hath (as it were) for horizon the instant of its birth. We may well give it the epitaph of the Rose:

Ridiculous pride of Queen Stratonica.

Mirabar celerem fugitivâ ætate ruinam,
Et dum nascuntur, consenuisse rosas.

Here lies the Rose in one day come From the first Blossom to a Tombe.

VI. A much more notorious folly it also is to boast and brave it in apparel, which are plaisters of the scars of sin, to wit, nakedness; borrowed feathers from all kind of birds, unpunished thefts, witnesses of our povertie, which causeth us to beg the assistance of all creatures to cover our shame. What an indignitie is it to be desireous to brave it above ones state, qualitie, or port, and to arrive at this height, ofttimes to bear the fat and marrow of the poor in the plaits of garments? Nay these many rapines are not sufficient to entertain this enraged prodigalitie. Debts must grow which cannot be discharged: Silk must be dragged at your heels, and a Sergeant readie behind you; to shew gold, and hide miserie and sin; to adorn a bodie, as if it were a Temple of Ægypt with all possible splendour, and to lodge within it the soul of a Rat. What infamie is it to behold in a banquet a Roman Lady, called Lollia Paulina, carrie about her in chains, carcanets, and pretious stones, a million of gold, and her father, who had dispoiled all the Roman Provinces to cloath this onely daughter, drink afterwards poyson, overwhelmed in the despair of his own affairs? Is not the chamlet coat of the greatest of all our Kings, S. Lewis, is it not of power to confound all Courtiers of both sexes, who having nothing worthy of praise in them, would dignifie themselves with apparel, shewing they have like Peacocks a little head, little brain, beautifull feathers, and a long tail?

Habits.

Plin. l. 9. c. 35. Paulina bare about her a milion of gold.

VII. Not to be proud for riches, for they are a river which now this day pass along by your lodging, and are no more yours than the river of Seyne. Nor to look with a surley face in great fortunes and dignities; for it is a vizard in a Comedie, which must presently be pulled off. Not to value your self highly for a happie memorie; for it is as it were the bellie of the soul, many times filled with much windines: not for wit, for it is often but thin, like the spiders web, fit to catch flies and nothing else: nor for the judgement, for much to confide therein is a dangerous leprousie in the heart of man.

Supereminence of person.

Modestie. VIII. To measure your self by your own rule, to know your own abilitie, not overmuch to presume of your own forces, not to undertake a great burden, and shrink under the weight of it. To speak little of your self, and of all that which is your own, not to overprize, nor deject your self, to do good without speaking of it, to obey the commandments of Superiours faithfully, readily, courageously, to moderate desires, to love mediocritie in all things, to have a sweet, affable, and respective conversation.

Megnanimity IX. If you be truly humble you will necessarily have the acts of magnanimitie, which are to undertake great things for the honour of God: For there is not any thing so potent as the humble man, who expecteth all his power from heaven. To contemn the promises and menaces of great men, when they request or command you to do any injustice.

Arist. Eth. 3. X. To drive from you with courage any obstacles, which present themselves to divert you from a good work: to make little account of all the states and dignities of the world: To enter into it, stay in it, go out of it, ever with the same countenance. To take honour as a tribute, which you are to put into the coffers of God. To abide continually both in adversitie and prosperitie within your self. To recompence a benefit liberally, never to detract, to praise sparingly, beg seldom, admire nothing lightly, nor complain of any man. To hold rank among great men without vanitie, and to humble your self to inferiours through charitie. Not to undertake many things, but perform brave things. To hate flatterie as a plague, hypocrisie as a poyson, complacence as a mockerie. To do and speak freely, what is reasonable. Not to remember injuries. To aym rather at true honour than profit.

The thirty second SECTION.

Practice of Patience.

Praise of Patience. BEhold that which setteth a seal upon all virtues, patience, ever the first in the list and last in the triumph. It is the crowned pomegranate which hangeth among bels in the lowest border of the high Priests robe of the old Law. It was a goodly thing to carrie all the world on his habit, all was imperfect without the crown of patience; she it is which hath the bell, to teach us, that all virtues are very excellent, but it belongeth not to them to proclaim victorie without patience and perseverance. Other virtues are as those ancient Painters, who subscribed at the foot of their table, He painted, he made: but patience may affix, I have made, I have perfected, since it giveth full accomplishment. It is the school of Christianitie. So learned are we (saith S. Ambrose) as we have patience: so much do we participate with God as we can suffer by his example. He hath taken a bodie to be able to suffer, and to make himself altogether the mirrour of sufferers, and the reward of those who have patiently endured. If we suffer not to imitate him, our soul is no longer ours: For it is the word of the Son of God, that we possess not this soul but by the means of patience. If we leave it, we loose all.

A notable observation upon the habit of the High Priest.

Ambr. super Proverb. Tantò quisque minùs ostenditur doctus, quantò minùs ostenditur patiens.

Vita PP.

For the practice of this virtue, I require not you should be a Saint Macarius, who for having killed a gnat which stung him, went (as if he had committed a great act of impatience) for the space of six moneths, exposing his naked bodie to all the flies, gnats, and wasps of the wilderness, to be revenged on himself. This patience is not for your purpose, learn one more ease.

Patience of S. Macarius.

Patience of great men, what. I. That you a little bear with your self. All follie hath this propertie with it, that it is perpetually in disturbances, ever wearie of the present, and with open mouth gaping for the future. It leapeth like quick-silver, it boundeth and skippeth from thought to thought, from purpose to purpose, from place to place, as the Stag from the hillock to the mountain, from the mountain to the hillock. And all that proceedeth from impatience of heart.

Acts.

to

First patience to endure ones self.

Take for the first act of patience to reclaim your self within your self, not to be still upon change, to rest with firm footing in the conditions, professions, employments, recreations, in which through duty you are engaged.

To spare men and endure men.

II. To spare men as saith the Emperour Antonius) and suffer men. You would have men speak, laugh, go, and spit, even after your fashion, that is the way to please you. Superiours molest you, equals trouble you, inferiours can do nothing to content your appetite, the noise of a door, the wind of a window, a glass broken, a mess of broth over-salted, a flie in the kitchin negligently driven away by a servant makes you enraged. You have more disturbances than the winding Euripus hath waves. This proceedeth from the great weakness of your understanding, effeminacie of flesh, tenderness of education, custom of curiositie, sickness, and giddiness of spirit. If you do not seasonably prevent the mischief and daily accustom your self to tollerate some inconvenience with sweetness and patience, you will become a monster in conversation, insupportable to all, and in conclusion troublesome to your self. What an indignitie is it, that a man full of rebellions against God, should desire that men and beasts serve him according to all his humours? Some slight fellow will be so observed in puncto, and a thousand and a thousand Kings have endured a million of indiscretions of their servants with patience. Is it not said that Philip the second, King of Spain, having written a letter with his own hand, with much studie and labour, to be sent to the Pope, when he asked for sand to cast upon it, his Secretarie half asleep poured the ink in the standish upon it? This would have put you into a furie, and yet behold a man of this eminencie bare it without speaking one angrie word to his servant.

Calumnies.

III. From hence you shall learn to suffer calumnies and slanderous words, not raising a storm in your mind about the interpretation of a doubtfull word, not to frame differences about the leg of a flie. Not to be amazed at forged imputations, which trench even upon the Diadems of Kings and Miters of Popes. The buckler wherewith you must resist them is contempt and innocencie. It is said, the Basilisk desirous to infect a looking-glasse killeth himself by repercussion of vapours which proceed from his own bodie, and the calumniator doth the like, when he meeteth with a pure unspotted life: It is a smooth glass, which slayeth him with his proper arms. Speak onely these royal words of David, a King and Prophet: My God, if thou suffer this persecution against me, at the least I beg the sacrifice of my patience may ascend to thy Altar in the odour of sweetness. S. Ambrose, as I have demonstrated before, hath observed, that this great man was so disposed to patience, that being persecuted by his son Absolom, and at the same time furiously pursued with the foul slanders of Shimei, he took the clamorous tongue of this detractour, to make as it were an Antidote of it, and apply it to the sorrow he received from the parricide of an unnatural son.

1. Reg. 36. Patience of David. Si Dominus incitat adversum me, odoretur Sacrificium meum.

Verborum contumelia paricidii levavit erumnam.

Maladie.

IV. Patiently to endure a maladie: It is a hard matter in vehement pains, but that some outcries and exclamations escape nature. I know not what heart that Gentleman had of whom the table of constancie speaketh, who played on a lute when his leg was cut off with biting saws and burning cauteries, without breathing forth one sillie sigh. That is not exacted of you, but that you use some moderation, and above all you have a soul resigned, principally in dolours and small maladies, which give you leisure enough to re-enter into your self.

Heroick acts of patience.

V. Finally to swim in a strong stream, you must fortifie your self, against all humane accidents, as are the hurly-burlies of fortune, (which in a moment thrust a man down to the bottom of the wheel) banishments, imprisonments, shipwracks, loss of goods, infamous accusations even of innocency it self, crimes, calamities, death of friends, neer kindred, fathers, mothers, brothers, children, and all that which hath sadness and horrour in nature. Out alas! what lightenings, thunders, tempests on all sides? What traps, what snares? O man (miserable creature) drenched in the water of thy tears, which are more familiar to thee than the sea and rivers to fishes; where wilt thou save thy self, if thou put not thy self under the shelter of patience? All is replenished with miseries, and to be desirous of exemption is a petty apostacie in nature. Tribulation is the Kings high-way, beaten and tracked with the sacred steps of thy Master, and with a countless number of Saints, who all of them have made their afflictions the degrees of their glory. Behold thy Jesus, he is the brazen serpent, planted in the wilderness of this world, which healeth all the bitings of our impatience. Behold patience, it is the salt of the Prophet Elizæus, which purifieth the polluted waters, and sweeteth all the bitterness of life.

Patience the Sanctuary of mortals.

The thirty third SECTION.

Practice of dayly actions.

Every day a table of life.

ALl our virtues are included in our actions, and our actions in the hours, the hours in the day, and the day in the moneth, the moneth in the year, and the years in the Ages. Every day is a brief table of our life, and the means to make ones self perfect quickly, is to perform all our daily actions with mature consideration and perfection. Behold a portraict, the lineaments whereof I have taken from a man endowed with great wisdom, religion, and integrity, whom I would willingly name, did I not fear to offend his humility, able to endure any thing but his own praises.

Means of perfection

I. It is a long time since the sun for your benefit hath dispersed the shadows of the night, that you may rejoyce at the sight of the great spectacle of the works of God; and yet your curtains are still shut to entertain you in the duskie image of death. Get out of your bed, and think this goodly star, which maketh you begin the carreer of this day, will this day run more than ten or twelve millions of leagues. And you, how many steps (I pray) will you set forward to draw neer to virtue? This indefatigable harbinger is gone forth to score you out the lodging of a tomb, so many minutes are so many points deducted of our life. Will not you follow the counsel of the Son of God, and do well whilst it is day? A great night will speedily involve you under it's wings, wherein you shall no more have further means to travel.

Motive to pass the day well.

II. Take every day as a day in harvest. Take it as a day of a fare, or mart; take it as a day wherein you are to labour in the mines of gold; take it as a ring, which you must engrave, adorn, and embellish with your actions, to be in the evening offered up at the Altar of God.

Day pretious.

III. Represent unto your self a notable consideration of S. Bernard, that your actions pass, as not passing: For every good work you do, is a grain of seed for life eternal. Say as did Xeuxes that painter so renowned, Æternitate pingo, I paint for eternity.

To paint for eternity.

IV. Follow the counsel of S. Thomas. Do every action in the virtue of Jesus Christ, desiring to have all all the good intentions and affections of the Church militant and triumphant: Do it as if thereon depended the praiſe of God, the good of the whole world, all your happineſs, and as if it were to ſet a ſeal on all your works.

Counsel of S. Thomas,

S. Thom. de moribus divinis.

To provide on the evening for the day to come.

V. Begin from the evening the purpoſe of good works which you are to perform the next day, what points you ought to meditate on, what vice you ſhould reſiſt, what virtue exerciſe, what affairs you are to handle, to make all appear in its proper time with a well matured providence. It is the thread of Ariadne, which guideth our actions in the great labyrinth of time, otherwiſe all runneth to confuſion.

Diligence in the morning.

VI. Have ſo much curioſitie in you, as ſometime to know of what colour the day-break of morning is, cutſtrip the ſteps of light, according to the counſel of the Wiſeman, to praiſe God. Take good heed leſt you imitate that hog Epicurus, who boaſted he had waxed old without ever beholding the ſun riſing or ſetting. It is a good cuſtome to riſe in the morning, but very difficult to perſwade women ſo, and all the Antipodes of nature, who change day into night, and night into day. That famous Apollonius held in his time for an Oracle of the world, coming very early in the morning to Veſpaſian's gate, and finding him awake, conjectured thereupon that he was worthy to command an Empire, and ſaid to one who accompanied him: Undoubtedly this man will be Emperour, ſeeing he is ſo early a ſtirrer.

Ἀνὴρ ἄρξει.

Three parts of the day.

VII. All that which you are to diſpoſe the day unto, is divided into three parts, Devotion, Buſineſs, Recreation. Devotion muſt carrie the torch and open the door to all our actions.

Awaking.

VIII. Make account at your firſt awaking to give all the firſt fruits of your faculties, ſenſes, and functions to the divine Majeſtie. Let the memorie preſently put it ſelf in mind, that it ought to do the work of God. Let the underſtanding caſt a conſideration upon its Creatour, like a flaſh of lightning. Let the will be enkindled with his love. Let the heart ſhoot forth ſome fiery ſhafts, ſome deſires and ſome affections wholy celeſtial. Let the mouth and tongue endeavour to pronounce ſome vocal prayer to the moſt Holy Trinitie. Let the hands figure on the forehead and breaſt the ſign of the Croſs, ſince they are lifted up to heaven. Let the arms and feet ſhake off the ſluggiſhneſs of ſleep, as S. Peter did the chaines at the voice of the Angel. Behold a good beginning, how to offer ones ſelf to God. The hair was pulled from the victim, and put into the fire before it was ſacrificed; ſo muſt you draw away at your awaking thoſe ſlight-eractions, to give beginning to your Sacrifice.

IX. This action ſhould ſerve as a preparative to another more long and ſerious devotion, which you are to make in your cloſet, when firſt you come out of your bed. If you have ſo gorgeous garments to put on, that neceſſarily you muſt beſtow ſome notable time to dreſs you, it is a miſerable ſervitude. Obſerve you not it ſhould be done to render your tribute to God? Then cloath your ſelf indifferently, as much as ſhall be neceſſary for comlyneſs and health. Afterward with bowed knees uſe five things, Adoration, Thanksgiving, Oblation, Contrition and Petition.

Exerciſe of the morning.

Five things to be practiſed.

Adoration, in adoring God proſtrated on the earth, reſounding like a little ſtring of the worlds great harp, and offering to the Creatour this whole univerſe as a votive-table hanged upon his Altar, wholly reſigning your ſelf to his will. For this act, it is very expedient to uſe the Hymn of the three children in the fornace, who called all creatures as by a check-roul, to the praiſes of God.

Thanksgiving for all benefits in general, and particularly for that you have happily paſſed over this night. The Church furniſheth us with an excellent form of thankſgiving in the Hymn Te Deum laudamus.

Oblation, of your faculties, ſences, functions, thoughts, words, works, and of all that you are, remembering the ſentence of S. John Chryſoſtom, That the worſt avarice is to defraud God of the oblation of your ſelf. Offer to God the Father your memorie, to repleniſh it with profitable and good things, as a veſſel of election; to the Son your underſtanding, to enlighten it with eternal verities, to the Holy Ghoſt your will, to heat it with his holy ardours: Conſign your bodie to the Bleſſed virgin, to preſerve it under the ſeal of puritie.

Contrition in general for all ſins, and particularly for ſome vices and imperfections which moſt ſurcharge you, with a firm purpoſe to make war againſt them, and extirpate them with Gods aſſiſtance.

Petition, not to offend God mortally, nor to fail with grace, light, and courage to reſiſt thoſe ſins to which you are moſt inclined. To practice thoſe virtues which are moſt neceſſarie for you. To be guided and governed this very day by the providence of God in all that may concern the weal of your ſoul, bodie, and things external. To participate in all the good works which ſhall be done in the Chriſtian world. To obtain new graces and ſuccours for the neceſſities of your neighbours, whom you then may repreſent, and this by the interceſſion of Saints, wherewith your prayer ſhould be ſeaſoned. It is then to very good purpoſe to ſpend ſome quarter of an hour at the leaſt in reading ſome ſpiritual book, imagining it as a letter ſent from God to you, for direction of your actions.

Spiritual leſſon.

X. When you put on your apparel, to acknowledge your great ſervitude, ſo to ſerve with much induſtry the moſt abject and brutiſh part of man. To think you garniſh a bodie, which even this very day may be a putrified rottenneſs. What time and diligence had Jeſabel uſed in the laſt day of her life to adorn and deck a bodie, that was trampled under the feet of horſes, and gnawn by dogs ſome few hours after?

Cloathing.

Maſſe muſt be heard at a due hour, in the manner before related, and that is a moſt eſpecial act of devotion.

Maſſe.

XI. The ſecond employment of the day, is in the affairs which one mannageth, whether it be for the publick or for your own particular, in the government of your familie, or diſcharge of ſome office. A good buſineſs is a good devotion, and nothing is ſo much to be feared as idleneſs, which is a very antheap of ſins. He who taketh pains (ſaid the ancient Fathers of the deſert) is tempted but by one devil; he that is idle, by them all. There is no perſon ſo noble or eminent, that ought not to find out ſome employment. If iron had the reaſon of underſtanding, it would tell you, it better loved to be uſed by much exerciſe, than to ruſt and conſume in the corner of a houſe.

Affairs.

XII. In the practiſe of charges, offices, affairs, to uſe knowledge, conſcience, dexteritie, diligence. Knowledge in learning that which is profitable to be known, for the diſcharge of dutie, in informing ones ſelf of that which cannot be gueſſed at, in hearing counſel, examining and weighing it with mature deliberation. Conſcience, in adminiſtering all things with integritie according to laws both divine and humane. Dexteritie, in doing all things diſcreetly, peaceably, with more fruit than noyce. In ſuch manner that one ſhew not anxietie in affairs, but like that Prince of whom in ancient time one ſaid, That in the moſt buſie occupation he ſeemed ever to have the greateſt vacation. Diligence, obſerving occaſions well, and performing every thing in time and place.

He that hath never ſo little ſpirit and good diſpoſition, ſhall always find wherein to employ himſelf, principally principally in the works of mercy both spiritual and temporal, amongst so many objects of our neighbours miseries.

Recreation. XIII. Time of repast, recreations, sports, and visits should be very regulat, for fear nature be not dissolved in a lazy and bestial life, greatly unworthy of a noble heart. Away with gluttony, play, detraction, curiosity, scoffing, babling. Let the conversation be as a file, to smooth and cleanse the spirit, and ever to adapt it to its proper functions.

Elevation of heart to God XIIII. One should not in affairs, recreations, retirements, omit at some times to elevate his heart to God by jaculatory prayers. Happy are they, who in every hour of the day do make unperceivably some litle retrait in their hearts, casting their eye like a lightning-flash upon the hour past, and foreseeing the direction of the next. Above all, after dinner it is fit to reenter into ones self, and to see the good order which hath been given for the execution of the mornings good purposes.

Evening. XV. In the evening before you go to bed, you are to use examen of conscience, Lytanies, and other vocal prayers, with the preparation of the meditation of the next day; happily to shut up the day with acts of contrition, faith, hope, charity, prayers for the living and dead. Thereupon settle your self to sleep with some good thought, to the end according to the Prophet, your night may be lightned with the beauties of God. If any interruption of sleep happen, mark it out with jaculatory prayers and elevations of heart, as anciently the Just did, who for this cause were called the crickets of the night. This doing, you shall lead a life replenished with honour, repose, satisfaction towards your self, and shall each day advance one step forward to eternity.

The marks which amongst others, may give you a good hope of your predestination are principally twelve. First. A lively, simple, and firm faith. 2. Purity of heart, which ordinarily is free from grievous sins. 3. Tribulation. 4. Clemency and mercy. 5. Poverty of spirit disengaged from earth. 6. Humility. 7. Charity towards your neighbour. 8. Frequentation of the Sacraments of Confession and Communion. 9. Love to the word of God. 10. Resignation of spirit to the will of your Soveraign Maister. 11. Some remarkeable Act of vertue exercized by you upon occasion offered. 12. Devotion to our Blessed Lady: In honour of whom you shall do well to observe daily three things. First, to present unto her an oblation every hour of the day of the Angelical salutation, when at the striking of the clock you recal your heart to your self. Secondly, to exercise some mortification of mind or body, by some motive of the imitation of her vertues. Thirdly, to give alms to her honour either spiritual or temporal.

This have I enlarged in a litle manual called THE CHRISTIAN DIVRNAL.

Instructions for the Married.

The thirty fourth. SECTION.

Of the misery of ill governed marriages, and to whom we may impute it.

THE great evils in ill managed marriages, made S. Gregory Nyssen and S. Iohn Damascene say, wedlock had not been invented, but to serve as a remedy for the wound of concupiscence, and that if the first Authours of mankind had remayned in original justice, the world would have been multiplied in a manner wholy Angelical, rather than by the ordinary ways of marriage. Notwithstanding S. Augustine and S. Thomas, who diligently looked into it, assure us marriage was treated in the state of innocency by natural ways, since Eve was created before sin, and given to man to serue as a companion for him in the worlds propagation. But if the divine providence would have pleased to have made choyse of other means for this increase, he had created millions of men in the beginning of the world, like unto Angels, and not one man alone, nor one sole woman, who were set in the front of all Nations of purpose to produce them with that progress of time and succession we therein observe. I pronounce, marriage had been without the ardours and disturbances of concupiscence, the paines of child-bearing, disloyalty, riots and discontent: but rather entertained with a tender love of the man towards the woman, and a perfect obedience of the wife towards the husband, with a sweet education of children, free from poverty, loss, and all sorts of troubles. Christian Religion endeavoureth to recal wedlock to the purity of the first institution, whilst good liking accordeth with the commandments of God, and the immutable laws of eternal Justice.

Nyss. lib. de hom. cap. 18. Damasc. l. 2. de fide ortho. c. 30.

There is a most remarkable thing written of the Peach-tree, that in Persia, which was the first and onely place heretofore of its growth, it was venoumous and mortal, but being carried and transported into other countreys, as Ægypt, Greece, Italie, France, it wholy changed nature, and loosing with the country its malignity, bare, and to this day beareth fruits rellished with muth tastfulness. The like is marriage, a strange plant if you leave it in its Province, that is to say within the limits of nature, extreamly passionat, and irregular; beware of poyson and death: but if you transplant it into the Evangelical Law, and manure it with order, continency, and that restriction which the law of God dictateth to you, you shall derive delectation and profit from it, for the solace and ornament of humane life. Nay we must affirm, the exorbitancies which now raign in the world, and which draw so many miseries along with them, make married people very often feel most harsh conditions, and to render marriage a soyle as natural for cares, as it is barren for roses and violets.

Marriage now adays throughout the greatest part of the world is a poesy of thorns, we know not where to lay hold of it, on what side soever it be touched it pricks the fingers. Marriage is the ivy of Jonah, exteriourly verdant with some apparance of cheerfulness and delight, but the worm of grief and anxiety gnaws the root within. Marriage is the plant which the Indians call the thorny bodkin: it is all over sprinkled with stars, and the rayes of these stars are nothing els but prickles: Maydens take heed, one may think to gather a star, who shall find a sharp thorn.

Marriage is the balm of Arabia, whereunto little vipers hasten to make their nests: such an one sees the leaf and sents the good odour, who perceives not the little serpents of a thousand disturbances which lie hidden there-under.

Marriage is the island of dreams of which the Ancients speak, where a thousand griefs are presented, covered at first with the veil of pleasure; you would swear they were little Cupids, who say, Come to me young man, come to me, come hither fair maid, come hither. They are entertained, they are courted, in an instant they take off the mantle, and appear as they are, with ugly countenances and horrid shapes. Marriage is a stormy sea, where nothing is to be seen but ruins, tempests, and shipwracks; one cries mercy, and another help, save if it be possible; and there are very few who arrive at the haven without infinit hazard.

Nescis quia Ismael est qui tecum ludit.

Marriage

Marriage is a long pilgrimage, which finds but three hosteries: The first is called false pleasure, the second repentance, the third calamity, and if you go any farther, you shall meet with despair.

The first difficulty there encountered, is, that of a free-man you become a bond-slave, and the sweet liberty which nature impressed on the heart of all living creatures, is the first trophey you must hang up over the bridal bed: The wife (saith the Apostle) hath no power over her own body; that jurisdiction is reserved to the husband: nor can the husband reciprocally dispose of his own body, for it is in the power of the wife.

Mulier sui corporis potestatem non habet, sed vir: similiter vir sui corporis potestatem non habet, sed mulier. 1 Cor. 7.

Nay did she know into whose hands she consigned this precious treasure, it would be some comfort to say thus much at the least. If I be a slave, I will choose a good Master. But thou silly maid, who hast been so tenderly bred, and hatched up under the wings of thy parents as a chaste dove, art put into the hands of a husband, as into the tallons of a faulcon. When he wooed thee as a suitor, he made shew of much mildness, he was a lamb, nay rather a wolf in a sheep-skin. No sooner was marriage consummate, but the mask was taken off, he shewed what he was, a gamester, a man chollerick, base, barbarous and tyrannical, that held this wretched dove in his bloudy claws, making her hourly vapour out her life through the sighs of her sorrows. Young man, who as yet art not fettered in the bands of marriage, thou makest love to a maid with infinite services, and for that purpose thou learnest to dance the cinque-apace, thou clothest thy self in silk, and cuttest thy beard in fashion, thou dost crisp and comb thee, thou dost court thy hair, and knowest not thou seekest for a Master. Thou thinkest thou hast found a precious stone, but thou meetest with a counterfeit: Thou thinkest she is a lamb, but she proves a wolf, yea a serpent which beareth fire and flames: thou must take her at adventure, and such as she is must keep her. Oxen and asses are tryed before they be bought (sayes Saint Hierom) but wives are taken without notice of their humour and deportment.

Nulla uxoris electio, sed qualiscumque venerit habenda. Hierom. contra Jovin.

Nay, which is worse, this poor maid with huge sums purchaseth her slavery. Fathers and Mothers have sweat hard for the space of twenty or thirty years, to amass a portion: Behold they have attired, decked, and adorned her like a temple, and she is led out with the sound of violins, as to the galley, and many times thrown into the arms of a husband who wasteth all. And the young man to become a slave, makes a thousand journeys, offereth a thousand supplications, a thousand thanksgivings, and as many salutations: Ah poor creatures, if you be weary of your liberty, are there no prisons, caverns, nor chains more pleasing?

Galley-slaves who toil at the oar, hope after five years, after ten years, or some term prescribed them, to be discharged from bondage. The ill married are enforced to expect death for freedom from their fetters; and there is not any Deitie to which they offer more vows and candles than to death, which is notwithstanding the terrible of terribles.

I give you leave to think, when two contrarie humours meet, as fire and water, a holy man with a spitefull and an immodest wife, or a noble spouse with a wicked husband, what an affliction it is. Saint Augustine relates that certain thieves, cruel and bloudy, to torture captives resolved on an execrable barbarism, which was, to joyn and straightly tie a live body with a dead, and so let the poor patient expire amongst ordures and insupportable stenches. It is the very like, when a holy and pious wife meets with a husband impious, wicked, and unnatural: she alive by grace and virtue is joyned to a rotten carrion, which intollerably tormenteth her, and if she in such occasions exercise patience, she gains so many crowns as there be hours in every day.

Let us pass further, and not here conceal some roses of marriage mingled among thorns. If beauty be therein, jealousie doth easily slide into it; and doubtless it is more aimed at, and is more subject to be surprized by temptations: If there be deformity, it much altereth the band of affections. If there be riches, and ample fortunes, they are exposed to much embroylment, great travel, and infinite peril; for the strokes of thunder ruine not any thing so often, as the tops of high steeples: If there be povertie, it is a misery intolerable. Are there children? wives, you know how dear they cost you. They who are tortured on the rack, suffer nothing in comparison of a poor creature, who is constrained to be delivered of her fruit by a travel extraordinary, hydeous, painfull, and oftentimes in seeking to give life to another, she there leaves her own. This sometime happeneth, because those children come into the world laden with benefices, mitres, and croziers. Abuse precedes birth; they are fathers before they are children: It is not yet known whether they be males or females, and all the world sees they already are charged with ecclesiastical livings. Mothers, you still bear them in your entrails; their fortunes, their accidents, their maladies, their deaths, through a reflection of nature imprint on your hearts all their passions, all their disasters; you are transfixed with as many martyrdoms as evils happen to your children; nay, should all succeed prosperously and according to the course of nature, yet must you a second time produce them to honours, estates, and fortunes. This pain perpetually ties you to the rack: To have them upon your hand, and not wherewith to provide for them, is a very sensible sorrow, yet richly to endow them is to give them wherewithal to enkindle their lust, entertain disobedience, and cherish vice. You think after your travels they will afford you the like, who oftentimes prove lewd, ungratefull, and malicious wretches, that waste the wealth you amassed for them, as it were on your tombs. Behold the slender scantling of the toyls and perplexities of marriage, drawn from the Doctrine of holy Fathers. I wonder not at all, those ancients in the ceremonies of marriage carried before the bride a torch made of black thorn, and never of any other wood; to testifie wedlock was replenished with difficulties very thorny. Nor shall I any more admire their custom, who in like manner caused the new wife to touch fire and water. For to say truly, she passeth through the boyling ardours of many dolours, through the waters of infinite many afflictions, and may repeat that verse when she hath met with some ease: I have passed through fire and water, and thou hast set me in repose and comfort.

Raram fert mixturam cum sapientiâ forma, & nihil est tutâ in quo totius populi vota suspirant. Molestum est possidere quod nullus habere vel amare dignatur. Pauperem alere difficile est, divitem ferre tormentum. Mulier cum parit tristitiam habet.

Psal. 65. 12. Ecce transivimus per ignem & aquam, & eduxisti nos in refrigerium.

Now, it is not sufficient to have expressed the inconveniences of marriage, if we also declare not the causes and remedies thereof: and this (Reader) is the reason, why I desire you to proceed in your attention. Men who will always conclude to their own advantage, speaking of this matter, cast all upon women, and ordinarily affirm we must not ask from whence the evils of marriage come, it is enough to say one cannot be married without a wife, and that woman is the source and seminary of all the miseries and disasters which happen in this affair.

Behold a very slippery place, what shall we answer? It seems that generally to condemn women, were to produce more testimonies of passion than marks of judgement. They are the mothers of men by nature, nurses by charity, and as it were hand-maids by patience. It is the devout sex, the sex of compassion and pitie. They daily do many good things, they succour the necessities of the poor, they visit hospitals, prisons, the sick; they replenish Churches, and edifie families with examples of pietie; and can you then speak ill of them? Notwithstanding, as we are not to flatter them, so it is undoubted that those who have once resigned themselves to evil, and become libertines in sin, are the cause of many ills, and practice much frailty in their sex, and cunning in their behaviour, to disturb families and the affairs of the world, if not guided by virtue. If we now will consult with the Ancients both Greek and Latine, they will tell us wonders; but let us hearken to Holy Scripture and Fathers. First in Genesis chap. 2. where the creation of woman is declared, it is said, that God caused a profound sleep to steal upon Adam, and that being asleep he drew woman out of his side. These words are very considerable. What meaneth it that God before he made woman, caused sleep to steal into the eyes of Adam? I will not here tell you, that some have glossed, that he could not have admitted this production of woman in any other manner: but I affirm with the Septuaginta, this sleep was an extasie, with Saint Augustine that it was a rapture, and with others a trance of spirit: For he then had need enough to fortifie himself with consideration, since woman came into the world, who would bid him many battels. Poor Adam fell into an apoplexy, into a convulsion, into swooning fits, as already feeling the cross thwartings, passions, and afflictions, he should receive from woman.

Immisit Deus soporem in Adam, cumque obdormivisset, tulit unam de costis ejus, & replebit carnem pro eâ, & ædificavit Deus costam quam tulerat in mulierem. Adam particeps Angelicæ curiæ intravit in sanctuarium Dei. August. l. 9. de Genes. ad lit. הורעוח Aquila. Κατὰ φορὰν. Symach. κάθοδον. Tertul. Accidentium spiritus.

Moreover who can but admire the phrase, which the Scripture useth in this creation, where it is said woman was built. Good God! what meaneth this? thou already hadst erected so many goodly buildings, Heaven and earth, the high and low stations of the world, thou hadst created Adam with a plentiful concurrence of many parts, and yet the Scripture saith not, thou then didst build, but when woman was to be created, God built, God made his first piece of architecture. And why? It is because woman is a house, wherein the heart of man should inhabit, who is, alas! there but too often captive? Or is it, that a woman costs as much in making, as a fair house? To build a house you must have so much sand, lime, stone, timber, iron-work, manufactures hands, strokes of hammers, masons, carpenters; and to dress and attire a woman so many coiffs, kerchiefs, cawls, so many false hairs, paintings, gowns, petticotes, chopins, verdingals, whalebones; so many carcanets, gold chains, jewels, gemmes, attendants, that a house were almost as soon built, as a woman furnished.

What doth she when she is built? Saint Augustine saith, she becomes the scholler of a serpent, the gate of sin, the fountain of errour, and the rust of pietie? Good God! what unhappiness is this? If from the side of man a flaming dart or keen sword had been drawn, they would have done less hurt than an evil woman; which I speak without prejudice of the virtuous. The first woman ungrateful towards God, a traiteress to her husband, a murderess of her race, made a bridge for Satan to pass into the world, and needs would lodge him in her heart, whom God had confined to the deep pit of hell.

Others, who have prostituted themselves to evil for these five thousand five hundred and thirtie years that the world hath circumvolved, have acted upon this large Theatre of many forms, so many bloudy tragedies, that they make histories to blush thereat. The daughters of Loth, the Thamars, Athaliaes, Jezabels, Vasties, Helenaes, Fredegondaes approve it, and their ashes also incessantly produce others into the world, Work-mistresses of all mischief.

Alas Mothers! instruct your daughters well whilst they are young, breed them up in the fear of God, frame them to duty, imprint on their tender hearts as with a searing-iron, the love of chastity, modesty in their behaviour, and devotion in their souls.

And you young men, who suffer your selves to be cheated and deceived by impudent women, permitting them to bewitch you with love-drinks and wicked attractives, open your eyes and behold the precipice before you, and then I doubt not you will abhor it. Trust not their familiar conversation and dalliances; know they are full of danger, and that there is not any can resist them without the particular grace of God. Strength little availeth; the Sampsons sunk to the ground: Wisdom is to seek; the Solomons fell: Valour therein is short; the Davids found it: Sanctity is not free from their batteries. the Elishaes were persecuted by women, and the John Baptists therein lost their heads: That venerable face, those eyes enflamed with heavenly rays, which won reverence from the wild beasts of the desert, could not mollifie a female dancer. That wise head where the maxims of eminent virtues resided, was taken from the shoulders of a Saint, carried in a dish to a banquet by the sacrilegious hands of a shameless woman: That tongue from whence distilled a stream of honey, was pricked and pierced with a bodkin wherewith the wretch used to curle her hair. Now according to the counsel of Saint Chrysostom, take into your hands this bloudy head, ask of it, O head which should never die, who hath drenched thee into the wanness of death? Who hath bathed thee in this bloud? Who hath put out thine eyes, the torches of the elect, and thunder-strokes of the wicked? Who hath layed an eternal silence on that tongue, which first of all announced the Kingdom of Heaven? The love of women. Lyons and Tigers reverenced me in wildernesses, and women massacred me in a Kings Palace, women mingled my bloud with wine, and made me as a pompous morsel of their tragical banquets.

Efficacissimum est glutinum ad capiendas animas mulierum. August.

When I say this, I not onely accuse women, but carnal men, who suffer themselves to be allured and surprized with sottish love, and trampling under foot the honour of God, the presence of Heaven and Angels, the conjugal bed, and faith promised to their wives, wallow themselves in execrable adulteries, which fill families with opprobrie, confusion, and tragedies; why say I families? nay, Kingdomes and Empires: and if we will well examine it, we shall find the greatest part were turned topsie-turvie by fooliish love.

O you that sigh, hearing speech of the furious disorders this unhappy sin brings into the world, I beseech you with Saint Paul, by the very bowels of our Lords mercy, offer your bodies to God as an hoast lively, holy, and acceptable to the Divinity; and you especially who are in the state of marriage, entertain your beds honourable and chaste, cemented with a perpetual knot of faith, love, and peace, that God may please thereon perpetually to shower down from on high his holy benedictions, and after the course of this painful life, crown you with comforts in the glory of the Blessed.

The

The thirty fifth SECTION.

That the evils of marriage ought not to be imputed to sex, but sin; and of the disorders committed in this Sacrament.

IF the unhappineſs of marriages proceeded onely from women, we might neceſſarily conclude they were alwayes unfortunate, as never being without a woman: but ſince experience daily teacheth there are of them excellently governed, we muſt not impute to the condition of ſex that which proceeds from the vice of depraved nature. Though the Scripture condemn evil women, yet it beſtoweth ſo great elogies on the virtuous, that they are able to dazle calumny, and enlighten virtue. One while woman is called, A Lamp which ſhineth on a holy candleſtick: a title onely given to perſons eminent, as it was ſaid of Saint John Baptiſt, He was a burning and reſplendent lamp. The body of this Lamp is the rib created by the hand of a great Work-man, the ſoul is the fire of it, virtue the light, grace the oyl, devotion the match and nouriſhment, and marriage the holy candleſtick whereinto it is put. Another while, ſhe is called a Sun: As a Sun (ſaid the Wiſe-man) riſing in the world from the palace of God. Whereby he would have us to underſtand, that a Mary ſhould ſo near approch to the Divinity, that ſhe was to poſſeſs the higheſt place above Angels, Thrones, Virtues, and all Intelligences. Sometime the ſame Scripture, to declare the rank a virtuous woman holds in the world, preſenteth unto us a ballance, in one ſcale a woman, and in the other all the riches of the world, and woman is the weightieſt. A chaſte woman is a grace above all graces, admitting no compariſon. And beſides holy Writ, repleniſhed with the virtues and remarkable acts of famous women, the Wiſe-man ſeems alſo to have undertaken as a task, the praiſe of women, in the panegerick of the one and thirtieth chapter of the Proverbs. There he compareth woman to a ſhip carrying victual from a far diſtant countrey, deſirous to ſignifie that ſhe is laden as much with virtues, as a ſhip with merchandize. Do you ſeek for devotion in her, a moſt eſtimable ornament of ſouls? Behold how the great Saint Auguſtine by ſingularity calleth this ſex, the devout ſex. Their firſt mother, as I told you, was created in terreſtrial Paradiſe; and they are perpetually at the gates of celeſtial Paradiſe, either praying or hearkening to the word of God. Were there not women, who accompanied our Saviour with his holy Mother in ſo many painful pilgrimages, ſuccouring his neceſſities according to their abilities? And is it not a prodigie, that on the day of that bloudy and dolorous paſſion, which ſhook the pillars of Heaven and made the Apoſtles flie, women were found who followed the Son of God with heart, affection, preſence, tears, ſighs, even to the foot of the Croſs; terrours of arms, fury of ſouldiers, earth rent in ſunder with ſorrow, and Heaven wholly covered with darkneſs, unable to force affrightment into theſe ſouls to ſtop the current of their holy undertakings? Beſides, they have done ſo many ſervices to the Church, yea ſo many wonders, that not onely Cities, but whole Kingdoms have many times been converted and brought to the knowledge of God by the means of women. Deſire you prudence in them? Behold a poor Thecuite, who treateth with King David of Abſaloms reconciliation, with ſuch dexterity, that ſhe obtained whatſoever ſhe asked. See in the Hiſtory of Eſther, how by the treachery of Aman, ſwords were drawn out of ſcabbards to be thruſt into the throats of an infinite number of poor innocents, throughout all the Provinces of the Kingdom, at which time God raiſed a young captive, an Eſther, who ſo well knew how to temper the ſpirit of this harſh and haughty King, that ſhe made him open his ears to innocency, and ſhut them up from flattery and cruelty: withhold the wings of thunder already ſhot over the heads of thoſe poor Citizens, and turn them againſt the guilty. If you among them ſeek for juſtice, the hiſtory of the ancient Gauls will ſhew you, that anciently they decided differences among people, and often ſtaid arms ready to encounter, planting the Temple of peace in the midſt of furies and liberty of arms. Yea God himſelf for the government of his people, was pleaſed to make uſe of a Debora, whom the Hebrews called by the name of a Bee, for her wiſdom, valour, and induſtrie.

Lucerna ſplendens ſuper candelabrum ſanctum. Eccleſ. 26. Erat lucerna ardens & lucens. Joan. 5. 35.

Sicut ſol oriens mundo in altiſſimis Dei.

Gratia ſuper gratiam, omnis ponderatio non eſt digna continentis animæ.

You will perhaps think ſtrength is wanting in this ſex: Behold Judith, who conſecrated her victorious hand to the defence of her countrey, and ſlaying Holofernes, defeated a whole Armie ſpread over Judea, and ſurging on every ſide like a furious deluge. And if you will thereuntoadde the hiſtories of later times, ſee a ſhepheardeſs, a ſimple maid, commonly called Ieanne la Pucille, who oppoſed herſelf as a wall for the defence of this Kingdom againſt Engliſh arms, with ſuch military proweſs, that ſhe ſeemed to bear fire, bloud, war, and victory in her hands.

Erat Debora pro Prophetis. Jud. 4.

Tu gloria Hieruſalem, tu lætitia Iſrael, tu honorificentia populi noſtri, quia feciſti viriliter. Judith. 15.

Let us then no longer ſay that woman is the ſeminary of evils happening in marriage: but rather that they are vices which proceed from both, when the husband and wife take the liberty of doing ill.

The firſt diſorder is, that ſuch matches are almoſt never made but for covetouſneſs. We do not well to call this an iron Age, it is all compoſed of gold and ſilver. Heretofore marriages were made for love, which cauſed them to be of a laſting condition, and to be indiſſoluble: but now adays avarice alone predominateth. We thought love was the moſt powerfull Archer of the world to transfix a heart; but avarice is found to confront him. Had a maid now all that which fools uſe to couch in their writings, the brows of Juno, the eyes of Venus, the hands of Miuerva, and feet of Thetis; if ſhe be not rich, were ſhe Pandora her ſelf, if ſhe bring not where-withal to guild the hand of her husband, it is no match for him.

Si uxorari oportet, ſit amor in cauſſa. Hieron. in ep. ad Ruffin.

Oculos ſuos ſtatuerunt declinare in terram

And from hence it comes, that marriage is not as it were marriage, but a mercenary traffick, a fare, a market, where reaſonable creatures are ſold like bruit beaſts. Ancient laws teſtifie, that heretofore nothing was given with maids in marriage but their apparrel, mean enough I warrant you: It was for men who ſought them, to endow them. This is practiſed ſtill in the new world, to wit, in China. It is a treaſure there to have many daughters, men buy them with large ſums of money, which they give to the parents that breed them; now they purchaſe men, and with huge portions buy their bondage. This makes their parents hair to wax grilly, and impoveriſheth families, which fear to be over-burdened with daughters; becauſe one cannot be rid of them, nor drive them away but with a rod of ſilver, ſo much this miſchievous avarice, this feaver of the heart, this voluntarily frenzie hath prevailed upon the ſpirits of theſe times. And were the maids in this caſe ſuch as they ſhould be, ſeeing the covetouſneſs of men, they would rather reſolve to take God for a husband in the ſtate of virginity, than yield their bodies and riches up to a husband, who ſeeks after nothing leſs than themſelves. S. Hierom relateth an excellent paſſage of Martia daughter of the great Cato, who ſaid, that among ſo many Gallants as made love to her, there was not any fit for a husband. Say the like, maidens, avaunt mercenary husbands who have the fever of money, marry them to the mines of Peru, and not to virtuous maids.

The second evil I observe, is riot, which now adays wasteth body and goods, and becomes more insatiable than hell. It is asked why avarice swayeth in marriages, and wherefore husbands are so greedy of portion? because indeed they stand in need of it to entertain the bravery and vanity of their wives apparel. It is a prodigious thing to what height this folly is mounted: Lawyers are much troubled to reckon up all the attires and trinkets of women, what pain shall then the husband suffer to buy them?

O woman, what makes thee so passionately to desire these gauderies? Thy first mother, whose garments were cut out by the hands of God, was contented to be clothed with skins, and now seas must be sailed over, and the bounds of elements broken, to seek out dressings for thee. Miserable that thou art, who inordinately deckest thy self, and for an ill purpose! Knowest thou not thy garment is to thy body, as the plaister to the wound, or any ivy leaf to stop a cautery? S. Isodore said, before sin Adam and Eve were clothed with light: O precious attire! The Sun will have no other mantle than his own rays, nor the rose any other robe than her scarlet; because nature hath sufficiently adorned them: So man, had he continued within the limits of original justice, would not have wished any garment but innocency. Sin is come, which hath by reflection impressed an ugly scarre both on soul and body; and needs must gold and silk be sought out to involve it. A man in former Ages was seen, who having feet of wood, shod them with golden pantofles: O miserable, and ridiculous vanity! Woman doth the like to cover her wretched body, which one of these days must putrifie, and which hath received the wound of sin and death. All the most exquisite beauties of nature must be drawn together; yea marry, if it could afford any comfort and ease to the body: but you shall many times behold a young gentle-woman groan as at a torture, under the weight of her garments, yet she for all this will have, and adore her own punishment. The great Chancellour of England, and glorious Martyr Thomas Moore, was he not pleasantly disposed, when he said to one who complained of heat: Ah silly creature, what wonder is it? thou carriest upon thee meadows, vine-yards, mills, mansions, and Islands, in the value of Jewels; how canst thou possibly be cool? This was the cause why Tertullian complained before him: A little Cabinet makes shew of a large patrimony. Twenty three thousand Crowns are disbursed for one rope of pearls. A womans neck puts on woods and Islands, and her ears which are so curious, waste ample revenues, Tertul. de habitu muliebri. Brevissimis loculis patrimonium grande præfertur, uno lino sestertium inseritur, saltus & insulas tenera cervix fert, graciles aurium cutes exlendarium expendunt.

But the matter most to be lamented, is, that it often happens, the servile and unfortunate husband buys all this bravery at the charge of the poor, and if any perhaps wring these gorgeous garments, there will be some danger the bloud of the poor may distil from it.

The third disorder is the discord which proceedeth from the ill government of men, from the obstinacy of women, and jealousie of both. And verily we may affirm the sleight vanities of wives, are much more tollerable than the disorders of men. It is no ordinary folly, but rather a rage and madness to see a poor woman full of children, groan under the heavy burden of a houshold charge upon her hand, daily fading and withering away like a plant without juice or moysture, to live on gall and tears, and in the mean time a disloyal husband to consume in excess of diet and game (the instruments of Satan) that substance God gave him for the entertainment of his family.

O ungratefull and unnatural wretch, who to give way to thy passion trampleſt under-foot the commandments of God and honour of marriage! This money which thy cruel hand so profusely scatters in game, if thou wouldst well understand, is the bloud of this poor creature which was so charily to thee recommended: It is the sweat of her parents labours, they are her proper entrails which thou piece-meal teareſt in this fatal dicing-house. I do not say thou art a homicide, there is some difference between thee and a murderer. The murderer in an instant taketh away life and bodily pain both together; but thou who livest in perpetual riots, thou draweſt the vital parts from this afflicted turtle one after another, which thou oughteſt to love as thy self. Thou cutteſt the throat of thy family, of thy poor and unhappy children, who are thine own bloud, which thou shouldest fervently affect, hadst thou not renounced nature, and entertained the heart of a bruit beast for that of a man; what say I a beasts heart? the Lamiæ have bared their breasts, they have given suck to their young, and there is not any but the daughter of my people who is cruel as the Ostrich of the desert.

Lamiæ nudaverunt mammas, lactaverunt catulos suos: filia populi mei crudelis sicut struthio in deserto. Hier. Thren.

Knowest thou to whom S. Paul compares such a man? to a Cannibal, to a Barbarian? No, he tells thee he is worse than an Infidel: If any one neglect his own, and namely his domesticks, he hath renounced faith, and is become worse than a Pagan.

Si quis suorum & maximè domesticorum curam non habuit fidem negavit & est infideli deterior. 1 Tim. 5.

On the other side the obstinacy of woman is a horse hard in the mouth, head-strong, untractable: and I can no longer wonder (said one) that she was made of a bone, since many times her head is so hard; which brings infinite trouble on a family. The Ancients dressing up the statues of the Moon in humane shape, set on her shoulders the head of the Sun, to shew, a virtuous wife should have no other will, nor other intentions nor glory, than the will, intentions, and glory of her husband, if they be reasonable. It is the doctrine of S. Paul to the Ephesians: That wives should be obedient to their husbands as to Jesus Christ himself, because the husband is head of the wife, as Christ of this Church.

Mulieres viris suis subdite sint sicut Domino, quoniam vir caput est mulieris, sicut Christus caput est ecclesiæ. Ephes.

But if she withdraw and disunite herself from this tye of obedience, and incessantly vex her husband with her obstinacy, this will be to him a martyrdom almost insupportable. The rocks of Caucasus are much gentler than a wicked woman: which verily you may see in the history of Job, to whom the evil spirit granted a wife to be the accomplishment of his afflictions. For this holy man, after the loss of his large possessions, so strange, so sudden, so dreadful; after his poor children were murdered and undone, had for tomb the ruins of their own house; after he saw himself changed into a scurf, covered over with ulcers, and placed on a dung-hill before the eyes of a citie whereof he had been Lord, he then thought the rage of Satan was satisfied: but he made use for the last piece of battery, of a spitefull and malicious woman, who seeing her husband in this plight, said unto him: Do you still remain in your simplicity? curse God and die.

Adhuc permanes in simplicitate tua? benedic Deo & morere.

But amongst all these disorders, no influence is more malign than jealousie, which cruelly tortures marriages, when it hath once bewitched the weak brain of man or woman, interpreting all the actions of each part in evil sense. Why went she to such a place? Did she not smile upon such an one? Did she not cast a pleasing glance upon such an one? Why spake she of such an one? And why shewed she compassion in such a mans mishap? Questionless she loves him, her affection grows cold towards me. Behold the idol of false zeal, whereof the Prophet Ezechiel speaketh at the entrance into the temple of Ierusalem.

Behold how before the temple of marriage, which is holy and sacred, man placeth the statue of jealousie, and daily offers a thousand sacrifices of sinister suspitions, ill digested fantasies, purposes wicked and injurious, to the prejudice of one who is in heart both chaste and modest.

Awo-

A woman oftentimes is made loyal by thinking her loyal, and he who doubts faith well observed, puts himself in danger to ruin it by his suspition. There are some care not to forsake innocency, when they have lost reputation, and when they entertain the opinion, their actions are ill interpreted, they are in danger to do all sorts of mischief. It is far better to think well of an hundred faulty, than ill of one innocent. It is a notable mystery to judge of hearts, nor is it any wonder that God reserved it to himself. Besides, as jealousies are very prejudicial to wedlock, so they cause many tales and matter of mirth to arise in a Citie repleat with curious people, who many times fatten themselves with the mishaps of another, and it often happens that from jesting they draw men and swords in revenge to act horrible tragedies. Happy they who know how to prevent by wisdom all those miseries which may grow from malice and misfortune, or discreetly correct by patience, what prudence cannot avoid.

The thirty sixth Section.

Very profitable instructions for the Married, drawn from the choice of holy Fathers, and abbreviated in a short discourse.

NOw will I descend to instructions suitable to this subject, and let you know (O husbands and wives) you should greatly take heed in all your deportments, as well in the beginning, middle, as the end. It very much importeth to begin with a good choice, and to enter with prudent consideration, and strong resolution unto the Sacrament of marriage: For that ought a long time to be deliberated, which is to be done but once for the whole life. What sense is there to thrust some forward upon marriage with a forck, when they have no disposition thereunto, and divert others who are more notably called to this kind of life? What rigour of parents, to tie young people by command to matches from which they have infinite eversion? Is it not enough to have the contentment of sage direction over a free-will, without usurping a petty tyranny upon the functions of nature? I do not tell you, you must readily obey all those who marry by the eye, without calling reason to counsel, or having any other guid in a matter of so great importance than the exorbitancy of their sensuality: But for my part, I hold it unfit to be violent by striking at the reasonable inclinations of children, for the accommodation of interest; otherwise, marriages are made without love, to create love afterward without marriage. It is a ridiculous thing to put wedded couples into the nuptial bed, without any fore-knowledge, as if they had been brought thither in a sack. So likewise should you not draw these treaties at length, lest they drag with them some disorder, and waste love before the beginning thereof. Love, which commenceth by fervours of a fire of tow, very often endeth in ice. Happy they who have the blessing of success, and are favoured from above to make an equal alliance between good hap and virtue. It was a great simplicity amongst those Ancients, who offered sacrifices to Fortune, to make their beards grow handsomely, and not to crave the benediction of God in their matriages. Fathers and Mothers give riches (said the Wise-man) but a wise wife is properly the gift of God. If one have matched ill, he must correct by prudence what wants of felicity. Beware, O husbands, for in this kind of life, which so straitly ties you, you are accountable to God, to your selves, to your wives: To God you owe a sincere conscience, that you may serve him worthily in the vocation wherein he hath established you, to become a member of humane society. Beware you hasten not to matriage as to a duty of nature, and not a Sacrament; if so, you wed like a Saracin, not a Christian. Those, saith the Angel to Tobit, are in the power of the fiend Asmodeus, who banish God from their hearts, and have no other intention in marriage but to satisfie their brutishness. Observe marriage as an invention of Almighty God, to produce man on earth, and to make elect for heaven. Entertain it as a golden myne, from which vessels of election are to be taken for the other world. Love your condition, and think you have a great priviledge, since you are to afford Heirs to your houses, Citizens to cities, Religious to Monasteries, and Angels to Paradise. Look upon God in the midst between you both, since he perpetually beholdeth you: The nearer lines draw to the center, the more they approach one to another: The nearer you are to God, the better shall you be united. If you build not the foundation of your house upon the fear of his Divine Majesty and sincere devotion, you raise fortunes like a Colossus of glass, which will shiver in pieces over your head.

Tob. 6. 17.

After you have resigned this your conscience to God, you owe to your self the government of your senses and use of reason; and (as it appears) you are, O men, strictly bound in marriage the more to render your selves men, since God placeth you therein to afford men to the Christian Common-wealth. It is necessary you draw from the fountain of wisdom more wit and more light, since you are to make use of it to enlighten a wife and children, who depend on your direction.

As for the duty of both, I find if marriage be a Lilly, it must have six leaves, which are Respect, Love, Loyalty, Support, Direction, and Help. It is fit love begin by a certain Regard which man and woman should bear one to another all the time of their life. For the functions of this society permitting a great familiarity, if it be not counterpoyzed with a chaste reverence, soon degenerateth into contempt. The wives Respect ought to pass even to obedience, which the Apostle S. Paul so punctually recommendeth to Christians, and the husbands should be mixed with a tenderness and moderation, to let him know, God drew woman out of his side to make her his companion, and not his slave.

Mulier collateralis viro. Gloss. in Gen.

It is good for the entertainment of this respect, that both of them accustom to conceive a good opinion of each others abilities: For where there is dis-esteem, honour will hardly be found, because it is tyed to worth, as the shadow to the body. For this purpose they must endeavour to cover the defects they may have by nature, by other virtues in their power, and to persevere in a belief of sufficiency in each ones condition.

To this respect the Love is added, which should be rendred according to the precept of S. Paul, in the matter of conjugal duty. For it is an intollerable thing, and wherein God may be grievously offended, when a woman imagineth that to be married is nothing else but to have a Coach to her self, to buy stuffs according to her own fantasie, to become brave, and have no regard to obligations essential amongst the married. But we may truly affirm all love of sense is very low, if it tend not to those eternal sources of amities, which distil from the Paradise of God, and learn to love by grace and reason, that which is to be loved. God, to cement this love together, drew woman out of man (saith Tertullian) as some part of a liquor from the vessel which contained it: He made two of one, to put them both afterward into one. It is to tear each others flesh, and gnaw their bones, to waste one another by discord, the most capital plague of marriage.

Tertul. de resur. carnis.

Holy love is always accompanied with mutual loyalty in any thing which concerneth conjugal chaſtity, as being the knot of affections and foundation of all the happineſs of the married. O wife, a ring is given you of a circular form, to teach your loves are limited within the nuptial bed. The ring, which heretofore bare the ſeal of promiſe, to ſignifie your heart ought to be ſealed with charity, and cloſed up from all other pretenſions. Believe not thoſe make-bates who tell you, good is of its own nature communicable, and that a fair wife is not for one alone, that chaſtity is a note of deformity, and that a husband and a friend are not things incompatible. Theſe are not words, but hiſſes of the ſerpent. Fear the leaſt blemiſhes of honour, and do not ſo much as caſt an eye upon the ſmoke of this cole, which now adays burneth ſo many unhappy ſouls. Love not to be wooed and courted by ſo many eyes and lips, nor to behold ſuch worldly pleaſures, to become pliant to others, or to attempt to afford love, and receive none back again. Out alas! theſe ſleight entertainments breed many acerbities. They are enchanted apples which poiſon all who taſt them. Men likewiſe, remember the beſt leſſons of loyalty which your wife can learn, ſhe muſt derive from your example. Think not becauſe you are a man, all things are permitted you, and that your ſex is a ſanctuary for your crime. If you be the head (ſaith S. Auguſtine) move it that way whither you would have the body follow. You are the more bound to conjugal chaſtity, becauſe you ought to be the moſt wiſe & ſtrong, becauſe you have the moſt employments to divert your temptations in the affairs of civil life, and laſtly becauſe you have moſt liberty, and may make your evil moſt general by diſturbing many wedlocks, as it happeneth to reprobate and inordinate ſouls in this kind.

Domus & divitiæ dantur à parentibus: à Domino autem propriè uxor prudens. Prov. 19. 14.

Caput ducat, corpus ſequatur. Auguſt. Serm. 49.

I adde to loyalty mutual bearing with defects and imperfections, which is a ſingular virtue in marriage. For we being in this world as in a territory where good and evil eaſily mix together, there is no plant which hath not its worm, nor beauty which ſuffereth not diminution. There are not any married couple ſo accompliſhed, who have not vices, defects, and imperfections, which who practice not to digeſt through Chriſtian patience, ſhall become not unlike a ſea-calf, ſaid to be always moody againſt his fellow. The husband and the wife are upon the river called Life in marriage, as in a boat: If there happen a leak, and it receive water, they muſt ſeek to ſtop it preſently, and if you have nothing to put into it, rather ſet a foot upon it, than pierce round about it to make the leak wider. A word or indiſcreet action hath eſcaped; to what purpoſe is it to reproach or pick quarrels with a man or woman upon it on all occaſions? Rather uſe the ſpeedieſt remedies you may, and if none be at hand, bury it in ſilence.

Finally, know you enter into marriage for direction and aſſiſtance; and though direction be principally proper to man, notwithſtanding it is a poor buſineſs to ſee a woman have neither care nor government in her family, imagining ſhe from morning till night ſhould have no other employment but to dreſs her ſelf, and many times to be attired when divers think of unclothing to go to bed. It is a ſhameful thing to prattle all the day long, and make a whole city trot upon her tongue, and yet be ignorant of what is done in her own houſe. A virtuous wife ſhould not onely govern her family, but with wiſdom and diſcretion temper her husbands paſſions; and if ſuch things eſcape him, redreſs them rather by love than power. If God heretofore cauſed a ſhe-aſs to ſpeak, to inſtruct a falſe Prophet, why ſhould he not at a need draw a good word from the mouth of a diſcreet woman, to ſet man into a fair way. Know we not that the laſt unhappineſs of Pilate was not to have believed his wife, much more enlightened by God than himſelf?

As for help, it is ſo neceſſary, that next after the comfort of poſterity marriage is conſtituted for that end. It is not enough to aſſiſt a mortal body in its infirmities, but ſo much as one may mutually to manure a ſoul immortal; you muſt between you ſhare all your proſperities and adverſities: I ſay proſperities, to moderate them; and adverſities, to honour them: you muſt mutually ſtrive to lend a ſhoulder, and if your burdens be weighty by the yoke of neceſſity, ſanctifie them by your patience. You muſt think it is a bleſſing even from God, to be choſen out to preſerve a husband, or a ſick wife, ſince this infirm creature is the Image of God, and your proper fleſh, to whom you render duties, which perhaps at this time ſeem thorns unto you, but ſhall one day be crowns if you know how to make virtues of your neceſſities. Be not diſcouraged through puſillanimity, but do like the Dolphin, who raiſeth himſelf with much alacrity againſt the ſea-waves during the tempeſt. Underſtand you not the Holocauſt muſt burn from evening till morning? Burn in this fire of love and tribulation, expecting to ſee glory in the day-break to crown your perſeverance. Though God allot you no iſſue, yet no whit the leſs love your comfort: God oftentimes ſuffereth barrenneſs of body to afford fruitfulneſs of virtues.

The thirty ſeventh SECTION.

Inſtructions for Widdows.

PErfect widdows are in the Church as the horizon of Marriage and Religion; they participate of both conditions, when they be in the world for the example of the world, for the government of their children and family; but they alſo have a ſhare in the life of the Religious, when they wholly diſpoſe their hearts to God.

We ſometimes ſee a bank of earth, which keepeth two ſeas from intermixing, but being taken away, thoſe two waters will paſs along together, and enguſf themſelves one within another. O how often ſaid you, during the knot of marriage, that if God once took away your husband, you would wholly be for him? Conjugal obligation and affairs of the world was your bank and your obſtacle; but now God hath taken it away, diſſolve your heart into his.

This is the paſſage where you are expected: Here it is where proof ſhall be made of your conſtancy. When you have deplored the death of your husband as a wife, you muſt learn to bear it like a Saint. It is a wretched virtue not to know what elſe to do than bewail the dead, and be deſirous to derive glory from the peeviſhneſs of your ſorrow. If we could draw aſide the curtain of Heaven, to ſee the ſtate of ſouls already paſſed out of mortal bodies to the promiſed recompence of the faithful, how much we ſhould be aſhamed and confounded at the weakneſs of our tears: we ſhould ſee this great Eternity ſeated in a chair of diamond, all ſparkling with ſtars and brightneſs, holding a flaming mirrour in its hand, at which time it would let us behold a goodly harmony of all the beatitudes theſe glorious ſouls now enjoy, ſeparated from the contagion of our mortality: then wiping away the tears from our eyes, it would ſay to us with a voice repleniſhed with ſweetneſs and majeſty: Why bewail you theſe kinred and friends, who live better than ever in my boſom, abſorpt in a torrent of eternal felicities?

An hundred and an hundred-fold happy are the dead, who depart in the favour of God! Behold them them for the time to come diſcharged from labours: Behold them freed of a thouſand and a thouſand cares, fears, pains, paſſions, maladies, wants, ignominies, and all thoſe evils which divide our miſerable life: Behold them folded within the arms of the Sovereign, where they reap the good works they ſowed on earth. You are much troubled, O widdow, that this your ſpouſe is at this preſent of the houſhold of God, an inhabitant of his manſion, and a poſſeſſour of his glory. Have you ſo many tears to lament miſeries, that you waſte them in felicities? as if it were a great unhappineſs to paſs from the ſervitude of the ſlaves of the world, to the liberty and joy of the children of God.

This is admirably well expreſſed in the 21. Chapter of Exodus, where God at the going forth of Ægypt, ſhewed himſelf to Moſes, Aaron, Nabal, Abiud, and all the moſt eminent of this Nation, having ſaphires for his foot-ſtool (which are ſtones of a celeſtial colour;) whereupon a learned Commentary drawn from the Hebrew Interpreters moſt divinely anſwereth, that God would ſay unto them: You have laboured in Ægypt with much patience about morter and tyles; and behold all your tyles turned into ſaphires, into heavenly ſtones, to build of them the foot-ſtool of your glory. This is it which the moſt Bleſſed Eternity ſaith to us concerning the dead whom we deplore. It is not fit any longer to take pains with tyles and morter; buſineſſes, cares, troubleſom affairs of the preſent life are paſt; there is not any thing but repoſe, peace, glory, and felicitie. Behold that which comforteth all ſolid and generous ſouls, with lively, fruitful, and eternal conſolations. Will you have a ſingular reſignation in the death of your kinred, which may daily happen and fall out of neceſſity? Behold Saint Lewis, when news was brought him of the death of his mother Queen Blaunch; he ſoon perceived by the countenance of the meſſengers, who were the Archbiſhop of Tyre and his Confeſſour, they were ready to tell him ſomewhat able to afflict the heart of man, before they could open their mouthes: Let us go (ſaith he) into my Oratory; (for it was the magazin where this great King took up arms to combate againſt worldly diſaſters:) and when they came thither, ſpeak now, what have you to ſay? Sir, God who had a long time lent you your mother for the good of your perſon and Kingdom, hath taken her out of the world for her own repoſe. At theſe words S. Lewis fell upon his knees before the Altar, and lifting up his hands to heaven, ſaid: O my God, I give thee thanks thou haſt afforded me my dear mother whileſt it was thy will, and that now according to thy good pleaſure thou haſt taken her to thee. It is true, I loved her above all the creatures of the world, and ſhe well deſerved it; but ſince thou haſt bereaved me of her, thy Name be for ever bleſſed.

Conclude your tears as he did, but never the reſolution of your widdow-hood. It were to be wiſhed a good vow might fix it with a nail of adamant: but that ſhould be done with diſcretion; for all in woman being frail, her tears can have no conſtancy. You may have read in the hiſtory of the unhappy Politician, the ſorrow of Glaphyra the wife of Alexander, ſon of Herod, whom his father moſt cruelly put to death to ſatisfie his chimæraes and ſuſpitions. Never woman more paſſionately reſented the death of her husband: her lamentations were yellings, her tears torrents, her words furies, her countenance deſpair, and life a little hell. There was no light to be ſeen after the eclipſe of her Sun, no world after her little world, nor life after the loſs of the moity of her ſoul. In the mean ſpace ſome babler inſinuating hereupon, and ſaying, ſhe did ill to afflict her ſelf for a death which could not but be happy, ſince it was free from the ſenſe of pain; and that for her ſelf (it was true) her loſs was unſpeakable, but the providence of God made it reparable by a ſecond wedlock, which would wipe away her tears, and that in her conſtancy the world approved all but the reſolution ſhe took to remain for ever miſerable. She ſo much with time mollified her courage upon the like remonſtrances, that ſhe married the brother of her dead husband, and after him a third, the King of Mauritania. Joſephus reJoſeph. 17. Antiqu. lateth that the firſt night of her wedding, the ſoul of her husband appeared to her, and ſaid: Glaphyra, you have approved common bruit, which ſays women are light. Where are now your tears? Where your ſorrow? Where the vows you made me? Your words were full of promiſes, your promiſes of oaths, and your oaths of perjuries and infidelity. For after my fathers cruelty had violently pulled away this my immortal ſoul, which now ſpeaks to you, you laid aſide your great grief, which ſeemed would never have an end, and yielding your ſelf up to the importunities of ill propoſed ſuits, you have admitted my brother into your bed, entertaining my memory and aſhes, as if I had been but a ſhadow; and not content herewith, after his deceaſe you married the King of Mauritania; and behold you now have turned your wanneſs into vermillion, your tears into pearls, and ſorrow into gold and ſcarlet. You are drenched in delights over head and ears, and take ſo much pleaſure among the living, that you forſake the memory of the dead. Now know, although you be ſo ungrateful towards me, I have not forgotten you; nor ſhall it be long before you be with me. The poor Queen was ſo terrified with this viſion, that ſhe was quickly taken into the other world, leaving (ſaith the hiſtory) by the publication of this apparition, a notable proof of the immortality of our ſouls.

Yet we do not forbid ſecond wedlocks: but all widdows are advertiſed they muſt proceed with great diſcretion, and that according to the Apoſtles counſel, the greateſt perfection reſts in widdow-hood. But above all, ſo uſe the matter, that this widdow-hood be not idle, that your children may find you a true mother, the Church a perpetual votareſs, virgins a protectrice, the poor a charitable nurſe, Monaſteries a good friend, orphans a tutreſs, the houſe one retired, ſocieties an example of good odour, and God above all a faithful ſervant. To encourage you to this reſolution, you ſhall preſently hear Saint Hierom ſpeak, who uſed words to this effect in the Treatiſes he wrote unto two widdows:

You have learnt in marriage the troubles of marriage; God was pleaſed to give you this ſchool to inſtruct you for widdow-hood by your own experience. You have vomited up the choller which ſurcharged your ſtomach, would you take it up again to bear it in your mouth? Would you return to the ſnare from whence you went? Fear you the world may want, if you bring no children? Let it fail through virtue rather than be ſupported by weakneſs. All thoſe who are married, have not children, and ſuch as have, are many times enforced to curſe their fruitfulneſs. To whom (ſay you) ſhall I leave all this wealth, ſince I am mortal? To God, who cannot die: To Jeſus, that you may make an heir of your own Maſter. Your father will be afflicted at it, but God glorified: your family mourn, but the Angels will rejoice. Let your father do what he will with his riches; it is not to him to whom you owe your birth, but to Jeſus the Authour of your regeneration.

Beware of thoſe venemous creatures, who ſeek their gain from anothers charge, and who tell you there is no ſenſe that a young woman ſhould waſte her youth in ſad ſolitude, and neither taſt the delight of children, noy reward of pleasure. If you have posterity, why desire you a second marriage? and if you have none, why fear you not a second sterility? If you be a mother, you perhaps set over your children, not a nursing father, but an enemy; not a parent, but a Tyrant. Needs must you forget your own children in the pursuits of your loves, and trick up your self in the defection from your orphans, who as yet scarcely know how to lament or understand their own misery. Alledge not here unto me, wealth, affairs, and services: No woman takes a husband, but to lye with a husband. Otherwise what a folly were it to resign up her chastity to multiply her riches? What will it be when a husband shall persecute you having your estate? What will it be when you no longer shall be suffered to love the children by your first husband, and that you must hide your self from doing them any good, and hate them, to shew you have renounced the ashes of the dead? If you have children of a second wedlock, be you never so good, you shall be a step-mother: If you spare ought from your son in law, you will be cruel; and if by accident any ill befal him, it is you did it; if you deny him meat, you are ingrateful, and if you give him any, you have poisoned him.

It is time you bury to your self all these pleasures in the tomb of your husband. Counterfeiting cannot make a fair accord with tears, nor doth grief permit the pomp of attire. Meagerneß and fasts should be your pearls, and prayer your perfumes. If a Queen of Carthage said heretofore of her husband, He that espoused me in the first wedlock took my heart and love with him, let him enjoy, let him possess them unto the grave; If she set glass at so high a rate, what shall we do by gold and pearls? If a Pagan widdow in the law of nature condemned all the pleasures of marriage, what may be expected from a Christian Ladie, who ows her chastity not onely to a dead husband, but a living God, and with whom she ought to live and reign for ever? The reputation of chastity is a most delicate Lilly in the person of women: It is a very beautiful flower, but there needs no more than a little breath, a little bad air to corrupt it, when age bendeth towards vice, and that she hath the freedom of a husbands authority, whose shadow many times might serve as a bulwark to chastity. What doth a widdow in so great a family, and amongst so many servants, whom I would not have her to despise as servants, but regard with some modesty, remembring with her self they are men? If the state and quality of her condition require a retinue, let at the least some ancient grave man be seen to bear sway, who by his good life may commend the honour of his Mistress. I know many of them, who having shut their door against strangers, have had an ill report raised by occasion of their houshold servants, who ministred matter of suspition, either through excess of their bravery, or their gentle garb and handsomness of proportion too lovely; either for their age proper to wantonness, or the vanity of a haughty spirit, or confidence in the favour of their Mistress.

All that by prudence should be prevented, which the world through malice may imagine. I desire not to see about you a houshold Steward so spruce, nor any servant who may savour of an effeminate Comedian, no wanton musician (the true instrument of Satan) to poison your ear with his warbling. Have nothing remiss, nothing which may smell of the stage in your family, but rather Quires of widdows and virgins, to be an honour to your sex, and to serve as a recreation in your most innocent delights. Let the reading of godly books never be laid aside, and let your prayers be so frequent, that they may serve as a buckler to repel the fiery arrowes of evil thoughts, which ordinarily assail youth. Let virtue consummate the good, which intemperance had prepared for it self. Redeem virgins, to present them to the chamber of the spouse. Take care of widdows, to mingle them as violets amongst virgins and Martyrs. It is a garland you shall give to God for his crown of thorns, wherein he bare the sins of the world.

It is very hard, and almost impossible to cut away all the seeds of passions, which we may call avant-passions, because concupiscence sootheth our senses, and insinuateth it self very subtilely: but it is in the power of the will to dismiss or entertain them. The God of nature said in the Gospel, evil thoughts, homicides, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness-bearings, blasphemies, proceeded from the heart. The spirit of man is more propending to evil than good, from the first cradle of infancy, and in the battel of the spirit and the flesh, whereof the Apostle speaketh, our soul is almost wholly floating, and knows not to what part to incline. No man comes into the world without bringing vice and ill inclinations with him, and he is the best who hath the least evil, and can preserve a fair body amongst many little infirmities. Matth. 15. Galat. 5. 1.

The Prophet said he was troubled, and that thereupon be held his peace. He tells you one may be angry without sin, like Architas the Tarentine, who said to his servant: I would chastise thee, were I not angry; which sheweth it was no sin, but a simple passion, for otherwise anger puts not the Justice of God in execution. That which is spoken of one passion, may be understood of another. It is proper to man to be moved with choller, and for a Christian to overcome choller. So the flesh desires carnal things, and by the itch thereof draweth the soul to mortal pleasures: But it is your part to quench the heat of lust by the love of Christ, and to conquer the flesh when it seeks liberty, by the help of abstinence, in such sort that in eating it may search for nourishment, not lust, and bear about the spirit of God descending into it, with a firm and even pace. Every man may be subject to passions, which are common to nature: We are of one and the same clay, of the same element. Concupiscence may as well be found in silk as in wool: It neither fears the purple of Kings, nor contemns the poverty of beggers. You were better have the disease of stomach, than will. Rather let the body obey, than the spirit; and if you must needs make a slippery step, do it rather with the foot than modesty, not flattering your self before sin with pretence of a future penance, which is rather a remedy of misfortunes than an ornament to innocents: For you must ever defend your self from wounds where sorrow serves for remedy. Psal. 76.

To Maids.

The thirty eighth Section.

The praises of virginity, and the modesty they ought to observe in their carriage.

THe great S. Basil calleth virginity the perfume of the living God; and I note from the thirtieth chapter of Exodus, this perfume of God which is spoken of, was composed of four ingredients, to wit, of Galbanum, Myrrhe, Onyx, and Incense. Galbanum is the juice of an aromatick herb, as white as milk, and which borrowing its name from milk, figureth unto us the whiteness and purity of virginity; Myrrhe it is mortification; Onyx a kind of little oyster, from whence issued a most odoriferous savour, signifies its constancy; and Incense in flames its patience in tribulations. But as for purity, I say reasonable nature hath engraven on the hearts of all mortals, and namely maids, so particular a love of integrity, that souls the most prostituted to sin, have ever had some remorse and feeling of the honour they had forsaken. S. Basil apud Meliſſam. λογιάδιον μικρόν.

Should I prove this by a passage of Scripture or a Father, it were the less effectual; because it may be said, chastity ought to be praised by such lips, I will evict this verity from the confession of a Pagan, to let let you understand it is a voice of nature. Behold a passage of Seneca, whom I have ever much admired: It is a wonder (saith he) that prostituted women still retain some modesty, and that those bodies which seem not to be made but to serve as an object for publick uncleanness, have ever some veil for their unhappy patience. The infamous place it self is in some sort bashfull. See the cause why there never hath been any people so loose and exorbitant, which afforded not some honour to chastity, convinced by their own conscience. But we must likewise affirm it was never known to be true purity, until the standard was advanced by Jesus Christ, and his most Blessed Mother.

Senec. naturalquæstion. l. 1. c. 16. Est aliqua etiam prostitutæ modestia, & illa corpora publico objecta ludibrio aliquid quo infelix patientia latear obtendunt, adeò lupanar quoque verecundum est.

We find even among those who lived in the law of nature some shadows of chastity. We have from the relation of Tertullian, that one Democritus voluntarily made himself blind by earnest looking on the Sun, that he might not behold the corporal beauty of women, shutting up two gates from love, to open a thousand to wisdom. But what chastity is this (I pray) since himself confesseth he did it not for any other purpose but to be freed from the importunities of lust, seeking out therein his own peculiar ends, not the honour of the Creatour? A Christian Champion proceedeth much otherwise: He hath eyes for the works of God, and none for concupiscence. He pulleth not out his eys to bereave himself of the spectacle of this universe, but teareth from his heart all the roots of depraved thoughts, to prepare therein a Paradise to our Sovereign Lord and Master. He sees all, and desires nothing: and although he touch at the sense of it, stays not in the consent. There is never a more undoubted triumph of chastity, than to deprive ones self of the instruments of evil. For as very well Climachus saith, the dead are never crowned, nor any man justly praised for having the impotency of doing ill. We find in ancient Rome Vestal virgins, and in the Citie of Egea, and Temple of Delphos: We are not ignorant that many have made profession of virginity; but what virginity? a virginity mingled with idolatry and secret impurities, loose liberty, and thoughts resigned to all kind of objects. Which caused Tertullian to say: (a) O goodly continency, which offers sacrifice to hell!

Νυχθὸς σ'ίφια ἔτραι ἀδύτοις δίκαις ἀφ' ἁμερίαν τὸ πᾶχυς.

Melissa. (a) O continentiam gehennæ sacerdotum! diabolus præcipit & auditur; nihil apud eum refert alios luxuriâ alios continentiâ occidere. Tertul. ad uxorem.

Virginity amongst Christians admitteth not one sole glance with deliberate consent, one dishonest thought, if voluntary. It reverenceth its secrets, and tells it not, Let us sin, none see us, there is nothing but darkness round about us, which cannot accuse us, our sins shall be letters sealed up from God. Nay much otherwise, the eyes of God are two flaming torches more resplendant than the Sun it self, which will drench us in the abyss, and for this cause we keep chaste our most secret thoughts. O excellent and admirable purity! O the true juice of Galbanum! O the true tribute of heaven!

Quis me videt? tenebræ circumdant me, quem vereor? delictorum meorum non commemorabitur Altissimus. Eccles. 23. Oculi Domini multò plus lucidiores sunt super solem, circumspicientes omnes vias hominum, & profundum abyssi.

Consider now the second ingredient of the perfume of God, which is myrrhe, to wit, mortification of senses. Where shall we find throughout the whole Synagogue, and all antiquity a chastity preserved with so many austerities and mortifications, as in true Christianity? Saint Ambrose in an Oration he made against Symmachus, mocketh at Vestal virgins, who made a shew to embrace virginity, living in superfluitie and delights; which is as if one would quench hot embers with oyl, or hope for beauty from the dawbing of a cole. Mortification of appetites hath ever been esteemed by Saints as a Palliffado of the delicious garden of chastity, and formal reason proveth unto us, that to cut off a vice subsisting in the flesh, necessarily the sinews of the flesh must be taken away. You may have as many fruits of honesty, as there are of it in terrestrial Paradise; you may have an infinite number of virtues, the ordinary companions of purity of body. If you destroy mortification, the serpent will enter into your garden and sting you.

Eccles. 10. Qui dissipat sepem mordebit eum coluber.

O Maids, you infinitely betray the glory of your soul, when you think to preserve the treasure of purity in vanity, bravery, and curiosity, which have ever been accounted the nest of immodesty. How can you imagine that living in banquets, pleasures, dissolute sports, among stage-plays, love-pamphlets, and continual occasions of sin, you can keep to God the faith you promised him in your confessions. You deceive your self, you have betrayed your bulwarks, and ruined your ramparts; the serpent will rush in upon you to suck your bloud, and then will be a fit time (indeed) to crie out murder.

Quis miserebitur incantatoria serpente percusso? Eccl. 12. 13.

You take delight to play with aspicks, and then say they have stung me, give me a remedy. Must you needs confide in serpents? Must you needs approch so near to a creature untractable? With what arms think you did the Church in its first beginning preserve this gift of chastity, and raise it to such a degree, that it filled the world with astonishment, but by flight from occasions, but by rigours and austerities of life? What flames of sensuality did not they quench who lived in wilderneses covered with skins, companions of bruit beasts, feeding on roots pulled up with their nails, and steeped in the sweat of their fore-heads?

Circuierunt in melotis, in pellibus caprinis, egentes, angusti, afflicti, quibus dignus non erat mundus: in solitudinibus errantes, in montibus, speluncis, & cavernis terræ. Hebr. 11. 18.

All passed times have infinitely commended a Joseph for leaving a cloak in his flight in the hands of an unchaste Mistress: He forsook his own (saith Saint Ambrose) as no longer accounting it his, since it was in the hands of an adulteress, and thought a garment touched by the hands of an unchaste woman was no longer for Josephs wearing. If this act be laudable, what shall we say of those who have not left a simple habit already polluted by an evil touch, but quite forsaken and abandoned in their best health, their own bodies, although most chaste and innocent, to preserve purity of soul by an extraordinary mortification of flesh? What shall we say of a Christian maid, of whom Isodore of Peluſium speaketh, who seeing herself sollicited by a yong man, shaved her head close to the skin to cure anothers love, depriving herself not of a coiff, not of a petticote or gown, but of an ornament which is on womens heads as flowers in meadows? What shall we say of those, who to chastise a slight glance rather curious than unchaste, have put irons about their necks, that so they might perpetually look on the earth, as unworthy to behold heaven? And what of others, who were threescore years without sight of any creature? Is not this properly to cast off, not a cloak as Joseph, but the body as if it were dead? Is not this to live in mortal flesh as if he had it not? And can you think God hath sold virginity to such, at the price of so many travels and mortifications, and will afford it you in pleasures and continual conversation amongst men, since where there is most battel, is most merit? What else is it to say, I will have wherewithal to overcome, but that I will have wherewith to undo my self? Beware lest you purchase an eternal ignominie, where you promise your self a triumph. For amongst all the battels in Christian Religion, none is more sharp than that of chastity, where the danger is daily, and the victory very rare.

Relquit sua tanquam non sua, quæ adultera suis manibus detinebat, & aliena judicavit, quæ ab impudicitiâ poterant comprehendi. Ambros. de Joseph.

Isod. pelus. l. 2. ep. 53.

Acepsimas ut refert Theodoretus & Menæa Græca.

Quid est dicere volo habere quod vincam, nisi volo habere quo peream? vide ne unde te putas habere triumphum æternum incurras opprobrium: inter omnia enim Christianorum pia certamina sola sunt dura prælia castitatis, ubi quotidiana pugna, & rara victoria. Auguſt. de viandâ famil. mulier. to. 9.

If you regard the third ingredient of this perfume, which is the Onyx, solid and permanent, the symbole of constancy; where can you meet with a virginity more bravely defended than among Christians? For if constancy (as Saint Thomas teacheth) consist in surmounting all difficulties and obstacles which offer to cross a good affair, who hath overcome more innumerable in quantity, more sharp in kind, more various in quality, than virginity? Domestick enemies are ever most to be feared, and such there are who have torn Lions, that could not rend from their hearts the least passion: But virginity, how many times hath it within its own body extinguished the flames of concupiscence by couragious and magnanimous acts, as are those which we find in the lives of so many holy creatures? How often did some roul themselves in ice and snow, as Saint Francis? How often did others drag themselves over thorns, all torn and bloudy, as Saint Benet? How often did others fight against fire with another fire, taking in open hand the prime element to vanquish the principal passion, as Saint Marcian? It seems to me when I hear of these combats, I may apply a notable place of the Seventy fourth Psalm to them: Help, O my God, help; the earth of this mortal flesh is all on fire, it is consumed, if you assist not. What have you to fear, faithfull soul? answereth the God of hosts. Be firm in your good purpose, it is I who will strengthen the columns and foundations of the earth: It is I who will shiver in pieces the bows, arrows, quivers, bucklers, and swords; yea all the temptations and powers of hell opposed against thee. My God, thou madest it; O what peace I now find in my heart, what great and divine lights descend upon me from the eternal mountains.

Liquefacta est terra, ego confirmavi columnas ejus, confregi potentias, arcum, scutum, gladium, & bellum. Factum est in pace locus ejus, Illuminans tu mirabiliter de montibus æternis. Psal. 74. & 75

Behold the interiour combats, but if you regard the exteriour, what violences, what warlike engines have not been employed against virginity? The teeth of Lions and Tigers were onely to be feared in beasts, yet they have been sought out in forrests and wildernesses, to be encouraged against virgins, and virgins have vanquished them. How many times hath a Lion been seen let loose against a silly Christian maid in an Amphitheater, to lick her feet, and in sight of four-score thousand people adore his prey, taking upon him that courtesie, which in men was wanting? Coals, which cast up devouring flames, frying-pans, boyling cauldrons made their hair stand an end, who afar off beheld them without danger, yet virgins felt them on their bodies, virgins overcame them, virgins stood free from hurt in the midst of these horrours, singing the praises of God, and the triumphs of chastity. Wheels armed with sharp irons to make bodies flie in pieces by gobbets, were the practises of Satan, never seen, heard, or thought on, yet being applied to the bodies of virgins, virgins blunted and rebated them with their tender and delicate flesh.

O quàm pulchra est casta generatio cum claritate! immortalis est enim memoria illius &c. Et in perpetuum coronata triumphat, in coinquinatorum certamine præmium vincens Sapient. 4.

Now, that none may object all this to be done by wily tricks of extatick souls, and that there could not be a true constancy observed therein, which is onely seen when there is a firm setling for some good space in the exercise of a virtue, you find an infinite number of them, who waxed old in great combats, great afflictions, great austerities, great flatteries, yet never left their resolution. And to let others pass under silence, who are innumerable, I will onely remember a maid of Alexandria, endowed with an exquisite beauty, and sued unto with all possible importunities, who hid her self in a sepulchre of the dead, and lived twelve years in a little cell, made to lodge such as had nothing to do with the world, she being found in this manner, and asked what she meant to do; made answer: I preserve the treasure of chastity amongst these dead carkases, from whence I behold not the sparkles of concupiscence to flie. O my God, what constancy is this! what vigour of spirit! what adamantine courage! and what may weak souls say to this, who yield at the first brunt, and seem to have nothing in the world more easie and familiar, than to loose that which can never be recovered.

Thesaurum castitatis servo inter arentes calvarias, unde nulla flamma erumpit. Raderus.

To conclude, constancy being never consummate without perseverance to the last breath, behold the fourth ingredient of the perfume of God, which is incense, and you shall see that as incense is melted on coals, so many have been dissolved in torments for the defence of chastity. Some have presently yielded up their lives, others were burned with a slow fire, delivering their bodies up to flames, as freely as one would be dispoiled of a garment. Witness that young man mentioned by S. Hierom, fast tyed with silken cords upon a bed all strewed over with flowers, who in such posture having nothing at liberty but his tongue, spit it out all bloudy in the face of a lewd woman, who came to tempt him. Witness another maid called Lucie, who lived a virgin among many others, and whose exquisite beauty was sought unto with vehement sollicitations by a powerfull Lord, who having command and authority in his hands, sent messengers of his fury to seize on this innocent lamb; and whilest they were at the gate menacing to kill her, and to set all on fire if this poor creature were not delivered into their hands, the maid came forth; who is there, Sirs, said she? What demand you? I beseech you tell me whether there be any thing in my power to purchase your Lord and Masters love? Yea, answered they, in a flouting manner, your eyes have gained him, nor ever can he have rest till he enjoy them. Well, go to then (saith she) onely suffer me to go to my chamber, and I will give satisfaction in this point. The poor maid seeing herself between the hammer and the anvile, acted a thing at that time which could never have been done without the particular revelation of God; she spake to her eyes, and said: How my eyes, are you then guilty? I know the reservedness and simplicity of your glances, nor have I in that kind any remorse of conscience. But howsoever it be, you appear to me not innocent enough; since you have kindled fire in the heart of a man, whose hatred I have ever more esteemed than his love: Quench with your bloud the flames you have raised. Whereupon with a hand piously cruel, she digged out her eyes, and sent the torn reliques embrewed in her bloud to him, who sought her, adding: Behold what you love. He seized with horrour, hastened to hide himself in a Monastery, where he remained the rest of his days to expiate his loves. O incomparable patience! I would go further, but she stays me. For what can I speak more, having said this? Is it not enough to shew chastity can do little of it self, but that it dissolveth as incense on the burning coals of charity? To give away the light of the day, the sweetest of all creatures; to give up her bloud drop after drop; to give her torn eyes, so to avoid a sin, which faithless souls account but a sport! Infinite many pusillanimous people, justly chastised for their sins cannot endure the least sting, but with complaint and murmur against God; they burn, but it is as lawrels, crackling in the flames: but this virgin in the sharpest rigours of a most sensible torment burnt sweetly, couragiously, silently. O what a perfume of the living God is virginity! If the smoke of the bodies of the damned, and despairing Babylon perpetually mount to Heaven in a sacrifice of vengeance, may we not affirm this delicious perfume of virginity will on the other side ascend as a sacrifice of honour, whilest there is Religion and Altars, men and Angels? O women, prodigal of a good irrecoverable! Ah wretched maids! Ah young witless women, that give for a momentary delight a treasure for which the Church hath shed so much bloud! Ah inexcusable treachery, to give to a bold libertine what is taken from Jesus Christ! Ah pusillanimity, to yield at the first shock, by delivering up a gift of God, for which so many virgins have persisted under the teeth and paws of Lions, under the sharp irons of tyrannical wheels, in cauldrons of scalding hot oyl, in the tearing out their eye-strings, in dislocation of their bones, and massacring their bodies, yea even to the last breath of life.

Raderus in viridario.

Unhappy

Unhappy victim made a prey to dishonour, what wilt thou answer to an Agnes, a Tecla, a Katharine, a Lucie, when they shall shew thee their palms, their bloud and wounds, more bright and radiant than the stars in the skie? And what will they say? behold what we have suffered for a virtue, which thou hast so sleightly valued as to trample it under foot, and through a strange prostitution hast thrown into their eyes who required it not. O mothers, breed your daughters piously, and preserve them as pledges charily recommended unto you by Almighty God. What a shame, what an ignominie, nay, what a fury, to behold maids now adays ill taught, bold amongst men as souldiers, wanton as leaping kids, and impudent as Syrens! who hath ever sequestred shamefac'dness from the soul that did not separate modesty from the bodie? How can you account a gadding house-wife, a dancing reveller, an idle wanton to be modest, since the strongest chastities have now adays much adoe to defend themselves from calumnie? Snares are laid on every side, as well upon the mountain as the valley. There is not a stone whereon some scorpion sleepeth not. Never was the lust of impudent men so enflamed, and yet you dally without fear or danger. Hearken to the advise of S. Hierom, concerning the instruction of maids, with which I will conclude this discourse:

Hierom. ad Lætam.

Let a maid, who ought to be the Temple of God, be so instructed, that she neither hear nor speak any thing which tendeth not to the fear of God: Let not impure speeches approch her ears: Let her be ignorant of worldly pleasures: Let her tongue in her tender years be seasoned with the praises of Jesus Christ: Let her banish young men from her company, who have any loose fashion in their behaviour, and let the maids themselves who come amongst them, be alienated from worldly commerce, least having been ill disciples of sensuality, they thereby become the worse Mistresses. If she also learn to read, let her letters be made of box or ivory, and be all called by their names, that so they may be a recreation for her eyes, to serve as instruments for her instruction. Let her in good time practice to write, and let her tender hand be guided on the paper, to trace the letters which are shewed her: Let her have some reward for doing well; for in this her minority these sleight ornaments prove to be an allurement to virtue. Let her have companions for emulation, and entertain a generous envie against their praise: Let her not be chidden if she be of a heavie spirit, but encouraged by the help of commendation: Let her take delight to overcome, and be as loth to be vanquished. Heed must be taken she hate not studie and travel, least the bitterness she may conceive in her infancy, spread beyond her most innocent years. Let the first letters she begins to call, compose some holy names, to prepare her memory to piety: Let her have a governess grave and modest: Let her entertain her companions with serenity of countenance: Let her become affable and amiable to all the world. Accustom her not to wear pendants in her ears, to paint, to load her neck and head with pearls: Change not the colour of her hair by art, nor frizle or crisp her with fire and irons, lest it prove a prediction of infernal flames. Take heed she be not touched with the hammer, which now adays strikes all the world, to wit, Vanity: Let her not drink in the cup of Babylon, which is Impurity; beware she go not forth with Dinah, to see how the maids of the countrey are attired: Let her not be a dancer, nor gawdy in apparel. Poyson is not given but by rubbing the goblet with honey, nor doth vice deceive us but under colour and pretext of virtue.

Above all, let her see nothing either in father or mother, the imitation whereof may make her guilty: Let her be disposed to the reading of good books, and never appear in publick without the advise of her mother: Let her not entertain some spruce young Amouriſt to cast wanton glances; nor let her bear particular affection towards any of her servants, who may whisper in her ear, but cause them to speak aloud, that all the rest may hear. Let her orderly every day offer her devotion to God; be very sober in her deportement, and delighted with works worthy of her condition. Let her be most obedient; nor ever so hardy as to see any, or undertake ought, without their leave who govern her. Doing this, she shall save her soul, and edifie all the world.

To Fathers and Mothers.

The thirty ninth SECTION.

Concerning the education and instruction of their children.

O What a goodly chain of gold is Charitie, which with its many lincks enchaineth the world! The more closely it shutteth, the more strength it affordeth: The more it tieth our hearts, the more it fasteneth our felicities. The first liberty of a reasonable creature, is the thraldom of an honest love, wherein fathers and mothers have a great part; for their union floweth from the bowels of nature, and none can falsifie it who violate not the first laws of the world. The father loves the son as a portion cut from himself, naturally the son loves the father; and so often as he wandereth from this love, he is like a fish out of the water. This was the conceit which S. Ambrose had upon the passage of Genesis, Let the waters bring forth fish. Let the good mother be the water, and good children the fish, saith he. God once commanded the water to bring forth fish, and instantly it obeyed, and ever since for almost these six thousand years that the world wheels about, the water feedeth its fishes without murmur, and the fish never go out of the water but by constraint. O man, who hast taught divisions between father and son, mother and daughter, thou shouldst be ashamed: Entreat the water to teach thee, and the fish to shew thee thy lesson. It is a strange thing the Patriarch Noe, justly provoked against an unnatural son, who had revealed the nakedness of his father, shooteth the arrow of malediction, not against the head of the guilty son, but his children; He curses not Cham, but Canaan; and if you ask why, Theodoret upon Genesis answereth, Noe would not curse him whom God once had blessed: For this had been to take off the seal of the Sovereign Master, and raze his edicts; but S. Ambrose says very pertinently, that Noe the more to punish his evil son, cursed him in his race, as if the wounds which fathers receive in the affliction of their children, were more sensible to them than their proper and personal hurts. Take away the beam from the Sun, and he shines not; the stream from the fountain, it drieth up; the member from the body, it putrifies; the son from the father, and he no longer is a son. This admitted and resolved, we draw a necessary consequence from the reciprocal love between two; and since we must hereafter speak of the duty of sons towards their parents, let us now pursue the course begun, and mention the duty of parents towards their children.

Producant aquæ reptile. Genes. 1.

Quam bona mater sis aquæ hinc considera, & homo, docuisti alterationes parentum in filios, separationes, odia, offensas: disce ergò ab aquâ quæ sit parentum & filiorum necessitudo.

Maledictus Chanaan servus servorum erit. Genes. 9.

One would not at first perhaps believe what I say, but it is most undoubted: Parents are in some sort more obliged to their children, than children to parents. For who is more bound than he, who by justice both divine and humane, oweth most? Now what owe children to their parents? The life they received, which they cannot render again, and therefore are not bound to it: Well may they owe the honour honour which falls upon themselves, well the helps and services in case of necessity: But the father, so soon as the infant hath set foot into being, is very straightly obliged to provide him two things, nourishment, and instruction according to capacity. These are the two heads of this discourse, wherein I purpose to shew (O fathers and mothers) that you commit a great sin when you abandon your children, to become a prey of misery, ignorance, and iniquity.

The reasons are evident: For first, you sin against the grand Law of nature, written by God with a stile of fire, not onely on the hearts of all living creatures, but even on plants, which is to cherish what they have produced. Grapes hang on the vine, fruits on the tree, and take with time their just encrease from the juice and substance of the wood which brings them forth. The lamb knows his damme among a thousand to suck her, and asks the tribute of nature: Eagles bear their young on their backs: Serpents throw themselves many times into boyling cauldrons to save their egs: The Pelican, as the report is, lets her self bloud, to make a bath of it for her brood. And you in this vessel of the vast world, wherein all creatures row alike in this point according to the course of nature, would you be an unprofitable burden? Deserve not you to be banished from all the parts of the earth, and not to enjoy any thing but fire, or nothing to settle on, since the one is barren, and the other devoureth all? Secondly, see you not that neglecting your children, you do like an adulterer, not a father? For what seeks the adulterer, posterity? No: To afford a child to the world, servant to God, a Citizen to the Commonwealth? No: To have a creature, who may serve for the exercise of his charity, to be an object of his providence, and an encouragement for his diligence? No: what pretends he then? loathsom and lewd lust: And what do you else, when after consummation of marriage and the birth of a son, you carelesly leave him without providing for his necessities? Besides, if (as saith Tertullian) it is to be a homicide anti-dated to hinder the generation of a man, what will it then be when he is already born and registred amongst mortals, through remisness and sloth to suffer him to die with hunger, cold, thirst, and misery? When wrinkles and grisly hairs shall seize on your forehead, when old age shall bow your back, and necessity cast you into calamity; with what face dare you crave help from that son or daughter, whom you all the time of their life have neglected? Were it not well all creatures made complaint over your ashes?

Homicidii festinatio est prohibere nasci. Tertul. in Apol.

This man will perhaps answer, As for my part (Gods name be praised) I have had a care of my children. They want nothing necessary for sustentation of life. Is it enough to give them necessaries? But how do you give them? without love, and void of charity; as a stony loaf given and taken by constraint. Fathers and mothers, it is a strange thing to see your odde proceedings: One loves the male, another the female: One the girles, another the boyes: One this, because he is nosed like himself, the other that, because she hath her eyes gate, and speech: The father takes his Idol to his side, the mother hers, and in one and the same house set up Altar against Altar: If you strike my little Deity, I wil not spare yours: If you bring not incense to mine, I will overthrow yours. Childish and ridiculous people! to cast affection on children through sensuality, passion, and fury, perpetually to fall out about children, to let them suck discord with their milk, from the example of those who begot them; what is it else but early to put a sword into the hand of these little creatures, but to tear one another, and to cherish factions and partialities before their eyes be open to understand them?

Partiality of parents.

Let them look to it who govern in such manner (saith the other;) as for my self I take no other care than to breed my children well, and regard them all alike. What do you call breed them well? Behold another vice: Some offend through negligence, others with too much indulgence. You term well-breeding the child to cramme him up to the throat, and let him have all he asketh. Senseless creature, see you not first, you do a great injury to God? He hath trusted a child in your hand to be bred like a man, and you have made a lump of flesh of it, a bears whelp, and think there is nothing to be done but to lick it, that it may grow. Secondly, it is a base thing to say, the Soveregn Creatour having made you a Father, Master, Directour, and Governour over this infant, you should forget the character God hath engraven on your face, and make your self a slave of a gluttenous belly, and an irregular concupiscence. Besides, you put spurs to his vices to make him run headlong into the precipice, you nooze haulters to strangle him, you light torches to consume him. For what good can be hoped, nay what evil not expected from a child bred up in pride and effeminacy? Hear Tertullian speak: Take away the curiosities and superfluities. It is not the life of a Christian: He hath renounced faith who breedeth his children in riot. Is it not a goodly thing to see Hercules spin silk, with those hands which were made to vanquish monsters? Know, God hath put us into the world to hew monsters more pernicious than hydraes or Cerberus, and not to make coronets of roses. You cannot breed your children in voluptuousness, and not thereby render their souls soft and effeminate, which quite extinguisheth the flame of a generous spirit; and yet you complain, that coming to the degrees of maturity, they are fit for nothing but to live lazily and pick quarrels. But it is no whit to be wondered at: It is the tincture you gave them from their most tender years. You have made them al their life time to dance to the tune of their own proper wills, light, fond, and childish, and now you would put the bridle over their necks, and make them lead a serious life. Know you not what happened to the horses of the Sybarites, an effeminate kind of people, who were so intoxicated and addicted to dances and balls, that not so much as their horses but learnt to dance? In the mean time their enemies awakened them, and so closely pursued them, that they were enforced to take arms for the defence of their lives. They drew into the field a brave squadron of Cavalry, the flower and strength of the Citie; but a fidler seeing them approch, mounted on these dancing horses, promised their Adversaries to deliver them into their hands whilest they were dancing. And instantly he began to strike up his violin, and the horses to bestir themselves in dancing, to break all their ranks, and put the Army into disorder; which shamefully made them become a prey to their enemies. Behold (O indulgent parents) what happeneth to your children: You have always bred them in sottishness, sports, and liberty, the fatal plagues of youth: when they must come to combate, to undertake some brave affair, some thing important for the good of their Countrey, for the honour of your house, for the advancement of themselves, they stand eclipsed. Nay, perhaps it might be tollerable to behold them benummed & stupified in worldly affairs, but they are deaf, blind, and dumb in matters concerning God; so that whilest you seek to make great and powerfull Lords of them, you (ere aware) have drawn the malediction of the serpent upon them, and made them creep on their bellies, as much as to say, according to the interpretation of some Fathers, to spend their thoughts, study, and affection, upon the care and education of the body, to the prejudice of the soul. Yet you would have those creatures to be instructed in the the law of God: How can it be? Do you not well know that Moses seeing the Israelites dance with full bellies about the golden calf, brake the tables of the Law? If you demand the reason, S. Hierom will tell you, he knew the Law of God was not for sporters, dancers, and drunkards, and that in the Kingdom of intemperance an eclipse ensues, not onely of the Divine law, but of nature also.

Exod. 32. Sciebat Dei sermonem non posse audire temulentos.

I come to the second point, which is instruction, so much recommended in Scripture. If you have children (saith the Wiseman) instruct them, and take great care of them from their childhood. You must think your children be as Temples of God recommended unto you from the hand of God himself. It is an intollerable thing to have good cooks, good lacheys, good grooms, good horse-boys, to serve the belly and stable; and a father who sends his son to school many times ignorant whether the Master be black or white, good or bad, mild or harsh, religious or wicked. If kine or hogs are to be driven into the fields, one is sought out who knows the business: but to trayn up a child of a good family, an idle fellow many times is trusted, who hath in him no talent at all but malice and ignorance. Fathers and Mothers, fear you not God will say unto you: My house is forsaken, I freed it from evil spirits, I withdrew it from the power of devils, I purged, decked, and adorned it; I put it into your protection, I consigned it into your hands; what have you done with it? Why have you polluted it, and why suffer you it still to lie drenched in ordure? You have put the lamb into the wolfs keeping, you have given the victim to the slaughter-man, you are the cause of his unhappiness, you have twisted the coard of his ruine so soon almost as the web of his life. Fathers and mothers do well, if they become as great Saints as are the Hermits of the desert; but if they neglect their child, they render themselves guiltie before God of one of the greatest injustices in the world. The Scripture in praising the great Patriarch Noe, doth not onely say he was a good man in his own person, but in his whole race, so far as his power extended.

Filii tibi sunt, erudi illos, & cura illos à puerilibus illorum. Prov. 7.

Noë vir justus & perfectus in generationibus suis.

As much honour and glory as it is to leave a good Citizen to the Common-wealth, so much dishonour and infamy it is to afford it ungracious wretches to trouble its repose, disunite peace, and embroyl affairs. They are such of whom the Scripture speaketh: They shall be nayls in your eyes, and launces in your sides, and they shall oppose you in the land of your abode. Cruel father that thou art, who quite dead and turned into ashes, afflictest the Common-wealth by children ill instructed; thou woundest and tearest Christianity. Were it not justice thinkest thou, to break up thy tomb and disturb thy ashes, for having voluntarily bred a little viper for thy countrey, to which thou art accountable for thy life? And from hence it cometh to pass, that fathers who have carried themselves so negligently and perfidiously in their childrens instruction, are the first who drink down the poyson they mingled for others, over-whelmed with toyls and miseries, for the continual disorders of these extravagants. O how often they make complaint like the Eagle in the Emblem of Julian, when strucken by a mortal arrow partly framed out of her own wings, she said, Out alas, wretched bird that I am! must I breed feathers to serve as a swift chariot to the steel which transfixeth my body? Must I bring forth children to give me the stroke of death? What remedie then for this unhappiness, which creeping into the bowels of the most flourishing Monarchies, depopulates and deprives them of good subjects, and furnisheth them with shadows of men? What remedy; but to observe three things in this matter? First, to give a good tincture of Religion to your children, pious apprehensions of God, and a filial fear of his judgements. Secondly, to manure them with arts suitable to their understanding and condition, to settle them in the world upon some good employment, lest having nought to do, they become fit to act any evil. Thirdly, to accommodate them, as much as possibly and reasonably may be, with exteriour moveables, called the blessings of fortune, that necessity open not them the gate of iniquitie; and then leave the rest to the providence of God, whose eye is alwayes open over his work. Behold the course most fit to be observed: Pietie goeth foremost; for as the eloquent Prelate of Cyrenes saith: It is not onely the foundation of houses, but of whole Monarchies.

Erunt vobis clavi in oculis, & lanceæ in lateribus, & adversabuntur vobis in terrâ habitationis vestræ. Num. 31.

Cyrus. ad Arcad.

Parents now adays seek to do quite contrary, and set the cart before the horse; they voluntarily imitate the stupidity of those Ægyptians, who prepared Altars to a Reer-mouse, for no other reason but that she is weak-sighted, and is a friend of the night. Now they preferred darkness before light, by right of antiquity: but these do much worse; for putting Heaven and earth into one ballance, they set an estimate upon terrene things, to the villifying and confusion of celestial. Nay, there are mothers to be found so malicious, as was one named Clotilda, not the Saint, but a mad woman, who being put to her choice either to consent her sons should enter into a Monastery to become religious, or resolve to see them loose their lives, Kill, kill, said she; I had rather behold them dead than Monks. How many are there now adays, who for a need would suffer their children to become Pages to Antichrist, to make a fortune, at the least would well endure to see them preferred to honour in the great Turks Court, with ship-wrack of their Religion? There are few Queen Blanches, either in courage or worth, who rather desired to behold her children in their grave than in sin. They must now adays be either Cæsars or nothing. None fear to put them into infamous houses, into scandalous places, to give them most wicked Teachers, to thrust them into snares and scandals under hope of some preferment: Nay, with how many travels and services, crouchings and crimes, do these miserable creatures purchase their chains? All cannot find a fortune in Court. Warfare picks out those with a kind of disdain, whom it entertains for labours and hazards of life. Onely virtue shuts not the gate against any, yet it is daily despised.

Non omnes curia admittet: castra quos ad laborem & pericula recipiant, fastidisse legunt; bona mens omnibus patet. Senec. Ep. 44.

Unfortunate fathers and wretched mothers, live on gall and tears, rise and go to bed with gnawing care, to set an ungratefull son on the top of fortunes wheel, who quickly grows weary of them, and after their deaths, gluts himself with the delights they with so much industrie prepared for him, mindless of those who obliged him: Nay far otherwise, he unfolds the riots of his unbridled youth even upon their tombs. God grant this evil may pass no further, and that the father and son do not one day reproach one another in the flames of hell, that the one ministred matter of damnation, and the other gave accomplishment. William the learned Bishop of Lions, relateth, that a young Hermit, retiring into a horrid wilderness to attend the exercise of penance, saw his father and brother, whom he had left in the world, embroiled in ill causes, at that time deceased and buried in everlasting fire, who made hydeous complaints, the son questioning his father as authour of his ruin by amassing unjust riches for him, and the father answering, the son was the source of all his calamities, since to make him rich he had spent his miserable life in perpetual anxiety, and now suffered eternal punishments in the other world, for loving a disloyal son more than Almightie God. Curled blindness, to buy tortures and gibbets with afflictions and crosses! O fathers and mothers, let your first care extend to those whom you begat, to teach them virtue, rather by your example than others instruction. These young creatures are your shadows, your ecchoes; they turn and wind themselves easily to imitate those who gave them life, and from whom they hope both wealth and honour. Wo to the father and mother, who make their children witnesses of their crimes, and not content to be evil, make their sin immortal in the immortality of their descent. An infant, though but two years old, should be used with much regard, as if it were an intelligence enchased in this little body. It is a great sacriledge to impress the first tincture of vice on those, who as yet rest in the innocency of baptism. The good Eleazar being advised to dissemble his Religion to save his life, or at least to make semblance of eating hogs-flesh, beholding round about him many youths who expected the end of this combat, pronounced these worthy words couched in S. Ambrose: God forbid I should serve for an incentive to the vices of these young people, who should rather be a pattern of wisdom. God forbid I defile my gray hairs with this execration, and that posterity may take notice I opened the gate to impiety by my example. That is undoubted which Julius Firmicus spake: Nothing hath so much advanced the power of Satan, as the making of sinfull gods. The young man looking on the statue of Jupiter soothed his own lust, and drew the nourishment of his sin even from Altars. So doth the son, who beholds himself in the vices of his father, and takes paternal authority for pledg of his wickedness. I leave you to think, if in Exodus 22. He who unawares suffered a silly spark to flie into his neighbours corn be guilty of the fires hurt, as we heretofore told you, what will it be with a father, who in his house shall enkindle the torch of iniquity to enflame his whole family? First then lay the foundation of piety, and consequently find employments for your children, lest they consume in idleness, which is the seminary of all vices.

Charlemain soon put his sons to exercises, and commanded his daughters to sow or spin, that the gate might be shut up against lazy sluggishness of spirit, wherewith the soul suffers it-self insensibly to slide into all sorts of corruptions. Yea, great discretion must beused in this point, not to enforce children to undertake vocations wholy disproportionable to their humours and qualities, to make them thereby row all the rest of their life against the stream. Saint Basil in the Epistle to Eudoxus praiseth the Athenians, who tried the nature of their children before they put them to any profession, proposing unto them sundry instruments of all kind of arts, and easily admitting that to which they most inclined. As for accommodation, you must therein reasonably provide according to your estate, and not according to the extravagant ideas of this insatiable Age. It is an admirable thing to see to what a height these offices and huge marriages are mounted: I think they will flie into the Kingdom of the Moon. The time hath been when a man was thought rich who had fifty crowns of yearly rent: We find when the marriages of the daughters of France exceeded not six thousand crowns payd down. Nay which is more, daughters were bought; and now they purchase husbands with prodigious sums. This is it which wasteth spirits, which renders instructions unprofitable, and throws all our evils into the despaire of remedy. If you knew well how to order this matter, you would find repose and facility in the rest of the government of youth; and when you have done that which belongs to you, leave the rest in the hands of the divine providence, who well understands how to handle the web of our lives, and to apply every one to what is fittest for his salvation. If all I have said (O fathers and mothers) be not sufficient to instruct and perswade you, I would draw hither out of the other world Hely the High-Priest, severely punished by the revengeful hand of God for negligences committed in the education of his children. He would cry aloud unto you. I am that Hely, heretofore the prime man amongst the people of God, that Hely, from whose lips passed so many brave oracles; that Hely, who with the winck of an eye made the people obedient; that Hely, who shined as a pharos in the Tabernacle of God; and in the mean space for permitting youthful follies and indiscreet libertie to my children, see me become the object of the most enflamed anger of God which may be imagined against one of my profession: Behold me cast from the High-Priest hood as a rotten member, my house everlastingly deprived of that honourable dignity, all my posterity condemned to die under the scourge of God, and not any one of them ever to attain to mans estate; another enriched with my spoils, which my Nephews shall never see but to wither with grief, in consideration of the felicity of their rival; my two sons sensual and voluptuous slain in one day, my daughter in Law dead in childbed; but above all, through my sin, the Ark of God taken away by enemies, and dishonoured by Infidels; and lastly, my self buried under the ruins of my countrey as the last victim of Gods justice. O Sovereign Creatour of Heaven and earth, how terrible thou art! nay, how just, nay, how severe, to chastise parents for the sins of their children! but how reasonable in this their punishment? Fathers and mothers fear, fathers and mothers shake under the hand of the Omnipotent: fathers and mothers, be satisfied with your own sins, and carry not your childrens into the other world; instruct them so, that in their education you may find the discharge of your consciences, they good doctrine, and you rest and comfort to have well bred them.

The fourtieth SECTION.

Advice to children concerning the duty they should render to their fathers and mothers, contrary to the contumacy of irregular youth.

THe Wiseman said it was a hard matter to break a triple coard. A triple law, divine, natural, and civil, hath straightly bound children to the honour and duty they ordinarily yield to parents. He is forsaken of God, an enemy of nature, and an infringer of publick tranquility, who would be exempted.

Funiculus triplex difficile rumpitur.

First I say, nature distilleth with the soul those amorous infusions of amity, which children have towards their fathers and mothers. The beam belongeth to its sun, the river to its fountain, the branch to its tree, and the child to his progenitours. They are not Storks alone who have taught us the law of reciprocal love: Lions, though of nature untractable, of life savage, even in their roring moods, which make woods and mountains tremble, give us a lesson of this charity. Lions whelps, whose paws itch and bloud boileth in their veins, go chearfully a hunting to seek out food for their sire now worn with age. And hunters have often observed an old Lion lying in the entrance of a cave, and a young one to come laden with booty, putting it into the paws of the other who expected it. He received the prey making ſhew of a thouſand thanks to his whelp, which freely divided the prize according to the law of nature. Theſe inclinations are found even in birds of rapine, who pull the prey one from another to feed thoſe with it who begat them.

Albertus Magnus noteth, that fowlers ſeeking for goſhawks found one in a vaſt wilderneſs perched upon a tree, not offering to ſtir from them, but ſeeming wholly immoveable. They wondring why this bird flew not away at the ſight of men as well as others of her kind, perceived ſhe was weak, blind, lame, and waſted with decrepit age; whereupon they hid themſelves, expecting the coming of other goſhawks, when inſtantly behold two haſtened thither laden with meat which they pulled in pieces, and thruſt into the beak of the poor old one. They made no doubt, but theſe were the young who fed the dam. O what charms of natue! Nay rather what providence of God! Is not he an Apoſtata to the great Law of the world, who violateth charity due to fathers and mothers?

As for humane Laws, what have they in them more noble or Religious than the charitable offices of children towards thoſe who begat them? If we believe the hiſtory of the Perſians, there have been ſome found amongſt them who voluntarily made wounds on themſelves to bury therein ſome part of the bodies of their parents reduced to aſhes? A matter truly very ſtrange, and which confoundeth the ingratitude of children, who deign not to preſerve the memory of their fathers ſo much as in their hearts, much leſs their aſhes on their bodies.

Ælian. l. 16. de animal. c. 7.

Hath not Tertullian written, that certain people called the Naſamones through much reverence held their meeting over the tombs of their Anceſtours, as upon Oracles? Doth not Herodotus make mention of the Iſſedons, a people of Scythia, who enchaſe the heads of their deceaſed Anceſtours in gold, and reverence them as things ſacred? And although there be in this action reprehenſible ſuperſtition, yet it is much more tollerable than the Law of the Ægyptians, who burnt incenſe to rats and crocodiles.

Tertull. de anima c. 57. Herodot. l. 4.

On the other part Nicholas Damaſcene aſſureth us, the Piſidians preſented the firſt fruits of all the viands of a feaſt to their fathers and mothers, thinking it an unworthy thing to take refection without honour done to the Authours of life.

Nicho. Damaſc.

Yea, Plato paſſeth ſo far as to call parents ἀγάλματα καὶ κειμήλια as one would ſay houſhold Gods, the pledges of Religion, the relickes, and choiceſt pieces of the houſhold meaſure. Solon would never eſtabliſh the Law againſt parricides, ſaying, God forbid a monſter ſhould ever come into our Common-wealth. Againſt impoſſible crimes there needs no prohibition. Did not Romulus the like in the inſtitution of his Common-wealth? He never inſerted one word of the ſin of parricide as if it had been a meer Chymæra: and verily ſix hundred years paſſed in the city of Rome amongſt Pagans, and not ſo much as the name thereof known. The firſt ſtained with this barbarous cruelty was one Lucius Oſtius, deteſted afterwards through all Ages. Men not knowing what puniſhment to invent for this monſtrous ſin, it was ſaid ſuch ſhould be thrown into the water, ſhut up in a ſack, with an ape, a cock & a viper.

Plato leg. 11.

Finaly Ariſtotle, who is ever in argumental diſcourſes, will not make uſe of any for the honour of parents: For ſaith he, that man who doubteth of the honour of Gods and parents, let him be inſtructed, not with words but ſharp puniſhments.

Ariſt. 8. Top.

As for the divine Law, what hath it more authentically recommended than this band of charity? What doth it inculcate with more eſpect, after the honour of God, than duty towards parents? For whom are recompences awarded, if not for the piety of children? And for whom menaces, but for their rebellion? Saint Thomas in his ſeaventh little treatiſe obſerveth, how in the Decalogue after that which concerneth God, immediately followeth the precept of the honour due to the Authours of our life, for the reſemblance they have to God. And Philo ſaith, this commandment is the knot and tye of all the Law. Saint Auguſtine writing upon the paſſage of Saint Paul, God from whom all fatherhood proceedeth, ſaith, that God is the Prince of all fathers, and fathers the Vicars of God, becauſe they give children (although with dependence on the Soveraign Cauſe) both being, education, and inſtruction.

A quo eſt omnis paternitas.

This duty of children towards parents being proved by the triple knot of the Law natural, civil, and divine: I will now enlarge upon the four parts thereof, which are, love, reverence exteriour and interiour, obedience, and ſuccour. I ſay love; for what child is there can hate his father if he be not unnatural? How (o wicked ſon) can the hatred of a title ſo ſacred, ſo ſweet, aſcend into thy heart, if thou art not become a banquerout in nature? If Tygers, and Lions had the like obligation, they would honour him, and thou perſecuteſt him? Ah! but he is unreaſonable, troubleſom, and inſupportable, what wilt thou not ſay? He is thy father, and therefore to be ſupported: behold the rock whereon all the waves of paſſion ſhould crack aſunder. But I know not what antipathy I have contrary to his nature, I cannot reliſhe him. Muſt we talke of nature, when there is queſtion of the God of nature? Know you not what the excellent Martyr S. Juſtine ſaid, To live according to nature, is to live like an Infidel? If your nature cannot agree with one whom you are bound to love, you muſt bridle that ill nature, you muſt put reaſon into command, and paſſion into fetters. Tell not me, you have endeavoured to mollify it, but find it untractable. Rather ſay, you are refractary againſt the yoke, which nature hath put over your neck from your mothers womb, for which cauſe ſee whether in the judgement of prudent men who may adviſe you, you yield him that duty which God commandeth.

Juſtin ep. ad. Zenam & Serenam.

The ſecond part of your tribute is reverence. For it is natural to fathers and mothers, who by the light of reaſon are tennants of that honour which both age, nature, and the commandment of God hath put into their hands: and if any thing happen to the contrary, it galls their heart, and transfixeth them more ſenſibly than one can imagine. For which cauſe the Wiſeman ſaid. Honour thy father both in word and deed with patiente.

In opere & ſermone, & omni patientiâ honora patrem tuum Eccl. 15.

It is a malignity and a moſt intollerable baſeneſs, to ſee children of poor or indifferent extraction advanced either by the gale of favour, or by their travel and induſtry to ſome publick charge, who no ſooner have ſet foot therein but their brains turn, and they ſcarcely acknowledge thoſe who gave them life and breeding, which is the firſt moveable of all the wealth they either poſſeſs or may hope. But yet far more barbarous are they that deſpiſe their parents, who heretofore rich and wealthy, are now deſpoiled even to nakedneſs, and drawn dry to the very marrow, to place them in dignities: This is a tyranny, which deſerveth that all the ravens from the brooks and lay-ſtals ſhould fly with fury upon him to pick out the eyes of this offender, who hath dared to contaminat himſelf with ſuch an attempt.

Vngrateful creature, thou art aſhamed of nature, thou bluſheſt at the divine providence, what ſay I bluſh? nay thou diſmembreſt it; a father who is the ornament of thy head, and happineſs of thy houſe if thou knoweſt how to uſe him, reduced by thy inſenſibility, thy cruelty, into the condition of a ſervant, whilſt thou perhaps feedeſt dogs, hawks, or ſome fatal harpies worſe than dogs or hawks.

Where is thy brow, thy blushing, thy understanding? Oh but he is poor. True, because thou hast despoiled him, because thou hast wasted him, because he voluntarily made himself poor to make thee rich.

Tell me, was it not an honour to King Agathocles, who from being the son of a potter raised his fortune to a Throne, was it not (I say) an honour to mingle on his cup-boards earthen vessels with his rich pieces of gold and silver plate, that he might not bely his birth? Nay, so far was he from blushing, or from being ashamed at it, that he made boast and trophey of it: What then would he have done by his poor father, if he set such a value upon the mean implements of his cottage? And thou wholly Christian as thou art, canst not behold without confusion of thy countenance what a great Captain, a great King, a great States-man sought to proclaim to all the world.

Contempt of the person of fathers entreth sometimes so far into their souls, as it hath transported them into horrible and tragick acts. Never have I read any thing upon this subject with more amazement, than that mentioned in Justine, of a certain African, named Cartallus, who was by the peoples consent raised to an eminent degree of dignity, and casually upon some solemn embassage sent into a place where his father, with many other, was banished. He looking on himself at that time like a peacock gloriously furnished out with the rich ornaments of his employment, thought it was not suitable to his honour to admit that his father should so much as see him. The unfortunate father became so enraged with this refusal and pride of his son, that instantly he raised a sedition, and mustering together a tumultuary Army of exiles, he fell upon his son, although a Magistrate, took him, condemned him to death, presently prepared a high gibbet, and attired (as he was in gold & scarlet with a crown on his head, caused him to be fastened to this fatal tree for a strange spectacle. What fury of despised nature is this, and what butchery?

Let us pass on to the third tribute, obedience, which (as an Ancient said) is the mother of felicities: It is the first band of families, and chief foundation of Monarchies. S. Gregory Nyssen hath a notable observation, saying, that Moses of set purpose caused the Hebrews to wear ear-rings, giving them thereby to understand, their beauty and grace was in the ear, to wit, in obedience; and verily in Exodus the people beginning to revolt, their ear-rings were taken from them, as from men unworthy of this priviledge. That which is expressed in Deuteronomie is much more bloudy and terrible, where the father and mother are permitted to bring forth a disobedient and refractary son in publick, and upon their own deposition to cause him to be stoned to death by the people. It seems this Law was well understood by a silly Pesant (a Mardonian by Nation) named Rachones, (a) who being the father of seven sons, perceived the youngest of them played the little libertine and unbridled colt: What doth he to bring him back into the stable? First he endeavoured to cure him with fair words and reasons, but finding him to reject all manner of good counsel, he bound his hands behind him, carried him before a Magistrate, accused him, and requires he may be proceeded against as a delinquent against nature. The Judges, who would not discontent this incensed father, nor hazard the life of this young man, sent them both to the King, who at that time was Artaxerxes, The good man went thither, resolved to seek his sons death, where pleading before the King with much fervour and forcible reasons, Artaxerxes stood amazed at his courage. But how can you (my friend) said he, endure to see your son die before your face? He being a gardiner, as willingly (said he) as I would pull away leaves from a ranck lettice, and not hurt the root. The King perceiving this resolution and zeal of justice in the poor man, of a gardiner made him a Judge, and severely threatened his son with death, if his carriage were not better.

See young man, behold wicked son, who disobeyest thy father and mother, not in a slight matter or of little importance, but in such as concerns thy life, safety, and reputation; see what thou maist expect from the justice of God, since that of men hath so much severity in this point.

You dare dispense with your selves in the Laws of piety and Religion, not shewing, even on festival days any more feeling of God than a beast; doth this seem tolerable? you haunt the company of buffons, wicked and wretched creatures, which wast the means that are not yours, weaken your body, violate your reputation, and defile your soul, and is not this a crime? You make resolutions and frame chymæraes without advise either of father or mother, you bring them into debt, you treat clandestine marriages, you thrust those alive unto their graves who gave you life; and can you think the vengeance of God will ever have leaden feet? Faithless and bruitish as you are, how many fathers for far less faults have inflicted severities on their children, dreadful even to those who read them. Marcus Scaurus in the Roman history sent this message to his son, who fled with the rest of his Army defeated by the Cimbrians: Son, you are born of a father, who knows either to vanquish or die, rather send me your bones than return alive after the death of your honour. A father could not endure the flight of a son, which was very excusable in a general defeat, because it seemed to cast some blemish upon his family; and you who surcharge your house with reproach and confusion, would you escape unpunished? Another father, Aulus Fulvius, understanding his son had rancked himself in the faction of Catiline (a wicked wretch, who supported and debaushed all the youth of Rome) caused him to be taken in the place, and condemned to death, and this young man begging pardon with all manner of suppliant intreaties had no other answer, but, Son I begat you to make war upon Catiline in your Countries quarrel, not in Catilines cause to assayl your mother. And who can but wonder at another Torquatus, that had a son in great employments of the Empire, flourishing in honour, age, and reputation; who being accused by the Embassadours of Macedonia, to have ill carried himself in their Province, when he had it in charge; this father with the Senats permission would himself be Judge in the sons cause, heard the accusers two whole days together, confronted witnesses, gave his son full scope to defend himself and to produce all that he could for his justification, in the end on the third day, he pronounced sentence: It having sufficiently been proved unto me, that my son Syllanus hath ill acquitted his charge, and taken money from the allies of the Roman People, contrary to the command of Laws and honesty, I declare him from this time forward unworthy both of the Common-wealth and my house. The unfortunate son was so overwhelmed with melancholy upon this judgement given by his father, that the next night he killed himself, and the father esteeming him degenerate, would not so much as honour his funerals with his presence. Good God what severity! what thunders, what lightnings against the disobedience of sons among Pagans. And you wicked sons, in Christianity, where the Law of love should oblige you to the duty, which I prove unto you with an adamantine knot, do you think all is permitted you? And you fathers, are not you most worthy of your unhappiness, when you cherish by a negligent and soft indulgence the disobediences of your children, which you should root up from their infancy

Filius noster iste protervus & contumax est, monitis nostris audire contemnit, comessationibus vacat, luxuriâ atque convitiis: Lapidibus eum obruet populus, & morietur. Deuter. 21.

(a) Ælian. var. hist. lib. 1.

fancy, and not suffer them to grow to the prejudice of your houses, with so many bloudy tragedies as are daily seen in the mournful theater of the worlds miseries?

Fili suscipe senium tam patris tui, & non contristes eum in vitâ illius & si defecerint sensus, veniam da, & non spernas eum in tuâ virtute. Eccles. 3. Qui timet Deum honorat parentes, & quasi Dominis serviet iis qui se genuerunt.

Let us conclude upon the fourth duty of children, which is succour: Son receive the old age of thy father and mother in thy bosom: Take heed thou do not contristate them in any kind: Beware thou scorneſt them not, if they chance to fall into any debility of spirit: Assist them with all thy might. It followeth: The child which feareth God never fails either in the honour or ayd he should yield to his parents: nay more, he shall serve them as a servant his Master. We need not here seek out examples in holy Scripture, or where the Law of nature is handled; the more our proofs are taken from Infidels, who had nothing at all but the light of reason, so much the more colour and weight they have. I will not make mention here of a Roman daughter (a) who fed her father from her own breasts, condemned to dye of hunger between four wals; you may sufficiently see that often recorded in writing. Yea, under Peter of Castle there lived a man that never ceased weeping until he were put to death instead of his father, who was to be executed. I speak nothing now at all of that, but cannot omit an example recounted in Bibliotheck of the great wit Photius, who telleth on a time there happened in Sicily (as it hath often been seen) an eruption of Ætna, now called mount Gibel: It is a hydeous thing, and the very image of hell, to behold a mountain which murmurs, burns, belches up flames, and throws out its fiery entrails, making all the world fly from it. It happened then, that in this horrible and violent breach of flames every one flying, and carrying away all they had most precious with them, two sons, the one called Anapias, the other Amphinomus, carefull of the wealth and goods in their houses, reflected on their father and mother both very old, who could not save themselves from the fire by flight; and where shall we (said they) find a more precious treasure than those who begat us? The one took his father on his shoulder, the other his mother, and so made passage through the flames. It is an admirable thing that God in consideration of this piety, though Pagan, did a miracle: for the monuments of all antiquity witness, the devouring flames stayd at this spectacle, and the fire roasting and broyling all round about them, the way onely through which these two good sons passed was tapistred with fresh verdure, and called afterward by posterity the holy field, in memory of this accident.

What may we answer to this, what can we say, when the virtues e en of Pagans dart lightening-flashes of honesty and duty into our eyes? What brasen or adamantine brow can covetous and caytive sons have, who being rich and abounding in means, deny necessary things to those who brought them into the world, yea have the heart to see them struggle with extream misery, whilst they offer a sacrifice of abomination to their burning avarice? Wicked son, wreched daughter, know you what you do when you commit such a crime? You hold the soul, bloud, and life of your progenitours in your coffers, you burn them with a soft fire, you consume them with a lingring, and shameful death; you are accountable before God for what they suffer. And for whom is remorse of conscience? For whom infamy? For whom necessity? For whom punishments in the other life, but for such as in this manner abuse a treasure so recommended by God? Take heed (O children) take heed of breaking this triple cord of the Law divine, natural, and civil, which indissolubly tie you to the exercise of that piety which you have abjured. Take heed of irreverence, disobedience, and ingratitude towards your parents; expect not onely in the other life the unavoydable punishments of Gods Justice against such contumacy, but in this present life know you shall be measured with the same measure you afforded others. You know the history of the miserable father dragged by the hair with the hand of his son unto the threshold of his door, where seeing himself unworthily used, Hold son, saith he, it is enough, the justice of God hath given me my due; I committed the like outrage heretofore against my father, thy Grand-father, which thou at this instant acteſt upon me: I dragged him hither, and behold me hither haled: Go no further. O Justice! O terrour! O dreadful spectacle! Great eye of God, which never sleepest over the crimes of mortals. O divine hand, which ever beareſt arms of vengeance hanging over the heads of rebellious children! How terrible thou art? who can but fear thee? who will not heareafter tremble at the apprehension of thy judgements?

Children be pious, live in the duty you have vowed and resigned to your progenitours, and to all your superiours: Live full of honour and glory in this world, live in expectation of palms and crowns which you shall enjoy in the other world. And you likewise fathers and mothers, embrace charity towards your good children with all affection, and if any forget their duty, and afterward stretch out hands humbly to your obedience, receive them into favour, exercise mercy towards them as you desire should be done to you by God our common father. But if you still groan under the ingratitude of wicked children, and the fear of future evils, wipe away your tears, sweeten your acerbities, season your bitterness with the comfort of a good conscience. When you have done all you can and all you ought to do, leave the succes to God, and say unto him, My God who hast seen the cause of my afflictions to proceed from my self, accept my good desires for the works of this evil child, my sufferings in satisfaction, and my patience for sacrifice.

THE FOVRTH BOOK.

Of the impietie of Courts.

The unhappie Politician.

HItherto, having proposed the motives and obstacles that men of qualitie find in the way of Christian perfection, I have made a collection of the most wholesom instructions, which may guid them to the wisdom of heaven. Consequently I purpose, according as time and leasure will permit, to write the historie of the holy Courts, pursuing the course which I proposed in the Preface. But this volume being become big alreadie in the press, requireth nothing but the seal upon it. Behold the cause why I have been willing to affix it thereon with two books of grave and admirable histories, which may serve as a scantling of the whole piece I intend. The scope of all this work is to declare a most worthy saying of S. Augustine, That nothing is so miserable as the prosperitie of the wicked, nothing so happie as true and solid pietie.

To bring these two verities into their full lustre of light as well by example as precept, I have chosen two Courts very different. The one is the Court of Herod, the other of Theodosius the younger. In the one the disasters of impietie are beheld, in the other the happiness of virtue. Verily I have cast the eye of my consideration upon divers histories, and have seen none which may make great men more sensibly apprehend how those who rule in Courts and places of dignitie by meere policie and humane prudence, accommodating Religion to their own interest, are deceived, than the life and death of this unfortunate King of Judea. He had an infinite natural judgement, an admirable penetrating wit, a courage unspeakably dauntless. A man who derived from nothing, advanced his fortune even to the Regal throne, and established it amongst so many thornie affairs, as to make himself admired by the wisest of the world. But because he built upon this Maxim of impietie, that Religion and Law must be made to serve our proper interests, he led a life full of crimes and disturbances, concluded with the most disastrous death that may be imagined. That also which hath made me resolve upon this historie (drawn from Josephus, with some other little fragments and memorials, dilating it according to the talent of my stile, without using any other transcription,) is, that besides the unhappie Politician, you shall read therein Innocencie persecuted in the life of a Lady, who hath been a true mirrour of patience, and whom I purpose to propose as one of the greatest ornaments of our holy Court. It is from hence I may truly gather a most beautiful rose amongst the sharpest thorns, shew calmest serenitie in the roughest storms, and seek the honey-comb in the lions throat, since I in Herods Court endeavour to find out the patient and chast Mariamne, the true Table of innocencie, unworthily used.

The sufferance of this poor Queen would deserve to be consecrated with a pen of Adamant, in the Temple of Eternitie, since she is able to dazle the eyes of the most hardie, to replenish the mouthes of the most eloquent, and ravish the minds of those who admire no vulgar things. God, who ever raiseth the glorie of his Elect as it were upon the depth of the greatest miseries, seeing the soul of this Princess amongst the most eminent and illustrious, thought he must give her a large field for encounter, to reap the richest palms of patience, and he gave her Herod a bad husband, a barbarous persecutour, an infamous executioner: but ever more sutable to the patient Mariamne in the qualitie of a persecutour and a hang-man, than in the office of a husband. To conceive the strength of this anvil, we must know the force of the hammer which beateth on it. To speak sufficiently of the singular virtue of this Queen, we must thereunto oppose the malice of Herod: we necessarily must behold how this disloyal man holding his life, scepter, and crown, from the house of Mariamne, for recompēce therof took from her, her scepter, crown, and life, after he had drawn her bowels out, causing her nearest of kin to be put to death before her eyes, then casting her all bloudie upon the pyle, where the bodies of her parents and brethren were burned, as the last sacrifice of his furie, yet never at all startling her invincible patience. Every man speaketh of Herod, as of a man of morter steeped in bloud, as of a Tyrant, who would murder mercie it self; but every one knoweth not the wiles he used to possess himself both of the Queen Mariamne and scepter of David, oppressing the one with all ingratitude, and governing the other with unspeakable mischief.

The estate of the Kingdom of Judea before Herod came to the crown.

About some fiftie years before the Nativity of our Lord and Saviour, the kingdom of Judea, which had subsisted, although amongst strange eclypses and horrible vicissitudes, from King David, almost a thousand years; after it had so many times tottered, and so often by many shocks and concussions been established, in the end found its total ruin and tomb in the discord of two brothers. At that time Hircanus reigned, a good man, but a bad King, who neither had fortitude, valour, nor courage. He used as much remisness in his charge, as he practiced innocencie in his manners His overmuch easiness made him degenerate into a certain stupiditie, and being unapt to do ill, he rendered himself capable to be an instrument of all kind of evils, by being too easie for the impressions of another. He acknowledging his own weakness, freely resigned the dignitie and burden of rule to his brother Aristobulus, a valiant and hardie man, who had little succes and many enterprises.

Hircanus.

Aristobulus.

Antipater the father of Herod affected the Kingdom of Judea.

In the mean time Palestine, during the inconstant wavering of this Royaltie, was much courted by her neighbours; but above all by Antipater, father of Herod, an Idumean by Nation, an Arabian in manners, wealthie, factious, able to overturn a large Empire by his subtil wiles, had for a long time a plot upon the Kingdom of Judea. He well foresaw it would would be a matter very difficult for him to force a passage for his wicked ends, whilst this courageous lion Aristobulus bare sway; but were he dismounted and Hircanus seated again in his throne, all would be in his own power. What doth this Arabian then? he soweth in the souls and minds of the people seeds of revolt against Aristobulus, saying, They were very remiss and disloyal, so to suffer His Countries lawful King to be dethroned, to whom nature had granted Empire, to transfer the Kingdom to a malicious and turbulent spirit, who quickly would with ill manage make them feel the ruin and desolation of all Palestine. That they had forsaken a King blameworthie in nothing but in surplusage of goodness, to take another, who having made entry into principality by the gate of infidelity, could not raign but in the disastrous miserie of his Countrie. Although Hircanus should pick out his right, he were dispensable in this his modestie. The more unworthy he should esteem himself to rule, the more were his worth. The glorie, which he endeavoured to decline in the undervaluing of his own person, would wait upon him even to his tomb. Yea, should they object to him his great sweetness & facility of nature, it were more suitable to the piety and gentleness of the Jews. If doves were to choose themselves a King, they would rather have a statue than a spar-hawk.

This wilie spirit by such like remonstrances quickly found much credulitie, partly in the minds of those who affected innovation, partly amongst such as were guided by justice; but all saw not how under the colour of publike good, he sought to raise a Monarchie for himself or his heires. He, thus having already put the iron into the fire, gained the heart and opinion of Hircanus by all kind of observances and testimonies of amitie; which was a matter not hard to do, this Prince suffering himself to be governed by those who made shew of any the least affection towards him. Behold him now as Procurator, Tutor, and Master of this flexible spirit, whom he so under pretext of friendship possessed, that the actions of Hircanus sought no other issue, no other extent, but as they were guided by the thought and counsels of Antipater. Notwithstanding, when he proposed to him to make war against his brother, to repossess himself of the Royal Throne, he found his heart all of ice, & was fain to use his best endeavour to enkindle him, by reason of the excessive coldness of nature. In the end he on day plainly discovered to him. That this abrenunciation of rule which he had transacted with his brother, was a thing incompatible with his honour and life. What eye would not be dissolved into tears, to behold him despicable and wretched, whilst his brother lived in all superabundance and pomp? It were to confound the Laws of nature, it were to authorise tyrannie, to say, that little theeves should live in fetters, and Aristobulus, who had usurped a Kingdom, sit in silken robes and resplendently glitter in diamonds. That a Kingdom was a shirt, which never was to be put off but with life. That they were tales of lasie Philosophers to affirm that Diadems were tissued with thorns, their Rubies and Diamonds never having pricked any man. The life which Hircanus then led was good for a Religious Essean, but not for a King. To conclude, that the people desired with passion to see him reestablished in the throne of his Ancestours. He plied the ear of the Prince with so many forcible words, that he already began to gain him: but yet found himself combated by two powerfull reasons, the one was his oath, by which he had renounced principalitie, and the other his weakness. From the oath Antipater absolved him, saying he had sworn to a sin, and that there was no obligation to execute it. For inabilitie, he made overture unto him of Arabian succours, which he had in his power. So that finding him wavering upon this wicked passage, he cast into his soul black jealousies of his brother, as of him, who after he had usurped his estate, would enterprise on his life, counterfeiting conspiracies framed against him with so much art, that Hircanus yielded himself up, and gave him an absolute commission to make war or peace, as best pleased him. This concluded, the apple of discord is cast, Antipater faileth not to solicite Arethas the Arabian King, who cometh with a huge Armie to fall upon Palestine, not without barbarous hostilities and lamentable desolations, even to the next straitning of Aristobulus, and the holding him besieged in Jerusalem, the capital Citie of his Kingdom.

Pompey in Palestine

But as the greatest serpent devoureth the lesser, it happened about the time of these undertakings, the Romans under the conduct of Pompey the Great making their Eagles to glitter in Syria, and leading an Armie of fire, before which the pettie Kings were but as chaff, forced the Arabian to retire into his kingdom, they marching in all parts victorious, and undertaking to give law, peace, and war to whom they pleased. The two brothers fail not to seek the gracious favour of the Roman, every one in his own way, with their best endeavour, well seeing, that therein was the main of the business. Aristobulus as the more free, courageous, and royal, found in the very beginning most favour, having presented to the Roman, amongst other largesses, a golden vine, one of the most curious workmanships of the world, which was afterward seen to serve as an ornament in the Capitol. In the end, behold the two brothers contesting at the feet of Pompey, to plead not for a meadow or a wine-yard, but for a Kingdom, little considering, that putting their fortune into the hand of a stranger, who had no other law but his own ambition, under the shadow of arbitration he would fix his tallons. Antipater beholding from the beginning the ballance to bend towards Aristobulus, as unto him from whom the Romans had most cause to hope readiest service for their pretences, spared not to disgrace him, to lay aspersions on him, to cast the Romans into a distrust of his spirit, and perpetually play the sleeping dog before Pompey, in such sort that Aristobulus, forseeing well that this pernicious man abusing the name and weakness of his brother, sold them both to the Romans, stood upon his guard; having more animositie than abilitie to resist the armie of a vast Empire. The poor Prince shrinking under the burden of such an enterprise, is taken, put into fetters, with two of his sons, and as many daughters, and was lead to Rome to serve as a sport in Pompeys triumph. Jerusalem is made tributarie, the High-Priests place given to Hircanus, and all authoritie in the hand of Antipater. It was a spectacle which drew teats even from those who before loved not Aristobulus, to behold this unfortunate King in fetters, with the Princes his sons, and those much to be deplored Princesses, his daughters, all heires of their fathers miseries, who left their countrie, where they had flourished with so much honour, to seek amongst tedious and irksom voyages both by sea and land, servitude, or death, which ever is the ordinarie vow and prayer of the wretched. Antipater as yet all bloudie gathered the Palm of this victorie, and establisheth his little Monarchie, which he a long time had plotted. Hircanus resembled an old sepulchre, which retaineth nothing but a bare title, all was acted by him in apparance, and nothing for him in effect: the other entertained and courted the Romans with his money, gave presents, sent and received Embassadours, practised supports, gained correspondencies, corrupted powers, ruined resistances which opposed his greatness, and made this poor High-Priest in all things to bear the seeming scepter. Then seeing him dayly become more weak than himself, to secure this state upon his own sons, he makes the eldest, to wit Phaselus, Antipater established.

Unhappy Politician.

Governour of Jerusalem, and giveth to Herod his youngest the Tetrarchie of Galilee. Some time after having sucked down all the wind which his ambition presented to him, and not knowing what more to do, he drank a cup of poyson, which in a banquet was offered to him by the slie cunning of Malichi his enemie. Behold the current of humane things. These Spirits enraged by mad after greatnes, which they pursue with all manner of toyl and sinister practises, are as those little bubbles that rise on the water in time of a tempest; they encrease and crack in a moment.

Beginning of Herod.

Antipater being dead, his two sons Phaselus and Herod divide the succession; each one holdeth firmly his share, and striveth to possess the heart of Hircanus, making him always personate his own part. Herod as soon as he was in office, even in the life of his father, being as yet but fifteen years of age, well discovered what he would be by his natural inclinations, which proceeded from him, as flashing streaks from a cloud, to be instantly turned into lightening. He had a malign spirit, craftie, ambitious even to furie, and whose fingers perpetually itched after bloud and slaughter. And verily he defiled his tender years and first beginning of principalitie with effusion of humane bloud, falling not onely upon one called Ezechias, reputed a Pirat, but he also cut in pieces with him many Jews, without either warrant or knowledge of the cause, which involved many innocents in this ruin. The mothers of those people massacred by young Herod, went out of the Temple disconsolate, with their hair disheveled; requiring justice of Hircanus, who was no other than a meer idol of principalitie. Notwithstanding, much importuned by the cries and lamentations of these weeping women, and incited by the Peers of his Kingdom, he ordained that Herod should appear before a tribunal of justice. In this action the young man sufficiently shewed the boldnes of his spirit, and fiercenes of his courage. The other who were accused came to this Parliament of Judea altogether in mourning habit, he thither went as to a feast or a Theater, waited on with a flourishing retinue, clothed in scarlet, frisled, perfumed, and besides with the recommendations of the Romans, who sent nothing but armed words, commanding the Judges to pardon without any other process. He then being but fifteen years old, so amazed the Judges and Advocates with his very fashion and countenance, that of all those who were prepared for long pleadings against him, there was not one to be found that had the heart to mutter in his presence. One of the Judges called Sameas, an honest man & more hardie than the rest, cried out aloud to King Hircanus there present, Sir, I wonder not this young Lord commeth in such equipage to this barr; every one doth what he can for his own safeguard: But I admire that you and your Councel suffer him thus to proceed, as if he came hither not to be adjudged, but to murther the Judges: you presently through favour will enfranchise him, but be one day by Justice will assail yours. And verily of the whole Senat no one escaped, whom Herod, being come to the full mannage of the Kingdom, put not to death, except him, who delivered his opinion with such libertie. It is reported of Sameas, that when afterward there was question moved to receive Herod for King, the rest constantly opposing it, he freely said, he gave his voice to Herod; and some amazed thereat, Let it not seem strange unto you (saith he) God in his indignation will give unto you a bad King, and a worse he cannot find than Herod, He is the scourge you stand in need of to chastice your infidelitie. Hircanus then seeing the Judges animated by Sameas, more inclining to the ballance of justice than mercy, caused him secretly to be shifted away. For he embosomed him with love, and so hatched the serpents egge in his breast.

Liberty of a judge

Grave speech.

Herod, nothing inferiour to his father in policie, pursuing his plots and examples, inseparably united himself to the Romans, gayning them with all manner of services, and entertaining Hircanus to serve his turns, as a shadow, with all manner of complacence and flatterie. The Kingdom of Judea seemed as yet not to behold him but at distance, his brother Phaselus, as the eldest, held the best part. Aristobulus, whom you have seen led in fetters to Rome, had also two sons, the eldest of which was called Alexander, father of this chaste Mariamne whose patience we decipher. The other was Antigonus, with whom Herod had much occasion. Of both he discharged himself in proces of time. For the unfortunate Alexander, successour to the unhappines of his father Aristobulus, putting himself into the field, with such troops as he could amass together in the disaster of his fortune, was in favour of Herod oppressed by the Romans. Antigonus, having escaped out of captivitie wherein he was held at Rome, with Aristobulus his father, gave Herod matter enough to work on. For putting himself into the Parthians power, he wrought so much with promises and hopes, that they undertook to establish him in his Royal throne. And thereupon they arm both by sea and land, and handle the matter so by force and policie, that they stir up Hircanus and Phaselus. Herod with much difficultie saved himself, and though he hada courage of steel, was so astonished with this surprise, that it was a great chance, he had not ended his life upon his own sword. Hircanus unworthily used by the commandment of his nephew Antigonus, had both his ears cut off, and thereby made for ever uncapable of the High-priestood. Phaselus the brother of Herod enraged with the turn of fortune, voluntarily knocked out his own brains against the side of a rock.

Great revolution in the Kingdom of Judea.

Herod, who always cleaved to the fortune of the Romans as ivy to a wall, seeing his affairs reduced to an extremitie, imploreth their assistance, representeth the outrages of Antigonus, the hostilitie of the Parthians, signifieth the services of his father Antipater, promiseth on his part all the world, and so handleth the matter, that beyond his expectation he is declared King, and at that instant Antigonus enemie of the people of Rome, as a fugitive and ally of the Parthians. Herod pursueth him with might and main, ayded by the Roman forces. The miserable Antigonus after a very long resistance was imprisoned, becoming the very first of Kings, who, by commandment of Mark Anthony, was executed with a punishment most unfit for his qualitie and condition, and among the Romans not usual, leaving his head upon a scaffold in the Citie of Antioch, for no other cause, but for the defence of the inheritance of his Ancestours. But Strabo saith, Mark Anthony could find no other way to make Herod to be acknowledged for King, while there was yet any of the bloud Royal left capable of rule, so much this people loved their natural King, and abhorred a stranger.

Entry of Herod to the crown.

After these slaughters, Herod mounteth to the top of the wheel, behold all the thorns (as he thinketh) pulled out of his feet, he now had nothing to grapple with, but an old man, an infant, and two women, the last remainder of the noble race of the Asmodeans. Hircanus was the aged man, who in truth grew old among the thorns and horrible changes, of his state. He was as yet captive among the Parthians, but the King, although a Barbarian, had so much commiseration of his so greatly afflicted goodnes, that he permitted him to live with all free libertie in his Citie of Babylon. This poor Prince, who had passed his whole life void of ambition, bare the change of his fortune with great equalitie and temper of mind. The Jews, who at that time inhabited in the Parthians dominions, beholding him all wounded, disfigured, wretched, wretched, abandoned, disarrayed, did notwithstanding honour him as their King with so much respect and reverence, that he had almost found a Kingdom in Captivitie. Herod, who saw this man might serve as a colour for those spirits, that would aym at him in the swinge of his affairs, as yet not well confirmed, dispatcheth an expres Embassadour to the Parthian King, with many presents and letters, sweetned with silken words, wherein he besought him not to bereave him of the greatest contentment he could possibly have in this world, which was to be grateful to those who had obliged him. Hircanus (said he) was his benefactour, his Protectour, his Father, and since God had given him some repose in his affairs, it was an unspeakable comfort to him to share the scepter, greatnes, and affluent content of Kings, with a friend so faithful & worthy to be beloved. The King of Parthia willing to gratifie King Herod, whom he beheld supported by the Roman Empire, the power whereof he more feared than honoured the virtue, gave free leave to Hircanus to go whither he would, he put the busines in consultation with the prime Peers of his countrie, who much disswaded him: But through the easines of his singular nature, which ever swallowed the bait without consideration of the hook, he yielded himself to the dissembled courtesies of Herod, and returned directly to Jerusalem, where he was received with infinite demonstrations of amitie.

Behold the whole Regal familie in the hands of this Tyrant. Hircanus had but one onely daughter named Alexandra, a woman no whit of her fathers temper, for she was extreamly haughtie, and had much adoe with herself to bite the bridle in this servitude. She was mother of two children, one son, and one daughter; the son was the little Aristobulus, and the daughter Mariamne married to Herod.

Marriage of Mariamne to Herod.

Mariamne was accounted the most beautiful Princes of the earth; for Gellius, who went prying after all the beauties of the world, to make relation thereof to Mark Anthony, having well considered all the most exquisite Master-pieces of Nature, when he beholdeth Mariamne in Palestine, he protesteth all other beauties were terrestrial in comparison of this, which seemed to have been composed amongst the the heavenly Orbs. This man saw nothing but the exteriour bark, and was rapt with admiration, but her form was not worthy esteem in comparison of the noble qualities of her mind. She was a grandchild of the great Machabees, well versed in the Law of God, discreet, wise, stayed, circumspect, courteous, chast as Susanna, but above all courageous and patient; who lived in Herods Court as Job on the dunghil. Never beautie and virtue were so disgraced in any match. This creature which had power to make so many brave Princesses to sigh for her, and who might have beheld so many obsequious services done at her foot, hath now Herod for her husband, who had nothing humane in him but lineament and figure. It was to match the Lamb with the Wolf, the Dove with the Faulcon, and to tye a living body mouth to mouth with the the dead, to marrie such a Lady to so Prodigious a Monster. But he, who already had power in his hand, passionately sought her, as well for her incomparable beauty, as besides for ever to establish his state, considering the alliance of this little creature, descended from so many Kings, would cover the obscuritie of his house, and gain him more reputation among the Jews, Mariage by Euphonie Mariamne.

Hircanus grand-father to Mariamne and Alexandra her mother, seeing Herod was Master of his desires, the Scepter already in his hands, although by injustice and tyrannie, measuring all things by his fortune, not person, judged this way might be yet advantagious, and that his wife might mollifie him, and make him favourable to the Royal bloud. The generous Lady well foresaw that the putting her into Herods hands was to cast her into the Lions jaws. But not to gainsay those to whom she had been taught to sacrifice her whole life, and to obey the Laws of necessitie, she under-went the yoke, fortifying her Royal heart against all the stormy tempests, which seemed already to menace her. Behold her married, Herod loveth her, as the hunter venison, for his appetite and advantage; his love being not of power to make him loose one sillie grain of his ambition or crueltie. This perverse and violent spirit, who held the Kingdom as a wolf by the ears, ever wavering, yea even, in the secure safetie of his affairs, endeavoured nothing but to rid himself of those, whose spoils he possessed, the respect of this good Queen being not able to sweeten or soften his savage humours. He well shewed how little affection he bare towards her allies, when it might any way import his pretended interest, even at that time when there was question to substitute a High-Priest in the place of Hircanus, who having his ears cut off with much deformitie, necessarily fell into the irregularity ordained by Law, which forbad him Altars. Herod daily saw the young Aristobulus in his Palace, son of Alexandra, and sole brother of his wife, a most accomplished Prince, to whom every one destined the Myter. He sets his eyes a-wandering, and finds out on the further side of Euphrates in the Citie of Babylon an unknown Jew, named Ananel, and createth him High-Priest. This was a pill, which Alexandra the mother of Aristobulus, and Mariamne could not swallow, yet thought fit to dissemble it. She saw her house manifestly dejected, in that her son after so many obligations was dispossessed of an honour, to which, bloud, nature, and the consent of the whole world called him, to give it to a man of no value, she could not so well digest her choler, but that she thundred more lowdly, than the miserie of the time and malice of Herod permitted.

Herod depriveth the Royal stock.

Aristobulus the brother of Mariamne put from the High-Priesthood.

Mariamne still reposing in the calmnes of her noble spirit, declared to the King in her natural sweetnes, That he was, the support of her house, greatly decayed, and at that time upon such terms, that she had no care to pretend to scepters, she onely desired to breath her last in the world with honour. If he should give a Miter to her brother Aristobulus, it were to make a creature, from whom he had no cause at all to fear, his throne being throughly established, and he being one from whom resonably he might expect any thing, having the tender youth of this Prince as a soft piece of wax in his hands. This act would make him rule in hearts, as well as in Provinces, when he should be known to be a father and a Protectour of a young son of Hircanus, whose virtue he always had honoured. Briefly, that the honour which she had by matching with him seemed not compleat to her, whilst she saw her allies kept from degrees, wherein he might establish them without prejudice of his authority.

Prudence of Mariamne.

Herod suffered himself this time to be gained by the charming sweetnes of Mariamne, and having deliberated the affair with his Councel, he resolved to give the High-Priests place to young Aristobulus his brother in law, which was performed with much ceremonie. He assembleth his friends in the hall of his Palace, then sending for Alexandra, he made in the presence of them all a premeditated speech, complaining of her, & saying, she had a mutinous & turbulent spirit, which sought nothing but to embroyl the affairs, and take a Scepter from him which heaven had caused him to purchase with so much travel and pain, to put it into the hands of an infant, to the prejudice of the Queen her daughter. Notwithstanding withſtanding that, forgetting all injuries, he could not neglect his own diſpoſition, which was to do good even to thoſe that wiſhed him ill; in confirmation whereof he gave the High-Prieſthood to her ſon, his purpoſe having never been other, and the ſubrogation of Ananel having not been made but during the time of expectation of maturitie in the tender age of an infant.

The ambitious woman.

This ambitious mother, according to her ſex, and indeed beyond her ſex, upon the offer of this High-Prieſts place, was ſo ſenſibly tranſported with joy, that tears guſhed from her eyes, and ſhe at that inſtant freely proteſted to Herod, That ſhe had endeavoured all ſhe could poſſibly to keep the Miter in the Royal familie, ſuppoſing it an unworthy thing to tranſfer it els-where: but as for the Kingdom, ſhe never had pretended thereunto, and that ſuch reſolutions ſhould never enter into her thoughts. Whenſoever it ſhould pleaſe Almightie God to call her out of the world, ſhe would die well ſatisfied, leaving her ſon High-Prieſt and her daughter Queen. As for the reſt, if ſhe had exceeded in ſome words, ſhe was excuſable as a paſſionate mother towards a ſon, who well deſerved to be beloved, a mother in law of the King to whom kindred and alliance permitted ſomewhat the more libertie, and a daughter of a King to whom ſlaverie was a hard morſel, and her ſtomach unable to digeſt it. But hereafter, ſince he uſed her ſo courteouſly, he ſhould have no cauſe to complain of her obedience. Hereupon they ſhook hands, and behold they are friends.

But out alas! The amities of the world are like the felicities thereof. If the amities be deceitful, the felicities are tyed to a rotten cable, or grounded upon the moving ſand. The poor mother rejoyced for a little ſenſe-pleaſing flattery of her feaveriſh ambition, and ſaw not that her ſon was not (to ſpeak really) the High-prieſt, but a ſacrifice of the ſavageneſs of Herod. The diſcreet Mariamne, who by long obſervation had learned to hold proſperity as ſuſpected, ſuffered her heart not to be ſo diſſolved into joy, but that ſhe ſtood ſtill armed againſt the counterbuffes of Fortune.

Entrance of Ariſtobulus into the High-Prieſthood.

The feaſt of the Tabernacles, greatly celebrated amongſt the Jews, being come, Ananel, after he had ſerved as an o in ciphering, is ſhamefully rejected; Ariſtobulus beginneth to excerciſe his charge. He was at that time but ſeventeen years of age, yet of a gallant ſtature, tall, and ſtraight as a palm tree, radiant as a ſtar, and very like his ſiſter. When the people beheld him cloathed with the pontifical habiliments, which were repleniſhed with majeſty, and to go towards the Altar and perform thoſe ceremonial rites with ſo much gravity and comlineſs, he appeared as a new Sun, which brake out of the clouds, and came to gild the world before covered over with darkeneſs. All the hearts of thoſe poor Hebrews, which ſo much had ſighed in the civil wars, freſhly bloomed, and newly opened themſelves, as roſes at the benigne, and gentle aſpect of this young Prelate. His excellent natural graces enchaſed in the majeſty of his robes, rendred an incredible luſture, which dazeled the eyes of all beholders. Some ſtedfaſtly beheld him and became as ſtatues, yet ſhewing by their tears their eyes were not made of marble. Others ſpake to him with infinit dumb teſtimonies of a never-ſilent hearty affection. The reſt made reſentments of their hearts burſt forth from their lips, not being able to with-hold acclamations too free and profuſe for the ſeaſon, but for their love excuſable. They remembred the virtue of the ancient Machabees, who had delivered them from Idolatry; they knew the wretched Hircanus was no other than a ſhadow following his own funerals; they retained the freſh memory of the grand-father of this young High-prieſt, Ariſtobulus the Great, who had been carried & bound fettered to Rome like a gally-ſlave; they were not ignorant how Alexander his father and Antigonus his uncle, had loſt their lives by oppoſing the government of a ſtranger: This young Prince onely remained free from ſo many ſhipwracks, and in the green tenderneſs of his youth they ſaw all the hopes of their Country to bud and bloſſom. And as one is credulous to hear what he affecteth, they perſwaded themſelves, Herod, who at the beginning had demanded the Kingdom in the name of this young Ariſtobulus, would come to let go his hold, giving way to juſtice, and for this cauſe they with the more liberty enlarged themſelves in theſe applauſes; but poor creatures, they reckoned without their hoſt. Herod having beheld this countenance in the people, inſtantly obſerved that according to his own Maxims he had played the Clark, and that this was not his ordinary manner of proceeding; entring at that time into a furious jealouſy, he maketh the High-Prieſt, and his mother, and wife, to be ſo narrowly watched, that neither within nor without the Palace they could ſtir a finger, but Herod was advertiſed of it. The prudent Mariamne amongſt theſe ſuſpitions lived ſtill in grace, ſweetning upon one ſide and other all acerbities as much as buſineſſes of that nature would permit. But her mother Alexandra touched to the quick to behold her ſelf amongſt ſo many ſpies, ſhe, who was ever deſirous to converſe and live with all royall liberty, reſolved to play at double or quit, to break the guyves of ſpecious ſervitude, or yield her neck to Herods ſword, if it ſhould come to paſs her calamity tranſported her into ſuch extremity. What doth ſhe? Cleopatra, that Queen who had filled the world with her fame, was then in Ægypt, and naturally hated Herod, as well for his barbarous diſpoſition, as for particular intereſts of her own perſon: For ſhe knew he much had entermedled in her affairs, and given Mark Anthony counſel to forſake her, yea to kill her. This Tyrant was ſo accuſtomed to ſay, Kill, that he eaſily adviſed others to uſe the ſame medicine, which was with him to his own maladies frequent. It is a ſtrange thing, that Cleopatra one day paſſing through Judea, he reſolved to ſend her into the other world, thinking therewith to gratifie Mark Anthony, but was diſſwaded by his friends, ſaying it was too audacious to attempt, and able for ever to ruin his fortune. The deſign was never publiſhed: But Cleopatra had cauſe enough beſides to hate Herod, which much emboldened Alexandra to write to her in ſuch like terms.

Malice of Herod.

ALEXANDRA

ALEXANDRA, to the Queen CLEOPATRA, Health.

Madame,

Letter of Alexandra to Cleopatra.

SInce God hath given you leave to be born the most accomplished Queen in all qualities, it is fit your Greatness serve as a sanctuary for the innocent, and an Altar for the miserable. The wretched Alexandra, who hath much innocency, void of support, and too many calamities without comfort, casteth her self into the arms of your Majesty, not to give her a scepter, but to secure the life of her and her son, the most precious pledge which remaineth of heavens benignity. Your Majesty is not ignorant that fortune having made me the daughter and mother of a King, Herod hath reduced me to the condition of a servant. I am not ambitious to recount my sufferings, which I had rather dissemble; but whatsoever a slave can endure in a gally, I bear in a Kingdom, through the violence of a son in law, who having stoln the diadem from my children, would also deprive them of life. We are perpetually among spies, sharp knives, and black apprehensions of death, which would less hurt us, if it were more sudden. Stretch out a hand of assistance to the afflicted, and afford us some petty nook in your Kingdom till the storm be over-blown, and that we may see some sparkles of hope to glimmer in your affairs. Glory thereby shall abide with you and with us everlasting gratitude.

Cleopatra having received these letters, made a ready answer, and invited her to hasten speedily into Ægypt with her son; protesting she should esteem it an unspeakable glory to serve as a sanctuary and refuge for the affliction of such a Princess. Resolution of departure is taken, but the execution is a hard task. The poor Io knows not how to withdraw her self from this many-eyed Argus. In the end, as the wit of woman is inventive, especially in matters that concern their proper interests, she, without discovering ought to any one, no, not to her daughter Mariamne, fearing least her nature too mild should advise her rather to rest in the lists of patience than to attempt ways so perilous, she I say, onely advising with her own passion in this business, caused two beers to be made (a matter of ill presage) to put her self and son into, thinking by this means to elude the diligence of the Guard, and so to be carried to the sea, where a ship attended her, and by this way save her life in the power of death. But by ill hap a servant of hers named Æsop, who was one of those that were appointed to carry the beers, going to visit one called Sabbion, a friend to the house of Alexandra, let some words fall of the intention of his Mistress, as thinking to to have spoken to a faithful and secret friend of hers. The perfidious Sabbion had no sooner wrung the worm out of this servants nose, but he hasteth to open all to Herod, supposing it was a very fit opportunity to work his reconciliation, he having a long time been suspected and accounted to be of Alexandras faction. Herod after he heard this news, wanted not spies and centinels. The poor Lady with her son is surprised upon the beers, drawn out of the sepulcher of the dead to return to the living, ashamed, and disgraced, that her Comedy was no better acted, little considering that after her personated part had failed, she could nothing at all pretend to life. Herod notwithstanding, whether he feared the great credit Cleopatra had, or whether he would not wholy affright Alexandra, thereby with the more facility to oppress her, contained himself in the ordinary dissimulation of his own nature, without speaking one sole word unto her. Although very well in the face of this painted hypocrisie was seen, that the clouds were gathered together, to make a loud Thunder-crack, & raise an unresistable tempest.

Enterprise of Alexandra

The caytive, after he had given so many deaths in the horrour and affrightment of arms, would inflict one, even (as it were in sport) upon a fair sommers day. Being at dinner at the house of the miserable Alexandra, feigning to have buried in deep oblivion all what was past, saith, that in favour of youth he this day would play the young man, and invite the High-Priest Aristobulus his brother in law to play at tennis with him, or some other like exercise, The sides were made, the elumination was enkindled. The young Prince; hot and eager, played not long but he became all on a water, as at that time happened to many other Lords and Gentlemen. Behold they all run to the rivers, which were near this place of pleasure where they dined.

Pitiful death of young Aristobulus.

Herod, who knew the custom of Aristobulus, and well foresaw he would not fail to cast himself into these cold baths, suborneth base villains, who under the shew of pastime should force him to drink more than he would. All succeeded as this traiterous wretch had premeditated. Aristobulus seeing the other in the water, uncloathed himself quickly, and bare them company. There was no cause why he should swim, sport, and dally upon this element, ever dangerous, although less faithless than Herod. The poor sacrifice skipped up and down, not knowing the unhappiness which attended him. But the accursed executioners remembred it well: For spying their time in this fatal sport, they smothered the poor High priest under the waters, in the eighteenth year of his age, and the first of his High-priesthood. This bright Sun, which rose with such splendour and applause, did set in the waves, never to appear again, but with horrid wanness of death on his discoloured visage.

Vanity, and misery of the world.

Humane hopes, where are you! True dreams of the waking, aiery fantasies, fleeting fires, which shine not, but to extinguish your selves, and in being put out to bereave us of light, leaving us the evil savour and sorrow of loosing it! This Prince so accomplished, that nature seemed to have framed him to be the object of thoughts, the love of hearts, the admiration of souls; this Prince, in whom was stored all the glory of the Royal house of the Asmoneans; this Prince, who was to marry the Miter with the Diadem, and raise all the hopes of a lost race; behold him by a most treasonable practise smothered in the water, in an age, in a beauty, in an innocency, which made this accident as full of pitie, as it was unfurnished of remedies.

Sorrow upon this death.

Vpon this news the whole City of Jerusalem was in as great a confusion, as if Nebuchadnezzar returning from the other world had been at the gates thereof: In every place there was nothing to be seen but tears, groans, horrour, astonishment, yellings, representations of death: You would have said that every house bare their first-born to buryal, as was seen heretofore to happen among the Ægyptians. But above all, Alexandra the disconsolate mother afflicted herself with uncurable sorrow: sometime she wept, prostrated on the body of her son, and sought in his eclipsed eyes and dead lips the remnant of her life. Sometime she rouled her eyes like a distracted lunatike, calling for fire, sword, halters, and precipices, to find in them the catastrophe of life. The sad Mariamne, although infinitly patient, had much ado to resist the impetuous violences of an incomparable sorrow. She loved this brother of hers most dearly, as her true image, as the pledg-bearer of her heart, as the hope of her house, all rent in pieces: All confounded as she was, the good daughter reflected on the wound of her mother, and stayed near the corps of her brother, as if she had been the shadow of the same body. Then turning herself to God, she said to him with an affectionate heart: My God, behold me presently in that estate, wherein I have nothing more to stand in fear of, but your justice, nothing more to hope, but your mercie: He for whom I feared, for whom I hoped, all that which one may fear or hope in the revolution of worldly occurrents, is taken from me by a secret judgement of your providence, ever to be adored by my obedient will, although not to be penetrated at all by the weakneſs of my thoughts. If I yet among ſo many acerbities, ſuck ſome ſweetneſs out of the world, in the preſence of delicious objects of which you have bereaved me, behold me wholly weaned, hereafter I will find therein nothing but wormwood, to the end that renouncing the comforts of the earth; I may learn to taſt thoſe which are proper to your children. Behold how fair and reposed ſouls draw honey from the rock, and convert all into merit, yea even their tears. The impatient, like Alexandra, afflict themſelves without comfort, torment themſelves without remedy, and many times become deſperate without remiſſion.

Extream hypocriſie of Herod.

What ſhall we ſay? Herod himſelf in this ſad conſort of ſorrow, would needs play his part. He maketh externally appear in a diſſembled hypocriſie, all the ſymptoms of a true ſorrow. He deteſteth play, he accuſeth fortune, he complaineth Heaven had ſiniſterly envied him an object, on which he deſired much to make all the love and reſpect appear he bare to the Royal bloud, from whence he greatly derived his advancement. He moſt ceremoniouſly goeth to viſit the Queen and her mother, and when he findeth them weeping about this dead body, ſcalding tears flowed from his eyes, whether it were he had them at command to make his diſſimulation the more great, or whether he verily had at that time ſome reſentment of grief, beholding on one ſide this little bloſſom ſo cruelly cropped under the ſythe of death, and ſo many celeſtial beauties, which had for limit and horizon the inſtant of their birth; and on the other ſide conſidering theſe poor Queens, drenched in a ſea of ſorrow, which had force to draw tears from rocks. This crayterous creature had yet ſome humanity in him; and I could well believe that nature had at this time wrung theſe tears by violence from his barbarous cruelty, notwithſtanding he feigned willingneſs to ſtop his paſſion with mälineſs, afterwards turning himſelf to the Ladies, he ſaid: He was not come ſo ſuddenly to wipe away their tears, which had but too much cauſe to be ſhed, as for himſelf, he had enough to do to command his own: Nature muſt be ſuffered to have her ſway; time muſt have his, and would apply a plaiſter to this ſorrow. That he would perform for the memorie of the dead, whatſoever an onely ſon might expect from a paſſionate father, and a puiſſant King; that hereafter he would be true ſon of Alexandra, true huſband and true brother of Mariamne, ſince God was pleaſed to redouble theſe obligations in him by the loſs they had ſuffered.

Tyranny of revenge.

O the powerfull tyranny of the appetite of revenge! Alexandra whom one might have thought would burſt into contumelies and reproches (as well knowing Herod, what face ſoever he ſet upon the matter, was Authour and plotter of this death) held herſelf conſtantly in the degrees of diſſimulation, not ſhewing to the King any diſcontent on her part, and all for the hope ſhe had to be opportunely revenged in time and place. Herod retiring, thought he had acted his part well, free from any ſuſpition of offence, ſeeing Alexandra ſpake not a word, who heretofore too frequently accuſtomed to complain in far leſs occaſions. To apply the laſt lenitive, he cauſed the funerals of the dead to be celebrated with ſuch pomp and magnificence, that nothing could be added thereunto, as well in the order of the equipage, as in the curioſity of the perfumes, with which the body was embalmed, and the magnificent furnitures of ſepulchre. The moſt ſimple and ignorant ſuppoſed all this proceeded from a real and ſincere affection; but the wiſeſt ſaid, they were the tears of the crocodile; that Herod could not cordially deplore his death which had taken a ſtraw out of his eye, and put him in full poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Judea. Alexandra joyning the paſſion of her ſorrow to her reſolution of revenge, immediately after the obſequies, faileth not to give notice to Queen Cleopatra of all that had paſſed, with ſo pathetical a letter, that every word ſeemed to be ſteeped in tears of bloud. Cleopatra, who was apt enough for theſe impreſſions, ſuddenly takes fire, and affecteth the affair with that ardour ſhe would her own cauſe; ſhe rowſeth up her whole Court, ſhe ſtorms, ſhe perpetually filleth Mark Anthonie's ears, crying out, it was a thing inſupportable to ſee a ſtranger hold a ſcepter, to which he could pretend no right, to maſſacre the heir with ſo much barbarous cruelty, to torment with ſervitude poor afflicted Queens, contrary to all equity, reaſon, and Royalty of their birth. Anthonie, who knew Herod to be his creature, and the work of his own hands, would not willingly underſtand theſe complaints. Notwithſtanding to pleaſe Cleopatra, he ſwore a great oath, he would examine the buſineſs in ſending for Herod, and if he were found culpable of ſuch a villany, he would inflict an exemplar puniſhment upon him.

Herod accuſed.

Behold Herod cited to Laodicea, where Mark Anthonie was to remain for a certain time, whither he was ſummoned to appear and purge himſelf of the murder of Ariſtobulus, of which he was ſuppoſed to be the Authour. This was a clap of thunder to this diſloyal wretch, which moſt powerfully awakened him, when he leaſt thought of it, and put ſuch terrours upon him as are not to be imagined. Upon one ſide he had before his eyes the image of his offence, and the voice of bloud, which rung in his ears; on the other ſide he ſaw all his fortune depended on Mark Anthonie, who at that time handled nothing but by the counſel of Cleopatra his mortal enemy, and whom he well knew to have an enterprize in hand upon the Kingdom of Judea for her advancement. But nothing ſo troubled his brain as a furious jealouſie: For he imagined that Anthonie, a looſe and wanton Prince, one that courted all the Princely beauties of the world, would do the like to his wife, whoſe picture he formerly had, and that with the more eaſe to enjoy her, he would make him ſerve as a ſacrifice for his fatal loves. This ſpirit of his was torn and diſtracted on all ſides, and in all objects diſcovered precipitation and affrightment: one while he ſeemed to reſolve to undergo a voluntary baniſhment, ſometime he ſuppoſed death more ſuitable, other-while he framed to himſelf ſome purpoſe of reſiſtance: but nothing appeared to him better than to delay, and draw the buſineſs out at length as long as he could.

Herod's affrightment.

Anthony preſſed with the voyage he undertook to war againſt the Parthians, ſent inſtantly for him; delays and excuſes thruſt him further into ſuſpition. Neceſſarily he muſt go, or reſolve to looſe all. He taketh leave of his mother in law Alexandra, and Mariamne his wife, without ſeeming to be amazed, without complaint, without giving teſtimony of his diſcontent, as if he had a ſhort journey of pleaſure to make. Laſt of all, he had his own mother, and his ſiſter Salome in Court, to whom he much recommended vigilancy over the deportments of thoſe whom he eſteemed to have wrought him the miſchief. Then drawing his uncle Joſeph aſide, he ſpake theſe words to him: Uncle, you know the occaſion that tranſporteth me to Laodicea, which truly is very difficult, ſeeing my innocency aſſaulted by powerfull and ſecret malice, which would be ſo much the more dreadfull, if it had as much effect as paſſion: But I hope to find day-light through the ſtorm, and that you ſhall ſee me return triumphant over calumny through my integrity, as I have already raised tropheys over hostility by arms: If God shall otherwise dispose of me, it is a meer plot prepared against me for the beauty of my wife, on whom Mark Anthonie may perhaps have some design, and this may be a cause to shorten my days, and be thereby to get more liberty for his unbridled passion. But I for the present conjure you, by the love which I have born you, by my fortune which you reverence, by bloud and nature; if happily you bear I am otherwise used than my quality and innocency permit, never let the death of Herod be waited on with the injury of his bed: Preserve the Kingdom for your self and your bloud, and cause my wife instantly to take her leave of this world to accompany me in the other: Kill her courageously, lest another enjoy her after my death: If the souls of the dead have any feeling of the affairs of the world, that shall serve me for a solace.

Horrible jealousie.

Joseph much amazed at this manner of proceeding, doth notwithstanding promise him he would perform all according to his will, if necessity so required; but that his fortune ever powerfull and invincible made him conceive other hopes in all kinds. Thereupon he set forward on his way, carrying along with him the richest parcels of his treasure, to make a present of them to those, whom he should most stand in need of, shewing in all things else, as much confidence in his countenance, as he hatched despair in his heart.

When he was arrived at Loadicea, he found strange informations prepared against him, which strongly charged him with the murder of Aristobulus. It was shewed to Mark Anthonie, how Herod ever had a design upon the scepter of Judea with a desperate and enraged ambition: That nothing so much perplexed him, as to see Aristobulus alive, to whom he in conscience knew the Kingdom in such sort belonged, that himself durst not demand it of the Romans, but under the title of Regency, whilest the right heir grew to maturity: That he had converted this Regency first into an Empire, afterwards into a Tyranny, removing as much as he could the Royal bloud from dignities, to advance men of no worth; witness Ananel placed in the High-priesthood of which Hircanus was despoyled; and that which made him alter his resolution therein was, not good affection, but importunity, and evident danger of popular commotions, which he well foresaw rose upon this rejection of the bloud Royal. That Aristobulus being preferred to the High-priesthood, received with all alacrity and applause of the people, he shewed this action to be most hatefull to him, being not sufficiently able to cover the fury of his envy under the ordinary mask of his hypocrisie: That after this time he had not ceased to persecute the dead Prince and his mother, in such sort, that finding no longer repose among the living, they were enforced to put themselves into the coffins of the dead, to be carried to the sea, and from thence to be transported to Ægypt: That he had caused them to be surprized in the act, and in sequel thereof had not afterward sought any thing more than to be rid of them: That the young Prince was drowned in the water, not alone and separated from the rest, but manifestly smothered by the insolent youth of the houshold and bosom of Herod.

All this process (as was then said) was so evident, that had it been written with the rays of the Sun, one could not wish more perspicuity. The voice of bloud cried to Heaven, which the trayterous wretch could not stop. The picture of this poor Prince, which had a little before his death been carried into Ægypt, was presented with a singular admiration of his beauty: His ghost was made to speak, which asked justice of Mark Anthonie, for having been so unworthily, so inhumanely murdered in the flower of his tender years, by the most horrid treason that ever was perpetrated. The tears of the disconsolate mother were not omitted in her absence. Cleopatra made this whole Tragedie to be presented, the combate was much enkindled, and the battery was forcible. Herod, who wanted no eloquence in his own occasions, replieth with a countenance very lowly and modest:

Apologie of Herod full of craft.

Prince, and you Sirs who are of the Counsel, I hold the scepter of Judea, neither of Hircanus nor Alexandra, never having had any purpose to flatter them for this end, yea much less to fear them. You know (Most Illustrious Anthonie*) the Kingdom is in my hands, I hold it of you; from you all my greatness ariseth, and in you all my hopes are concluded. If you command, I am at this present ready, not onely to leave the scepter, but my life also, which never have I been desirous to preserve but for your service. But it troubleth me, the way of death being open to all the world, the path of reputation, which is more dear to me than life, should be shut against my innocencie. I am persecuted by women, and much I wonder, how the soul of Queen* Cleopatra wholly celestial, can nourish so much spleen against a King, who never hath failed in any respect lawfully due to her merit. For Alexandra, it is not strange that she raise such a storm against me; her fierce and haughty spirit hath always opposed my patience, endeavoring by all means to disparage my government, to pull a crown from me, which a more puissant hand than her Ancestours hath placed on my head. What apparence is there, that being by the favour of the Romans a peaceable possessour of a Kingdom, the which even by the consent of my adversaries I sought not (so regular was my ambition) I should attempt a horrible crime, which cannot fall but into the mind of a monster? No man will be wicked in chearfulness of heart; the memorie of the recompence which man proposeth to himself, ever beareth the torch before the crime. To what purpose should I attempt upon the life of Aristobulus, to settle my affairs? They were already established, your gracious favour (most Noble Anthonie*) hath afforded me more than all their machinations can vanquish. But I perpetually have kept back the bloud Royal from dignities: What keeping back is it, when I have cherished them in my own bosom, as much as possible? Every one knows* Hircanus, the prime man of this Royal family, being held as a prisoner among the Parthians, I bent all my spirits, employed all my credit to have him set at libertie, and to procure his return to Court, where he now liveth in full tranquilitie, enjoying all the priviledges of Royaltie, but the carefull sollicitude of affairs. It is known, I have divided my crown and bed with his grand-child Mariamne, making her both Queen of people, and wife of a King. I have given the High-Priesthood to her brother Aristobulus of my meer and free will, not enforced by any constraint (as being absolute in the mannage of my own affairs) and if in ought I delayed him, it was because the minority of his age ran not equal with my affections, but in effect he hath been beheld High-Priest at eighteen years of age, which is a favour very extraordinarie. Alexandra his mother, who maketh way to this businesse, hath ever had all the libertie of my Court, except the licence of ruining herself, which she passionately pursueth. For what reason had she to hide herself in a coffin, and cause herself to be carried in the night as a dead bodie, to steal from my Court, and after she had wronged me in mine house, to traduce me among strangers? If she desired to make a voyage into Ægypt, she needed to have spoken but one word, it had been sufficient: But she pleaseth herself in counterfeiting a false peril in a real safetie, to thrust into the danger of life those who make her live in all reposed assurance. I having discovered this practice, did not let fall one word of bitterness against her, desirous she should enjoy at her ease the sight of me as a spectacle of patience, & thinking all folly sufficiently punished with its own proper conscience. Certain time after, the death of this young Prince happened, which draweth tears of compassion from me (for I loved him) and much it troubled me, his mother perverted the frankness of his excellent nature, and put more stuff out for his youth, than he was able to stirre together. He is dead, not in my house, but in the house of his mother, dead, by an accident which no man could prevent; dead, sporting in the water, a faithless element, where a thousand and a thousand have without any such purpose perished, dead, among the youth of the Court, with whom daily he disported himself. His own meer motion bare him into the water, the bravery of his youth caused him to dally even in danger it self, without any possibility to divert him, and his own mishap hath drowned him. It is to tie me to hard conditions, if Alexandra will make me both accountable for the youthfull levities of her son, as if I were his governour, and of the frail inconstancy of elements, as if I were Lord of them.

This pernicious spirit spake this with so much grace and probability, that he gained many hearts: So much force had eloquence even in the hands of iniquitie. Behold him now on the shore out of peril, remaining in Anthonie's Court in all liberty, to attend the sentence of his justification. In the mean time, being (as he was) wise and liberal in all occasions, by force of presents he purchased the hearts of the chief, and made all the accusation of Cleopatra appear to be the passion of a woman ill advised. Mark Anthony himself said to Cleopatra, she did ill to intermeddle so much with forreign Kingdoms, and that if she took this course, she would raise enemies prejudicial to her estate. That Herod being a King, it was not fit to use him like a subject, and that it would be her happiness rather to have him a friend, than an enemie.

As these things were handled in Anthonie's Court, the Queen Mariamne and her mother Alexandra ceased not to be observed by the sollicitous diligence of the mother and sister of Herod. Joseph his uncle played the Goaler, and often visited Queen Mariamne, sometime to treat some affairs with her, sometime in the way of complement. This man began to burn like a butterflie in the eyes of this incomparable beauty, and much affected her, although he saw himself far off from all manner of hope. Notwithstanding he found some contentment to have fixed his affection in so eminent a place. This passion made him foolish and full of babble, having already rudeness enough of his own nature, which made him utter strange extravagancies. For one day, there being occasion to speak of Herod's affection to Mariamne his wife, Alexandra the mother mocked thereat in an exorbitant fashion, and indeed somewhat too bitter, according to her custom. Joseph, who was desirous to entertain the Queen in the good favour of his Master, were it out of folly or drunkenness, said: Madame, your mother Alexandra may tell you what pleaseth her: But to give you a clear and ample testimony of King Herod your husband his love, know, that in case he happen to be put to death, he hath commanded me to kill you, not being able to abide in the other world without your company. At these words the poor Ladies looked pale with horrour. Out alas, the frantick man (said Alexandra in her heart) what will he do living, if after death he intend to destroy those who are yet alive?

An act of great stupiditie in Joseph, uncle of Herod.

In the mean time many bruits (the dreams of the credulous) were spred through Jerusalem, that Herod was dead, that Mark Anthony had caused him to be executed, he being convicted of the murder of Aristobulus; whether these rumours were divulged by Herods enemies, or whether himself caused them to be secretly buzzed, to try the face and disposition of the times. The wife Mariamne seemed to believe nothing; Alexandra grew passionate, and bated like a hawk on the pearch, entreating Joseph with all possible supplications he would remove them from Court, and conduct them to the Court of Guard of the Roman Legions, disposing them into the hands of Colonel Julius, from thence to pass to Mark Anthony; for she vehemently desired this Prince might see her daughter, perswading herself that so soon as he should behold her, he would be taken with her beauty, and doe any thing in her favour. These intentions being oblique, were unhappy in the success, and all Alexandras pursuits served her for no other purpose but to vent her passion.

Return of Herod.

In the end Herod returneth victorious, with authenticke testimonies of his justification and Anthonies amity, notwithstanding the endeavours of Cleopatra, God, reserving this parricide for a life like Cain, attended with a death most dreadful. His mother and sister fayled not presently upon his arrival to serve him up a dish of their own dressing, and to tell him the design which Alexandra had to put herself into the power of the Romans. Salome, envious against Mariamne even to fury, steeping her serpentine tongue in the gall of black slander, accused her of some secret familiarity with Joseph; whereupon Herod, who was extreamly jealous, thought in that very instant to ruin her, and so drawing Mariamne aside, he demanded of her from whence this correspondence grew which she had contracted with Joseph? The most chaste Queen, who never went out of the lists of patience, shewed her self both with eye, visage, countenance, & word, to be so penetrated with this cursed calumny, that well the trayterous wretch perceived how far she was alienated from such thoughts; and verily being ashamed to have uttered such words, he asked pardon of her, bemoaning with scalding tears his credulity, giving her many thanks for her fidelity, and making a thousand protestations of an everlasting affection.

The good Ladie, who was displeased to behold such hypocrisie, said covertly to him, That truly it was an argument of love to his wife, to desire her company in the other world. He, who understood by half a word, presently perceived what she would say, and entered into such desperate fury, that he seemed as a mad man, tearing his beard and hair of his head, and crying out, Joseph had betrayed him, and that it was apparent he had great correspondence with Mariamne, otherwise so enormous bruitishness would never have escaped any man, as to reveal such a secret. Thereupon he commandeth Joseph should be killed in the place, to serve as a victim at his return, not consenting to see him, nor hear one sole word of his justification. It was a great chance he had not at that time finished the sacrifice of his intemperate cruelty, and that to satisfie his chymerical humour he had not put Mariamne to death. But the irrefragable proofs of her innocency, and the impatient ardours of his love, withheld the stroke; onely to make the sparkles of his choller flie further off, he discharged it upon Alexandra, shutting her up for a time, keeping hena part from the Queen her daughter, and doubtlesly resolving with himself, it was in her shop, where all these counsels plotted for his ruin were forged and fyled.

Troublesom affairs of Herod.

Certain time after, Herod saw himself embarqued in another business which he thought to be at least as perillous as the former. Mark Anthony, who always had lent his shoulders to underprop him, after he had for a long time stroven against the fortune of Augustus Cæsar, fell to the ground in the Actiack battel, ending his hopes and life with a most mournfull catastrophe. This accident struck the Tyrant more than one would think, seeing his support ruined, his affairs, which he supposed to have been so well established, in one night dissolved, and that he had him for an enemy, who was in a fair way to become Emperour of the world. His friends and enemies mies judged him as a loſt man: He, who already had eſcaped ſo many ſhip-wracks, deſpaireth not at all in this extremity, but reſolves to ſeek out Cæſar, who was then at Rhodes, and proſtrate himſelf at his feet. But before he ſet a ſtep forward, he did an act wholly barbarous and inhumane.

Moſt lamentable death of Hircanus.

Hircanus, the true and lawful King, who by his ſweetneſs and facility had firſt raiſed Antipater, and afterward ſaved Herod's life, ſeating him in the Regal throne, to the prejudice of his own allies, was as yet alive, worn even with decrepitneſs, for he now was paſt eightie years of age. The Tyrant, fearing leſt he, being the onely remainder of the bloud Royal, ſhould again be re-eſtabliſhed in the throne, by the ſuppliant requeſt of the people who much affected his innocency; ſeeing him already upon the brink of his grave, threw him head-long into it, tearing out his ſoul with bruitiſh violence, which he was ready to yield up to nature. Some held this was meer cruelty without any colour of juſtice, wherewith this diabolical Prince was wont to palliate his actions. Others write, that Hircanus days were ſhortened upon this occaſion.

Ambition of Alexandra cauſeth the death of her father.

Alexandra being not able to put off her ambition but with her skin, ſeeing Herod gone upon a voyage from which it was likely he ſhould never return, ſollicites her father Hircanus, ſhews him the time is come wherein God will yet again make his venerable age flouriſh in Royal purple. The Tyrant is involved in ſnares, from which he can never free himſelf. Fortune knocketh at the gate of Hircanus to reſtore the Diadem, which is due to him by birth-right, and taken away by tyranny. It onely remaineth that he a little help himſelf, and his good hap will accompliſh the reſt. Hircanus anſwereth her: Daughter, the time is come wherein I ſhould rather think of my grave, than a Regal throne. You know what opinion I had of greatneſs in an age and condition, wherein rightfully I might cheriſh it. I voluntarily forſook it, preferring repoſe before all the crowns of the world. Now that I am in the haven, would you recall me into the ſtorm? Daughter, leave ſuch words; I have ſeen too many miſeries, ſpeak to me of my grave, not of ſcepters.

Alexandra replied, that although in his own perſon he not at all pretended to life, nor to the fortune of the living, he notwithſtanding ought not to neglect his bloud, but permit juſtice to be done, and meddle with nothing, but by writing a word or two to Malichus the Lieutenant of Arabia, who would aid him with money and forces, as much as ſhould be needfull. In concluſion, he was bound to ſave both his daughter and grand-child from the ravening teeth of this Tyger. She deafened his ears with ſo many reaſons, that in the end he yielded, and treateth with Malichus, who ſhould ſafe conduct him with a good troup of horſe. The letters are put into the hands of one called Doſitheus, a couſin of Joſeph (whom Herod lately had cauſed to be maſſacred) to be with all ſafety delivered. But the perfidious wretch betraying the bloud of his allye and the fortune of Hircanus, inſtead of cartying the letter faithfully to Malichus, delivered it into Herod's hands, who commandeth to require an anſwer and bring it to him, thereby to diſcover the practice thereof, and underſtand the Arabian's purpoſe. He faileth not to promiſe Hircanus all aſſiſtance, inviting him with much earneſtneſs to be with him as ſoon as poſſible. Herod having diſcovered the whole plot, ſends for Hircanus, and asked if he received not ſome letters from Malichus? Yes, anſwered he: but they contain nothing but complement. The other demanded, Had you not ſome preſent with thoſe letters? He confeſſeth that verily Malichus had preſented him with four horſes to draw his coach. Thereupon without any other form of proceſs, the Tyrant made this venerable old man to be murdered, embrewing the hoary hairs in the bloud of him, who had been a ſoſtere, a father, a protectour of him, yea, all. Then after he had impriſoned Alexandra and Mariamne in a ſtrong fort, under the cuſtody of Joſeph his treaſurer, and Sohemus the Iturean, he goes directly to Rhodes, leaving the abſolute charge of his Kingdom to his brother Pherorus.

Alexandra and Mariamne priſoners.

The hiſtory telleth not the ſorrow of the Queen and her mother for the death of Hircanus. It is probable all was a long time concealed, as from ſuch who were held in a ſtraight priſon, and had converſation with no man. Alexandra gnawed her bridle of impatience: Mariamne reſiſted the dull languiſhments of this captivity with a generous conſtancy, and endeavoured to ſweeten the diſcontents of her mother. All her comfort was in God: For how could ſhe ſpeak or think of any thing elſe? My God (ſaid ſhe) you ſteep all creatures for me in wormwood. If I heretofore have loved them, and ſucked ſome ſweetneſs from the world, for an ounce of honey you have given me a pound of gall. From the time I began to bear a Diadem on my head, I have felt nothing but thorns, and Royalty hath been nothing to me but a ſpecious ſlavery. My God, how long ſhall it continue? Shall we not behold that bright day to ſhine over our heads, which is perpetually in its Eaſtern riſing, which may drie up our tears, and breaking the bands of our captivity, place us in Abraham's boſom, the liberty of the elect?

These poor Ladies ſtayed there, perpetually pent up between horrid walls, beholding nothing but rocks and ſavage wildernеſſes, which to their ſorrow ſeemed to reſound compaſſion. They knew not in what ſtate the world was, much leſs the affairs of Court. At every ſeaſon the Goaler came to viſit them, they expected nothing but news of their death. The Guard in the beginning ſhewed themſelves ſevere in their countenances, and reſerved in their words; all was full of horrour, affrightment, and melancholy ſilence. In the end (for there is no iron but will be ſoftened in the fire) Sohemus viſiting them more oft, according to the commiſſion he had, felt fiery arrows flie from the eyes of Mariamne, ſo ſharp, that they tranſfixed his heart with compaſſion, judging it a hard thing to hold a Queen in captivity, who was able to enthral all hearts with ſo many ſupereminent excellencies as Heaven had conferred upon her. He began to ſhew her a pleaſing countenance, and Mariamne ſeeing him one day in a good humour, took confidence thereby to know ſome news of the other world. Sohemus (ſaid this Ladie to him) you now behold us in a moſt wofull ſtate, and much unworthy our qualities; but the day perhaps will come the ſtorm may blow over. Miſchief and miſery knock not always at one and the ſame gate. You know who I am, and that in obliging me, you engage not an unable creature, much leſs an ungratefull. Tell us in a word, to what end doth King Herod hold us here, and of what condition are the affairs of the times?

Sohemus at theſe words felt his heart aſſaulted with moſt violent counterbuffs: on the one ſide he repreſented to himſelf the avengement of Herod, freſhly exemplified in Joſeph; on the other ſide he was ſo touched with compaſſion of thoſe words this noble Ladie ſpake to him, that the ice of his heart diſſolved, and began already to evaporate through his eyes. Mariamne finding him waver, ſpake boldly: Sohemus, it is a word which can no whit prejudice you, being ſtored up in deep ſilence, and which may much advantage us for the ſecurity of our affairs.

Sohemus, ſuppoſing either that Herod never would return again in the quality of a King, or that he being under the protection of Mariamne might eaſily work his reconciliation, openeth his heart unto her, and ſaith: Madame, I put my ſecrets and life into your hands; yea I deſire to die before ever I undertake to execute this barbarous command which Herod hath impoſed upon me, in caſe the affairs he negotiateth at this time with Cæsar succeed not according to his wish. And what is it? (saith Mariamne to him.) Madame, I tremble onely to think of it: It is a matter, which concerneth your life. My friend (replieth the good Queen) it is his ordinary guise, he enjoyned his uncle Joseph as much upon his first voyage. But is there no means to deliver us from this? Sohemus answereth, that Pheroras brother of Herod had charge of the Kingdom, and he being a man extreamly distrustfull, ever had his eye upon sudden surprizals. Well then (said this poor Princess) we must die: on what side soever be turn me, I behold nothing but the image of death, with which I am already grown acquainted. Sohemus comforted her with his best endeavour. But she then shutting up her ears from all earthly comfort, opened her heart to celestial contemplations, daily more and more purifying her soul both in the water of tears, and in the boiling furnace of afflictions. O the providence of God! That is true which the Scripture saith: Your ways are now in the abyss, and your pathes on the waters. Who could discover such tracks, whilest this most chaste and innocent Queen, amidst the dark obscurity of a prison, daily drowneth one part of her life in tears?

Arrival of Herod at Rhodes.

Herod, who was now embarqued, all bloudy with massacre committed on the person of Hircanus, found the sea, winds, men, and all his affairs successfull. This Proteus, who made his wit comply with all accidents, seeing he could not conceal the service which he had done for Mark Anthony, ever playing the dog sleeping under the feet of his fortune, resolved to colour and cloak them with the mantle of virtue. He knew Augustus was a Prince born to goodness, generous, just, and that he endeavoured to make faithfull servants in this change of affairs, which he began to undertake; he deceives him under the shadow of virtue, with the colour of constancy, and pretext of fidelity. Behold he presenteth himself to the Emperour, and speaks in these terms:

His speech to Augustus.

O Great Augustus, behold here my person and crown at your feet: It is good reason that all depend upon your Greatness, since God is pleased to put the Empire of this Universe into your hands. For mine own part I cannot deny what I have been, no more than I will dissemble what I ought to be, and what I will be. I have hitherto been a great friend of Mark Anthony: It is true; and had he believed me, as he hath done Cleopatra his Mistress, you, Cæsar, had felt how far I was your enemy, and he, how much I was his friend. But this miserable Prince cozened by this creature, took money of me, and counsel of her, to destroy, in so doing, his fortune, and raise yours upon his own ruins. I have followed him even to the brink of the grave, and not fallen therein, since my death could nothing advance his service. He is in that state and condition, wherein I am able to render him nought but tears. To you (O Cæsar) are due the services which I tender with much heartiness, if you shall please to accept them, on this condition, that you enforce me not either to hear or speak evil of my old master, whom being no longer able to serve, I notwithstanding ought after death to love.

Augustus took pleasure in this liberty, and thought this man was made of the wood whereof good servitours are composed, not seeing the subtility of the fox, who measured all according to his own interests. He then taketh the crown which Herod had laid at his feet, and set it on his head, saying: I desire you may live peaceably in your Territory, onely be faithfull to me, as you have been to Mark Anthony. Herod after this so favourable access, ceased not to put himself forward into the grace of Augustus, by seeking out all occasions to procure it, and namely in the voyage the Emperour made into Ægypt, wherein he perpetually attended him, and performed many singular offices. This business so prosperously dispatched, he triumphantly returneth into the Citie of Jerusalem, to the amazement of the whole world.

Here it is that the virtuous Mariamne endeth her career, to serve as a sacrifice in the lamentable triumphs of her husband. Let us behold how this bright flame is extinguished, we shall from thence expect no evil odour; the good vapours of her life will wait upon her even to death. So soon as Herod was arrived in his capital Citie, he hasteneth to salute the Queen his wife, whom he had already caused to be set liberty, being secure of his affairs, and was the first brought her the news of his happy success in this voyage. He was so puffed up with his prosperities, that he could not contain himself, and the love of so amiable an object (which he then beheld in his presence after so many dangers) did so unloo'en his tongue in excess of vaunts, and and superfluity of words, thinking he made himself very acceptable with such impertinencies. Mariamne much perplexed to hear him, and being free and generous in all her actions, shewed not to take much pleasure in these his idle boastings, which passion likewise made to appear somewhat childish. He thinking at the first this was nothing but a trifling humour of melancholy, which would quickly vanish into smoke, flattered her the more with words, playing the wanton beyond his custom. Upon these dalliances the poor Ladie sighed often, remembring herself of the secret commandment very lately given to Sohemus. He well saw by this her countenance she was not content, and beginneth to enter into suspition that Sohemus had used the like intemperance of tongue, as Joseph. He at that time knew not what face to set upon it, so much was he turmoyled: love, anger, jealousie, suspition, drew him with four horses. He could not be angry, as he would, nor knew how to love what he affected. This proud spirit, unacquainted how to bow under any one but to deceive him, was ashamed to behold himself dis-armed, and to become a counterfeit in amorous courtships, not so usual to his nature. He then seeing this mommery succeeded not, was the more afflicted, and thought it was time to brandish his sword. But love proved of more force than anger, and withheld the stroke. He retired, shaking his head, and muttering I know not what between his teeth; as cursing love, which made him mercifull in despite of his own disposition. Out alas! Can one find out a more spitefull hatred than in women against women, when jealousie hath laid hold of their brain? Cypre, an Arabian by nation, mother of Herod, and Salome his sister, seeing him so passionate, ceased not to blow the cole with their tongues, and enkindle him with many calumnies, which the Tyrant partly believed, yet could not suddenly resolve to give the blow. He was long time debating with himself, without power to conclude any thing. In the end an unhappy day comes, in which about noon, being retired into his chamber, he sendeth for Mariamne, who instantly came thither; but conjugal rites being required of her, she stuck in the refusal, saying, The law of nature forbad her to company with a man, who had murdered her father and brother, speaking of her father Alexander, who by the pursuit of Herod, had been oppressed by the Romans, and of her brother Aristobulus so cruelly smothered. Here Josephus the Historian, after he had highly praised Mariamne, as a most chaste Queen, and truly endowed with an admirable faith (for such are his words) taxeth her with a little disdain, which was (as he said) engrafted in her nature, for that she rejected the dalliances of her husband. But he that will well consider how Herod had used her neerest of kin, most unworthily massacring them, and how holding the scepter from her house, he used her not in the quality of a Queen nor a wife, but of a poor sacrifice, which he caused to be shut up, commanding to murder her as often he he fell into any danger of his own life, life, for fear some other should enjoy her after his death, shall find the Ladie had most just cause to make him this answer. Herod notwithstanding, who would not afford such liberty, was so moved with these words, as it was a great chance he had not laid violent hands upon her, shewing by his eyes sparkling with anger, his shrill voice, and hands lifted up, he would proceed to force. And as he stamped up and down, transported with rage, acting his anger like a fencer without Mariamne's reply to any one word, the perfidious Salome, thought it was now high time to strike her stroke. She sent a trusty servant, whom she a long time had suborned, to cause him to depose a calumny, as wicked as ridiculous; to wit, that Mariamne having a purpose to give Herod a love-drink, had addressed her self to him, who was cup-bearer to the King, to corrupt him with many promises, to which he never had given ear. For the rest, he had such instruction given him, that if perhaps Herod should ask what this potion was, he should answer without further difficulty, it was the Queens invention, and that herein she onely required the service of his hand.

Strange mischief.

This wicked fellow entered into the chamber in cold bloud, and very seriously makes oath hereof: whereupon Herod, who was already enkindled, becoming more enflamed than ever, thought within himself he must no longer wonder from whence these his impatiences in love proceeded. At that instant he caused an Eunuch to be laid hold on, one of the Queens most trusty servants, supposing nothing was done without his knowledge: He putteth him to the torture, causing him to be most cruelly tormented, of purpose that his body very feeble, not being able to endure the violence of tortures, and on the other side having nothing to say against his good Ladie, in whose conversation he had never perceived any thing but honour and virtue, should for a long time remain in very great perplexities. In the end he let a word fall, saying, he had seen Sohemus talk a long while in secret with Queen Mariamne, as framing some relation to her, and that after this very time, he well perceived she was troubled. Herod had no sooner heard this word: It is enough, said he, take him from the torture, and let Sohemus be called. Sohemus knew nothing what had passed, and lived in great contentment, having very lately obtained a good government by the Queens recommendations: He was wholly amazed, they laid hold upon him, and would enforce him to confess the discourse which he had with Mariamne during this specious imprisonment. But he persisting in denial, is massacred in the place Herod retired into his cabbinet, drinking in deep draughts the gall and poyson of his deadly choller, and contriving in his heart the fury which he soon after was to shew in publick: For without giving any truce to his spirit, he assembled his Prive-Counsel, and sendeth for the Queen, who expected nothing less than such proceeding. This monster, who always endeavoured to give colour of justice to his most exorbitant actions, beginneth a long speech, which he had prepared at leisure, and while every one was in horrour and silence, not knowing what would be the catastrophe of the Tragedy, except the couragious Mariamne, who was armed with an invincible constancy against all exigents, he speaketh unto them in such like words:

Death of Sohemus.

Oration of Herod against his wife.

SIRS, It seemeth God will counterpoize the prosperities of my state, by the misfortunes of my house. I have found safety in winds and tempests, in so many painfull voyages as I have undertaken, so many thorny affairs, which I have ended, to find a storm in my own Palace. You are not ignorant how I have cherished the whole family of Hircanus within my bosom, in a lamentable time, when it was in decay and confusion: for recompence whereof, as if I had hatched the egs of a serpent, I have got nothing but hisses and poyson. God knoweth how often I have dissembled, and how often I have cured my self by patience. Notwithstanding I cannot so harden my heart, but that it may be softened, and ever become penetrable to a new wound. Behold the Queen my wife, who following the steps of her mother, is always ready to disquiet my repose. As soon as I was returned from the voyage so full of danger, as you know, I brought her news of the happy success of my affairs: She shewing the little account she made both of my state and person, at that time heard me with so great disdain, that what endeavour of courtesie soever I used, never could I extort from her pride one good word. And afterward not contenting herself therewith, she proceeded to very bloudy injuries, which I love better to conceal, for the honour of yours ears, and come to deeds. Behold one of my faithful servants, who testifieth, she would have suborned him to give me a love-potion, to wit, a poyson, of purpose to turn my brain, or take away the life which God reserveth for me to acknowledge the many good offices, which you all in general, and each one in particular have afforded me. Thus you see how I am returned, my head crowned with lawrel, honoured and courted by the prime men of the world, to serve as a sport for the malice, and a mark for the treachery of a woman, whom I cannot reclaim by the force of love nor benefits, no more than if she were a Lyoness. Consider what you ought to do, I deliver her into the hands of your justice, not willing to direct my self herein by my own advise, to the end posterity may know, that my proper interests are ever seated beneath the truth.

Herod speaking these words, would seem less passionate, putting all tortures upon his natural disposition, plyable enough: But he notwithstanding so vehemently fretted, that all the Counsel knew well he was in heat of choller, and that his purpose was no other but to ruin the poor Queen. She is summoned to answer at that instant, without an Advocate. The glorious Amazon, Grand-child of the Machabees, and Inheritrix of their patience, being presented before this wicked tribunal, 28. years before the coming of the Son of God, did then, what he afterward taught us most remarkably by his example: Never from her mouth was heard one syllable of impatience, never did she use one sole word of recrimination, and being able to declare to the Counsel a thousand and a thousand outrages, received by herself, and the persons of her nearest allies, she swalloweth all these bitternesses with a patience more than humane: Onely, saith she, that as concerning the essential Article of this accusation, to wit, Admirable modesty of the poor Queen.

The love-potion, which was objected against her, it was a thing in the judgement of all those, who would truly weigh it, very far from her thought: since she had always more feared King Herods love than hatred. Lastly, that she made no reckoning of life, wherein she had suffered too much sorrow, yea much less of the Court, from whence she never received any contentment; and that if they would oppress her by false testimonies, it was easie to gain victory of one who made no resistance; more easie to take the Diadem from her head, and her head from her shoulders; but most hard to bereave her of the reputation of a Princess of honour, which she had of her Ancestours, and would carry to her tomb.

The poor creature was like a silly sheep in the Lions throat, or among the paws of many wolves: They proceeded to sentence, all tended to baseness. It was supposed the King was willing to be rid of her, and that sufficed. Never was any one to be found, who had the courage to plead the cause of this innocent Queen, or in any sort to mollifie the passion of Herod. All those consciences were oppressed either with crimes or cowardise, from whence it came to pass these false Judges did more for the Tyrant than he desired; for they all resolved upon death. He himself was ſurprized with horrour, though he were wholly a bloudy man, and commandeth ſhe ſhould be kept in a priſon of the Palace, with delay of execution, thinking perhaps by that means to make her more plyant to his paſſion. But the enraged Salome who had raiſed this ſtorm, not willing to do any buſineſs to halves, approched to the King her brother, and ſhewed him ſuch birds were not to be kept in cages; that his life and crown thereby ran into hazard; that already all tended to a revolt, and that if he delayed this execution, he haſtened the ruin of himſelf and his whole ſtate. Whereupon Herod let fall this word: Let her be taken away. And behold inſtantly an officer diſpatched to the good Queen, who brought her the news of the laſt hour of her life; ſaluting her with a low reverence, and ſaying: Madame, the King commandeth you muſt preſently die. She without any diſturbance ſaid: Let us then go (my friend) it cannot be ſo ſoon for King Herod, but it will be as late for me: and ſpeaking this word, ſhe ſet forward, and went directly to the place of execution without change of colour, having a ſweet aſpect, which drew tears from the whole world.

Invincible patience, and very admirable.

To crown her patience, as ſhe was ready to receive the ſtroke of death, Alexandra, her own mother, the companion of her impriſonment, the Guardian of her thoughts, who had ever been one heart with her, betraying bloud, nature, and all piety by a miſchievous trick of ſtate, thereby avoiding the ſuſpition of Herod, as conſenting to her daughters humour, came to charge her with moſt bloudy injuries; and it was a great chance ſhe had not taken this poor Ladie by the hair, to dreg her up and down the pavement; ſaying to her with the foam of boyling choller, That ſhe was wicked, and extreamly proud, and well deſerved to die in that manner, by ſhewing herſelf refractory to ſo good a huſband.

Barbarous act of Alexandra.

Behold yetily the greateſt indignity which could happen in ſuch an accident. There is no better honey, nor worſe ſting, than that of bees; no better amities, nor greater injuries, than of allies. The patient Mariamne onely made her this anſwer: Mother, let my ſoul paſs in peace, which already is upon my lips, and trouble not the repoſe of my death: and with a generous ſilence, ſhutting her mouth up to further replies, and opening her heart to God, the onely witneſs of her innocency, moſt unworthily uſed, ſtretched out her neck to the executioner, to ſeal with her bloud the laſt teſtimonies of her patience.

Heroick ſilence.

Joſephus ſpeaketh not expreſly enough of the puniſhment, ſhe doubtleſs being executed in the manner at that time ordinary, which was to behead offenders of that quality. This day-break, which bare ſtil in the rays thereof joy & refreſhment to the poor afflicted ſouls, through the horrible confuſions of tyranny was then extinct in her bloud. Yea, the eyes of all the ſtanders by bathed in tears, beheld her in her eclipſe, when that fore-head full of Royal Majeſty was ſeen couragiouſly to affront approaching death, which maketh the moſt confident to tremble, and when this alabaſter neck was ſtretched out, and bowed under the ſhining ſteel, to be ſeparated from this beauteous body, a ſhivering horrour crept into the bones of all the beholders, and there was no rock ſo hard which afforded not the water of tears, before ſhe poured out her bloud. The head was ſeparated from the body, and the body from the ſoul: But the ſoul never ſhall be divided from God, raiſing to death ſuch a trophey of patience. The limbs lay all cold and ſtiff extended on the place, and the voice of innocent bloud, which already penetrated the clouds to ask vengeance of God, was inſtantly heard, as you ſhall underſtand: onely I beſeech you ſtay to behold the Pourtraict and Elogie of the good Queen by us here inſerted.

Moſt pitifull death.

What horrour.

Upon the Picture of MARIAMNE.

FOrtune a heavenly beauty did engage
To a fell husband, who through boundleſs rage,
Practiz'd fierce tyranny, and foul debate,
As well in love, as in his Royal ſtate.
She liv'd on gall, upon the ſword ſhe dy'd,
Soon in the Lamb's bloud to be puriſi'd.
The Croſs ſo to prevent, in pains pertake
With patient God, miſhaps thrice-happy make,
Which after death immortalize her ſtory,
And from her body take leſs bloud than glory.
Thus from the world this holy Queen remov'd,
Breaths forth affections to her God belov'd;
And her great ſoul to heav'n in ſilence rears,
Purg'd in her flame, & waſhed with her tears:
Who bravely ſo both lives, and leaveth breath,
Makes of a dying life, a living death.

THE diſloyal husband, who ſo inhumanely had treated a Ladie worthy of all honour, as ſoon as ſhe rendered up her ſoul, as if he had been ſtrucken by ſome inviſible dart, cried out with grief, and ſaid, he had done an act worthy the wrath of God; then dreadfully howling, he ceaſelesly invoked the memory and name of the poor dead creature, to whom he by his ſorrows could not again reſtore, what had been taken from her by the ſword of the executioner. Whereſoever he went, he ſtill was accompanyed with the image of his crime, ſtill tormented and aſſailed with black furies, monſters, and hydeous ſights. He tried all ſorts of feſtival entertainments, dancings, and delights, to divert this ill, but it ſtill augmented; in ſuch ſort that he was enforced to abandon all the affairs of his Kingdom, though he had been very eager and ardent in this employment, and became in the beginning thereof doltiſh and dull, not knowing what he did: For often in the time of dinner he ſpake to his ſervants, and commanded them to call the Queen, as if ſhe had been yet living; they ſlipped aſide without making anſwer, and the whole Court was drenched in terrour and ſilence. In the end, not being able any longer to endure the walls of his Palace, as if they had upbraided him with his cruelty, he ran into the forreſts like a mad man, where he got a ſtrange maladie of the mind, and ſo horrible a frenzie, that the Phyſicians ſitians were to ſeek, ſaying freely, it was a blow from Heaven. God, who yet reſerved him for greater calamities, would not at that time take away his life. The wicked mother Alexandra, who ſo outragiouſly had complained of her daughter upon the ſcaffold, inſtantly died, taſting the bitterneſs of death, and looſing her glory. Laſt of all followeth a plague, which took away even many of Herod's Counſellers, and all that was nothing but the ſcourge of Heaven, in avengement of this death ſo deplorable, and never ſufficiently lamented.

Fury of Herod after the death of Mariamne.

The ſons of Mariamne bred at Rome.

Mariamne of her chaſte wedlock left two ſons to Herod, Alexander and Ariſtobulus, who were very young, able to ſuffer much in time to come, but as then incapable of feeling their own miſeries. Herod to take from them the ſenſe of this cruel tragedy, and to raiſe them likewiſe by the degrees of good education, to the glory of his ſcepter, happily puts them aſide, and ſends them to Rome, to be bred in the Court of Auguſtus Cæſar, held at that time the Academie of Kings, and prime ſchool of the world. Some years being paſſed, he had a deſire to make a voyage into Italie to ſalute Cæſar, and by that opportunity ſee his children, whom he found excellently trained, and ſo accompliſhed, that he purpoſed with the good leave of Cæſar, to carry them back into Judea, which he did. Theſe young Princes returning into Jeruſalem with Herod, raviſhed all the people with admiration. They were of a gallant preſence, ſtraight, active, quick-ſpirited, couragious in the exerciſe of arms, well-ſpoken, affable, as lovely as the perſon of the Father was odious. Men looked on them, as one would upon the two ſtars of Caſtor and Pollux, after a ſtorm; they repleniſhed all with alacrity, and ſeemed already to win all hearts, to approve their titles to the Crown. Thoſe notwithſtanding, who retained the memory of the uſage of poor Mariamne their mother, could not abſtain from tears.

Calumnie is plotted againſt them.

Pheroras brother of Herod, and Salome his ſiſter, who both had dipped their fingers in the bloud of the innocent Queen, entered into affrightments and apprehenſions unſpeakable, ſeeing the bloud they had ſhed, ſhould one day ſway over their heads: Wherefore they began ſilently to calumniate them, and cauſed by truſty inſtruments, many bruits to paſs into the ears of Herod, which intimated, That the Princes his ſons, in conſideration of their mothers wrong, had a great averſion from the father, and that they never ſeriouſly would affect him. Herod, who as yet in the heat of his affection, and could never be ſatisfied with beholding them, gave no credit to this calumny. But rather ſeeing them now upon the confines of maturity, ſought to match them highly, plotting for Alexander the daughter of Archelaus, King of Cappadocia, named Glaphyra, which was aſſented unto; and for Ariſtobulus, he cauſed him to marry the daughter of Salome his cozen germain, ſo plaiſtering over the domeſtick enmities, which ever after found many factions. Alexander and Ariſtobulus converſed together with great freedom, and uttered whatſoever they had upon their hearts, ſpeaking of the death of their mother in ſuch manner, that they ſhewed a great reſentment thereof. Pheroras and Salome, cloſe-biting and watchfull, ceaſed not to provoke them to ſpeech, and whatſoever they ſaid, either through vanity, or ſleight diſpoſition to anger, or in the liberty of ſecrecy, was inſtantly by a third perſon related to the ears of Herod. The ſubtile Salome holding ſtill a power upon her married daughter, who was a ſimple creature, put her upon the rack, to tell her all that her husband and her brother in law had ſpoken in the privacy of their mutual converſation. She then recounted the words theſe poor Princes had through ſimplicity and bravery ſpoken, to wit, that Ariſtobulus vaunted himſelf, The Kingdom belonged to the children of Mariamne, as to the line of the true Queen; as for Herods other ſons, who were ſpread abroad in very great number (for he had nine or ten wives) that he might make Regiſters of them in ſome petty Towns, and that they ſhould do well to learn to write and read. She added, that Alexander ſaid in boaſting, he was a better man than his father, notwithſtanding that converſing with him, and ſeeing him of a jealous humour, he reſtrained himſelf, as in a ſcabbard, and durſt not diſcover himſelf for fear he ſhould give him ſome ſuſpition of his power. That hunting or walking with Herod, he did as it were bow and contract himſelf together, that he might not appear taller than his father: that if he were to ſhoot in a bow, he purpoſely made himſelf unskilfull, thereby to take all occaſion of envie from him. It was a notable act of wiſdom to do it, but a great folly of youth to breath out many words, as innocently ſpoken, as treacherouſly interpreted; and above all an infinite ſimplicity to commit their ſecrets to a woman, whoſe heart is as fit to keep what it ought to conceal, as a ſive to hold water.

When Pheroras and Salome had a long time filled the ears of Herod with theſe trifling reports, ſeeing the ſuſpition began to take footing in his mind, and that the affection of a father cooled towards his children, they ſtruck the iron while it was hot, and wiſhed him ſeriouſly to take heed of his ſons, for they ſpake big, and had boldly ſaid, That all thoſe who were embrewed in their mothers bloud, ſhould not carry the puniſhment into the other world: for verily as they were vexed upon the remembrance of the dead, ſuch like words had eſcaped them. Herod was much amazed at this liberty, and thought he muſt repreſs their boldneſs by ſome counterpoize. What doth he? To humble the hearts of theſe Princes, he ſelecteth among his children one called Antipater, his ſon by Doris, nothing noble, and who had ſhamefully been hunted out of the Court; he putteth this his ſon in the turning of a hand upon the top of the wheel, not that he had a purpoſe to raiſe him, but to uſe him to counterballance the children of Mariamne, reputing him an inſtrument proper for this end. For certainly this Antipater was of a dark ſpirit, cloſe, and miſchievous, much of his Father Herods diſpoſition; as it was preſently to be ſeen. When he was advanced, he reſolved fully not to deſcend but with loſs of life, and to hold that Kingdom as well as others, by ſome notable trick. Behold why he played the Proteus, and changed himſelf into all forms to gain credit with Herod, who then began to like him very well; and he the more to fortifie himſelf, ſpared not under hand to aggravate the calumny againſt the children of Mariamne, and after he had thrown the ſtone, withdrew his arm ſo cunningly, that it ſeemed he had not touched it: for he always was converſant with Alexander and Ariſtobulus with much reſpect, as with his Maſters; yea when he made falſe tales to tickle the ears of his father, then feigned he by a counterfeit modeſty to take their cauſe in hand, and defend them ſo diſcreetly for his own advantage, that thereby he caſt them further into ſuſpition. King Herod judged, that to countenance him, it were to good purpoſe to ſend him to Rome, which he did, allotting him a flouriſhing retinue, and an infinite number of recommendations. There it was that he much embroyled buſineſſes, writing to his father, That he had diſcovered at Rome ſtrange plots, that he ſhould take heed of his brothers Alexander and Ariſtobulus, that they had practiſed ill diſpoſitions in every place, that their purpoſe had no other aim but to ſhorten his days, and diſpoſſeſs him of his Empire. This had ſo much the more colour, for that theſe miſerable Princes galled with their repulſe, could not diſſemble their diſcontent; they ever caſting forth ſome words, which gathered by the ſpies of Pheroras and Salome, never fell to the ground.

Herod ſighed to ſee that he having pacified all abroad, the fire ſhould kindle in his own houſe, and thereupon had ſome deſire to arreſt his ſons, but he would attempt nothing upon their perſons without Cæſars command, referring all to him, both for his ordinary complacence, and ſafeguard of his own affairs. After he had revolved this affair, with a thouſand anxieties in his heart, wherein he bare the chief extent of his counſels; he reſolved in his own perſon to carry his ſons to Rome, and accuſe them before Cæſar. In the whole courſe of this long way from Paleſtine to Italie, he held himſelf cloſe and reſerved, not making the leaſt diſguſt againſt his children appear, that he might not occaſion in them any ſuſpition. Being arrived at Rome, he learned Auguſtus Cæſar was then in the Citie of Aquileia; without delay he went thither, conducting with him Alexander and Ariſtobulus, who were received by the Emperour (who was as their father) with all demonſtration of love. In the mean time this miſerable father ſpying his opportunity, demands day of Cæſar for an audience, which he affirmed was of great conſequence; it was granted him, and he came at the time appointed, bringing theſe two poor delinquents, who doubted nothing, nor at that time ſought any thing but to laugh and paſs their time with their ancient acquaintance. When they were in the midſt of a brave aſſembly of Princes there preſent, Herod breathing out a great ſigh, ſaid:

Behold me, GREAT CÆSAR, a happy King by your favour, and an unfortunate father through the diſgrace of my houſe. If nature had denied me children, fortune ſhould ſee me without miſeries: all my diſaſters proceed from my own progeny. It much troubleth me, to defile your ears (worthy Cæſar) with the recital of ſo great wickedneſs, but neceſſity, which hath no law, enforceth me, and your juſtice which eſtabliſheth all laws, inviteth me. Behold my two unnatural ſons, who after they had received the honour to be bred at your feet, after they had obtained from me all the favours which could be expected from a King, by your gracious clemency ſufficiently powerfull, and from a father of his own nature moſt indulgent, betraying the glory of the education they had at your hands, & forgetting even the nature and bloud they received from me, have attempted a crime, which I dare not name. I live too many years in their opinion, and too long enjoy a Kingdom, which with ſo much labour I purchaſed. I have opened to them the gate of honour, that they may enter, after that natural death ſhall cloſe up mine eyes: and they will paſs through by the portal of parricide, preparing ambuſhes for my life, to ſnatch away the ſpoil ſteeped in my bloud. Behold I proſtrate them at your feet, not willing to retain any right in mine own diſpleaſure, neither of King, nor father, but that which ſhall be decreed for me by your juſtice. Yet notwithſtanding (O Great Cæſar) I would beſeech you to beſtow upon my old age, which you have pleaſed ſo much to honour, ſome repoſe in my own houſe, and free me from the hands of theſe barricides. So likewiſe I think it not expedient for children ſo ungratefull, who have trampled laws both divine and humane under foot, to live any longer, and ſtill to have the Sun in their eyes, to ſerve as a witneſs and an upbraiding of their crime.

Herod ſpake this with a marvellous vehemency, ſo that he put the whole aſſembly into an aſtoniſhment, and theſe poor young men, who had as much innocency as ſimplicity, ſeeing themſelves charged on the ſudden with ſuch a tempeſt of words, made the apple of their eyes to anſwer, and weep in good earneſt. They endeavoured to ſpeak, fearing leaſt their ſilence might make them culpable; but the more they ſtrove, ſo much the more the ſobs choaked up their words. Auguſtus Cæſar, who was a judicious and courteous Prince, ſaw well by this their aſpect, theſe young men had more miſhap than malice, and caſting a gracious eye upon them, Courage, my children, be confident (ſaith he) anſwer at your leiſure, and be not troubled. All thoſe there preſent bare already much compaſſion towards them, and Herod ſhewed even by his countenance he was moved, ſo eloquent are the tears of nature. Alexander ſeeing the eyes of the whole aſſembly very favourable, took heart, repreſſeth his ſighs, & being (as he was) eloquent ſpeaketh in theſe terms:

Apologie of Herod's ſon before Auguſtus.

„ MY LORD AND FATHER, Your Ma-
„ jeſty hath not brought us ſo far to the Altars of „ mercy, to offer us up as a ſacrifice to revenge: we

„ but proceedings moſt ſweet. If calumny had ſo alte„ red your excellent nature, as to make you take reſo-
„ lution upon our lives, to the prejudice of our inno-
„ cency, you might have done it in Paleſtine, as a fa„ ther and a King; the ſentence and execution were in „ your own hands. But God permitted you to bring „ us to the Court of Auguſtus, not to leave the head

„ it back victorious, and free from ſlander. It is a ve„ ry ſtrange thing to pretend the moſt enormous of „ crimes againſt perſons of our reputation and quali-„ tie, without ſaying wherefore, or how. Nothing is „ ſpoken of letters, poyſons, complots, conſpiracies,
„ ſuborned ſervants, it is onely affirmed we are parri-
„ cides, and proofs are pretermitted. If this be ſuffi-
„ cient, you ſhall have in the world no more innocen-
„ cy, but that which calumny ſhall diſdain to fix her
„ tooth in. Our enemies, who for many years have ſpun
„ this web, never could alledge any other thing, but
„ that we were old enough, and of ſufficient courage
„ to do it, and that we might perform it in revenge of
„ the death of our mother Mariamne. As for the firſt „ reaſon, who ſeeth not how weak it is? If nothing but „ age and valour be neceſſary to perpetrate a parri„ cide, it is to fill the whole world with bloud, to put „ all fathers into jealouſie, and all ſons into crime. For „ the ſecond, which concerneth our dead mother, ſhe
„ left us in an age, wherein neither could we as yet

„ our child-hood, we have not been willing to ſearch
„ into your counſels, to ſift out your reſolutions, the „ iſſue of them ought to make us, not more audacious
„ to undertake evil, but more ſtayed and adviſed to do „ good. We onely have afforded tears to her, not to „ bemoan her death, for ſuch were unprofitable, but to „ ſatisfie our paſſion, ſeeing our enemies ceaſed not to „ diſturb the aſhes of her, whoſe bloud they had ſhed.
„ Father, if our tears, which proceed from ſo juſt a re-

This

This Oration, accompanied with the tears of this young Prince, ſtruck all the ſtanders by with admiration, and as they were both beheld with lowly looks, expecting the Judges ſentence, every one was enkindled with deſire to juſtifie them. Ceſar caſteth his eye on Herod to ſee his countenance, who ſhewed himſelf much moved with compaſſion, and could have been content never to have thought of ſuch an accuſation: for verily this action in the apprehenſion of thoſe preſent, much hurt him, and cauſed his credulity to be condemned. Auguſtus, who would not confound them, pronounced, that undoubtedly his children had done ill to diſpleaſe him; but as for the pretended crime, he ſhould raze it out of his papers. Theſe young Princes were too well born and bred to proceed ſo far: there remained for them hereafter to live in good correſpondence, and renew this holy knot of nature, which could not be diſſolved by ſo good a father, nor children ſo futurely hopeful. This ſaid, Herod embraced his ſons one after another, much weeping, which drew tears even from thoſe who were not interreſſed in this affair. After all manner of complements were done, behold them upon return with their father and brother Antipater, who had cauſed all this goodly Tragedie to be played. Notwithſtanding, this wicked creature overwhelmed them with courteſies and congratulations, as if he would make bonfires of joy in his heart. Thus diſſimulation goeth along in Court, till ſuch time that God taketh away the mask.

Being returned to Jeruſalem, one year was ſcarcely ſpent, but that calumnie ſet new ſnares to entrap the innocency of theſe poor Princes. Pheroras reſolved to excite Alexander with jealouſie, telling him in great ſecret, Herod his father made too much of the beauteous Glaphyra his wife, daughter of King Archelaus, ſuppoſing it was a powerful means to turmoyl his ſpirit, and enkindle it with fury againſt the King his father, and this way to precipitate him into ruin. Theſe words upon the matter were moſt ſenſible to this generous heart, and then he began with a jealous eye to prie into Herods actions, who, it is true, familiarly converſed every day with this Princeſs, endowed with incomparable beauty, but in concluſion he obſerved no other thing in ſuch converſation, but loving entertainments of a father-in-law towards a ſons wife, worthy to bee cheriſhed for many excellent parts. Alexander notwithſtanding, after this advertiſement of Pheroras, turned this honey into poyſon, interpreting all in an ill ſenſe, and was ſo tranſported, that one day entering into his fathers chamber he diſcovered the jealouſie and ſuſpition he had conceived with ſighs and tears of rage. Herod found himſelf much troubled with this accident, and thinking it a thing unworthy his perſon to juſtifie himſelf to his ſon, with many words to excuſe that which was not, he onely ſaid: My ſon, who hath put this into thy head? The other replieth, he knew much of it himſelf, and Pheroras had confirmed it. Pheroras was inſtantly ſent for, and Herod, who oft-times uſed him as a ſervant, caſting a furious glance of his eyes upon him, Rake-hell (ſaith he) what haſt thou ſaid to this young Prince? It is not a word thou haſt put into his ear, but a ſword into his hand againſt his father; for verily he would no more endure a companion of his bed, than I in my Kingdom. Ingratefull creature ſhouldſt thou not rather tear out thy own heart, than entertain ſuch a thought of thy brother? Such crimes as this never were in our houſe, nor ever will be, unleſs thou bring them hither. Get hence, and let me ſee thee no more, I ordain tortures for other delinquents, but for thee, ſince thou art ſo wicked, I leave thee to thy own conſcience, not being able to find a fitter executioner.

Horrible malice.

Pheroras, who was not much aſtoniſhed with this noiſe, anſwereth, he knew nothing but what Salome, who was there preſent, had told him, as indeed this came from her. But the ſubtile woman caſting out at that inſtant a loud complaint, and tearing her hair, ſaith: It was a lamentable thing, that ſhe of all the world ſhould be perſecuted for being onely faithful to her brother. Herod knew not what to think, and ſighed in his heart, beholding the diſſentions of his houſe, and in the mean time ſaw not that his own ill example was the influence of all theſe maledictions. He did nothing elſe to Pheroras, but ſequeſter him for a time, for although he ſeemed much moved with anger, he was not exaſperated againſt any in good earneſt, but thoſe whom he thought would practice againſt his ſtate; and ſuch Pheroras appeared not to be, for he was a libertine, who had married his own ſervant, attracted by dalliances, refuſing the daughter of a King, and all his deſigns aimed at nothing but ſenſualitie. It was thought this was not ſufficient ſatisfaction in Pheroras for ſuch a crime, and that this might ſtill feed a diſtruſt between the father and ſon. Behold the cauſe why the pernicious Antipater, who ever was gracious with Herod, making uſe of this opportunitie, beginneth his battel more furiouſly than ever, and having perceived ſome familiarity between Alexander and three Eunuches, the moſt intimate of Herod's chamber, he under-hand giveth notice, that the conſpiracy of Alexander againſt his father, was now abſolutely contrived, and that the chief Eunuches of the chamber and privacy of Herod, had a hand therein. Behold them preſently apprehended and put to the torture: Theſe bodies, corrupted with eaſe and delicacy, feeling themſelves ſo roughly racked, ſpake what they knew and what they knew not, and in the end delivered nothing but boaſts and vain-glorious bravadoes of youth, which had eſcaped the mouth of Alexander, that is to ſay, That thoſe Eunuches were very fools to be ſo affected to this old man, who cauſed his hair to be painted, like a ſpruce yonker. He had done all well enough: His time was paſt, theirs was coming, the Kingdom could not forſake them, having juſtice, force, and credit in their hands, and ſo many valorous men, who would not in time of neceſsity forſake them, and ſuch like things, ſpeaking nothing of that which Antipater pretended, yet too much for a jealous ſpirit.

Antipater ſon of Herod calumniateth his brothers.

It was a pitifull thing then to behold, how this miſerable Court was diſ-membred. It was nothing but calumniations, threatnings, ſummons, diſtruſts, examinations, tortures. All men looked upon one another, and every one ſuppoſed, there was no other ſecuritie, but in preventing his companion. A thouſand ſottiſh things were daily depoſed, that were of no effect. There were found not paſt one or two, who extreamly racked upon the torture, to free themſelves, ſaid, Alexander had diſhonoured his father at Rome, as much more enclining to amitie with the Parthians than with the Romanes; and as torments were inceſſantly redoubled in favour of Antipater, they ſpake at random whatſoever they would have them, to wit, That Alexander and Ariſtobulus had conſpired to kill Herod by poyſon, then to go to Rome to demand the Kingdom, which had no probabilitie. And when it was asked where this poyſon was, they replied it was in the Caſtle of Aſcalon, and the whole matter ſearched into, there was nothing to be found. Alexander notwithſtanding is arreſted, he generous, and much offended to ſee ſo many tortures, ſaid ſtoutly to Herod, bitterly ſcoffing: To what end is it to make all theſe ſlaughters, ſeeing you will have it that you are deceived? I have conſpired, and if you deſire to know with whom, with Pheroras your brother, ther, and Salome your ſiſter, and Ptolemy, and Saprinius your Counſellers. Kill all the world, and you alone ſhall reign.

He is delivered by Archelaus.

He ſpake too much to be believed, and delivered it in an accent which ſounded nothing leſs. Howſoever, he was for certain days impriſoned, until ſuch time as Archelaus King of Cappadocia, his father in law, advertiſed of this diſaſter, came to the Court of Herod. He took great care not to affront him, nor tell him that he wronged himſelf to be ſo credulous: this was not the manner to treat with a man, who extreamly deſired to juſtifie his actions. The Cappadocian ſtriketh ſail, ſeeming to have great compaſſion to find him in ſuch trouble, ſaying, His children had done ill to diſquiet him in that manner: that he came not to excuſe his ſon in law, but to chaſtiſe his daughter, if ſhe were found blame-worthy. Herod was ſo comforted to hear him ſpeak in this ſort, that the tears ſtood in his eyes, and Archelaus ſeeing he had found the ready way of perſwaſion, began by little and little to declare unto him, that in truth the Princes his ſons had ſhewed a little too much inſolence, but that their facility was much abuſed, and it would be good to take heed thereof. He did ſo well, that at the laſt he diſſolved the calumny, and Glaphyra being there preſent, with her eloquence and tears obtained whatſoever ſhe would for her husband; ſo that the poor priſoner was inſtantly releaſed.

Herod in the mean time lived like a Cyclop in his Cave, perpetually in the obſcurity of an infinite number of diſtruſts, ſtill upon the point of acting new cruelties; and being obſerved to be capable of all ſort of ſuſpitions, the wicked Antipater failed not to furniſh him with matter enough to foment his jealouſies, and by the ſame means advance his fortunes.

Laſt endeavour of calumny.

A wicked Grecian came to the Court of Judea, named Eurycles, who took upon him to be a Prince, and gave preſents to Herod, to inſinuate himſelf into his friendſhip. The unhappy King reliſhed this man, and ranked him in the number of his intimate friends. He was lodged with Antipater, and obſerving that he at that time bare the greateſt ſway in affairs, he endeavoured by all means to win his favour, which he did, familiarly converſing with Alexander, and undermyning him, that afterward he might carry truth and falſhood to the ears of Herod, who gave him much credit.

Three years were not fully paſt, but behold calumny caſteth the reſt of her venome. Two ſouldiers of Herod's Guard, caſhiered for ſome ſleight offence, were afterward indiſcreetly entertained in the houſe of Alexander, who loved them, ſeeing them ſufficient men, and capable of good employments. Behold them accuſed of conſpiracy, immediately apprehended, and put to torture. The vehemency of torment made them ſay, that at the ſolicitation of Alexander and Ariſtobulus they had a plot upon the perſon of Herod, to kill him in hunting. At the ſame time the governour of the Cittadel of Alexandrina, (which was one of the ſtrongeſt Fortreſſes of the Kingdom) is accuſed to have been willing to deliver it into the hands of theſe young Princes, which he denied ſtrongly and ſtoutly. But his ſon, provoked againſt the father for ſome diſgrace, ſaid the depoſition was true, and at the ſame time produced falſe letters of Alexander, which ſeemed to confirm the ſame, held notwithſtanding to come from the hand of Secretary Diaphantus, a ſtorehouſe of falſifications.

Alexander & Ariſtobulus ſons of Mariamne impriſoned.

Herod would have no more proofs, he cauſed his two ſons to be apprehended, reſolving to ruine them: and verily every man at that time accounted them loſt. When theſe things were in hand, Melas a Counſellour of the King of Cappadocia, came into Judea, to underſtand the knot of the buſineſs: he found it much envenomed, and deſperate of remedy. The wicked father cauſed his ſons to be fetcht out of priſon, to examine them before Melas, and to confront them with the depoſitions. Alexander asketh where the accuſers were: it was anſwered, they were already dead. He replieth: It was an unjuſt proceeding to put them to death in the guilt of a lie, drawn out by force of torments, for ever to ſhut up their mouth from verity. As for himſelf, and his brother Ariſtobulus, they never had any other purpoſe but to flie to Cappadocia, and from thence to paſs to Rome, to free themſelves from the unquietneſs of their father. When Herod heard ſpeech of the voyage of Cappadocia, he entreated Melas to enquire particularly of Glaphyra, if ſhe more clearly would utter any thing touching this deſign. Glaphyra then was ſent for, and when at her approch ſhe beheld her husband in fetters, it was a dreadful thing to ſee her afflictions. Alas! my dear huſband (ſaid ſhe) are theſe the favours of your father? is this the diadem he hath promiſed you? And thereupon her heart oppreſſed with grief, ſtopped up the reſt of her words. Tears ſtood in the eyes of the miſerable Alexander, who paſſionately loved her, and all the company was ſo troubled with this ſpectacle of pitie, that thoſe there preſent to examine, looked one upon another, and forgat the formalities of juſtice. Herod asketh Alexander, if his wife were not partaker of all his ſecrets. He anſwereth, Such was her deſert and diſcretion, that he concealed nothing from her. The poor Ladie was a little amazed at this word. Notwithſtanding, with great ſimplicity ſhe ſaid, ſhe was ignorant of all that had paſſed; as the child not yet born, yet was very ready to tell a lie to ſave her husband, and that ſhe never would diſavow it, although he ſhould charge her with ſome crime. Alexander touched to the quick with this tenderneſs, ſaid to her: Madame, be not aſtoniſhed; you very well know I never had any other plot but to carry you into Cappadocia, to viſit the King your father: Behold all our offence.

This cured not Herod, but made him extend his ſuſpition upon King Archelaus, taking it ill, he ſhould go about to withdraw his ſon without his privacy. He commanded the priſoners to be ſet at liberty, and in the mean time ſendeth new Embaſſadours to Rome, to purge himſelf from ſome ſlanders wherewith he was charged, and to obtain of Cæſar full liberty to diſpoſe of his children according as juſtice ſhould require; which was aſſented unto. The young Princes are diſgraced and foyled with ſtrange calumniations at Rome, ſo that no man durſt undertake their defence. He very glad to have ſuch diſpatches, being (as he was) a man preciſely formal, and ever giving colour of juſtice to his paſſion, aſſembleth the Counſel to frame an Inditement againſt his ſons, admitting all thoſe whom he ſaw miſchievouſly bent to countenance his bad purpoſe, and ſequeſtring others who might cauſe ſome obſtacle; amongſt the reſt Archelaus, expreſly nominated by Cæſar to examine this buſineſs. Moreover, that which was an act of great injuſtice, he never would ſuffer his children to appear before the Judges, to be heard in their juſtification: but himſelf alone entereth into this Aſſembly, full of gall and poyſon. Never was he ſeen to be ſo out of countenance, paſſion having wholly transfigured him, in ſuch ſort that he ſpake and acted things little conſonant to his gravity. His friends were to ſeek in him, and he ſeemed rather a ſavage beaſt than a King. Sometime he accuſed, and lamented within himſelf, ſometime he ſtammered, and cut himſelf ſhort. He produced letters of his ſons, that had no value in them, as was thoſe of their journey into Cappadocia, and yet as if he had got a great victory, he cryed out: Sirs, what ſay you to this? Behold you not great malice? O that I had been dead before I had known any ſuch thing! Sometime he ſaid he referred himſelf to juſtice, and that through paſſion he would do nothing paſſionately. Sometime he publiſhed, he had not ſummoned this Aſſembly to judge, but to approve his opinion, to the end poſterity might the more abhor parricide. Then he cited Deuteronomie, which permitted fathers to ſtone their rebellious children to death, and played the Scribe or the Divine: then he ſhewed Cæſar's letters, of which he made more account than of his Deuteronomie, and inſiſted thereupon as if the offenders had already been peremptorily condemned by the ſentence of Auguſtus. When they came to voices, Saturninus the Roman, a Conſular man of great authority, abſolutely diſſwadeth this cruelty, ſaying, Himſelf was a father, that he knew the price of children, and that Herod would repent him of this precipitation. This good man had three of his ſons with him, all gallant perſonages, and well entertained in good employments, who ſpake in favour of theſe poor Princes. But to no purpoſe. After them ſtandeth up Volumnius, a rude man, who drew to his faction all thoſe which practiſed to ſerve Herod's paſſion, who altogether moſt unjuſtly concluded upon their deaths. As ſoon as this decree was publiſhed, an old ſouldier of Herods, named Tyron, very paſſionate for the innocents, went directly to the Palace, demandeth to ſpeak to the King alone by himſelf, which was granted him. This honeſt man taking him aſide, gave him a ſharp admonition, even to the reproching him that he had loſt his wits, in commanding his true heirs to be put to death, to advance a Viper, who in the end would ſecretly ſting him. Herod hearkened to him in the beginning with great patience, but ſpeaking over-much, he asked him, Who are thoſe that take exception at this judgement? My ſelf (ſaith the good old man) firſt, and ſuch and ſuch men of quality, whom he named. Herod cauſed him to be caſt into priſon, laid hold of the reſt, and condemneth them all to death. Afterwards cauſeth his ſons to be carried to Sebaſte, and directeth the moſt cruel of his Guard to ſtrangle them in priſon.

Theſe unfortunate Princes, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch a ſentence, ſeeing the dreadfull faces of executioners, and the fearfull image of death before their eyes, looked pale with horrour, and asked them, Who brought you hither? But they pulling them aſide as ſacrifices, and diſcovering the inſtruments of their cruelty, ſoon ſhewed wherefore they came: for without making any other anſwer, they took them by the throat, and putting the fatal cord about their necks, by main force ſtrangled them, devoid of mercy.

The poor Glaphyra, who as yet loſt not the hope of her husbands libertie, having at that time prepared a new battery to diſpoſe her father in law to clemency, heard the tidings of the death of Alexander, and withal of her own widdow-hood. She a good ſpace remained in a trance, then mute as a ſtatue, laſt of all a little recollecting her ſpirits, and caſting out a ſigh from the bottom of her heart, Wo is me! (ſaith ſhe) I thought not Herod would have proceeded thus far. Tell him the ſacrifice of his cruelty is not finiſhed, for behold one part of the Victim is yet alive. Alexander, my dear Alexander, who for ever in my heart ſhall ſurvive, needs muſt you end your innocent life by this infamous puniſhment? Muſt you have him for executioner, whom nature allotted you for a father? At the leaſt I might have been called to receive the laſt groans of thy penſive ſoul, to emboſom thy final words, and enchaſe them in my heart. Then turning herſelf to two little children, which ſhe had by her ſides: Poor orphans, what a father have they ſnatched from you? Alas! you are timely taught the trade of miſery. The poor Ladie night and day diſconſolately afflicted herſelf, and being no longer able to endure the Court of Judea, no more than a Lyons den, ſhe was ſent back into Cappadocia, to the King her father. Herod kept with him the two ſons, under colour of their education, but in effect to eſtabliſh himſelf, fearing leaſt their name ſhould ſerve for a pretext of ſome revolt.

O the providence of God! It ſeemeth you much ſlacken to fall upon guilty heads. Theſe young Princes, ſons of ſo virtuous a mother, ſo well bred, ſo well educated, accompliſhed with ſo many excellent parts, declared lawfull ſucceſſours to the Crown; theſe Princes, who had been ſeen (not above five years before) to return in triumph from Rome to Jeruſalem, like the two twin-ſtars, who guilded all Paleſtine with their rays; theſe Princes, that promiſed ſo many Tropheys, ſo many wonders, behold them in the ſweetneſs of their years, in the flower of their hopes, at the gate of the Temple of honour, for a ſmall liberty of ſpeech unworthily maſſacred, in ſtead of a Diadem on their heads, a halter about their necks, and cauſed to be ſtrangled by two Sergeants, that ſo they might breath out their Royal ſouls under the hand of a hangman. Behold the brave apprentiſhip which Herod exerciſed three year together about the time of the birth of our Saviour, to prepare himſelf for actions much more enormous. It was ſaid of Silla, that if Mercy had come upon the earth in humane ſhape, he had ſlain her. But Herod did much worſe. There remained nothing for him, after ſo many ſlaughters, but to embrew himſelf in the bloud of fourteen thouſand Innocents, and attempt upon the Son of God himſelf, which preſently after happened, and of which every one by relation of the Scripture taketh notice.

It is time to behold the recompence thoſe wicked ſouls received, for having dipped their fingers in ſo much bloud, and ſo many tragedies, to the end we therein may obſerve the proceedings of the Divine Providence, which ſpareth not, firſt ſleightly to touch and aſſay by ſome viſitation thoſe, which it afterwards reſerveth for the eternal pains of hell. The deteſtable Antipater, who had directed all the paſſages of this wickedneſs, ſeeing the two Heirs of the Kingdom removed quite away by his practiſes, thought he had already a foot in the Throne. He continueth his cunning and malice, ever masking himſelf with the veyl of piety, as if he had an unſpeakable care of the life and ſtate of his father, while he in the mean time had no other aim, but quickly to make himſelf abſolute Maſter of all, fearing leſt the diſpoſition of Herod, which was very fleeting, might alter; and for this cauſe he went up and down daily practizing very great intelligences. But he was hated by the people like a Tiger, and the ſouldiers, who ſaw him embrewed in the bloud of his brothers, ſo beloved by all the Nobility, could in no ſort reliſh him. Above all, the people were extreamly touched with compaſſion, when theſe little children of Alexander and Ariſtobulus were led through the ſtreets, who had been bred in Herods Court. All the world beheld theſe poor Orphans with a weeping eye, and with ſorrow remembred the diſaſters of their fathers. Antipater well ſaw, it was fit for him to withdraw himſelf, and decline envy, and not ſindge his wings in the candle, fearing his father in proceſs of time (who in ſuch matters was ſubtile enough) might diſcover his purpoſes. Notwithſtanding, he was ſo ſecret, that he avoided to ask leave of Herod to ſequeſter himſelf, for fear to miniſter matter of ſuſpition to him. But he cauſed letters cloſely to be written from Rome to his father, by friends whom he had wrought for that purpoſe, which imported all he deſired, to wit, that it was neceſſary he ſhould be ſent to Rome to break the enterprizes which the Arabians plotted againſt the ſtate of Judea. Herod having received theſe letters, inſtantly diſpatched his ſon Antipater with a goodly train, rich preſents, and above all the Will of Herod, which declared him King after the death of his father. Behold all he could deſire in the world. But as the eye of God never ſleepeth, and ſurprizeth the crafty in their own policies; it happeneth peneth the mischievous Pheroras, who had acted his part (as we have seen) in this lamentable tragedy, departed this life, by a sudden death, and poysoned (as it is thought) by the maid-servant whom he had married.

Conspiracy of Antipater discovered.

Herod being requested to come into the house of his brother, to take examinations upon the fact, unexpectedly learneth how his son Antipater had given poyson to the dead Pheroras, at such time as he was out of favour, to poyson the King his father, whilest he was at Rome, that he speedily might return into Palestine with a Crown on his head. This was deposed even by the son of the Comptroller of Antipaters house, and circumstanced with grounds and particulars so expres, that there was not any cause of doubt. Herod demanded where this poyson was. He answered, it was in the hands of the widow of his brother Pheroras. She being examined upon the fact, goeth up into a higher chamber, feigning to fetch it, and being mounted to the top of the house, she through despair, fell down headlong, with a purpose to kill herself. But God suffered not the fall to be mortal; they much heartned her, and promised all impunity, if she freely would deliver the truth. She telleth that true it was, her husband had received the poyson of Antipater, and had some inclination to give the blow: but that a little before his death, he repented himself, and detested such wickedness, and with these words, she drew out the poyson, which afterwards was known in the death of delinquents to be very mortal. At the same time Bathyllus, set at liberty by Antipater, was taken coming from Rome to Judea, to advise Pheroras to hasten the business, and bearing with him a new poyson, if the first were not of force.

In the mean time Antipater wrote to the King his father, that he laboured earnestly at Rome to dissolve obloquies, and accommodate his affairs with clearness; that he hoped to come to a period in them, and quickly return into Judea. Herod was desirous to lay hold upon him, sendeth him this letter:

My son, the frailtie of my age, and debilitie of my bodie, daily instructeth me that I am mortal. One thing comforteth me, that having made choice of your person to succeed me in my estate, I shall behold the decrepitness of my age flourish again in your youth, and as it were burie my death in your life, since I shall live in one part of my self, to me most precious. I wish you presently were with me, not so much for the assistance I expect from your pietie, as for the prejudice your absence may impose on my fortune. Fail not with the good leave of Cæsar, to return hither as soon as you can, delays nothing advance our affairs.

Subtilty against subtilty.

This bayt was too tempting to defend him from the hook: upon this news he would, as it were, flie to Jerusalem; he dispatcheth his affairs, takes leave of Augustus, and hastily posteth to obey his fathers commandments. It was an admirable thing, that in the way he never had any notice of that which passed, so hated he was both of God and men. Yet so it was, that being in Cilicia, he learned his mother was disgraced, which much astonished him, so that he resolved to retire back again, but one of his counsel (perhaps wrought by Herod) shewed unto him, that if nothing were plotted against him, he ought not to fear; and if any calumny were forged, he rather should hasten to strangle it, otherwise his absence would thrust him further into suspition. This counsel he believed, and notwithstanding the remorse of his conscience, he took the way to Judea.

Woful event of Antipater.

When he was arrived in the port of Sebaste, he began to enter into greater apprehensions of his own unhappiness than ever. For upon the same haven, where he before had beheld so great confluence of people, which made many loud acclamations at his departure, not for the love they bare him, but for obedience to Herod, who so would have it, he perceived the chance of the dye to be now changed; he was entertained with respectless countenances, and that some beholding him, scornfully muttered between their teeth, as cursing him for shedding the bloud of his brothers. He was too far engaged to retire back, and the vengeance of God already had scored him out his lodging. He goeth directly from Sebaste to Jerusalem, and hasteneth to the Palace magnificently attired and well attended. The Guard suffered him to enter, commanding all those who accompanied him, in the Kings name, to withdraw. He was much amazed to see himself taken like a bird in a snare, notwithstanding he went forward, and entereth into the Hall, where his father expected him, accompanied by Quintilius Varus, newly sent from Rome as Governour of Syria. After he had made an humble obeysance according to the custom, he came to kiss his father, but at that instant he heard the roaring of the Lion. For Herod retiring back, said unto him: Avant thou murderer of brothers and father: the kiss of a father was not instituted for thee. Behold Quintilius thy Judge. Advise with thy self what thou art to morrow to answer upon crimes whereof thou art accused.

He strucken with this word as with a thunderclap, withdrew, bearing terrour in his face, and the image of his crime in his thoughts. He in the next chamber found his mother and wife weeping, with many laments already preparing his funerals; amazement so seized him, he had not language to comfort them, nor so much as tears to bemoan his own mishap. He spent the whole night in great afflictions, finding by experience it was much more easie to commit a crime than excuse it. The next morning he is sent for by the Councel, where he found the King his father with Quintilius Varus, and many Counsellours of State: Yea, letters were then intercepted, very lately written by his mother, which signified all was discovered, and that he should carefully beware not to return and put himself into the hands of his father, if willingly he would avoid the throat of the Lion. This was represented unto him at the entrance to the Councel; he expected nothing but the instant of strangling, so much his conscience tormented him. Behold the cause, why casting himself on his knees, he besought his father not to condemn him before he was heard.

Antipater accused before his father.

Herod replieth: Impious villain, what hast thou to say? Hath God then preserved thee to be the last scourge of my old age? Thou knowest I have extracted thee from the dregs, to place thee over thy brothers, above and beyond all hope? I have given thee my money, my revenues, my authoritie, my favour, my secrets, my heart and Crown into thy hands, in a Will signed with my own hand, and thou canst not a little stay, till thy fathers eye is closed by natural death, to enjoy it? It was thither thy purpose aimed, when with such heat thou didst pursue the death of thy brothers, nothing have I done in their inditements, but by thy information and advise. Wicked creature, I fear lest thou hast stained me with their bloud; thy crime now makes their innocencie appear.

At these words he bitterly wept, the memory of Mariamne and his unfortunate children coming into his mind. He was so oppressed at his heart, that he was enforced to intreat Nicholas Damascen, who was as his Chancellour, to pursue the rest. Antipater preventeth him, and speaketh in his own defence, That he was much wronged in giving credit to slaves and silly women to his prejudice, that he had received letters from Cæsar, whom a man could deceive no more than God himself, which gave a most ample testimonie of all his demeanours, and of the satisfaction he had given to Rome. That he never had failed in duty towards his father, and that it were a passage of extream folly to put himself into an uncertain hazard for a Crown, which he had as it were already in his hands. Briefly, without any further discourse, he offered himself to be used like a slave, and to be put to the torture for proof of his innocency. And therewithal he dreadfully tormented himself in such sort, that he began to move all the company.

Nicholas Damascen, who was a rough gamster, taketh the word out of his mouth, he confronteth the witnesses, he interrogateth, urgeth, involveth, and puts him into confusion, and thundereth a very bloudy invective against him, which at large is couched in Josephus history, where like an Oratour he exaggerateth all the circumstances of his crime. Behold you not (saith he) a brutish stupiditie, to conspire against your father, having as yet the blood of your brothers before your eyes, and all the assurances of the sceptre in your hands? Needs must you perpetrate a parricide, to make your self possessour of a Crown, which was acquired for you by so solemn and authentical a Testament? Look you after nothing but the blood of your father, to set a seal upon it? yea, of a father, whose life is so dear to all honest men, and of nature so indulgent to love his children that have never so little merit. An ingratitude able to make Heaven blush, and earth tremble under your feet. An ingratitude worthy that all the elements should conspire to punish it.

This man ceased not to discharge against him words of fire with a masculine eloquence, and the miserable Antipater prostrated himself on the ground, and prayed God to do a miracle in favour of him, to make manifest his innocency, since he found himself so oppressed by the malice of men. It is wonder (saith the Historian) that those, who during their life have believed no God, would yet acknowledge him at their death. This man lived as if there were neither Heaven, God, nor Angels, and now seeing himself in the horrours of death, prayed the Divinity to excuse his crime. Varus saith unto him, My friend, expect not extraordinarie signs from Heaven in your favour, but if you have any good reasons, boldly produce them. The King your father desireth nothing more than your justification. Thereupon he stood confounded, like a lost man, Varus taking the poison that had been before represented to the Councel, caused it to be given to an offender already condemned, who instantly died, and all the assembly arose (as it is said) with manifest condemnation of Antipater. His father esteeming him absolutely convicted, required of him his complices: he onely named Antiphilus, who brought the poison, saying this wicked man was cause of all his unhappiness.

It was a great chance Herod at that time had not caused the sentence of death to be executed upon him: but according to his ordinary proceeding, he resolveth to inform Cæsar of all that had passed, and to send him the whole process formally drawn, to order all at his pleasure. In the mean time Antipater is streightly imprisoned, expecting hourly, as a miserable victim, the stroke of death.

Horrible state of Herod in his latter days.

Herod at that time was about seventy years of age; and already felt, through imbecillity of body, the approach of the last hour. It was a very hard morsel for him to digest. Never man better loved this present life. Very freely would he have forsaken his part of the next world eternally, to enjoy this, though he in effect was therein most unhappy. Towards the end of his days he grew so harsh, so wayward, then so collerick and furious, that his household servants knew not how to come about him: they handled him in his Palace as an old Lion, chained with the fetters of an incurable malady. He perswaded himself he was hated of all the world, and was therein no whit deceived, as having given too great occasion thereof. The people almost forgot their duty with impatience, and could no longer endure him.

The golden Eagle thrown down.

As soon as his sickness was bruited abroad, Judas and Matthias, the principal Doctours of the Jewish Law, who had the youth at command, perswaded the most valiant of their sect to undergo a bold adventure, which was, that Herod having re-edified and adorned the Temple of Jerusalem, and (as he had always shewed himself for the accommodation of his own estate, to be an Idolater of Cæsars fortune) to set upon the principal gate the Romane Eagle, all glittering in gold. This much offended the sight of the Jews, who could not endure any should place portraictures of men or beasts, or any other figures in their Temples, so much they abhorred such monsters, which their fathers had seen adored in Ægypt. Behold why this Judas and Matthias, who were the chief, thinking the sickness of Herod would help them, began earnestly to exhort the most valiant of the young men, who every day frequented their houses, to take in hand the quarrel of God, according to the spirit of their Ancestours, and to beat down this abomination, which they had fixed upon their Temple. That the peril was not now so great, Herod having enough to do to wrastle with his own pain: but if it should happen they lost their lives, to die in so glorious an act, was to be buried in the midst of palms and triumphs.

There needed no more to encourage the youth. Behold a troup of the most adventurous came forth about the midst of the day, armed with axes and hatchets, who climbed to the top of the Temple, and hewed in pieces the Eagles in the sight of the whole world, Judas and Matthias being there present, and serving for trumpets in this exploit. The noise hereof instantly came to the Palace, and the Captain of the Guard ran thither with the most resolute souldiers. He much feared some further plot, and that this defacing of the Eagle, might prove a preamble to some greater sedition. But at the first, as he began to charge, the people retired, which the more encouraged him for pursuit. Fourty young men of those who had done the feat, were taken in the place, Judas and Matthias, who accompanied them, deeming it a thing unworthy to flie away, and that at the least they ought to follow them in peril, whom they had brought into danger. Being presented to Herod, and demanded from whence this boldness proceeded, they freely answered, Their plot had been fully agreed upon among themselves, and if it were to do again, they would be in readiness to put it in execution, in regard they were more bound to Moses than Herod. Herod amazed at this resolution, and fearing greater commotions, caused them to be secretly conveyed to Jerico, whither himself after, though crazy, was carried, and assembling the principal, spake to them out of his litter, making a long narration of the good offices he had done in favour of the whole Nation, of the Temple he had built for them, of the ornaments with which he had enriched it, adding, he had done in few years what their Asmonean Kings could not perform in six-score: And for recompence of his piety, at noon day they had hewed down, with notable boldness, a holy gift, which he had raised in the Temple, wherein God was more interessed than himself; for which he required a reason.

These now, fearing any further to incense him, declined the danger, and put him upon their companions, leaving them to the pleasure of the King. At that time the High-priesthood is taken from Matthias, and another Matthias, who was held to have been the authour of the sedition, burned alive that night with his companions, at which time an eclipse of the moon was seen, that made this spectacle much more dreadfull.

Herod in few days, after he had tried in vain, and worn out all humane remedies, was reduced to that that horrible ſtate of maladie, which is rightly deſcribed by Joſephus and Euſebius of Cæſarea. God would have him in this life taſt in long draughts the cup of his juſtice, waſting that caytife carkaſs with lingering torments. Behold the cauſe why he was touched with a manifeſt wound from Heaven, and aſſaulted with a furious ſquadron of remedileſs dolours. He, who from his young days had been enflamed with a deſperate ambition, felt at his death a fire, which devoured his marrow and entrails with a ſecret and ſubtile flame. He, who all his life time had an enraged hunger to heap up treaſures, even to the opening of David's and Solomon's ſepulchers, to extract booty from thence, was afflicted with doglike hunger, both horrible and shamefull, which cauſed him day and night to crie out for meat, yet never was ſatiated. He who had made ſo many voyages, and gone ſo many paces to make himſelf great, ſaw then his feet ſwoln with bad and phlegmatick humours. He, who in his life had cauſed ſo many tortures to be inflicted, felt outragious and intollerable collicks which racked him. He, who had taken life away from ſo many men, was ſeized with an Aſthma, which hindered his breathing. He, who eſteemed prudence and humane policy for the ſinews of his eſtate, felt in his body cramps and convulſions of ſinews, which gave him many ſhakes. He, who ſhed the bloud of the poor Mariamne, who ſlew her ſons to make the kids (as ſaith the Scripture) boyl in the milk of their damme; briefly, he who wallowed in the bloud of about fourteen thouſand innocents, of purpoſe to involve therein the Saviour of the world, died in his own bloud, afflicted with a cruel fluxe. He, who abuſed his body with prodidigious luxuries, had dying, his ſecret parts filled with lice and vermine, with an ignominious Priapiſm, a maladie not to be named.

Shall we then ſay the Divine Providence of God hath no eyes to be wakefull for the puniſhment of the wicked? This deſperate wretch, in ſtead of adoring the juſtice of God at his death, and kiſſing the rod which had chaſtiſed him, dreameth of new ſlaughters, publiſheth an Edict, by which he ſendeth for the principal of the Jews of every Province to Jerico, whither he cauſed himſelf to be carried, and ſhutting them up in a Theater, calleth his ſiſter Salome, and her husband Alexas, and then ſpeaketh to them in theſe words:

Notorious cruelty.

It troubleth me not to die, and tender the tribute which ſo many Kings have paid before me; but I am afflicted that my death ſhall not be lamented as I deſire, if you aſſiſt not. Know then, for this purpoſe I have ſent for all the Nobilitie of Judea, whom you have in your hands. As ſoon as my eyes are cloſed, put them all to the ſword, and let not my death be divulged till firſt the fortune of theſe ſame people be known to their friends, by this means I hope to fill Judea with tears and ſighs, which ſhall make my ſoul leave my bodie with the more contentment.

The wretch in ſaying this, with many ſcalding tears beſought his ſiſter by all that which ſhe eſteemed in the world moſt glorious, moſt ſacred, as if he had asked Paradiſe of her, and that neceſſarily ſhe muſt promiſe it to content him at that inſtant with oath, though afterward it were never executed. In this act alone he well declared he had the ſpirit of a ravening wolf in the skin of a man, and that the thirſt of humane bloud was become natural to him.

As he was framing this notable Teſtament, letters were brought him from Rome, written by Cæſar's command, which certified him that Acme, a Jewiſh Ladie, of Livia's train, the wife of Auguſtus, had been condemned for ſiniſter intelligence with Antipater, and for that cauſe puniſhed with death: as concerning his ſon, he wholly left him to his diſpoſition. This man in the very point of death, ſtill ſucked vengeance with marvellous ſweetneſs. Vpon this news he taketh courage again, and calls for an apple and a knife, buſying himſelf in the paring of it. But in theſe employments, as his pains redoubled, he waxed weary of life, which he ſo much had loved, and at that inſtant one of his Grand-children, named Archiabus, who ſtood near to the bed, perceiving he roled his eyes full of rage, and made a ſhew as if he would have ſtabbed himſelf with the knife he had in his hand (which much affrighted the young Prince) held back his arm, as well as he could, and began to make a terrible out-crie, as if his Grand-father had yielded up the Ghoſt; whereupon the whole Palace was in an uproar. Antipater, who from the priſon heard all this tumult, ſuppoſing Herod was at the laſt caſt, his feet itched in his fetters, and did not as yet deſpair of the Crown, offering, as one would ſay, mountains of gold to his Keeper, to ſet him at liberty. But, O the judgement of his God! his Goaler, inſtead of giving ear to all his rewards, went directly to his Father, and relateth to him how Antipater uſed all poſſible means to get out of priſon, and take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom. Herod howling and knocking his head, How (ſaith he) will the parricide murther me in my bed? I have yet life enough left to take away his. Then lifting himſelf up, and leaning on his pillow, he calleth one of his Guard, Go you immediately (ſaith he) to the priſon, and kill this parricide, and let him be buried in Hircanus caſtle, without funeral pomp. This was incontinently executed, and ſuch was the end of this wicked wretch, who had diſturbed earth and hell, to place himſelf in his fathers Throne, according as certain Mathematicians had foretold him.

Death of Antipat.r.

Few days after his death, Herod, having declared Archelaus for Succeſſour of the Kingdom, contrary to his firſt will which was diſpoſed in the behalf of Antipater, after he had accommodated his two other ſons with ſuch ſhares as ſeemed good to him, and given large legacies to Auguſtus Cæſar, yielded up his wicked ſoul in rage and deſpair, in the LXX. year of his age, and XXXVII. of his reign.

End of a Politician moſt diſaſtrous.

A Prince (ſaith Joſephus) who all his life deſired to be Maſter of his laws, and a ſlave of his paſſions, and who, notwithſtanding all his great felicities, ought to be reputed the moſt miſerable on the earth. Behold in what tearms this Authour, a great ſtatiſt, ſpeaketh it, to teach humane policie, there is no prudence, wiſdom, counſel, greatneſs, nor happines, where God is not preſent. For laying aſide eternal torments of the other life, wherewith this barbarous man dying in puniſhments, was encompaſſed, I aſſure my ſelf there is neither peaſant, nor handi-crafis man, if he be not mad, would give one day of his life for the thirty ſeven years of Herods reign, which he paſſed in continual apprehenſions, thornie affairs, perilous voyages, ſiniſter diſtruſts, frosty fears of death, barbarous cruelties, remorſes of conſcience, the forerunners of hell, leaving beſides a ſhort and unfortunate poſterity. Behold his Picture and Elogie.

A man no whit with civil grace indu'd,
Of viſage hydeous, of manners rude,
A monſter made of maſſacres and bloud,
That boldly God, Heav'n, Natures laws withſtood;
Ill words within no certain limits fall,
But who once mentions Herod, ſpeaketh all.

BY the carriage of this Court one may ſee whither vice tranſporteth great fortunes. In the perſon of Ariſtobulus and Hircanus, you behold that the canker is to a body leſs dangerous, than the diſcord of brothers to a ſtate.

In the perſon of Antipater, a friend for advantage, who ſeeketh to fiſh in a troubled water, in the end fiſheth his fill, but is drowned in the act; to teach you, there is no policie ſo great, as to be an honeſt man, and that he who prepareth ſnares for another, digeth his own grave.

In the perſon of Pompey, an Arbitratour, who worketh his own ends under the colour of juſtice, who buildeth his ambition on the ruins of ſtate, in the end, the earth, which faileth him for his conqueſts, denieth him a ſepulchre. He found no more Countries to conquer, and ſcarcely had he ſix foot of earth to make him a tomb.

In that of Hircanus, too much credulity, too much facility to pleaſe others humours, too much puſillanimity in the government of Juſtice, which head-long threw him into a life as miſerable, as his death was cruel and bloudy.

In that of Anthonie, a paſſionate Judge, who turneth with all winds, and ſuffereth himſelf to be carried along by the ſtronger, without conſideration of Juſtice.

In that of Joſeph and Sohemus, that it is perilous to treat with women, though free from ill purpose, and much more dangerous to reveal a secret, which who will safely keep, must make his heart a sepulchre for it.

In that of young Aristobulus, how the most beautifull hopes are storm-beaten in the bud, and that you must walk upon the prosperitie of the world as on ice; that it must be handled like glass, fearing always they break not in the lustre of their brightness.

In that of Alexandra, a boundless ambition, designs without effect, afflictions devoid of consolations, torments without patience, and a death without deserts, and all this because she gave not a good temper of virtue to her soul.

In that of the sons of Mariamne, innocency persecuted, and a little vanity of tongue deplorately revenged.

In that of yong Antipater, policy deceived, the cloud of humane hopes cracked, punishment and revenge ever attending an offender.

In the person of Herod, an enraged ambition, which giveth motion to all his crimes, a double soul, crafty, cautelous, politick, mischievous, bloudy, barbarous, savage, and withal in the best of his tricks benummed, doltish, & dull, thinking to make a fortune to the prejudice of religion and conscience. A goodly fortune, to make himself great, and live in the hatred of all the world, in the terrours of a Cyclopean conscience, a thousand times a day to call upon death, not being able to die, and in the end to die in a body leaprous, stinking, lousy, and death to tear his soul from him with scabs, stench, and lice, to make it survive its torments in an eternity of flames. See you not here fair fruits of humane wisdom, impiety, and atheisme?

In that of Mariamne, a soul raised above the highest sphere of true greatness, a soul truly royal, holy, religious, courteous, mercifull, wise, affable, and endowed with an incomparable patience, who as an Eagle strong of wing and courage, soaring above the storms of the world, maketh her self Mistress of tempests and thunders, which for that they had served as an exercise of her constancy, and perpetual battels for her life, shall through all Ages attend the immortality of her glory.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

Fortunate Pietie.

WE have hitherto beheld a Court, which rather resembleth Polyphemus cave than a Kings Palace, to teach Great-ones, there is no bruitishness so savage, wherinto ingratitude towards God, and vice, doth not precipitate a forsaken soul. Let us now see, that as unbridled passions are of power to make a hell of a Princes Court, so the practice of piety and other virtues, make it a true Paradise. Behold the Court of Theodosius the Younger, a Prince, who seemed to be born for nothing else but to allye the scepter to virtues, and manifest what royal greatness can do, guided by the rules of pietie.

Ring of God. It is no small miracle to behold a holy King. If God affected the curiositie of wearing a ring, as well in effect as the Scripture attributeth it to him in allegorie, the most agreeable characters he would engrave therein, were the names of good Kings, who are his most lively representations, as those, who wed together power and goodness, two inseparable pieces of God, but very incompatible in the life of man,

Four sorts of life. such are the corruptions of this Age. Some live in the world transported with the torrents thereof, and that is weakness. Others flie the world, and in flying oft-times carry it along with them, and this is an illusion. Others separate themselves as well in body as affection, and this is prudence. But few are found, who beating the world on their shoulders through necessity, do tread it under-foot by contempt of vanities. That is it which this great Prince hath done, whose Court we here describe: for being seated among people, he built a desert in his heart, and in a vast Ocean of affairs he lived as fishes, which keep silence within the loud noise of waves, and preserve their plump substance fresh in the brackish waters. I go not about to place Theodosius the Younger in the rank of the bravest and most heroick spirits, you hereafter shall see others more courageous and warlick; but I purposely have selected this history, drawn from the Chronicle of Alexandria, Zonaras, Zozomen, Raderius, and others, to teach certain vain-glorious people, who make no account but of those trifling spirits, fierce, mutinous, and unquiet, stampt with the coyn of impiety, how much they miss of their reckoning; seeing this Emperour, with the sole arms of piety and modesty, carried himself in a very long and most prosperous reign, amidst horrible tempests, which seemed ready to rend the world; and other rash Princes, who made shew to swallow earth and seas, were drowned in a glass of water.

Extraction of Theodosius. God made his birth and education singularly to contribute to the sanctity of his life. He was descended from Trajan, called the good Emperour by supereminence of worth: his Grand-father was the great Theodosius, a man, who in wariness had no superiour that preceded him, and in piety no better second than his Grand-child. The Emperour Arcadius was his father, a most generous Prince, who in the very beginning of the fifth Age, to wit, the year after the Nativity of our Saviour, four hundred and one, saw this infant rise as a bright star, at that time when he ended the course of his life, as the Poets feigned the Sun reareth himself from the bed of aged Tython, to illustrate the world. His nativity was fore-

His birth foretold. told by the mouth of Saints, his most tender infancy consecrated by the destruction of idols; God at one and the same time putting him in the number of the living, and in the rank of Protectours of the Church, by a most remarkeable act, of which behold the narration.

Prophesie of S. Procopius. Saint Procopius, an Hermit endowed with admirable sanctity, illumined with the spirit of prophesie, living in the Isle of Rhodes, praying daily for the destruction of some remnants of idolatry, which reigned in the Roman Empire, when by good chance two holy Prelates, Porphyrius and John, the one Bishop of Gaza, the other of Cæsarea in Palestine, saylng for that purpose to Constantinople, went to lodge in the Hermitage of this holy man. He having received them with all respect answerable to their qualities, and entertained them according to the poverty of the Cell, understanding they travelled to the capital Citie of the Eastern Empire, of purpose to obtain an Edict from the Emperour, absolutely to destroy the Temples of idols, and bridle the insolencies of Pagans, who stirred with so much the more boldness as the drouping faintness of the government of those times promised them impunity, he was infinitly comforted to see so great personages undertake so worthy a work, and God then prompting him these words, he saith: Courage Fathers, the glory of this conquest is due to your pietie: Go stoutly to Constantinople, and acquaint the holy Bishop John Chrysostom with this design, resolving to execute what he shall think fit. For the rest, know the Empress is nine moneths gone with child, and that which is more, she beareth an Emperour in her womb: upon the mother and the son who is to be born, depends the expedition of this affair. They very glad of this prediction, left the good Hermit Procopius, and in ten days arrived at Constantinople, where presently they visited S. John Chrysostom, who received them with much respect and very great contentment.

The affair being put into deliberation, the Bishop of Constantinople saw well that the Empress might therein much assist, and that God ordinarily useth the pietie of women to advance the affairs of Religion. Notwithstanding he durst not present these two Prelates to her, fearing his recommendation might be prejudicial: for he very lately had a sharp difference with the Empress. It was Eudoxia, a woman of a great spirit, and who naturally loved virtue, as milk in her infancy, but she had a heart extreamly haughty, and quickly would be offended if any thing of great consequence were undertaken against her authority. Behold wherefore S. Chrysostom, who was of no pleasing disposition, as one who had a spirit alienated from ordinary complements, sometimes towards those of his own coat, reprehending her openly at many meetings in the point of glory, wherein she most desired to be soothed, raised her indignation to the clouds. She was as yet in the height of her passion against him, and therefore he judging it to no purpose for him to sollicite her, caused the two Bishops to be presented by the means of one called Amantius, an attendant of Eudoxia's chamber, a very wise man, and of great credit with his Lady. She who knew her child-bed time at hand, gave very free access to religious men, as hoping all good success by help of their devotions; and seeing these two Bishops were very particularly recommended to her by Amantius, in quality of persons endowed with a very eminent sanctity, she was unsatisfied till she had seen them, and having most courteously saluted them, excusing her bigness with child to have hindered her passage to the door of their reception, according to the usual practice towards persons of their worth, she forbear not most affectionately to conjure them to employ their most fervent prayers to obtain of God a happy delivery for her. The holy Bishops, after they had wished her the child-birth of Sarah, of Rebecca, and Saint Elizabeth, began to declare the cause of their voyage, unfolding in very expres terms the indignity of this Idolatrie, the insolency of Pagans, the contempt of things sacred, the oppression of people, the lamentable mischief it would be to behold the worshipping of idols still to flourish, which to abolish, the Saviour of the world had so much sweat, so much wept, and shed so much bloud: and to see it predominate as it were in the eyes of a most magnificent Emperour, and a most religious Empress, who had all the means to extirpate it. That in such a field the palms of eternal glory should be gathered, and that better they could secure their estate, than by destroying the work of Satan, to erect the tropheys of Jesus.

Eudoxia taketh fire, being thereto otherwise well enough disposed, and promiseth to recommend the business to the Emperour, to obtain the dispatches they required for their better contentment. The Bishops retired, expecting the effect of this promise. The Ladie faileth not to offer her requests, and strike the stroke with her best dexteritie. But Court affairs proceed not always on the same feet, which the desires of the zealous move upon: she findeth the Councel engaged in these retardations, who think it to no purpose to roul such a stone: That idolatrie should be left to bury it self, and at leisure dress its own funerals. That the means to ruin it, is to remove the heads of the sect from all kind of honours and publick dignities: to forbid the exercise of superstition and Conventicles, which they make in private houses, to subdue Idolaters, and burn them, as it is said, with a soft fire: That the demolishment which should be made of those great Temples of Idols which yet remained, would make much noise, and yield little fruit; that this might thrust rebellious spirits into manifest despair; and in a word, it was feared, it might be a means to turn the coyn of the Emperours coffers another way, who drew a good round revenue from the Citie of Gaza, which even at that time was in hand.

Zeal of Eudoxia.

Judgement of Arcadius his Councel.

The consideration of interest, which ever holdeth as it were the ascendent in the spirits of men, transported at that time the belief of the Empress, who would no further proceed in this pursuit. She caused the Bishops to be assembled, signifying to them, how having treated this business with much fidelity and sollicitude, she could not find the Councel disposed to this resolution; that they must have patience, and suffer the fruit to ripen before it be gathered.

Porphyrius unfoldeth the prophesie.

Thereupon Porphyrius, Bishop of Gaza, the principal Agent, as being the most interessed, well perceiving the Empress had not used the utmost of her credit, saith to her in a discreet and effectual manner: Madame, that your Majesty may not fear seriously to employ your endeavours in the busines now in question, I promise you in recompence, that God will give you a son, which you bear in your bodie, and that quickly you shall see it to sway the scepter by your side. Women desire nothing more than to conceive male children. But if it concerneth establishment of houses, they passionately love their sons. Eudoxia, who notwithstanding all the forcible words of Porphyrius, had before not undertaken the affair but sleightly, upon this promise made to her of a male child, and of a son to be Emperour, protesteth to employ herself wholly therein, and in such manner, that she not onely would cause the idols of Gaza to be thrown down to the ground, and absolutely raze the Temple, but (which was not to be expected from her zeal) she addeth, she would build in the place of the Temple (it being demolished) a most magnificent church. Porphyrius thanking her for so much favour, taketh leave to retire to his lodging, attending the effect of the good mans prophesie. Eudoxia faileth not in few days to be delivered of a fair son, who is our Theodosius the Younger. As soon as he beginneth to breath air, behold him covered with royal purple, declared Augustus, with intention to associate him the year following to the Empire of his father. All the world was poured into joy at the birth of this infant, there was nothing but sports, largesses, and publick alacrity; so much happiness they promised themselves for this little Theodosius, in whose infancy already were seen all hopes of the publick to bud.

Birth of Theodosius.

The Empress seven days after her delivery, shewing herself very gratefull to God, caused the Bishops to be called, and received them at her chamber door, then holding her little Theodosius, covered with a royal garment in her arms, Fathers (saith she to them) behold the fruits of your prayers, bless the mother and her infant. Then bowing her royal head under the hands and benediction of the Bishops, she presenteth to them the fruit of her child-bearing to be marked with the sign of our Redemption, which they presently did.

to

The good Empress having made them to sit down, Well then (saith she) what shall we do for discharge of our promise? Porphyrius taking the word, relateth to her a dream he had the night before upon this subject: which was, that he seemed to be at Gaza, a Citie of his Bishoprick, in the temple of idols, named the temple of Marna, and that the Empress coming to him offered him a book of the Gospels, entreating him to open it and read therein whatsoever he should first encounter, and that upon the opening thereof, he found these words couched in the Gospel of S. Matthew: Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall have no power against it: and that thereupon the Empress should say: Courage, in good time. That (saith she) very well accordeth with the design I have figured in my mind, for the expedition of our affair. In few days I hope the son whom God hath given me, shall be presented at the holy font of Baptism: In the mean time prepare some very ample request, what ever you think good of, and upon return from the Christening, just at your going out of the Church, present it confidently to my son. I will instruct him that shall carry him in his arms, to take it, and do what then shall be needfull. When he is returned to the house, I will do the rest, and hope so much from the mercifull hand of God, that we shall have all we desire. The Bishops assembled, fail not to present their request, causing therein to be inserted, not onely the destruction of the Temple, but also many priviledges and immunities, in favour of their Churches.

Pious stratagem of a woman.

Baptism of Theodosius.

The day of Baptism being come, all the Citie is adorned and hanged in such sort, that it seemed a little Heaven, where the Sun and Stars smiled out of their houses. The infant is carried in solemn pomp to the Font, washed, and regenerated with the water of Baptism, by the hands of S. John Chrysostom, who gave him the name of Theodosius his Grandfather, and then adopted him for his spiritual child. Baptism ended, they went out of the Church in very good order: The Princes and Lords of the Court glittered in robes of their degrees, as stars; the Court of Guard was in very good equipage, the number of those, who attired in white bare burning tapers in their hands, was so great, that they seemed to equal the lights of Heaven. The Emperour Arcadius was there in person, appearing that day with a most singular majestie, as he who had given an Emperour to the world. Near to the father the little Theodosius was carried, who drew tears of joy from all the people. The Bishops, Porphyrius and John, beheld this goodly procession to pass along, and in the mean time spied their opportunitie. They failed not to approach near, as the Empress had instructed them, and with a lowly obeysance presented their petition to the infant. The Gentleman who bare him in his arms, received it and opened it, as if he would make the little Theodosius to read it, afterwards skilfully guiding him with his hand, he made him bow his head, upon which he cried out aloud, speaking to the Emperour who was near: Sacred Majesty, our little Master agreeth unto all whatsoever these good Prelates have asked of him: and in speaking this, held the petition upon his breast. The people credulous and desirous to flatter the Emperour, thinking the infant had made this inclination of his own motion, began at that instant to thunder with loud acclamations of joy, congratulating with the Emperour, that he had a son, who through forwardness of judgement, already received petitions.

As soon as they were come to the Palace, the mother, who had contrived all this business, made it to be read to her over and over, as a thing she had never thought on before, and straightways commandeth in the presence of the Emperour to open the petition once again. There was to be read the destruction of the temple of Marna, and many immunities which the Bishops earnestly demanded. The Emperour knew not which way to turn him, well knowing he had very lately rejected this suit at his Councel-table, resolving with himself to refuse it the second time. But the battery was too forcible. Eudoxia declared, it was an ill presage not to ratifie the first grant her son had made, by a kind of miracle, in such an age, such a habit, on such a day, and among such shouts of the people. I know not who could have resisted such sweet violences.

Marna destroyed by the infant Theodosius.

Arcadius, will he nill he, was constrained presently to sign the petition, without restriction or modification; and which is more, to constitute expres Commissioners for the execution thereof, who failed not upon the urgent follicitation made by the Empress, to raze the temple of Marna, and build a most stately Church in the place.

Women stout to do good.

Behold how potent and religiously cunning women are, when they addict themselves to good. But God made all these passages conduce to the glory of his well-beloved Theodosius, willing that hell should howl and tremble already under the feet of an infant, who was no more than born; to make him one day dreadfull to all the powers of impietie.

Contentions between the Empress Eudoxia, and S. Chrysostom.

The joy the parents conceived for the birth of Theodosius was not long. I know not through what mischance Eudoxia contested again with S. Chrysostom, upon a wilfulness, as forcible in the pursuit as unfortunate in the issue; for it steeped the remnant of this poor Princes days in bitter distasts, and headlong threw her into a death disadvantagious to the reputation of her life: to teach Great-ones, and above all Ladies, to bridle their passions, and never to oppose the authoritie of the Church. The Miters of Prelates are as the Crowns of the Kings of Ægypt, they carry aspicks which insensibly sting those, who too near approach with intention to offend them, having justice on their side. It was a shamefull spectacle for Christendom, to see upon this great Theater of the world, a woman contest with a Bishop, and hazard her reputation against the most eloquent tongue of the world. This Princes was ardent in any thing she enterprized, and made all affairs dance to the tune of her intentions: she so powerfully wrought the Bishops, that they assembled a little Councel of Prelats, passionate, and plyant to her will, who passed a sentence of condemnation against Chrysostom, under pretext of a scroul, charged with a tedious contexture of calumnies, invented against this holy Prelate. Eudoxia would free herself, and to give contentment to the people, it behoved her to proceed therein with some colour of justice. Behold him banished into Bithynia. It was a bold act to tear out of the throne of Constantinople, a man, who filling the sayls of eloquence, as easily moved the people as winds do the sands of Lybia, which stir at their pleasure. The people of Constantinople spared not to murmur, as do the waves of a mutinous sea, and their mutterings were seconded with an earthquake, which happened there at the same time; all tended to a revolt, if Chrysostom had not been repealed from this exile by the Emperours authoritie.

A good document for Great-ones.

S. Chrysostom banished.

Being returned to his See, he altered nothing of his former manner, crying out, thundering, and violently beating down the vice and corruptions of that

Age. And as by chance Eudoxia caused a silver statue to be dedicated to her self in a publick place, at the consecration whereof many sports, dances, and disorders were used; this gave new occasion to speak, which so vexed the Empress, that she resolved to ruin him whatsoever it cost her. Arcadius shewed himself a little soft and obsequious to the humour of his wife, who spared no wyles, inventions, credit, not violence, to bring her enterprize to pass. She came in the end (unhappy as she was) to be as prosperous as she wished in this pursuit. S. John Chrysostom is exiled to Cucuse, a town in Armenia, which hath nothing more remarkable in it, than to have been honoured with the banishment of this worthy man. He swallowed so many toyls and incommodities in this exile, that there he left his life, the more to illustrate the glory of his death. Divers prodigies happened at Constantinople, as messengers of the anger of Heaven, armed for revenge of his injustice. Among others a violent storm of hail, which much astonished all the Citie, and four days after, Eudoxia died in travel, having long endured many bitter throws. It is held her sepulchre shook, until such time as the body of the Saint, carried in triumph through Constantinople, seemed by the presence thereof to fix her tomb, who had furnished him with so many disturbances in his life.

Death of the Empress.

The Emperour Arcadius made no long abode in this world after the death of the Empress his wife, and S. John Chrysostom, behold him surprized with a maladie, which he presently knew to be as it were a fore-runner of his death. After he had setled the affairs of his conscience, he ordered those of his Kingdom, and though he had his brother Honorius Emperour of the West, he would not rely upon him for the guardianship of his son; all great men are jealous, and many times diffident of their own bloud: But he appointed as Tutour for his little Theodosius (who then was onely eight years of age) Isdigerdes King of Persia, his friend, who deputed a great Prince named Antiochus, to establish an absolute peace with the Emperour, and offer him his aid against all pretenses that might be raised against his state. Artemius, a Consular man, very wise and faithfull, took the stern of affairs in hand, which most prosperously he mannaged in the great troubles and revolutions of the Western Empire.

Qualities of Pulcheria sister of Theodosius.

Theodosius was left an Orphan with four sisters, Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadia, and Marina: but above all the rest Pulcheria possessed his heart from his infancy. She was the pearl of Princesses, and one of the wisest women which ever mannaged the affairs of a Kingdom. She had a strong and pleasing spirit, a solid pietie, an awakened wisdom, an incomparable grace to gain hearts to her devotion. Her brother made such account of her rare virtues, that he associated her for a companion of his Empire, holding her in the quality of a Queen. She was onely two years elder than himself: the one was thirteen, the other fifteen years old. In the fifteenth year of her age, behold her already so capable of government, that she was Regent of the Empire, and as it were a mother to her brother. Artemius, who had instructed her in state affairs, could not sufficiently admire the vivacitie of her wit, the solidity of her judgement, the equity of her counsels, and the happiness which ordinarily accompanied her resolutions. She then resolved to live in perpetual virginity, not as some have thought, to take away the jealousie of a husband towards a brother, and to hold the government always, wherein she so happily thrived; but for a meer inclination she had to the love of Chastity. She easily perswaded her sisters to the same, who took their flights to Christian virtues under the wings of this Eagle.

The holy virgins, to make the offer of their virginity the more solemn, gave an Altar of gold, garnished with precious stones to the Church of S. Sophia; as presenting upon this monument the incomparable treasure of their puritie, and making humble prayer for the prosperity of their brother's Empire. This infinitely pleased Theodosius, and the more Pulcheria resigned herself to virtue, the more reputation she got with the young Emperour. She then began seriously to make religion, justice, and peace to flourish in the Empire. And seeing the person of her brother was it which ought to speak by example to all the world, the good Ladie embraced the care of his education, as the most important piece of her government. First, with an admirable wisdom she sequestred all those who might cause any vices to slide into the soul of this young Prince, well knowing, no plague was so much to be feared in the Courts of Great men, as to expose the ear of a child to the hisses and venom of serpents, which cast sin into the soul before they have eyes open to behold it. She hated, as the shadows of hell, all those subtile Artists of fortune, who to confirm themselves in authority, oftentimes thrust Great-ones into vice, and catch them by sensual pleasures, as birds are with lyme, to entangle and snare them all together. Secondly, she procured worthy men to attend near the person of the Emperour, who royally might train him in the exercise of pietie, wisdom, arms, and letters, as much as is necessary for a King. She herself, who was well verst in the Latin and Greek tongues, and no whit ignorant of the precepts of the wise, often discoursed with her brother.

Education of Theodosius.

Plague of Great-ones.

That God, who made Kings, had charged him with a crown, the more to obliege him to be the best man in his Empire. That if he would gloriously reign, he must begin by the sway of himself. That by how much the more he acknowledged the dependante he had of God, to be united to him in the qualitie of an instrument, so much the more he should command over men. That our souls were as the mirrours of the Divinitie, which by how much the more pure, so much the more were they disposed to receive the rays of wisdom to their benefit. That vices in mean men were simply vices, but in the souls of Kings they were monsters. That if he would reign happily, he must establish his throne upon two columns of diamond, Pietie and Justice; the one would give him to God, and the other would give men to him. Moreover she exhorted him to make himself of an easie and open acces to the necessities of all who should prostrate themselves at his feet. To bear very much reverence to persons Ecclesiastical, advancing the affairs of religion with all his endeavour. To be very mercifull towards the poor and sick. To gain the hearts of all his subjects by sweetness, therein imitating the Sun, who neither breaketh doors nor windows to enter into houses, but penetrateth very peaceably with the benignitie of his favourable beams. To conclude, she often represented the examples of good Princes, as of Constantine the Great, and of his grandfather Theodosius, who because they took a happie way, had on earth enjoyed a most blessed Kingdom, and immortalized themselves in the memorie of men, with much advantage, reaping whileſt they lived, the first fruits of the glorie, of which they now in Heaven have an ample fruition. On the contrary, those who desired to have their passion reign, with, and above them, in their thrones, were involved in a brutish life and extream calamities, pursued with the exetration of posteritie, and torments of eternitie.

The blessed Pulcheria, with so much grace did make these good instructions distil into the soul of her brother, who was already naturally disposed to the pursuit of good, that he took therein unspeakable contentment, and resigned his heart to be handled as a soft piece of wax in the artfull hand of such a wisdom. Notwithstanding, as it is a matter very difficult so to banish vice from Princes Courts, but that that there always will be found ſome wolf covered with the skin of a ſheep, ſo amongſt theſe who guided the youth of Theodoſius, there was a certain man called Chryſaphius, a ſubtile and crafty ſpirit, with too far inſinuating himſelf into the favour of the Prince, caſt in the end ſome blemiſh upon this fair ſoul, and made work enough for Pulcheria, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. But at that time all was very peaceable: Pulcheria repleniſhed the heart of her brother with wiſdom, the Court with good examples, the Altars with vows, and the world with benefits. And all ſo proſpered in her hands, that it ſeemed the golden Age, foretold to be under the government of a Virgin, was returned to the world.

The Emperour was now arrived near the limits of his twentieth year, and it was thought very expedient to tie him in the bonds of a chaſte marriage, to which he ſhould bring the innocency of an Age, bred either in the contempt or ignorance of vice. Pulcheria caſt her eyes both within and without the Kingdom, to find a wife ſuitable to his humour, at which time the providence of God, that guideth our lives and affairs, gave an admirable teſtimony of his authority, leading a maiden, poor, unknown, needy, as by the hand, firſt to Conſtantinople, afterward to the marriage-bed of the Emperour. So many Queens and Princeſſes affected this alliance, and every one promiſed it to themſelves, flattering their hopes therein, when to the wonder of the world God cauſed the lot to fall upon a ſilly creature.

Leontius a Paynim Philoſopher, bred up in a poor cottage, had one onely daughter, which at that time was as a diamond hidden in a dung-hill, no man knowing the worth thereof: God drew it from this darkneſs to make it glitter in the prime Court of the world. This is the admirable Athenais, who was ſingularly priviledged from Heaven with beauty of body, but incomparably heightened with gifts of the mind. Her father inſtructed her from her tender years, and enabled her in Philoſophie, Rhetorick, Poeſie, and other arts, wherewith uſually they are adorned, who are ingeniouſly bred. This maid lived by learning, as the bee by the dew, and all her pleaſure was to ſtudy, thereunto invited by two powerfull motives, firſt, the fervour of her ſpirit, ſparkling like a flaming wheel, and ſecondly, ambition of ſex, which made her deſire to tranſcend men in their beſt faculties. That which the Poets have feigned of Pallas, is a fable, but he that ſhould behold Athenais might ſee a true Pallas. It ſeemed ſhe was ſome Intelligence, who had left the Heavenly Orbs, to come to be enchaſed in this beauteous body, and converſe with men. It was ſaid her father, well read in the knowledge of ſtars, foretold the good fortune which ſhould happen to her, and that making his will, he left all his wealth to two ſons he had, to wit, Genas and Valerius, making no mention of his daughter ſo much beloved, whereat ſhe being ſad, Let Heaven alone (ſaith he) dear daughter, your fortune will be good; more ſhall you have than your brothers. Thus man is often pleaſed to mix the verity of hiſtories with ſome fables, to give reputation to predictions of Mathematicians, as if the ſtars had ſome power upon that which abſolutely dependeth on the pleaſure of God, or as if one muſt ſtudy much in the book of the planets, to ſay, that a maid bright as a ſtar, and wiſe as Minerva, was to come to great fortune. Howſoever it be, as ſoon as her fathers eyes was ſhut, the wicked brothers, greedy as Griphons, uſed their ſiſter moſt inhumanely. Intereſt had neither eyes for the beauty, nor ears for the eloquence of Athenais: behold her deſpoiled and driven from her fathers dwelling, enforced to retire to the houſe of a poor Aunt ſhe had in the Citie of Athens.

She muſt make this ſhip-wrack to arrive to a good haven: ſhe were loſt, had ſhe not had ſuch a loſs. This Aunt gave her notice of another kinſ-woman in Conſtantinople. They both reſolve to viſit her, and mediate ſomething by her means. Behold they are now in the capital Citie of the Empire, not well knowing who brought them thither; but God, who was their guid, ſecretly contrived this work. The good kinſ-woman of Conſtantinople competently entertaineth and lodgeth them, very glad ſhe might exerciſe her charity on a creature ſo well deſerving. The Citie was much pleaſed with the gracious acceptance Pulcheria gave to all afflicted perſons, and the juſtice ſhe rendered to thoſe who were oppreſſed by violence. The good women, couſins of Athenais, thought they ſhould not do amiſs to complain to the Princeſs of the wrong ſhe had received from her brothers, and eſpying their opportunity, they both took her along with them. It was not now needfull to beg much the favour of admittance, the maiden bare her letters of recommendation on her forehead. Pulcheria at her entrance was dazled with the brightneſs of her aſpect, and when ſhe began to unlooſe her tongue, never was Syren ſo attractive with ſongs, as ſhe with words. Pulcheria not onely heard with patience, but greedineſs, ſtill fearing ſhe would make an end of her diſcourſe, ſuch pleaſure ſhe took therein. Many queſtions ſhe asked her, and above all very particularly enquired of her kindred, how ſhe had been bred, and whether ſhe were a virgin: which having judiciouſly found according to her deſire, ſhe put the buſineſs into ſuſpenſe to hear it again another time, by the courſe of audience ordinarily given: and from that time ſhe had a ſtrange deſign in her heart, to make her wife of the Emperour her brother.

Politicians, who will meaſure all things by their own ell, and penetrate into the purpoſes of the whole world, judge this manner of proceeding was a great wiſdom in Pulcheria, ever deſirous to ſway and poſſeſs the ſpirit of her brother. She foreſaw if he married ſome great Princeſs, ſhe might bring with the titles and Crowns of her Anceſtours, pride and diſdain into the houſe, and that ſo many alliances as ſhe might have, might divert Theodoſius his mind on many objects: That ſhe being of noble extraction, would rule without a companion, and therefore it was better ſtill to hold the higheſt place in the government: That ſhe ſhould make choice of ſome virtuous and handſom maid, though of mean parentage, to frame her as her creature, diſpoſe of her where ſhe beſt pleaſed, and then laſt of all conform her to her own will. Thus many judge of others intentions by their own diſpoſitions.

But it is much more likely Pulcheria, a creature wholly celeſtial, guided herſelf by other motives, the honour of God, pietie, peace, and her brothers contentment. He already had ſignified to her, he would not captivate himſelf in an enforced and ceremonious marriage, and that he deſired no other portion with the woman he ſhould marry, but virtue and beauty; which was the cauſe the Princeſs ſuppoſed this maiden was firſt ſent from Heaven, in the time he was in treaty of marriage. She failed not to make relation to her brother concerning an Athenian maid, who was preſented to her upon a ſuit in law, which ſhe commenced againſt her brothers, who unworthily had uſed her, and was indeed the moſt beautifull, innocent, and beſt ſpoken creature, which might be found throughout the whole Empire. She thereunto added no other thing at this time. It is enough to put matches to the fire, without commanding them to burn. Theodoſius upon the report his ſiſter made of this incomparable beauty, asked if there were no means to ſee her. Pulcheria anſwereth, ſhe had given day to hear her cauſe. The Emperour, whether it were he uſed not to be preſent in ſuch audiences, or whether he would hear her ſpeak to her own ſex with the more natural propriety, fearing he ſhould give her too much reſpect if he preſented himſelf in judgement, made his ſiſter to ſit in the tribunal, himſelf reſolving to ſee all that ſhould paſs through a ſecret window prepared for this purpoſe. Athenais faileth not to come on the day and hour aſſigned, to plead her cauſe. Then was plainly to be ſeen the Empire, which humane beauty and an eloquent tongue have over earthly powers. The confident maid, having before broken the ice when firſt ſhe ſpake to the Princeſs, ſpeaks now to her with much liberty:

Athenais pleadeth her cauſe.

MADAME, I ſhall have cauſe to love my ſhipwrack all my life time, ſince it hath given me opportunitie to arrive at your feet, as to the port, where all miſeries are poured out, to be changed into felicities. Your Majeſty may ſee the violence of my brothers is great, ſince it hath conſtrained me to undertake this voyage with much toyl, and now preſently to trouble your ears with my complaints, which the ſoftneß of my nature ſhould cauſe me to ſmother, were it not they are extorted by a powerfull hand, which is that of neceßitie. Had my brothers granted me ſo much of my fathers goods (which was mean enough, yet for my enablement ſufficient) but one ſole ſilly cottage, I patiently would have ſatisfied my ſelf without preßing their fortunes. But they have not left me one inch of land, and which is more, have driven me from my fathers houſe (where I ever have inhabited) with exceeding much incivility, which I had rather diſſemble, it being not my intention to accuſe my own bloud, to which I always have wiſhed as much good as to my ſelf. By their own ſaying, I have no other fault, for which I ought to be baniſhed and deſpoiled, but certain priviledges of nature. They alledge unto me for all reaſon, that I may hope for a good fortune, and that it was ſufficient even in my fathers judgement. If imaginary hopes are of power to diſpoſſeß true and lawfull heirs, what may we hereafter expect to be ſolid in the world? As for my own part, I have nothing to do with ſuch fantaſies as they form to themſelves: I deſire not great fortunes, but content my ſelf with that mediocrity my birth hath allotted me. A little wealth ſhall ſuffice to put me in ſafeguard againſt the accidents of a neceßitous life, and ſweetly to manure the ſciences my father left me as a portion. Hereupon, Madame, I moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſtie will be pleaſed to be informed of this I affirm, and if you find it, as it is, true, to do me juſtice, which I muſt ſeek in your Court, it being baniſhed from all the world beſide.

She ſpake theſe words with ſo much grace, that all thoſe there preſent were raviſhed therewith, perſecuted beauty never wanting compaſſion throughout the world. Every one wiſhed her well, each one became her Advocate, yet ſome were pleaſed to importune her with many curious queſtions in this affair, to put her upon replies, and make her exerciſe the vivacity of her excellent wit, wherein moſt happily ſhe gave ſatisfaction.

Theodoſius beheld all this with affectionate tenderneſs: The eye and tongue of this creature mutually divided his heart; at one and the ſame inſtant love ſurprized him by the eyes and ears. Pulcheria, without making any other propoſition, promiſeth all favour to the ſuppliant, and having diſmiſſed her, goeth to viſit her brother, who had the arrow of chaſte love deeply fixed in his heart. Reſolutely he ſaith to his good ſiſter, that never would he have other wife than Athenais. They were now upon the point to proceed in the marriage: but it was found ſhe was uncapable of that Sacrament, being not as yet baptized. Her Paynim father had bred her in Paganiſm: better ſhe knew the Theogonie of Heſiodus, than the Genealogie of Jeſus Chriſt, better Homers Iliads than the Books of the Goſpels, better the Apothegms of Pythagoras, than the Commandments of God. All the Court, which had been rapt in admiration with her pleading, was much troubled to ſee ſo fair a ſoul drencht in infidelity: ſome ſeriouſly treated with her about her converſion. Atticus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, employed himſelf therein to the utmoſt of his power. Paulinus a great favourite of Theodoſius, who was now upon ſome terms of jealouſie with him, by occaſion of a late accident, made himſelf as it were a prime agent in this buſineſs, ſeeing his Maſter affected it ſo ardently. And being well read in Divine and humane learning, beyond the profeſſion of a ſword-man, and moſt eloquent to explicate himſelf, he marvellouſly by his conference advanced the converſion of Athenais. In the beginning ſhe was obſtinate in Pagan doctrine, and fortified herſelf upon all propoſitions with Homers Iliads, which ſhe alledged as her Goſpel; and when the great indecencies were opened to her, which this Poet attributeth to theſe heathen gods, ſhe ſheltered herſelf with ſubtilities, as a hedge-hog with his quills, evading by oblique interpretations, drawn from the allegorical ſenſe, ſo that much ado there was to diſarm her. In the end, God, who would have her to be his, unſealeth her eyes, and makes her behold, as in the glaſs of a bright mirrour, on the one ſide the impertinences of idolatry, and on the other the greatneſs, majeſty, verity, ſolidity of our faith. As ſoon as the firſt reflection began to fall directly upon her underſtanding, behold all the wild fancies of her opinions were ſcattered, to give place to the truth. Never any ſoul more favourly taſted its converſion, never any creature more affectionately reſented the benefit of calling to Chriſtianitie. She bathed herſelf in the knowledge of our myſteries, as in a ſea of delights, and in ſhort time became ſo skilfull in the law, that ſhe wrote in Homers verſes the principal acts of Jeſus Chriſt: and even as Mary Magdalene with the ſame hayr wherewith ſhe had weaved nets for wanton love, made a towel to wipe the feet of our Saviour, ſo the devout Athenais conſecrateth from henceforth all the graces of her wit and learning, which ſhe had miſ-uſed in vanities, to the tropheys of Jeſus.

Her converſion.

She was baptized at Conſtantinople with joy and incredible magnificence, named Eudoxia at the holy Font of Baptiſm, confirmed in Chriſtianity, nouriſhed with holy Sacraments, wherein ſhe was entertained with moſt ſenſible devotion. The ceremonies ended, Pulcheria cauſed her to be called, ſaying:

Eudoxia, my Siſter, it is now time you forget the houſe of your father, and that you withdraw the ſuit againſt your brothers. God, who hath granted you the life of the ſoul and lights of faith, hath magnificently provided for the ornament of your perſon, for he hath choſen you to be the lawfull wife of the Emperour Theodoſius, our moſt honoured Lord and brother. All is agreed on, and ſuch is his reſolution, nothing more remaineth but your conſent.

The holy maid, aſtoniſhed at ſuch words, covered her fore-head with the vermillion of ſhamefac'dneſs, and proſtrating herſelf at the feet of Pulcheria, beſought her to entertain her onely in her Palace with her maids, in the quality of a ſervant, to waſh the feet of others, as Abigail ſpake. But the more ſhe ſhewed humility, the more ſhe ſeemed recommendable, and Theodoſius, to whom virtue ſerved as a powerfull motive, was after her converſion much more enflamed to love her. She muſt yield herſelf to the will of God. Behold her wife of the Emperour, the marriage was ſolemnized on the 7. of June in the year 421. with all pomp correſpondent to the majeſty of ſo great an Emperour, and the joy of ſuch a marriage.

Her brothers underſtanding the good fortune their ſiſter had, afflicted as they were with their own conſcience, fled like wild men, no man purſuing them. But the good Queen, conſecrating the firſt acts of her Chriſtianity to forgetfulneſs of injuries, cauſed them to return, and obtained of the Emperour for the the one the government of Sclavonia, and for the other a most honourable place in Court. God knows, the good women, who with so much charity had assisted her, were not forgotten. Nothing was changed in her but seat and condition, all the virtues of humility, modesty, and affability, remained with her, and how much the higher she was raised, so much the more she undervalued herself, as if she had fore-seen the storm which should afterward assail her.

Sanctity of Theodosius his Court.

Hither it is I call all noble and great men, who flatter their sensuality by a false imagination of impossibility in the way of perfection, while they abide in Courts and greatness, in company and affairs. The Court of young Theodosius was at that time the prime Court of the world; that of the Roman Emperour was fallen into eclipse. Thither was the confluence of all Nations, the ebbe and floud of great affairs, a profound peace, an absolute power to satisfie all sorts of desires with attractive objects and delights, ever ready to be reaped; and in the mean time what a life led the new couple? what a life Pulcheria and her sister? what monasterie more regular than the Court of this Emperour? what virtue, what chastity, what sanctity, what devotion, was ever found in Cloysters, which hath not here been seen with so much the more lustre, as it is more difficult to have all vices a power, and all virtues in will? If in religion the first account be made of devotion, which is the master-wheel of all great actions, this Court was as the Tabernacle of the ancient law, which born amongst armies, environed with hosts of men, bristled round about with pikes and javelins, ever retained a sweet silence, a chaste religion, a sacred veneration, and perpetually had holy fire in centinel, victims and prayers in sacrifice.

So the Palace of Theodosius amongst all the clamours of affairs, all the rumours, tumults, and accidents, which upon one side and other occur in a large Empire, never so much slackened as to loose the sweetness of prayer, which was as the Manna these Royal souls daily gathered in the desert, which they had planted in the midst of their hearts. Pulcheria, as the Abbess, governed the devotion of all the rest, by her counsel and example. As soon as break of day drew the curtain of Heaven, to discover the works of God, they adored the work-man, and assembling in their household Chappel, sung the praises of God, following therein the course of the Church-prayers. The whole time was there circumvolved in compass: The divine office had the first fruits; affairs and recreations had likewise their turn, nothing was exorbitant, where all was done by weight and measure. If in religious life so much esteem be had of poverty, as of walls and rampires of the Citie of God, where shall you find a more admirable poverty, than in this Court? Is it not a prodigious thing to be spoken, that this good Emperour, for whom seas and rivers ran, for whom the earth opened her bosom with so much prodigality, for whom she kept so many Magazins of gold and silver within her entrails, beholding himself among the revenues of a great Empire, so husbanded them for the entertainment of things necessary, wherein he was ever magnificent, that he suffered no excess in his own person? He used all his blessings as things borrowed, and sometimes in his own particular, would not permit the expence of his diet exceed the value of the work of his own hands. He painted very well, and took pleasure, so much as affairs would give leave, to delineate the holy Scripture in most noble characters, saying to his familiars, it was reason, since all the world took pains in his Kingdom, himself should have a trade, and that as others, he should learn to dip his bread in the sweat of his brow, and his body being of the same composition which others are, it was fit to exercise the same labours.

Note here, O Noblemen, a Holy Court.

Such innocency was very far from the profusions which are made in Princes Courts, with the expence of the peoples bloud, a matter that beyond all other burdens would surcharge them at the Judgement-seat of God. The Emperours sisters, to imitate him, had always their works in their hands, that they might leave no passage open to idleness. If in religion chastity be esteemed, here the conjugal supereminently flourished between Theodosius and Eudoxia, virginity in Pulcheria and her sisters Marina, Flaccilla, Arcadia, was as redolent balm, which ascended to Heaven in a perpetual sacrifice. The very name onely of dishonesty, was not so much as known in this Palace, yet all things were therein learned but vice and idleness. Glances of the eye were simple and dove-like, words pondered, ordinary discourses of the imitation of Jesus Christ, and virtues of Saints, carriages full of respect, honour, and majesty. This chastitie abode among the chief in Court, and was spread over all the rest by the odour of good example, as do the rays of the Sun, which involve the whole world, without ever parting from the original fountain of light. If in religion obedience be esteemed, this Court was the very model of well obeying and commanding. Those holy souls had made a law to themselves most exactly, to observe all the Commandments of God and the Church; to reverence the Prelates of the same, to cherish, assist, comfort the religious, and all Ecclesiastical Orders with most cordial affection, tempted with holy reverence, in such sort that the most austere Monks could not be more punctual in religious obedience, than all of this Court were in the government of their consciences. God for reward, imprinted on the Emperours forehead the rays of his Majesty, which made him so much the more awfull, as he less of purpose sought to make himself such.

Excellent chastity and modesty.

If in religious Orders, they live in perpetual exercise of mortification, what life more mortified, than to behold so much humility in sovereign greatness, so much chastity in vigorous youth; in an absolute power to do all, so much retention? In so much science, so much conscience? so much temperance, among so many occasions of delights? Besides the fasts of the Church, which were there exactly kept, abstinence was observed on the wednesday and friday in every week. The Emperour gave the example, his wife and sisters imitated it, their table was rather a perpetual list of temperance, than a provision of dainties.

Mortification

It was observed, the good Prince travelling one day through the heats of summer, full of dust and sweat, his Court being in great scarcity of water, behold a peasant cometh, who presenteth him with a draught of cool water in a fair christal glass: he was in his passions so mortified, that as an other David, after he magnificently had recompenced the good mans present, he gave it back again to bestow where he pleased without once touching it, thinking it unreasonable he should flatter his own taste, during the thirst of his followers.

A worthy act

He sometimes stole away in hunting, and went to dine with some Hermit, where he fed on a little slice of mouldy bread, and drank the clear water of the fountain, protesting afterward it was one of the best repasts he had made, for commonly it was seasoned with sacred discourse and wholesom counsel. In his apparel, although he appeared full of majesty, according to his quality, yet he oftentimes hid under his royal purple, the old frock or hair-shirt of some holy Anchoret. In publick shews he also abstained from gazing, that seeing, one would have thought him blind. His virtues were so much the more, as they had the less of affectation. He was in conversation among men, as a man, and yet therein preserved himself pure as an Angel.

If

If religion be the hive wherein the honey of good doctrine is made, Theodosius was most studious and well versed in divine and humane learning: he oft spent one part of the night in study, that he might employ the day in his affairs; and that which is an admirable note of infinite sweetness and facility, this good Emperour, for whom a thousand and a thousand would have thought themselves most happy to pass the night in watching, he for fear of interrupting the sleep of any the meanest servant, caused by art a marvellous lamp to be made, which perpetually flamed, oyl running thereinto by certain little passages or conduits, which easily were turned. There was no Prelat so learned, who admired not his great promptness to repeat by heart all the texts of the Bible: and as for the Civil law, he was so conversant therein, that he caused by his direction that notable book of Imperial Constitutions to be compiled, which to this day beareth his name.

Admirable lamp.

Briefly, to shew that Theodosius in his Court yielded nothing at all in perfection to the most austere Hermits, Glycas recounteth, that a holy Anchoret, who had passed fourty years in the horrour of a dreadfull penance, as he one day was touched with some sleight imaginations of his own merit, God revealed unto him, that in those fourty years he had done nothing in the desert in matter of perfection, which the Emperour Theodosius had not performed in his Court. This put into his heart so sharp a spur to know the conscience of the Emperour, that he went directly to the Court, where he was very courteously received: and considering with himself how the Prince was clothed, used, served, honoured, he had much ado to understand where this perfection was. In the end, one day speaking to him apart, he conjured him for Gods sake to recount some good works he did. Theodosius felt a marvellous strife in his soul, in the contention between his humility and obedience: Humility sought to hide it self, but the obedience he ought to yield to a man, who conjured him with so many signs to tell him in the name of God what he did, and to testifie a truth, prevailed with him. After he had bewailed his imperfections, he recounted with much modesty his prayers, abstinencies, alms, mortifications of hayr-cloth, and such like, and then added, that being sometimes enforced to be present in the Theaters, to wit, in sports and pastimes, wherein the wisest were spectatours with much liberty, he at that time in such manner withdrew his sight, that none of those levities entered into his eyes: so that amongst so many horse-races, shews, ostents, pomps, & noise, he was ever in a perpetual tranquility. The Hermit was so amazed to hear of such mortification of sense and appetite, in occasions so moving, that away he went, no further presuming of himself, but singularly edified by the life of the Emperour.

Arrival of an holy Hermit, and his discourse with Theodosius.

If then in his retired life onely he equalled the perfection of Anchorites, who now may sufficiently value the virtues of a King, which necessarily must be shewed in publick, after they have been watered with the tears of his prayers, and sweetly manured in the solitude of his heart. He was so wise and discreet, that all his actions and words remained perpetually in as just an equality, as do the nights and days under the Equinoctial; so mild, that he not onely desired to save the living, but also to raise the dead; so mercifull, that all the miseries of the poor which came to him, went no further than himself; so just, that he made a golden Age of his Kingdom; so much he obliged the Church, that it seemed his hands were fatal to overthrow all the monsters of heresie, as are the Eunomians, Encratites, Macedonians, Novatians, Donatists, Nestorians, and other such like: and how much the more he endeavoured to advance the Kingdom of God, in stopping all impiety with incomparable zeal, so much the more God, who maketh Kings to reign, established his scepter, causing the Heavenly powers to fight for him, and holding the winds and tempests at command in his favour. Witness the notable victory he obtained against Roylas, who having passed Danubius, with all the forces of Scythia and Russia, came pouring like a furious torrent upon Constantinople. God so stayed this Barbarian in favour of his well-beloved Theodosius, that he turned him into ashes with a thunder-stroke, and blasted his whole Army by the violence of horrible tempests. On the other side, Baravanes King of Persia, breaking the treaty of peace, came into the field with innumerable forces, to swallow the Eastern Empire, associated with Alamondar the Saracen King, who drew along with him no less than an hundred thousand men: and all this was scattered in an instant, a panick terrour being crept into the disorder of this vast Army. This is to teach those, who make no account of Princes, if they be not hot-spurs, rash, and many times impious, what a devout Emperour can do.

Great virtues

Notable victory.

But since there is no beauty in creatures so perfect, which is not soyled with some blemish, it cannot be denied but that this excellent Prince had (as others) his defects. Among the rest he is blamed not to have used sufficient industry in affairs, but to suffer himself through too much facility, to fall into the complacence of others humours. He sometimes signed dispatches without wel examining them, through overmuch confidence in those who were much conversant about him, and being of a singular integrity, measured all others by himself.

Defects of the Emperour.

Pulcheria his sister, to correct this negligence, resolved one day to draw a transaction in formal and expres terms, by which Theodosius gave and consigned into her hands his wife Eudoxia, to use and handle her at her pleasure. He, without reading the contents of the writing presented unto him, according to his custom, let his pen run, and signed it. Pulcheria wisely made use of this her grant: for gently leading the Empress into her chamber, she there held her as a prisoner. The other demanding the reason, this transaction was produced, signed by the hand of her husband. The good Queen knew not what to think, and shewed rather a disposition of offence than laughter. Notwithstanding her complaints, she was held in captivity, and Theodosius, asking where the Empress his wife was, it was answered, she was in the Princess his sisters chamber. She is in good company (saith he) but I wonder what tedious business can keep them so long together: Go bid her come hither. He was so passionately affected, that the hours he spent without beholding her, seemed years unto him. A Gentleman deputed thereto, bare this message to Pulcheria. She persisting in her game, with a serious countenance sendeth word to the Emperour, he should not expect her, and that she was not at his command. Theodosius was amazed at these words, and could not imagine what game his sister meant to play, having never hitherto known any such levity in her. He presently hasteneth into Pulcheria's chamber, And what devise (saith he) is this? Where is my wife? The poor prisoner stretched out her hand to him; Pulcheria opposed it, and sheweth she was hers, to buy, and sell, and dispose of at her pleasure. And as the Emperour admired much these so extraordinary proceedings, in a person of his sisters humour, she caused him to read the writing, signed with his own hand; then, adding good counsel, Behold, (saith she) most Sacred Majesty, the goodly order precipitation & negligence bring to affairs. The holy Emperour took this advertisement in good part, and promiseth he never more would sign dispatches at this rate. But Eudoxia was vexed at this sport in good earnest. She was in an estate wherein she

she would no longer be over-awed; she knew the power she held over her husbands heart, having already given him pledges of her fruitfulness, to wit, a daughter named Eudoxia, who was afterward married to the Emperour Valentinian. It much troubled her that Pulcheria still retained some small predominance over her, and shewed a spirit of command: she resolved with herself, that her person at this time required another consideration; that such tricks had heretofore been well enough accepted in that estate she was in, but not as now she is: It is too great a game to play upon diadems. These petty resentments of the point of honour easily creep even into the purest souls, and who seasonably stops them not, findeth his heart drencht in the gall of certain aversions, which weaken charity. I know not what cooling-card this goodly game cast between the two Princesses, but from that time the one would no longer be commanded, and the other pursued her ordinary course, which was to command. These hearts formerly united, were now upon breach, which notwithstanding never outwardly appeared, so retentive they were on both sides. God would exercise both, and put them into the furnace of tribulation to purifie them, and take away some dross, which by long prosperities is easily contracted. He first began with the Empress Eudoxia, to whom he suffered a most sensible accident to happen, the narration whereof behold, which verily is pitifull. But who will think it strange to see Eudoxia fallen into the sinister opinion of Theodosius, seeing the same hath chanced to many Saints, yea to her, who hath born the standard of all sanctity, the most Blessed Virgin.

Athenais, a poor maid preferred by Pulcheria, could not brook her.

Sinister accident.

Upon the day of Epiphany, as the Emperour returned from Church, with great pomp and magnificence, a certain countrey man, a stranger and unknown, brake through the press, accosteth Theodosius, who was of most easie access, and presenteth him with an apple of an extraordinary size, esteemed at that time as a rare fruit. The Emperour receiveth it gratefully, and commandeth to give the good man presently about the value of one hundred and fiftie crowns. As soon as he was returned to the Palace, he goes to visit the Empress, and full of joy giveth her this fair present, which he had taken of the peasant for a great rarity. Out alas! this verily was the apple of discord, infected with the breath of the serpent, which horribly rent asunder this poor Court. The good Empress, having understood that Paulinus, a great favourite of Theodosius, was in bed sick of the gout, to please and comfort him, sent him the apple, not mentioning from whom she had received it. Paulinus was seized with so great joy, seeing such a courtesie from a person so eminent used towards him, that the contentment he received at that time, charmed the pain of his gout. He so admireth this goodly fruit, that he judgeth it worthy of Imperial hands, and without delaying resolved to send it to the Emperour, excusing himself through indisposition of health, that he was not himself the messenger. Theodosius knew the apple, which he had very lately put into the Empresses hand, he turned it on every side, and judged it to be the same: thereupon a furious jealousie, as if it had been breathed from hell, began to lay hold on this gentle spirit, all the objects of what was past returned to thicken this black vapour, to frame a cloud thereof, and resolve it into a storm. It is true, the Empress loved Paulinus with a most chaste and innocent love; one must have had the heart of a Tiger not to love him. He was a Lord very much affected by her husband: it was he who partly had drawn her from the obscurity of Gentilism by his learned and friendly conferences; he, that had procured her Baptism; he, that had wrought her marriage; he, that yielded most faithfull service to their Majesties in the chiefest charge of the Empire, wherein he had been most nobly employed: all which made him worthy of great respects, besides that, he was of a very royal conversation, which had great power over all those who treated with him. The good Lady, who ever had her pen in hand to work some piece of her invention to the glory of Altars, which she affected, was pleased to communicate her labours to Paulinus, and discourse with him of holy things. All these conferences, which ever had been for the honour of an entire reputation, and which before yielded nothing but honey, were all turned into gall in the heart of Theodosius, by this lamentable jealousie wherewith he was possessed.

Apple of discord.

He instantly sendeth for Eudoxia, the more deeply to sound her heart, demanding what was become of that fair apple he had given her. The poor Princess was overtaken, and seeing herself between the hammer and the anvile, I know not what gesture appeared on the brow of her husband, but she well perceived this fair soul was not in its ordinary situation. She therefore declining suppliant intreaty, thought to under-prop her innocency with a lie, and said she had eaten the apple. Virtue hath nothing to do with the veil of untruths to cover it self, it is not her custom. Had she freely told what she did with the apple, as her intention was most sincere, all the malignity of suspition would have been diverted. But this sudden surprizal a little altered her judgement, and all she did was to remedy the passion she saw to be enkindled in the heart of Theodosius, by the eyes, which are as the mirrours of our soul. The Emperour urged her upon this answer: She, who already was involved, tumbled herself further into the snare, and that she might not seem a lier, sware by the life and health of her husband, she had eaten the apple. He to convince her of this impudence, drew this fatal fruit out of his Cabinet: It is then flown from your stomach into my chamber without corruption; behold I have found a wonder. The Empress at the sight of this fruit, endured the same symptoms in innocency she had done in crime; for she becometh very pale, and was so confounded, that she had not courage enough to speak one onely word. Theodosius in an instant retireth like lightening, and withdraweth into his Cabinet, having his heart wholly drencht in gall and bitterness. The poor Eudoxia on the other part poureth herself into tears without comfort, as her misery seemed devoid of remedy.

The evil of a sleight lie.

Here was a rough trial which God sent to these innocent souls, and yet we need not wonder, since Saint Joseph (as I have said) one of the most perfect husbands which the earth ever bare, gave too much scope to his suspition, upon the chastity of her, who was more pure than Angels. Love, jealousie, anger, and sorrow, divided the heart of the Prince in the sad retirement of his Cabinet, and drew strange sighs from him.

A silly maid (said he) come of nothing, who was tossed in a storm as the tennis-ball of fortune, without support, without means, without favour, to have been preferred before such and so many Princesses who sought my alliance, raised even to my bed by lawfull marriage, to plant dishonour there; to have been ennobled with a diadem, and negligently to pollute it by her ingratitude, and Paulinus, whom I trusted as my self, that he might satisfie his desires with all the greatness and beauties of my Empire, (for all was in his hands) to proceed so far as to attempt the bed of his Master! Where shall we hereafter find fidelity? We must search for it among Tartars and Scythians, for it is banished from Christianitie.

It is not well known who in these confusions suggested to the Emperour this wicked counsel, to destroy Prince Paulinus. The soul of Theodosius was too sweet to resolve on an act so tragical, without others motion; so likewise it is not credible it should proceed from Pulcheria, who was in affairs more reserved, and ever guided by the rule of conscience. However it was, the history saith, the poor Paulinus, who knew nothing of that which passed, was cured of the gout the same night, by a very rough and most bloudy phlebotomy, for he was put to death without any form of process. Other have written, he was first banished into Cappadocia, and there oppressed by the faction of his enemies. O God, what may not depraved love do, since sincere amity cannot avoid suspition, attended by an accident so strange! Some have said, nothing else followed, but the sequestration of Paulinus, and that should more pleasingly run from my pen, which abhorreth bloud: But as the Scripture, speaking of David and other holy Kings, hath not dissembled their faults, I will not so paint Theodosius exteriourly, that I cover this aspersion of too much credulity, precipitation, and revenge, in this matter, which proceeded even to bloud, as the Chronicle of Alexandria assureth us.

It is a fearfull example, to see a soul so mild, by the disturbance of a passion and some pernicious counsel, transported so far, to teach Great-ones they cannot maturely enough consult in the like occasions. The father of this Paulinus had been High-Steward in the Court of the Emperour; Paulinus himself from his infancy had been bred with Theodosius, participating in all his counsels and pleasures of youth; he was grown so high, that nothing but the hand of his Master could ruin him. He lived in the reputation of a great man, and his words were heard in Court like Oracles: Yet notwithstanding behold him, to satisfie jealousie, miserably massacred, and the glorious services he had done to the Crown recompenced with a direfull catastrophe. It is unknown why the Divine Providence permitted the same. It oftentimes holdeth the affairs of the world under the veil and silence: but we must presume, all which it permitteth, is done with justice. When the afflicted Empress understood the death of Paulinus, so sudden and unexpected, she well saw the Emperour was tainted with the venom of most cruel jealousie, and that all her apologies would be fruitless. The poor Ladie saw nothing about her but darkness, fantasies, and affrightments. The clock which struck, ever seemed to her the last moment of life, yea, and that in her opinion over-slow to end her miseries. When her soul was able to surmount the storm, she said to God with an affectionate heart: Alas! God of justice (for I dare not implore thy mercies) thou hast well touched me on that part which was most sensible in me. Although I had seen my diadem thunder-stricken by thy hand, fall into dust at my feet, though thou hadst taken this creature from my side, which thou hast afforded us as a pledge of our marriage, though all infirmities and manners of death had conspired against me; I doubted not always to have had courage enough to bear my self above wind and tempest. But what light of spirit would not be eclipsed, what temper of heart would not be lost in these dolorous afflictions? Thou hast lifted me up, as they do little children to the branches of a tree, to make me fall down head-long, and crush me with a ruin as ignominious, as my fortune was eminent. Were I now under the poor roof of the house from whence thou drewest me, I should be too happy. You have exposed me to the mid-day light, that I might not be unfortunate, without making all the world witness of my wretchedness and disgrace. And yet (my God) thou knowest my eyes have ever been chaste, and that never any other love entered into my heart but that of a lawfull husband. It is better to suffer in innocency than crime: but it always is a thing worthy of compassion, to behold chastity unworthily persecuted. That poor innocent hath gone before me into the other world, and hath served as a sacrifice for his Masters jealousie: his services ought not to have been crowned with such a recompence. It is my friendship, as chaste as unhappy, that hath betrayed him: my sins are so great, that I cannot do good but by doing ill. My God expiate them by death, and onely deliver me from the hands of dishonour.

Strange affliction of Eudoxia, and her words.

Vanity and inconstancy of worldly affairs.

Thus went the afflicted turtle mourning in the solitary retirement of her heart; the nights were irksom to her, so much was her sleep clogged with dreams and fantasies, which with the more horrour represented her calamity: and when the Sun arose to bring comfort in his rays to all creatures, he found the eyelids of this poor Princess all watered with tears, which he could not drie up.

In the mean time the Court of Theodosius was in a sad silence. It was not well known what tragedy was played. The Emperour shewed a melancholy distracted spirit; the Empress bare the image of her sorrow in her dejected countenance; Pulcheria abode in a prudent dissimulation, and an admirable advisedness. The sudden death of Paulinus made it to be suspected there was some strange accident. Every one discoursed according to his opinion. At that instant Eudoxia was seen to be removed from Councel and manage of affairs, deprived of the Imperial bed, abandoned by all those who before adored her; she was dead to the evil life, and onely survived to see her own funerals. It was thought Pulcheria, who was desirous to make a sequestration, (fearing lest her presence might again enkindle the fire covered under ashes in the Emperours heart, to possess it to the prejudice of affairs) caused the counsel of undertaking the voyage of the holy land, to be suggested to her under-hand. But it is more credible far, the good Empress took this resolution upon her own motion, for the reason I will deliver.

Departure of Eudoxia.

A devout Roman Ladie of a noble house, named Melania, who filled the deserts, Cities, Provinces, and Empires, with her fame, passing into Palestine, there to wear out the rest of her days in peace, went by Constantinople, and was received at the Emperours Court; where seeing Eudoxia endowed with an admirable spirit, but yet untrained to the sweetness of things spiritual, she endeavoured to give her a tast. The Empress, who at that time was in the prosperities and delights of a flourishing Court, thought she should handle devotion, as a Captain Philosophie, and it was enough to tast it outwardly. But when this sad accident, like the steel, began to strike on the flint, it made the sparkles flie out in good earnest. She was on fire to forsake the Court, where she no longer was what she had been; she sighed after those places of the holy land, as the thirsty Hart for the streams of a fountain. I well believe she took counsel at that time of Chrysaphius, a powerfull Eunuch, who had governed Theodosius from his infancy, and was much reputed in Court, closely countermyning the over-much authority which Pulcheria had, according to his opinion, in affairs; but he took good heed openly to affront her, satisfying himself to act his part by Eudoxia, according to directions she gave him. This man, very understanding in businesses, found it was to good purpose to retire back, to come on the better, that it was necessary the Empress should give way for a time, and that her absence would make her the more desired, and that he in the mean space would do all good offices for her with the Emperour, and act his part in time and place. Conclusions of the voyage are made, leave was not hard to be obtained of the Emperour, seeing his instrument Pulcheria was thereunto wholly disposed. When it came to a separation, which was a thing very sensible in minds so long time, and with such ardour mutually loving, the good Eudoxia could not refrain to say to her husband with tears in her eyes:

SA-

SACRED MAJESTY, I am upon terms to see you no more in this world; for which cause it is fit I discharge my Conscience. Behold me ready to depart, not onely from the Court, but this life, if you so ordain. I sorrow not for greatness, nor delights. I have ever thought the prosperitie of the world was a current of fresh water, which looketh not back on any thing, and hasteneth to pour it self into the salt sea. I onely grieve, that having brought to your Court two inestimable Jewels, virginity, and the reputation of a child of honour, the one, which I ought rather to have given to God, I dedicated to your bed, and the other is taken from me by your suspition, grounded upon a sudden surprizal of a word spoken from a heart perplexed to see you troubled. You have caused the Prince Paulinus to be put to death, and in doing this, you have not bereft me of a lover, but your self of a good and faithfull servant, and God grant the voice of bloud accuse you not before the tribunal of the Sovereign Judge. I hope God, who is the Protectour of innocents, wil one day take my cause in hand, and when truth shall give light through your suspitions, you at least will render me the honour, which I ever onely have sought to be conveyed into the ashes of my tomb.

Theodosius knew not how to answer her but with the moist dew of his eyes, which began to do the office of his lips, a few such words were enough to turn his soul topsie-turvie. Pulcheria readily made the stop, saying, that which was past could not be recalled, over which God giveth us no other power but of forgetfulness. That the Empress might in good time go to satisfie her devotion, and that were she herself free from the bondage of affairs, it would be one of her greatest contentments to bear her company.

Voyage of Eudoxia into Palestine.

Thus Eudoxia departed, travelling directly to Jerusalem, and with her the grace and alacrity of Court. All Constantinople was filled with sadness, at which time the plains of Palestine were already comforted with the first rays of this bright day-break. Whersoever she passed, the people ran thither by heaps to behold her, she was received with much applause, with eloquent orations, and all demonstrations of hearts affections; and particularly her approach was much celebrated in the Citie of Antioch. For it is said, the Senate going out to receive her, she replied at an instant, as she was sitting in her golden Caroch, to the Oration pronounced before her, and undertook to praise this famous Citie with so much grace and judgement, that the principal and most eminent of the Citie, ravished with such courtesie, dedicated two statues to her, the one of gold in the Senate-house, as to the Empress, the other of brass in their Library, as to the tenth Muse. Entring into Jerusalem, she was received as an Angel from Heaven, but above all, the Clergie rejoyced at the abode she meant to make there, well knowing the Church should thence derive great succours in its necessities. Some perswaded her David had prophesied she should re-edifie the walls of Jerusalem, because in the fifteenth Psalm, where these words are read, In bonâ voluntate tuâ ædificentur muri Jerusalem, the Septuagint have translated, in Εὐδοξίᾳ. The interpretation was not amiss; although it were not literal, it had the effect: For the pious Empress in process of time, made many most worthy reparations. There she began to live as in another world; she seemed to herself to have cast from her shoulders, the burden of a huge mountain, she now breathed a far other air than that of Court, she had another tast of things divine. All her study was to pray, meditate, and hear exhortations and spiritual conferences, to read and learn holy Scripture, to sow charities, that she might reap merits, to visit the Cells of Anchorets, to see how their garments and girdles were made, to observe their manner of living, to multiply Monasteries, to cloath Virgins, to heap up reliques together, and such like things.

Theodosius understanding her carriage, and the good entertainment she had every where, thought it was the work of God, who favoured her innocency, and at that time the flames of his chaste love began to burn more forcible than ever. He loved her with a love mingled with respect of her merit, and compassion of persecuted innocency. He was pleased to have her spoken of in private, and hear the life described she led in this new world. Chrysaphius perceiving him to take fire in good earnest, followed his opportunity according to promise, and one day seeing the Emperour well disposed, adventured to say:

Chrysaphius laboureth the return of the Empress, in the mean time seeking his own ends.

SACRED MAJESTY, How long will you deprive us of this Saint? Must needs the deserts of Palestine so long time possess her to our prejudice? It is a wonder your Palace hath not been able to endure a Virtue, which maketh it self to be seen, heard, and adored in the savage wildernesses. The poor Ladie hath well paid for a little sudden surprizal of speech. Know besides, she never hath failed in fidelity to your bed, and hereon I would swear upon the holy Evangelists, and expose my hand to the fire: But God hath already sufficiently declared it by the sequel of her deportments. What is done, is done: we cannot restore life to the dead, but we ought to yield honour to the living, which hath unjustly been taken from them. It is an obligation of conscience. Who hindereth we cannot suddenly see her by your sides? Theodosius answereth: It would be my desire, but thou seest the impediment, I fear my sister will not like it. Chrysaphius replieth: Truly my Ladie your Sister, ought to be satisfied with the absolute command your Majesty giveth her in all the affairs of your Kingdom, without attempting on the contentments of your marriage, or the honour of this good Princess, whose faults she should rather cover with her royal purple, if any such had escaped her, but of necessity she ought to honour her merits. Let me alone, and I will give her satisfaction.

Theodosius giveth him absolute Commission, and thereupon, as it is most probable, he adviseth the Empress to return to Constantinople, with small noise, and much haste, and so plotteth, that the Emperour under colour of going a hunting, saw her, spake to her, treateth with her of her return, which presently was published, and all the Citie, which passionately affected her, ushered her in. Behold her arrived, as if she had flown in the air, and received with much honour and magnificence into the Palace. Pulcheria amazed at this accident, setteth a good face upon it, entertaineth her with strict embraces, congratulateth her pilgrimage, speaketh to her of nothing but of Monasteries, Crosses, Reliques. In the mean time very closely sheweth, she did not well like him who had contrived this. Chrysaphius imagining he had to do with an Imperious Maid, seasoned from her youth in government, who never would forgive him this fault, resolveth to play at fast and loose, thinking he had credit enough to do this by the means of Eudoxia. For the love which Theodosius bare to her upon her return, was a torrent, which after it hath a long time been restrained, breaketh the forced dammes, and with vigorous impetuousness drowneth the fields. He was so ardent and passionate, that he seemed unable to deny her any thing. This was the cause, why Chrysaphius, whose name is as much as to say, a seamster of gold, having already made a seam of his trade, stitched another together more strong than the former. He boardeth the Emperour under the wings of Eudoxia, in the heat of his affections most ardent: Both joyning to make the battery more forcible, declare to him, That MADAME his Sister, daily desired to gain repose, as she had often said, and that it was a thing lawfully due for the long services she had yielded to the Crown. That it was a wonder, how she, having dedicated herself to the Church by the vow of virginitie, could perſevere ſo long in Court. That hereafter Theodoſius had one, who held with him the firſt place in all favours, on whom he might repoſe himſelf, and was thereunto obliged by reaſon, which was his wife. That the ſpirit of Pulcheria was not ſuitable to the humour of Eudoxia, when one ſtar riſeth, the oppoſite muſt fall.

Theodoſius apprehended this buſineſs as the moſt ſlippery path he had ever trod: but what cannot love and the ſoft inticements of a woman do? Wearied out with ceaſeleſs importunities, he yieldeth, he ſendeth for Flavian the Patriarch, and intreateth him to put his ſiſter Pulcheria in the rank of virgins, who are dedicated to the ſervice of the Church, were ſhe willing or unwilling. Flavian, much amazed at this manner of proceeding, telleth him he ſhould take good heed of this reſolution, that he undertook one of the greateſt paſſages of State he had ever done in his life, and that the danger thereof was much to be feared. The Emperour repelleth, he hath well pondered it, that ſuch was his will, and he muſt ſpeedily ſee it executed. The Patriarch (Pulcheria being exceedingly affected by all the Clergy) adviſeth her to withdraw without further reſiſtance, otherwiſe he ſhould be forced to do that which would much trouble him. The good Ladie underſtood well what he would ſay, ſhe had already ſmelt the plot, and was unwilling to do any thing unworthy of her virtue: for ſeeing her fortune altered by the change of the Emperour her brothers will, ſhe freely diſpoyled herſelf of the manage of affairs, as from a ſhirt, which one hath long worn, and retiring from the Palace, went to lodge in a houſe ſomewhat diſtant from Conſtantinople, where ſhe lived in marvellous ſanctity. Virtue is as the Geometrical Cube, on what ſide ſoever it be caſt, it always findeth its baſis.

Behold then a new face of government, which beginneth under Chryſaphius and Eudoxia: But the miſchief was, an old dotard, called Eutyches, came into the field to ſow an hereſie, holding the body of our Lord, after the union with the Word, was no more of the ſame nature that ours are, but that the humanity was wholly diſſolved into the Divinity. The hypocrite ſo covered his opinion, that he ſhewed not to teach this doctrine, but for the reverence he bare to the Son of God. This became a ſtumbling-block to many good ſouls. As he advanced this propoſition, the Biſhops oppoſed to ſuppreſs it, and he for a ſhelter caſt himſelf into the arms of Chryſaphius, who not contented to embrace this buſineſs with all fervour, embarketh likewiſe therein the Emperour Theodoſius and Eudoxia his wife, firſt through great ſimplicity, afterward by a ſtrange unhappineſs, which almoſt brought them to deſtruction, if the Divine goodneſs had not otherwiſe diſpoſed. Theodoſius, the holy and pious Emperour, perſecuted the Religious and Saints. He wrote to Pope Leo in favour of Eutyches, he cauſed falſe Councels to be held, and covered the ſeditious under the protection of his arms, even to the authorizing the attempt committed on the perſon of the good Patriarch Flavianus by expreſs letters. What doth not a playſtered ſanctity for the ſubverſion of the ſimple? What doth not a bad ſervant, when once he poſſeſſeth the eaſie nature of his Maſter?

Pulcheria, who ſome years before had ſeen the hereſie of Neſtorius to ariſe, and had partly ſtifled it when ſhe was in the manage of affairs, by her excellent direction, never was deceived in the choice of a ſide, but moſt conſtantly tied herſelf to the doctrine of the See Apoſtolick. That gave a particular benediction to all her enterprizes, and made her ſway in the peoples hearts, as ſhe cauſed true religion to flouriſh on Altars. All the Eaſtern and Weſtern Clergie eſteemed her, and lent their aſſiſtance to maintain her authority, which was no little ſupport. All thoſe who have ſought to ſtrike theſe Powers, have therein loſt their endeavours. And very well Ariſtobulus King of the Jews, one of the greateſt States-men who had governed that Kingdom, being upon his death-bed, freely confeſſed, the fouleſt fault he had ever committed in matter of policie, was, to have oppoſed the Phariſees, who then had lawfull authority over affairs of Religion; and gave his wife Alexandra counſel to practiſe and hold good intelligence with them by all poſſible means. The very ſame which he adviſed out of reaſon of State, Pulcheria practiſed by conſideration of piety, and ever held herſelf firm on the rock of S. Peter, as it it is ſaid, the mothers of pearl fix themſelves to rocks during the tempeſt. If the wicked Eutyches had appeared in her time, ſhe had conſumed his hereſie as the ice of one night under the rays of the Sun; but it was then the kingdom of darkneſs. Chryſaphius perpetually beſieged the ears and heart of the Emperour Theodoſius, diſguiſing all affairs to him according to the ſway of his own paſſion. He drew along with him the good Eudoxia, who became too curiouſly intelligent in matter of religion, and loſt herſelf to follow rather the aims of her pregnant wit, than the tracks of holy humility, more agreeing to her ſex.

Pulcheria, who underſtood all this goodly buſineſs, was much perplexed to ſee her brother and ſiſter in law, after they had ſhaken off the yoke of her good precepts, to fall into a little apoſtacie: and not being able to get acceſs to talk with them, ſhe made the apple of her weeping eyes ſpeak to God in continual prayers. She wrote to Rome, ſometime to the Emperour Valentinian her couſin, ſometime to Eudoxia the Younger, his wife, daughter of our Eudoxia, ſometime to Pope Leo himſelf, ſoliciting them for the reduction of theſe poor wandering ſheep: ſhe every where diſpoſed ſquadrons of religious perſons, to force God with the arms of prayers. All the powers of Heaven and earth conſpired at that time: The battery was ſtrong enough to move a heart that never yet was obdurate.

In the end Theodoſius awakened, as out of a long ſleep, opened his eyes, and with horrour ſaw the precipice, whereinto he was ready to fall. He deteſteth the diſaſtrous Eutyches, and leaveth him to the cenſures of the Church. Pulcheria four years after her baniſhment, returned in triumph to the Court, with the general applauſe of all ſorts. Her firſt care was to ſeize on the perſon of Chryſaphius, and by form of juſtice to ſend him into the other world, that he might no longer trouble this, wherein ſhe ſhewed, that living otherwiſe as a bee in the delights of virginity, ſhe had not ſo much honey, but withal a ſting.

Theodoſius awakened.

The poor Eudoxia well perceived her Miſtreſs was returned, and her heart bled to behold this change. She no longer remembred the condition of Athenais, and ſhe who before would not be but under the feet of Pulcheria, could not endure her now by her ſides. It is a ſtrange thing, how the ayr of the Court doth, as it were, neceſſarily breath ambition. Theſe two pure ſouls, which ſeemed in the beginning (as an Ancient hath ſaid) able to abide together in the eye of a needle, when they were in concord, found the whole world in their diſcord too little for their ſeparation. Eudoxia, tyred with the many revolutions of Court, returneth to Jeruſalem, as a Pilgrim, with a great oath never to ſet foot again in Conſtantinople: and verily ſhe had her tomb in Paleſtine, as we ſhall ſee anon.

Great prudence to ſtick to Altars and the true Church.

Theodorus in the collection of his hiſtory, inſinuateth to us, that ſhe never undertook this voyage till the death of the Emperour Theodoſius her husband, which happened ſhortly after. You would have ſaid that his good ſiſter was come of purpoſe to diſpoſe his ſoul for this paſſage. He was about fifty years of age, and had already ruled fourty three years, with a moſt happy reign, had not this apple of diſcord been, which outragiouſly diſturbed the peace of his Court, and ſteeped his life in many acerbities. That which is read moſt probable of his death, is, that riding a hunting at full ſpeed, and falling from his horſe, he hurt the reins of his back, ſo that of neceſſity he muſt be carried back to his Palace in a litter, at which time he plainly ſaw his laſt hour approched, and ſigned his innocent life with the ſeal of a death truly Chriſtian. A Prince in all things elſe of a moſt ſincere life, religious, learned, mild, courteous, patient, in whom nothing could be blamed, but the over-much facility of his nature, which many times made his heart of wax to be moulded in the hands of thoſe who were neareſt unto him, and this was in a manner the cauſe of his ruin. But it was well for him he betook himſelf firmly to the good counſels of his ſiſter, who dearly loved his good, and aimed at nothing but the glory and repoſe of his Empire. We have here inſerted his Pourtraicture and Elogie.

A Scepter free from pride, a goodneſs ſweet,
A life not feign'd, but where true graces meet.
As Zeal he for ſole favour did advance,
So Heav'n his ſhield became, the Croſs his lance.

Marriage of Pulcheria, and new government.

HE had no male iſſue by his wife Eudoxia, and the Empire might not fall to the diſtaff, which ſeemed to invite theſe two Princeſſes, who till this day had ſwayed in government, to ſound the retreat. But Pulcheria was become very neceſſary for the ſtate, and as yet had not loſt the appetite of rule. Theodoſius having caſt his eyes, by the adviſe of his Councel, upon Martianus, to declare him Succeſſour in his Empire, Pulcheria married him, onely under the title of wedlock, with mutual conſent of both parties to keep virginity. This woman was made to govern men and Empires. She was already fifty years old, and had mannaged the State about thirty ſeven. Behold ſhe beginneth a new reign, with the best man of the world, who onely had the name of a husband, and in effect served and respected her with as much regard and humility, as if he had been her own son. She could not in the world have made a better choice. This great man was naturally enclined to piety, justice, compassion towards the necessities of mankind. He was very valiant, for he had all his life time been bred among arms, and during his Empire no barbarous Nation durst stir, so much was he feared. It was a wonder by what byas God led him directly to the height of worldly honours. He was of base extraction, a Thracian born, of a good wit, and a body very robustious, which made him find a sweetnes in war. He going to Philippolis to be enrolled in the list of souldiers, by chance it happened he found a dead body upon the way, newly massacred. This good man, who was very compassionate, had pitie thereon, and approched to give it burial; but this charity was like to have cost him his life: for being busily employed to enterre this body, one laid hold on his throat, as if he had been the murderer, and that he made this grave for no other intention but to bury his own guilt. The poor man defendeth himself in his innocency as well as he could, but conjectures prevail beyond his defence. He was now under the sword of the executioner, when by good hap the homicide was produced, who had done the deed, convicted by his own confession. This man thrust his head into the place of the innocent, and Martianus brought his away to behold it one day glitter under the rubies and diamonds of the Imperial Crown. This was not without long trials of his ability, which transferred him from degree to degree, through all the hazards of a long and painfull warfare. He was then mature in years, in account one of the greatest Captains of the Empire. Behold why Pulcheria could not be deceived in her choice. This good husband, who held his wife as a Saint, was wholly directed by her counsels, and she daily purified his soul in religion and policie: He became in short time so brave and perfect in this school, that he was accounted one of the most accomplished Emperours who had born the scepter since Constantine. God well shewed his love and faithfull protection towards Martianus, when in the second year of his Empire, he diverted the furious Attila from the East, who even now roared over the Citie of Constantinople, as a thunderstroke before it brake in shivers.

Marvellous accident of Martianus.

Good success of Martianus.

This Attila was a Scythian, a great Captain, who promised to himself the Empire of the world, and for that cause had taken the field with an Army of 700000. men, composed of strange and hydeous Nations, who had gone out of their countrey like a scum of the earth, ranging themselves under the conduct of Attila, for the great experience he had in the manage of arms. He notwithstanding was a little man, harsh, violent, his breast large, his head great, the eye of a Pismeer, his nose flat, his beard close shaved, beginning already to wax grisled. He walked with so much state as if he thought the earth had been unworthy to bear him, and though meerly barbarous, the desire of honour so possessed him, that being one day at Milan, and seeing pictures, where the Roman Emperours were represented, who had Scythians, his Countrey-men, cast at their feet, was so enraged, that instantly he sent for a painter, and caused himself to be drawn, in a very eminent golden throne, and clothed in royal robes, and the Emperours of Rome and Constantinople bearing bags on their shoulders filled with crowns, then made them to be poured at his feet, alluding hereby to the vast sums of money he in good earnest extorted from the Empire, and which Theodosius gave him afterwards to divert the course of his arms; thinking that speedily to dispatch such an enemy out of his territories, it was onely fit to make for him a bridge of silver. This man seemed created to shake the pillars of the earth, and for that cause made himself to be called The scourge of God. There was no infant so little, in the arms of the nurse, who hearing Attilas named, did not think he saw a wolf. He considering that Martianus, a most valiant man, at that time swayed the Eastern Empire, durst not come near, but hastened to fall upon the West, where Valentinian the Younger reigned, son of Honorius, cousin of Theodosius and Pulcheria, a wanton and dissolute Prince, as you shall understand in the course of this history, loosing his life and Empire by his sensuality. So it was that Attila, attempting first upon the Gaules, found work enough; for the Romanes, French, and Gothes (not unlike dogs, who after they have worried one another, rally themselves together to resist the wolf) by a common consent, heartened each other under the conduct of Ætius, Moroneus, and Thyerry, against this Barbarian, and having given him battel, defeated one part of his army in the Catalonian plains: but he failed not to pack away, creeping along like a great serpent, which loaden with redoubled blows given by peasants, hath received a maim in his body, and notwithstanding saved his head.

God, who derideth the proud, and in his Amphitheater is pleased to make, not Lions to fight with bulls, but the weakness of the earth against the most insolent greatness, reserved the conquest of this monster to Religious persons and women. It is a wonder, he coming to Rome as to the period and butt of his ambitions, all enflamed with great desires, in this clattering of harness, and loud noise of Armies, all the world trembling under the scourge, the brave Pope S. Leo went out to seek him, and preached so well unto him, that being come thither as a lion, he returned as a lamb: for Attila entertained him with marvellous respect. So had he done before to S. Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, granting him whatsoever he could desire. All his Captains were much amazed, for among other titles, this Hun had the name of being inexorable to suppliants; and it then being curiously asked of him, who made him at that time loose his furie, he confessed he saw a venerable person by Leo's side (it was the great Saint Peter) who threatned him with death, if he condescended not to what the good Pope desired of him.

Attila then leaveth Italie and passeth into Sclavonia, without being wished for again but by one sole woman. Alas! who would believe it? Honoria sister of the Emperour, cousin germane to Pulcheria, fell in love with this monster. I know not what she had seen in his picture, which commonly was painted with the horns of a bull on his fore-head: it was not in my opinion his fair eyes, nor goodly nose, which made him sought after, for he was one of the most deformed creatures of the world: Yet he notwithstanding was reputed a great Captain and a puissant King. This blind Princess so breathed the air of ambition, that though he were wholly Pagan and hydeous, she no whit was affrighted: for verily her passion was so much enkindled, that she secretly dispatched one of her Eunuches with expres letters, beseeching Attila he would demand her in marriage of the Emperour her brother, and she should account it a great honour to be his wife. This Scythian entered into a much greater estimation of his own worth than ever, beholding himself sued unto by a Romane Ladie of noble extraction, and thereupon grew so eager, that he immediately addresseth an Embassadour to the Emperour Valentinian, to require his sister of him in marriage, and the moity of his Kingdom; otherwise he was not gone back so far, but he would return with his Army to enforce his obedience.

All

All the world was now ſtrucken with terrour, when by good chance he ſaw himſelf, for ſome preſſing occaſions, engaged to return into his Countrey, where all theſe lightenings were quickly turned into a ſhower of bloud. After he had ſweat under harneſs, like another Hannibal, who in the end of his conqueſts was bruitiſhly beſotted in the boſom of a Capuan Ladie, this haughty King of Hunnes, as ſoon as he came into his Countrey, wholly engulphed himſelf in wine and love. Beſides a great rabble of creatures which he had to ſatisfie his luſt, he became in his old days paſſionately enamoured of a gentlewoman named Hildecon, whom he married with ſports, feaſts, and exceſſive alacrity. That evening, after he had freely drunk, according to his cuſtom, he retired into his nuptial chamber with his new ſpouſe, and the next morning was found dead in his bed, floating in a river of bloud, who had drawn bloud from all the veins of the world.

Death of Attila.

Some ſaid it was an eruption of bloud, which choaked him, but others thought Hildecon, lead thereunto one knoweth not by what ſpirit, nor by whom ſollicited, handled her pretended husband as Judith did Holofernes. Behold how God puniſheth the proud. A deſpicable dwarf, who commanded over 700000. men, who forraged every where, environed as with a brazen wall, who boaſted in the lightenings of his puiſſant arms, who razed Cities all ſmoking in bloud and flames, who waſted Provinces, who deſtroyed Empires, who would not tread but on Crowns and Scepters, behold him the very night of his nuptials, full of drink, maſſacred by a woman, having not ſo much as the honour to die by the hand of a man.

The ſame night that Attila yielded up the ghoſt in his own bloud, our Saviour appeared in a dream to the good Emperour Martianus, and ſhewing him a great bowe all ſhivered in pieces, ſaith: Martianus, behold the bowe of Attila which I have broken; thou haſt no further cauſe to fear thy Empire. Thus you ſee, how God fighteth for the pious even while they ſleep.

This ſcourge being ſo fortunately diverted, Martianus and Pulcheria attended with all their power to the conſolation and ornament of the univerſal Church, under the direction of the great Pope Saint Leo, whom their Majeſties moſt punctually obeyed. At that time were ſeen the reliques to march in triumph into Conſtantinople, of the good Patriarch Flavianus, maſſacred by the practices of hereticks; at that time the exiled Biſhops were with honour reeſtabliſhed in their ſeats: At that time the Councel of Chalcedon was celebrated, where the Emperour Martianus, though wholly a ſouldier, made an Oration, firſt in Latin for the honour of the Romane Church, then in Greek his natural language. At that time hereſie was fully condemned, and impudence ſurcharged with confuſion: At that time an infinite number of goodly Canons were confirmed by the Councel, and ſtrongly maintained by the authority of the Emperour: At that time juſtice was fixed in the height of perfection. Briefly, at that time the whole world was infinitely comforted by the good order and liberalities of this holy Court.

It was an admirable Empire, and a happy marriage, and nothing could be deſired more in this match but immortality. But the holy Virgin Pulcheria being about fifty years of age, not ſo much loaden with years as merits, wearied out with continual travel and care, which ſhe had endured almoſt fourty years in the mannage of affairs, found her repoſe in exchange of the Court of Conſtantinople for that of Paradiſe. She died in a moſt pure virginity, which ſhe carefully had preſerved all her life time, leaving the poor for her heirs, who were her delight, after ſhe had built in her own life time five Churches, and among the reſt, one to the honour of the moſt Bleſſed Virgin Marie, which ſurpaſſeth all the other in magnificence, beſides many hoſpitals and ſepulchres for pilgrimes. Torches made of aromatick wood, caſt out their odoriferous exhalations when they are almoſt waſted; and the virtuous Pulcheria made all the good odours of her life evaporate in the laſt inſtant of her death. She who had lived as the Bee in the taſtfull ſweetneſs of purity, died as the Phenix in the Palms, not of Arabia, but of conqueſts, which ſhe had obtained over the enemies of our nature. We have here annexed her Picture and Elogie.

A Golden Virgin in an iron Age,
Who trampled under foot infernal rage,
A barren wife, a fruitfull maid, unstain'd,
That all the world within her heart contain'd:
Mother of people, Mistress over Kings, (brings.
And who 'twixt Church and Law firm union
She in herself bright Scepters did behold
Joyn'd to the Cross, Altars to Crowns of gold,
The married life unto virginitie,
And glorious greatness to humilitie.
If virtue were a substance to be seen,
Well might we here suppose this happy Queen
Should lend her body, that it outward may Resplendent lustre to the world display.

GReat-ones may here behold, the shortest way to the Temple of Honour, is to pass by that of Virtue. Never woman was more honoured in her life, never woman more glorious in her death. That great Pope S. Leo, S. Cyril, and all the excellent men both of the East and West, have employed their pens in her honour. So magnificent and noble acclamations were made to her in Councels, that nothing would be wished more glorious. A little before her death in the Councel of Chalcedon, they cried out, Long live the Empress most Sacred, Long live PULCHERIA, Long live the Second S. Helena: God preserve the Saint, Preserve the Orthodox, Preserve Her who is the Guardian of Faith;

What tropheys of Alexanders and Cæsars are comparable to such honour? Raderus, who hath learnedly written her life, maketh a collection of her titles, and calleth her the holy Pulcheria, ever a virgin, always sacred; a virgin out of marriage, a virgin in marriage; daughter of an Emperour, wife of an Emperour, Mistress of Emperours, Protectress of Popes, Guardian of faith, Bulwark of the faithfull, Honour of the Church, Glory of the Empire, the new Helena, the new Miracle of the world, the new Example for posterity. The titles which Saints have given her, and her name in the quality of a Saint, have been couched in the Menologe of the Grecians and the Roman Martyrologe, the 10th September, a month wherein she passed from this world to the glory of Saints, in the year of our Lord 453. And Martianus her husband being not able to live without this celestial soul, fled quickly hence after her, to enjoy the recompence of his piety. Of whom behold here the Picture and Elogie.

Eudoxia lived in the holy land in the Eutychian hereſie.

LEt us return now to our pilgrime Eudoxia, who lived in the holy land, not being in the way of ſanctity. A woman endowed with a goodly body and a fair ſpirit, hath the charge of a veſſel very hard to be ſteered; more of ſuch ſuffer ſhipwrack than reach the Haven. The good Princeſs departed from Conſtantinople in grief, gall, and anxiety, which proceeded from the change of her fortune, and that which is more, ſeduced alſo with the hereſie of the wicked Eutyches. Theodoſius her husband yielded at the firſt encounter, and ſubmitted under the obedience of the Church: Eudoxia ſtill perſiſted, ſo apt the nature of women is to maintain an errour with obſtinacy. She had but too much wit to be deceived, and yet not prudence enough to diſcover the deceit. A wolf clothed in the skin of a ſheep, that is to ſay, one Theodoſius, a falſe Monk, who had gained her under appearance of ſanctity, and much wrought upon her during her abode in Paleſtine, wholly plunged her in the mire of hereſie, which ſhe ſupported in his favour, and endeavoured to illuſtrate by the ſubtilitie of her wit.

How was it poſſible but this hereſie of Eutyches, masked with the falſe zeal of reverence towards the Perſon of the Son of God, might not enſnare a woman, very eaſie to take impreſſions, which had ſemblance of devotion, ſince even divers holy Hermits, who numbred many years in auſterities and penance, before they were well informed, ſuffered themſelves to be tranſported with this novelty? Among others the great Geraſimus was ſeen to fall; that Angel of the deſert, who tamed Lions and uſed them as Mules, was beheld involved in the ſnares of this infamous Apoſtata, from whom he afterward freed himſelf by the mercy of God. It was a lamentable thing to ſee this poor Empreſs, who had forſaken all the greatneſs of Court, to live in retired ſolitarineſs, thus caught in the nets of her own judgement. She thought daily to amaſs infinite heaps of good works in the exerciſes of piety, which ſhe inceſſantly practiſed, and it was but duſt ſhe bare in her hands, blown away by the wind of preſumption. God would not looſe this fair ſoul, which he had enchaſed in a beauteous body, to make her in the end of her days, an exact miracle of virtue; and as ſhe kicked ſomewhat too eagerly againſt ſo many teſtimonies of verity, he reſolved to break this feminine pride with the iron rod of another very ſenſible affliction. She was then in her own opinion out of the danger of inconſtancy, but had ſtill one part of her ſelf upon the Imperial Throne, who received all the violence of the ſtorm, to make the effects thereof paſs into her heart by the painfull counterbuff of a love, which could not be renounced without a petty apoſtacy in nature.

Eudoxia's affliction in her daughter.

Eudoxia her onely daughter, inheritrix of the name and beauty of her mother, was married to Valentinian Emperour of Rome, to be the ſubject of a wofull tragedy, and to make poſterity behold, that too eminent greatneſs is often ruined with thunder. This Valentinian ſiſters ſon of the Emperour Honorius, couſin of Theodoſius, not being able to content himſelf with the ſprings of his own houſe (according to the proverb) and repoſe himſelf in the beauty of a Princeſs ſo accompliſhed, as he in lawfull wedlock had eſpouſed, daily went a hunting after change in the infinity of forbidden loves. The ſenſuality of this Prince ſo much diſpleaſed God, that for this vice he ruined in his perſon this great Roman Empire, which ſo many times had cauſed her victorious chariots, loaden with Palms and Laurels, to paſs over the heads of the Kings and Monarchs of the world; ſo often had it been ſhaken, and ſo many times eſtabliſhed by concuſſion; needs muſt a wicked ſin of luxury interpoſe it recoverably to entomb it.

Strange diſorders in the Roman Empire.

Luſt ruineth Empires.

The Emperour then beholdeth with a wanton eye the wife of an eminent Senatour, named Maximus, and ſeeing this Lady was honeſt and loyal to her huſband, he thought her a bird not eaſily caught. Behold he reſolveth to trie all the priviledges of his power, and break all the bands of equity to give vent to his paſſion. What doth he? Behold he inviteth Maximus to a ſumptuous and royal banquet, which he had prepared, miſerable man! who knew not this feaſt was a ſnare laid to entrap the honour of his wife. After ſupper Valentinian inviteth him to play, under the colour of paſſing away the time, which he moſt willingly did, and ſo heateth him in game, that after he had loſt all, he gageth down the ring off his finger, wherewith he uſed to ſeal his letters. Valentinian wan it, greatly rejoycing, not ſo much for the value of the gemme in it, which was of great price, as to have found a paſſage to his treacherous deſign. He preſently diſpatcheth a gentleman with this ring, who bare news to the Lady, that her husband ſent for her to the Palace to ſalute the Emperour. This was a very well coloured pretext: Notwithſtanding it caſt moſt ſtrong apprehenſions into the ſoul of his Lady, who too well knew the deportments of this Prince. But conſidering this precious pledge of her husband, held for an undoubted earneſt-penny of his command; ſhe goeth, and conſecrateth all the difficulties which ſhe conceived, to the obedience towards her Lord. The poor Lady was no ſooner arrived, but was raviſhed and violated, to ſatisfie the bruitiſh luſt of a man, more drunk with love than wine.

The Palace of a Chriſtian Emperour, which ſhould be a Sanctuary for the chaſtity of Ladies, is by an act black and villanous defiled. The chaſte turtle, who would not ſurvive her honour, as ſoon as ſhe returneth to her lodging, exclaimeth againſt her husband with outragious words, thinking he had conſented to this diſaſter. Go (ſaith ſhe to him) ingratefull and unnatural man as thou art, to proſtitute the honour of thy wife to the bruitiſhneſs of a Prince, abandoned by God and men: doſt thou not yet feel the executioners of thy conſcience, which reproach thee with thy crime? Maximus, much amazed at ſuch words, What is the matter, or where have you been, fooliſh woman? ſaith he. She ſhewing the ring, Doſt not thou yet acknowledge thy diſloyaltie, ſilly and perfidious man? behold that which will accuſe thee before God. He, as ſhe began to unfold herſelf, too ſoon found his own ſhame, enjoyneth her to ſilence and diſſimulation, and hath no vein in him which tendeth not to vengeance.

Valentinian had a brave and valiant Captain, who ſupported the whole Empire: this was Aetius, very lately adorned with the ſpoils of Attila, whom he in a pitcht battel had vanquiſhed. Maximus thought he muſt ruinate this pillar to make the whole houſe to fall, and therein was not deceived. But being a man full of craft, ſo diſſembleth what was paſt concerning his wife, as if it had never come to his knowledge, onely he endeavoureth to gain the good opinion of a powerfull Eunuch, named Heraclius, who was the Emperours inſtrument, and having already gotten him at his devotion, ſuggeſteth to him in great ſecret, he had learned from a good hand, that Aetius, Lieutenant General of the Emperour, was much puffed up with the victory he obtained againſt Attila, and that he on all ſides practiſed confederacies both within and without the Kingdom, to make himſelf abſolute Maſter of all; that under the ſhadow of entertaining the French and Gothes in good correſpondence with the Empire, he purchaſed them for his own ſervice with the Emperours revenues, and that nothing remained for him but to ſet the Diadem upon his own head, which quickly he would do, were he not with all ſpeed prevented. Heraclius faileth not roundly to relate all this to his Maſter, who was already ſtirred with jealouſie towards Aetius, ſeeing his fortune took ſo high a flight, that it ſeemed to mount above wind and tempeſt. Valentinian, a hair-braind Prince, perpetually drunk with luſt and choller, without any further inquiſition, ſendeth for Aetius to the Palace, and with enraged paſſion, How (ſaith he) Traytour, is it thou who undertakeſt to bereave me of the Crown? and ſaying that, taketh out a poinyard which he had in his boſom, and killed him with his own hand. An act both bold and barbarous.

The poor Aetius, who had born the brunt of an Army of ſeven hundred thouſand men, who firſt confronted a man that ſhoke the pillars of all Empires, who returned from the Gaules amply loaden with victorious Palms, one of the moſt glorious Captains that ever was, at that time ſhewed at Rome as a prodigy of valour, fell dead as a ſacrifice at the feet of his Maſter, receiving by the juſt judgement of God, that entertainment he before had given to Bonifacius the great Governour of Affrick. Valentinian, as if he had acted a Maſter-piece, went preſently to one of his wiſeſt Counſellours to boaſt thereof, asking of him if he had not well played his prize. The other replieth: Sacred Majeſty, if you had taken a hatchet with your right hand, and cut off your left arm inſtead of giving this accurſed blow, you had not done ſo ill. And I believe you too ſoon will feel the loſs you have received. Theſe words were not without effect, for the death of Aetius being preſently after divulged, it put the ſouldiers into fury, who loved him as a brave and valiant Captain, under whoſe ſtandard they had given ſo ample teſtimonies of their worth.

Two

Two of the moſt hardy of them, Oſtius and Tranſtilas, after they had maſſacred the Eunuch Heraclius, aſſailed the perſon of the Emperour, who was at that time in the field of Mars, and deſperately murdered him, it being impoſſible to free himſelf from their hands, God permitting this in revenge of the murder lately committed, and ſo many adulteries wherewith this miſerable Prince, degenerating from the bloud of Theodoſius, was polluted.

Maximus, who caſt the ſtone, and afterward withdrew his arm, cauſing all this tragedy to be acted to his own advantage, after the death of Valentinian, as being moſt eminent, obtained the Empire with little reſiſtance, and his wife during theſe enterprizes being dead (perhaps through diſcontent for her own diſaſter) ſeeketh the marriage of the Empreſs Eudoxia, wife of Valentinian and daughter of our Athenais. The poor Princeſs drenched in a deluge of ſorrow for the death of the Emperour her husband, ſhewed in the beginning to be deaf in this motion of marriage: but as the ſpirits of women are mutable and ſoothed with glory, in few days forgetting death, ſhe reſolveth to live among the living, and for accommodation of her affairs, weddeth Maximus. Behold him in a ſhort time in the Throne and bed of his Maſter, revenging himſelf of one wickedneſs by another much more execrable. But vice in greatneſs hath ever a ſtaggering foot. Maximus was no ſooner entred into the Palace, but his head aked, and the remorſe of conſcience diſtracted him: His moſt truſty friends heard him ſighing ſay, he eſteemed that ancient Damocles happy, who was a King but the ſpace of a dinner-while; ſo much already was he diſquieted with the Empire, as if he had foreſeen his own cataſtrophe. It chanced one day this unhappy man, familiarly diſcourſing with his new ſpouſe, let a word eſcape him, which coſt him his life: for to give her a great token of his affection, he confeſſed himſelf to have intermedled in the deſign of Valentinian his death, not ſo much for the deſire of the Empire, as of her beauty. Eudoxia was ſtricken with ſtrange horrour at theſe words not ſuppoſing her firſt husband had been deprived of life and ſcepter by his practices, and therefore reſolving to be revenged, ſhe covereth her plot with diſſimulation, and bendeth all her powers to content his humour. She ſaw how her mother had been uſed at Conſtantinople, ſo that from thence probably ſhe could expect no ſuccour. The fury of revenge tranſported her to an act very hazardous, which was to call Genſericus King of the Wandals, in ſect an Arian, reigning in Affrick, to make a voyage into Italie, which he did with a huge Army, by means whereof he eaſily poſſeſſed himſelf of Rome, where all was in diſorder: And as he thither came, rather led by his unquencheable avarice than any motive of juſtice or piety, he riffled all that which was rich and excellent, even to the treaſures of the Temple of Jeruſalem, whereof ſome had ſtill been preſerved at Rome, ever ſince Veſpaſian. Maximus, after he had reigned two moneths, is knocked down and rent like a ſacrifice. He who in all charges had well thrived with honeſty, when he began to practice treachery, found that which a great Prelate had ſaid in his hiſtory, That great mens fortunes like ſcorpions carry their venom in their tails.

Wicked revenge of a woman.

Sidon. Apol. lib. 7. Ep. 13. Ut ſcorpius ultimâ parte pericutis.

The Empreſs Eudoxia, who to ſatisfie her feminine paſſion, had made all this goodly innovation, in the ſight of the great Pope S. Leo, who was ſpectatour of all theſe calamities, mended not her market: for ſhe with her two daughters, were by this Barbarian carried into Affrick, one of which bare her name, and was married to the ſon of Genſericus, who afterward poſſeſſed the ſcepter: and the other was Placidia, ſent in the end with her mother to Conſtantinople, after the death of Martianus. Behold terrible accidents.

Converſion of Eudoxia.

Eudoxia our pilgrime, after recital made to her of all this tragedy, began ſeriouſly to open her eyes, and laying her hand juſt upon the wound, acknowledged ſo many diſaſters had befallen her, for that ſhe had ſtrayed from the true faith. Thereupon to ſettle her wavering ſpirit, ſhe deputeth an Embaſſadour to holy Simeon Stilites, near the Citie of Antioch.

Stilites.

This Simeon was a prodigie of man, who lived in a body as if he had been but a ſpirit. For figure to your ſelf a pillar fourty foot high, and on this pillar ſome little ſhroud fixed there as a birds neſt, open and expoſed on all ſides to the injuries of weather; there this great man, to raiſe his body to God as well as his heart, placed his abode. It was a ſtrange lodging, where he could neither lye nor ſit in any faſhion, but ever ſtood bolt upright, without roof, without coverture, his hairs being ſomewhat whitened with ſnow, and his beard full of yſicles, ſometime roaſted with the boiling heats of the Sun, and in the midſt of all this he paſſed his days and nights in contemplation, eating but once a week, and that very ſparingly.

To this famous Hermit then, who was the Oracle of Chriſtendom, Eudoxia ſendeth Anaſtatius, a truſty Biſhop, who in much ſecrecy laboured her converſion, to conſult with him upon doubts of faith. Simeon anſwereth in theſe terms:

Poor Princeſs, the malice of the evil ſpirit, who ſaw the great treaſures of thy rare virtues, would needs winnow and ſift thee. Theodoſius the falſe Monk, a miniſter of Satan, hath corrupted thy fair and glorious ſoul. But courage, my Daughter, thou ſhalt die in the true faith, conſult no more with me, thou ſeekeſt water far off, having the fountain near at hand. It behoveth to addreſs thee to Euthymius, who will ſerve as thy directour in a happy way.

This anſwer being related to Eudoxia, ſhe cauſed this Euthymius to be ſought out on all ſides, who ſhould undertake this buſineſs. He was a venerable Hermit, having become hoary in the exerciſes of a long penance, and one who was hard to be found out, ſo much he avoided light and the converſation of men. Notwithſtanding God permitted him to be found, and brought, as it were by force, to the place where the good Empreſs was. She ſeeing this bleſſed old man, proſtrated herſelf at his feet, ſaying: Father, I have lived long enough, ſince I have the honour to behold you, it is from your hand I expect the remedy of all my evils. The holy man raiſing her with much ſweetneſs, Daughter (ſaith he) the evil ſpirit hath too much abuſed your credulity: It is time you open your eyes to ſee the ſcourges of God. All your ills have proceeded of nothing but infidelity. And if now you deſire to be cured, there is but one word: Stand no longer upon diſputation, but follow the Councels of Nice and Conſtantinople. Behold the rule of your faith, which you ſhall learn of John Biſhop of Jeruſalem.

Euthymius, after he had thus ſpoken to her, returneth to his Cell, and ſhe goeth directly to the Temple of Jeruſalem, attended by an infinite number of Religious, lifting their hands to Heaven in thankſgiving for this converſion. She abjureth the hereſie of Eutyches, between the hands of the Biſhop, and abſolutely reconcileth herſelf to the Catholick Church, with ſo much fervour and zeal, that ſhe ceaſed not all the reſt of her days to extirpate impiety, & amplifie the church in all parts of the Eaſt where her power extended.

Worthy life, and glorious death of Eudoxia.

The good Empreſs then led a life wholly celeſtial, her ſoul being purged in the furnace of painful tribulation, afterward purified more and more in the love of God, held not of the body but by a ſlender thread. Her heart was an incenſe, daily diſſolved into the flames of her charity, ſending to Heaven its fragrant exhalations Her two eies were the conduits, by which penance with a powerfull expreſſion, diſtilled tears, which are as the nectar of the love of God; her hands like thoſe of the Spouſe, true globes of gold, repleniſhed with an ocean of bounty, poured through the cities and deſerts of Paleſtine. In every place nothing was to be ſeen but Churches and Hoſpitals, but houſes for the poor built at her coſt; ſo that an Authour named Cyrillus who lived in her time, aſſureth, it was a thing impoſſible to number them, God being willing to diſpoſe her paſſage out of this life by the exerciſe of ſo many good works. And being upon the confines of her laſt year, ſhe went to viſit a magnificent Church of S. Peter, which ſhe had founded, and one day repoſing near to a ceſtern, where ſhe laboured for the good of the ſaid Church, ſhe began to caſt her eyes upon a great number of Monaſteries, all near one to another, which were in the charge of her good father Euthymius, then fetching a deep affectionate ſigh, ſhe ſpake theſe words of the 24. Numeri: O Jacob, how fair are thy pavillions! O Iſrael, how excellent thy tabernacles! Then turning herſelf to a gentleman of her train, Go (ſaith ſhe) ſeek out Euthymius, and intreat him to do me the honour, that I once again may ſpeak to him. If he ſhall ſay, he ſpeaketh not with women, tell him I no longer know what ſex is, and that I converſe onely with Angels. Euthymius in his cell had by revelation, that this Saint ſhould quickly paſs to a better life, and he came directly to bring her the news thereof. The Empreſs ſaluted him very courteouſly, and diſpoſed her heart to ſpeak to him touching a certain ſum of money, ſhe deſired to give for the entertainment of his Monks: but the good man divining the thoughts of her heart, ſaith to her: Madame, trouble not your ſelf for this money, there are other affairs which more concern you: know, you very ſhortly muſt depart out of this world, and now you ought to have but one care, which is to entertain your ſoul in that ſtate you deſire it ſhould part out of this life. Eudoxia at the firſt was amazed at this diſcourſe. It ſeemeth ſouls (as Plato ſaith) go not but with grief out of fair bodies, but this was too much diſengaged to do in the end of thoſe days any unreſigned act. After ſhe had a long time talked to Euthymius, as one would with Angels, ſhe gave him the laſt adieu, full of hope to ſee him at the Rendez-vous of all good men. Returning into Ieruſalem, ſhe had no other care but to ſet a ſeal upon all her good works, then diſtributing whatſoever ſhe had to the poor, ſhe expected the ſtroke of death freely, and reſignedly: her ſoul was taken out of her body throughly ripened for Heaven, as fruit which onely expects the hand of the Maſter to gather it. She was about threeſcore years of age, having ſurvived Theodoſius her husband, and Pulcheria, Flaccilla, Marina, Arcadia: for all of them went before her into the other world: ſhe was married at twenty years of age, ſhe ſpent twenty nine in Court, and as it were eleven in Jeruſalem: ſhe deceaſed in the year of our Lord 459. the 21. year of Pope Leo, and the 4. of the Emperour Leo, Succeſſour of Martianus. A woman very miraculous among women, who ſeemeth ſo much to have tranſcended the ordinary of her ſex, as men ſurpaſs beaſts. More than an Age is required, ere nature can produce ſuch creatures. They are born as the Phenix, from five hundred to five hundred years, yea much more rare. A great beauty, great wit, great fortune, a great virtue, great combats, great victories; to be born in a poor cottage, as a ſnail in his ſhell, and iſſue out to ſhew it ſelf upon the throne of an Empire, and die in an hermitage! all is great, all is admirable in this Princeſs: But nothing more great, nothing more admirable, than to behold a golden veſſel, with ſails of linnen, and cordage of ſilk, counterbuffed by ſo many ſtorms, overwhelmed, and even accounted as loſt, in the end happily to arrive at the haven. Behold her Portraicture and Elogie.

was

Numb. 24. Quam pulchra ſunt tentoria tua, O Jacob, habitationes tuæ, O Iſrael!

Upon

Upon the picture of EUDOXIA.

Fortune unparallel'd, beauty her own,
A ſpirit that admits no Paragon.
Divine, immenſe, although it ſeem to be,
'Twas but the Temple of the Deitie.

HEr example drew an infinite number of great Ladies, to contempt of pleaſures and vanities of Court, to ſeek the Temple of repoſe in the deſerts of the holy Land. Among others Queen Eudoxia her Grand-child, who as we have ſaid, was married into Africk, treading the world under foot with a generous reſolution, came with her Crown to do homage at the tomb of her Grand-mother, kiſſed her aſhes, as of a holy Empreſs, and was ſo raviſhed with the many monuments of virtue ſhe had erected in the holy Land, that there ſhe would paſs the reſidue of her days, and chooſe her tomb at the foot of that from whence ſhe derived her bloud and name.

It is a great loſs to us, that the learned books written by this Royal hand have been ſcattered; for thoſe varieties of Homer, which are extant, are not Eudoxia's. Photius, much more ſubtile than Zonaras, to judge of the works of antiquity, maketh no mention thereof in the recital of the writings of this divine ſpirit, but of her Octoteuch, which he witneſſeth to be a worthy, heroick, and admirable piece. Behold that which is moſt remarkeable in the Court of Theodoſius.

And verily, for as much as concerneth the perſon of the Emperour, he did enough to make himſelf a Saint, by living ſo mortified in his paſſions, in the delights of a flouriſhing Court. It is a meer bruitiſhneſs, a very plague of mans ſoul, to make no account of Princes, but of certain braggards, vain, brain-ſick, and turbulent ſpirits, who fill hiſtories with vain-glorious bravadoes, whoredoms, murders, and treacheries: theſe are they, of whom the ſpirit of fleſh, (an enemy of God) proclaimeth falſe praiſes, and ſuch an one ſeemeth to himſelf ſufficiently great, when there appeareth a power in him to do ill. A calm ſpirit, united, docible, temperate, though he have not ſo many gifts of nature, is a thouſand times to be preferred before theſe vain-glorious and audacious, who are onely wiſe in their own opinion, valiant in raſhneſs, happy in vice, and great in the imagination of fools. It is good to have the piety of Theodoſius, and to let over-much facility work in praying, and pray in working; to have the beak and plumage of an Eagle, and the mildneſs of a Dove; to lay the hide of a Lion at the feet of the Statue of piety.

As for Pulcheria, ſhe was the mirrour of perfection among the great Princeſſes of the earth, yet not without her ſpots, but ſtill giving water to waſh them away. And for Eudoxia, you find in her what to take, what to leave, many things to imitate, few to reject, but an infinite number to admire. Behold in the end the Fortunate Pietie, which I have ſet before your eyes as a golden ſtatue, not onely to behold it in paſſing by, but to guild your manners with the rays, and adorn your greatneſs with the glory thereof.

Who will not admire the proſperity of the Empire of Conſtantinople, in the manage of Theodoſius, of Pulcheria, of Martianus, under the rule of piety, and not ſay, Behold the world, which trembleth in all the parts thereof, under the prodigious armies of Barbarians, who ſeem deſirous to rend the earth, and wholly carry it away in fire and bloud from the center? Behold the Roman Empire, which hath trodden under foot all Scepters and Crowns of the earth, ruined, diſ-membred, torn in a thouſand pieces in the hands of a vitious Emperour, who buried it under the ſhivers of his Scepter: and behold on the other ſide, God, who preſerveth his Theodoſius, his Pulcheria, his Martianus, among theſe formidable inundations, which caſt all the world into a deluge, as heretofore he did Noe in the revengefull waters, which poured down from Heaven to drown the impurities of the earth. What nurſe was ever ſo carefull to drive a flie from the face of her little infant while it ſlept, as the Providence of God ſhewed it ſelf affectionate in the conſervation of theſe elevated ſouls?

Obſerve the perſons preciſely, and conſider each in particular: What happineſs in the Empreſs Eudoxia, whileſt ſhe laboureth for the glory of Altars: God gave the heart of her husband into her hands, the world in honour at her feet, and a little Theodoſius by her ſide, who in his infancy maketh all the hopes of his mother to bud: But as ſoon as this poor Princeſs, forgetting her duty and ſelf, contended with S. John Chryſoſtom, behold her cut down with the ſythe of death, carried away in her flower, deprived of the contentment and glory which ſhe poſſeſſed. Behold ſhe received a breach in her reputation, which cannot in the memory of all Ages be repaired. Her bones are in horrour and dread, till ſuch time as S. Chryſoſtom, baniſhed by her commandment, and returning dead to Conſtantinople, came to ſerve as an anker for the floating aſhes of this unfortunate Empreſs.

Conſider this little Theodoſius, who even at his birth maketh the Idols to fall, the Pagan temples to ſink, and hell to howl under his feet. What glory was it to bury the remainders of Idolatry, what a trophey to extirpate under his reign ſo many monſters of hereſies? What celeſtial comfort, to ſee in his time ſo many learned writings to be laid at his feet? to ſee ſo many worthy men flouriſh, ſo many Saints, as Leo's, Cyrils, Chryſoſtoms, Simeons Stilites? to ſee the Church all garniſhed with ſtars and lights? to ſway a Scepter more than fourty years in a peaceful Kingdom, among ſo many tempeſts? and which is more, to fall into ſome defects by ſudden ſurprizal, and expiate them by a happy repentance? to ſee himſelf drawn by a powerfull hand from the brink of a precipice, and in the end to yield up his ſoul in the midſt of Palms and good odours of a glorious life? See you not a Fortunate Piety?

Behold Pulcheria, as an Eagle on the top of a pyramide, which ever hath her eye on the Sun, and ſeeth all ſtorms broken and confounded under her feet. Was there ever a more fortunate Piety? To ſay that a maid at fifteen years of age, ſwaying Emperours and Empires, enchaining all hearts of the world, to make herſelf on earth a Crown, might boaſt to have had the Univerſal Church for trumpet of her praiſes, and from the government on earth to mount to Heaven by ſo happy death, born as on a Chariot of liberality and magnificence! Where may one more manifeſtly ſee the happineſs of true and ſolid piety?

Behold Athenais, a ſilly maid, who had not ſo much as a poor cottage for ſhelter, as ſoon as ſhe embraceth piety, and offereth the faculties of her ſoul to the honour of Altars, behold her raiſed upon the throne of the prime Empire of the world; afterward, as ſhe came a little to forget God, he ſent her a very ſharp affliction, but as ſoon as ſhe hath again recourſe to the arms of devotion, the cloud of calumny caſt on her forehead diſſevereth, the ſtorm paſſeth away, and her face all glittereth in glory, and which is moſt admirable, God layeth hold of her even in the gulph of errour, whereinto a wicked hypocrite had cast her, reconducteth her to Altars, receiveth her soul in peace, and causeth her to reign both in herself and bloud in all the three parts of the world: for she held in person the Scepter of Asia, her daughter Eudoxia was married to the Emperour of Rome, the Capital Citie of Europe, and her Grand-child was Queen of Africk, miraculously finding a Kingdom in her own captivity. Is not this a fortunate piety?

Adde also hereunto Martianus, a poor peasant, who now had his neck under the sword of the executioner, falsely accused of a crime whereof he was innocent, and God taketh him by one hair of the head, delivereth him from shame and peril, marvellously guiding him to the government of a great Empire, giveth him innumerable prosperities, and indeed maketh him another Constantine. Ought not impiety to burst with rage, and confess that happiness, greatness, benedictions, and favours of Heaven are for piety?

Here it may be, you will also have some remembrance of the Court of Herod, where you have seen the poor Mariamne in virtue so ill intreated, and will think that piety in this creature was unfortunate. But if this thought occur, would it not condemn all the Martyrs, and all the Saints, whose lives notwithstanding we ought to judge most happy, since that vanquishing the petty misfortunes of the world she hath fallen into the bosom of felicity? Tell me, one hour of life in patience and tranquility of soul, which this good Queen had among so many strange accidents, is it not more worth than the thirty seven years of her husband, all clouded with crimes, disturbancies, and fury? Tell me, is it not a happiness and an incomparable glory, that God would pertake in persecutions with this good Princess, suffering himself by this self-same man to be pursued, who had been the hammer of all her afflictions? Is it nothing to die in the Amphitheater of patience, in the Theater of honour, by the same sword, which was afterward unsheathed against Jesus Christ? Is it nothing to give up the life of a Pilmeer in exchange of an immortal glory on earth, and a happy repose in Heaven.

And if you besides desire to see her fortunate piety according to the world, is it not a blow from Heaven, to say, that all the race of Herod issued from his other wives, was unlucky, miserable, execrable, deprived of their fathers Scepter, chased away, exiled, scourged with whips from Heaven, and the Grand-children of Mariamne, remained last in royal thrones? Tigranes her Grand-child descended from Alexander, was King of Armenia, crowned by the hands of the Roman Emperours. Agrippa the Great, issued from Aristobulus, who having been fettered with an iron cain, through the cruelty of Tyberius, was sent back to his Kingdom by Caius Cæsar, and honoured with a golden chain of like weight, with the same of iron wherewith he had been fettered.

Agrippa the youngest, under whom S. Paul pleaded his cause, was preserved from the horrible sack of Jerusalem, as Lot from the flames of Sodome, and reigned in Tyberiade and Juliade, even to decrepit age.

Berenice grand-child of Mariamne, was extreamly courted by the Emperour Titus, entituled the worlds darling. Another called Drucilla, was married to Felix Governour of Judea, of whom is spoken in the Acts, God likewise recompencing the virtue of the mother in the children by some temporal favours: and all those who disposed themselves to virtue were fortunate, to make it appear by evident testimonies, that unhappiness ariseth from nothing but impiety.

These two Courts, the histories of which we have here represented, in my opinion sufficiently shew the unhappiness of impiety, and fortunate success in the lives of Great-ones, when they are guided according to the laws of Heaven.

If I hereafter shall continue this work, I will unfold, according to the succession of Ages, the Elogies of great men, who in the practice of the world flourished in all piety, to cast confusion upon the foreheads of such, who being heirs of their bloud and fortunes, alienate themselves so far from their merit. Yet cannot I absolutely promise any thing. First, because the exercise of preaching and other ministeries, afford me little leisure to write: and although I might have some time for this purpose, yet have I some other labours upon the holy Scripture of a longer task, which would require their season. Secondly, I see many worthy men, who much more ably can perform it than my self: my talent is small, and my pen is slow, it can hasten nothing, I must ponder my works before I publish them, though very imperfect. They ever seem to me too soon to take flight and light; I would as it were perpetually hold them by the wings. Briefly, it is no small labour to find so many Saints in Courts. You know the Philosopher, who searched for men with a candle at noon-tide, and had much ado to find any: How much more difficult think you is it to meet with Saints, especially in the decrepitness of this Age, wherein there is little vigour, and many maladies? If you require books of me, I say, give me Saints, although verily I rather should endeavour to engrave sanctity in my manners than writings. The time will come, when books shall be gnawn by moths on earth, and works in Heaven esteemed.

To the Right Honourable

EDWARD D'SACKVILE,

Earl of Dorset, Baron of Buckhurst, Lord Chamberlain to the Queens Majestie, Knight of the Noble Order of the Garter, and of his Majesties most Honourable Privie-Councel.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THe eminent and well deserved place your Honor holds in the Court of her Majesty, to whose gracious favour the first part of my Work was heretofore humbly consecrated, emboldens me in the adventure of this present address to your Honour; nor shall there, I hope, any notable disproportion appear to the eyes of the judicious, that I thus purposely select your Honour to wait on her Highnes in a printed Dedication, who at Court in so near a degree daily attend on her Sacred person.

The great and general applause with which France hath entertained the whole Work in the original, gave encouragement to my pen to continue that first labour in the translation of this Second piece. Here may be seen the Court of a great and glorious Prince, standing conspicuous to all eyes, like a goodly fabrick raised on four fundamental columns; two of which, the Souldier and the Sates-man, may not improperly seem to reflect on your Honour.

The first, when in the fair occasions of his Majesties fit employments, his just reason shall at any time call you forth into action: The second, in the present and frequent use he hath of your well matured counsels: Both which, by masculine courage and sober wisdom, aptly personated in Consantine and Boetius, are here presented to the life, as strong patterns for imitation. It is your Honours patronage that thus brings them with the rest into the fruition of English air, and me by this opportunity into the grateful acknowledgement of many favours received from your Honour, which since I cannot make known by more real demonstrations, I offer this poor endeavour to supply the plentifull desires of him, who resolves to persist,

The humble devoted servant of your Honour,

T. H.

TO THE WISDOM of GOD INCARNATE.

ETernal WISDOM, Supream INTELLIGENCE, behold me proſtrate before the abyſs of your great and Divine lights, to offer up the homage of my perſon and book, acknowledging the nothing both of the one and other; and proteſting to have neither ſpirit nor pen which is not of You and for You, who are the ſource of good thoughts, and accompliſhment of all praiſe-worthy diſcourſes.

The Deſign and Order of this Book.

WE have, to ſpeak properly, but two great Books, Heaven and the Bible, which ſhall never periſh: The reſt bear ſome ſway, and have ſome laſting among men, yet in concluſion we find their ends; but the moſt part of thoſe which are written in theſe days, fall into the world as drops of rayn into the ſea, of which the Ocean neither feeleth the approach nor departure. I expoſed my firſt Tome of the HOLY COURT, amidſt ſuch a throng of Writers, as it were with this conceit, thinking I carried a little dew into a great River, and that when I had ſpoken ſome truths, as it were paſſing along, I ſhould in my birth, bury my ſelf in the tomb of ſo many volumns; which is excuſable by the law of neceſſity, and honourable for the multitude and quality of thoſe which are there to be found.

Notwithſtanding I ſee that God, who guideth our lives and pens, hath been pleaſed this work ſhould gain ſome eſtimation, and that, as it hath exceeded the merits of its Authour, ſo hath it ſurmounted his hope, expoſing it ſelf with ſome fruit and comfort, by an endeavour which I ſhall never think ill employed.

This hath again put the pen into my hand, to continue what I had begun, whereunto ſuch Honourable perſonages have perſwaded me, with motives ſo reaſonable, that having ſmall ability to undertake a ſecond labour, I had likewiſe leſs power to refuſe it.

Such as complain, my pen hath not ſoon enough ſatisfied their deſires, muſt remember, that though tardineſs be a mother ſomewhat unpleaſing, yet are not the children therefore deformed. The production of good Books ſhould not reſemble that of certain birds, which according to the ſaying of an Ancient, iſſue from their mothers before they are born; but we muſt a long time form and foment them in our minds, that they may appear in publick: for it is a very poor buſineſs, by precipitation to be able to hope no other thing, but through haſte to fail, that you may repent at leiſure. I rather fear the reproach of raſhneſs than delay, becauſe in this mortal ſtate wherein we live, all our perfecteſt actions are no other than groſs eſſays of perfection.

Symposius.

This may be ſpoken without extenuating the worth of ſome celeſtial wits, who make expedition and goodneſs walk hand in hand; it being abſurd, that thoſe who are unable to imitate them, ſhould boaſt infirmities oppoſite to their abilities. For my part, I content my ſelf to afford good liking and admiration to the Works of others, reſerving nothing elſe but labour for mine own. And although, notwithſtanding my endeavour, I never find ſufficient ſatisfaction in this Book, to pleaſe thoſe Readers whom I have found ſo propitious, yet doubt not but I have in ſome ſort anſwered their deſires.

For in this ſecond Volumn I treat of the Courts of Conſtantine the Great, the two Valentinians, Gratian, Theodoſius the Elder, Theodorick in Boetius his cauſe, Clodoveus, Clotilda, Levigildus, Hermingildus, and Indegondis, in ſuch ſort, that I have ſelected the principal ſanctities of Great-ones in the firſt ſix Ages of Chriſtianity, which will not be ſleightly valued by thoſe, who better love to finiſh a Work than unboundedly diſtend it.

Moreover alſo, to be better than my promiſe, in my firſt Volumn having taken the Court in general, I here deſcend into particulars: and there being four ſorts of perſons which compoſe the life of Great-ones, that is to ſay, the Prelate, the Souldier, the States-man, and the Court-Ladie, I have made a brief Table of the conditions neceſſary in every ſtate, couched in four diſcourſes, purſued with as many Books of Hiſtories, which contain excellent models of virtues, proper to all orders and ſtates of life, in perſons moſt eminent.

I can aſſure my Reader, theſe Summaries of Precepts, which I have ſo contracted in ſo few words (it being in my power to enlarge them in divers Volumns) are not unprofitable; and the Hiſtories are ſo choſen, that beſides their majeſty, which unfoldeth the goodlieſt affairs and paſſages of Empires in the beginning of their Chriſtianity, they have alſo a certain ſweetneſs, which ſolid ſpirits ſhall find as much to tranſcend fables and modern eloquence, as the ſatisfaction of truth ſurpaſſeth the illuſions of Sorcerers.

You ſhall perpetually therein obſerve a large Theater of the Divine providence, wherein, God himſelf knoweth, I have no other aim, but to dignifie virtue, and depreſs vice, without any reflection upon the perſons of theſe times, no more than if I wrote in the Reign of Charlemain or St. Lewis. I heartily entreat all thoſe ſpirits of application, who cannot hold their noſe over a piece of work, unleſs they find it to ſuit with their own fantaſies, imagining that all literature is the eccho of their own thoughts, that if they have any Commentary to produce, they would rather make gloſſes upon their own dreams, than my Books. We are not as yet, God be thanked, in ſo miſerable an Age, that we dare not offer ſacrifice to truth without a diſguiſe, ſince it is the glory of Great-ones, openly to wage war againſt vices, as their greateſt enemies.

For to ſpeak truly, after I had preſented my Firſt Tome at the feet of the ſacred perſon of our great King, I likewiſe conſidered in his Court rich and reſplendent lights, in all orders, which might ſerve as models for my Treatiſes: but to avoid affectation of all worldly complacence, I have purpoſely declined it; my nature and habit having already ſo alienated me from all worldly pretences, that it would prove painfull to me to court any man, if he had not Heaven and the Stars to give me for reward.

For ſo much as concerneth the form of writing, obſerved by me in this Second Volumn, I will truly confeſs to my Reader, that I have therein proceeded, rather guided by my proper Genius, than art or cunning. And although I heretofore have been curious enough to read and obſerve all what ever Greek or Roman eloquence hath produced of worth, yet I confeſs there is a certain ray of God, which encountering with our ſpirit, and mixing with nature, is more knowing than all precepts; and I may affirm this for the inſtruction of youth, which hath asked my opinion concerning the qualities and conditions of ſtile. True it is, I have handled many books, written in all Ages, and have found the wiſeſt of them to be elevated in conceits and words, above the ordinary ſtrain, but always free from affectation. Others are ſo paſſionately ſionately enamoured of certain petty courtſhips of language (which are capital enemies of perſwaſion, and which we moſt eſpecially ought to avoid in diſcourſes of piety, the nerves whereof they weaken, and blemiſh the luſtre, ſince even thoſe who ſpeak to us out of Chairs, by word, or writing, although in terms diſcreetly modeſt, make the leſs impreſſions on our hearts) and many times ſo ſeek after their own reputations, as they forget how much they are engaged to truth. We ſee ſome, who through over-much wit, ſearch out ſtrange ways, conceptions different from common underſtanding, words extravagant, and in all other things ſo vehemently adore their own imaginations, that they cannot endure any but themſelves in paper (which is the cauſe they very ſeldom meet with the habit of humane underſtanding, as being true Citizens of Plato's Commonwealth) of ability to controle all, and to do nothing. Some glory in barrenneſs, and would willingly be diſpleaſed with God, that he hath more plentifully ſown ſtars in ſome parts of the Heaven than in others: They can brook nothing that is generous, without ſnarling at it, and taxing it, ſuppoſing beauties and ſplendours are defects, becauſe they ſurpaſs their capacities. Finally, there are ſome, who ſo furniſh themſelves with the worth of others ceaſeleſs allegations, that they frame diſcourſes like to thoſe Helena's all of gold, where we can behold nothing but drapery; not being able to diſtinguiſh the hand from the foot, nor the eye from the face. I enter not into the conſideration of our times, having learned rather to regard the Works of the meaneſt Writers than cenſure them. But to ſpeak ſincerely, I never thought it fit to adviſe or purſue ſuch courſes: And as in this Work I have not wholly declined learning nor ornament of language, which I ſuppoſed apt for the purpoſe, endeavouring many times to enchaſe them with ſeemly accommodation; ſo have I been unwilling to repleniſh my leaves with Authours and forreign tongues, this being undertaken rather to perſwade virtue among men eminent, than to fill the common places of young Students.

I likewiſe have ſo intermingled my ſtyle, that not deſcending into a petty language of complement, which had been below my ſubject, I thought to make it intelligible, yea even unto thoſe who make no profeſſion of arts or ſtudy. My onely aim is to ſpeak, and to be underſtood, perſwaded thereunto by the ſaying of Philo, That ſpeech and thought are two ſiſters, they youngeſt whereof is created that the eldeſt may be known. I have more laboured upon the weight of ſentences than ornaments of words, not at all pretending to the honour of earthly pens, which we daily behold to grow in ſo many Authours of this Age, who would be much more abſolute, did they apply themſelves to graver ſubjects, and in ſome ſort imitate the Sun, who affording admiration to the world, hath none himſelf.

Notwithſtanding it often happeneth, not with the moſt eminent Writers, who ordinarily are endowed with much modeſty, but certain extreamly profane wits, to idolatrize their own inventions, to condemn all treatiſes of worth and value; that it is impoſſible to be eloquent in our language, but in the expreſſion of vanities and impurities. Truly, if queſtion were made to judge of French eloquence, the riches of Babylon are not ſo exquiſite, as to be compared with the beauties of Sion.

Whileſt there are letters and men, there ſhall ever be praiſe for the excellent Books, which come from the pens of ſo many worthy Prelates and other perſons of quality; yea, even from the Laity, who have exerciſed their ſtyle upon arguments, chaſte, honourable, and well-worthy of all recommendation. I ſpeak this as it were by the way, having at this time no purpoſe to enlarge upon recital of an infinite number of able men, who ſtand ready with pen in hand; nor likewiſe to commend thoſe of my habit, who have expoſed their excellent labours to publick view, and which I know might be well waited on by a large number of choice wits of the ſame Society.

But for as much as concerneth my ſelf, I have already diſcharged my promiſe, and doubt not, but that in theſe four models, I have ſufficiently comprized the whole ſcope of my deſign. For the reſt, I think the Books of devotion that are publiſhed, ought to be rare and extraordinarily well digeſted; becauſe ſuch is the quantity of them, that the number of Authours will quickly exceed the proportion of Readers. Diſtaſt is a worm, which ſticketh on the moſt reſplendent beauties; and although a thing may be excellent, we muſt not therefore glut any man with ſuperfluity, leſt good offices turn into contempt, and charity make it ſelf tireſom. Yet ſo it is, that we muſt confeſs, pieces well ſelected and curiouſly handled, can never ſo ſuperabound in number, as to offend thoſe who can diſtinguiſh of merit.

For if it be true, as I have heard, that there are many good and learned Religious men of divers Orders, who prepare themſelves to write upon this ſame ſubject, I am very glad, and proteſt it ſhall be acceptable to me, becauſe ſo they may perfect what I have begun, with more profit than my ſelf.

Note here the cauſe why I ſtay my pen, and if there be ought good in this Volumn, I look upon it as that mirrour, which was fixed on the wall of the Arcadian Temple, where thoſe who beheld themſelves, ſaw in ſtead of their faces, the repreſentation of the Divinity they adored. So in all this which here may profit my Reader, I ſee nothing of mine own, but in it acknowledge the Father of Light, who is the ſource and end of all which is in us eſteemed laudable, and whom I humbly beſeech, if there be any thing attractive in this Diſcourſe, he would be pleaſed to draw it upward, as the adamant, tranſporting ſuch as ſhall read it, to the love of their CREATOUR, to whom is due the tribute of all honours, as to Him who is the beginning of all perfections. This is the onely comfort of our labour: For, not to diſſemble a truth, he that more regardeth to write than to live, courting his pen, and neglecting his own conſcience, ſhall always have trouble enough to defend himſelf from mothes, rats, and oblivion. And though he ſhould be laden with the applauſes of the whole world, in a paſſionate life, it were but to gain a ſilly ſacrifice of ſmoke without him, to harbour fire and tempeſts within his own houſe.

It is ſaid, the Stars by contribution of their rays, ſtrengthen the activity of hell fire; and I may ſay, all the lights of underſtanding and reputation, will ſerve but to encreaſe the torments of a reprobate ſoul, who ſhuts his eyes againſt God, not to open them to other object than vanitie.

TO THE

NOBILITIE,

Dedicated to the CHURCH.

SIRS,

THe benefits you have received from God, and examples the Weal-publick expecteth from you, are so essential obligations of duty, that when we speak of the piety of Great-ones, you instantly are selected out to hold the first rank therein, and to be the cause that virtues, which ever are voluntary, may turn as it were into title of necessity. For, to joyn the Clergie to Nobilitie, is to connect two things together, which are both in Nature and the Gospel, very eminent. It is to profess ones self an honest man by birth and dignity, to stand on a pinacle, and serve as a torch, to change your word into law, and life into example.

The Bishops of all Ages have been esteemed amongst men, as the stars in the firmament, whereof the Prophet Daniel, speaketh, as the Senatours of Heaven, the Fathers of the Commonwealth, the Interpreters of God, the Mediatours of the marriage contracted between the Lamb and the Heavenly Jerusalem.

Daniel 12. 3.

Dionys. ἀρμοσται, De Ecclesiasticâ Hierarchiâ.

This is the cause why we ever think it is to desire a good work, to desire a Bishoprick, taking the words of the Apostle in a sense, which flattereth sensuality, informeth not the conscience; but now, that the passage to Offices and secular dignities, is closed up from many with bars of gold and silver, whom birth seemeth to invite thereunto, they hope to repair themselves on the spoils of the Church, where such as proceed by sensual and worldly ways, oftentimes find poison and death hidden under a seeming sweetness.

For Sirs, we must tell you, your dignities, how eminent soever they be, are like the roof of the Temple in Jerusalem, which had flowers among guilded prickles; in my opinion to teach Bishops, that Myters bordered with gold, and diversified with stones, have notwithstanding their points and prickings.

Villalpandus upon Ezechiel out of Josephus de bello Judaico lib. 6. c. 6.

Had we as many eyes open towards Heaven, as Heaven openeth to behold here below the most secret actions of men, we should be strucken with horrour to see an Ecclesiastical dignity fall to the lot of a depraved soul, which changeth all the abilities thereof to incentives for sin, and to make of his proper honours the true snares of his soul.

But it is a common disaster, that the smoke, which in the book of Tobie driveth away the devils, doth here daily surprize men. We stick on apparences, and if we retain some Maxims of verity, we use them as letters written with the juyce of a lemon, which can hardly be read but by the help of fire.

Hermanus Hugo de primâ scribendi origine.

So that when the day of Judgement shall manifest it self by fire, and that at the departure of the soul, flames shall be presented to enlighten it, even to the bottom of the conscience, then shall it be when all the knowledge of virtue, which we here on earth retain so poor and languishing, shall appear with enflamed characters for our condemnation.

It is an admirable thing, which the good Cardinal Hugo, who flourished about four hundred years ago, as he lay on his death-bed, where with much advantage the vanities of the world are discovered, and when perhaps some too indiscreetly flattered him upon the splendour of his dignity, spake in the voice of an Oracle: Take away these vanities, for I protest, if it were to do again, I had rather die in a Monastery covered with leaprousie, than with the scarlet robe of a Cardinal.

The life of Hugo.

Yet notwithstanding this man had been so little idle, that besides the Concordances of the Bible which he composed, and the Commentaries he made upon the whole Corps of holy Scripture, he so courageously employed himself in the exercise of good works, that being drawn out of the excellent Order of S. Dominick, he retained all his former virtues, which found no change in him, but that they added to their native beauty the lustre of authority. I speak this, not to inform Prelates, from whom I should receive instruction, but to represent to so many of the young Nobility, as we now daily behold advanced to Ecclesiastical charges, the peril there is in Prelacies, which are not guided by the paths of a good conscience.

Bern. de consid. lib. 1. cap. 7.

It is a monstrous thing (said holy S. Bernard) to hold the highest place, and have the lowest courage; the first Chair, and the last life; a tongue magnificent, and a hand slothfull; much noise about you, and little fruit; the countenance grave, and actions light; great authority, and no more constancy than a weather-cock. It were a better sight to behold an Ape on the house top, and smoke in a candlestick, than a man dignified without merit.

On the contrary part, when science and virtue agree with Nobility, to make up a good Church-man, it is so glorious a spectacle, that it may be said, God to produce it on earth, hath taken a pattern from himself in Heaven. I wish no more faithfull witnesses than this Prelate which I shall present unto you in this first Treatise, after I have made a brief Summary of precepts, which I have purposely comprised in very few pages, to render them the readier for the understanding; well knowing, there are store of books largely enough dilating on this subject, the length of which I have avoided to attend the matter.

I wish it may have an effect in your hearts worthy of your courage, that honouring your dignity for virtue, virtue may enoble you with titles of true glorie.

THE HOLY COURT.

SECOND TOME.

THE PRELATE.

The first Section.

That it is convenient the Nobilitie should govern the Church.

Æternitas mundi ex obedientiâ ad intelligentiam motricem. Apud Matthiam de Viennâ, qui libet impressus anno 1482.

I Begin by the Altar to measure the Temple of the Holy Court, and set a Prelate before your eyes, who bare Nobility into the house of God, and there furnished himself with all the virtues, which made him speak like an Oracle, and live as a true image of the Divinity. The Platonists say, the whole order of the world dependeth on Intelligences, which bear sway in the motion of the first Heaven; and we in imitation of them may say, all the good of Christendom proceeds from the examples of Ecclesiastical men, to whom the Son of God hath consigned his authority on their brows, his word in their mouths, his bloud and Church into their hands. For if bees, engendred of the body of a bull, carry in their entrails the very form of that bull from whence they are derived; by a much more just title the people will bear the marks of those, whom God hath given them for Doctours and Fathers, whether it be by correspondence of nature, through custom, or by imitation, which ever hold a very great predominance over spirits disposed to receive their impressions. Behold the cause why a Prelate, who liveth conform to his profession, imprinteth the seal of the Son of God, on all those souls he governeth, and produceth himself in as many objects as he hath imitatours of his virtues. As on the contrary part, he who liveth ill in great Nobility and dignity, is a Seraphin in appearance, but a Seraphin without eyes, without heart, without hands, which hath wings of a profane fire, able to burn the Propitiatory, if God afford not his helping hand.

Ulysses Aldobran. de apibus.

And forasmuch as we at this day see the Nobility aspire to Ecclesiastical charges, and many fathers to dispose their children thereunto, sometimes with more fervour than consideration, it hath caused me to undertake this Treatise for the Nobility which dedicate themselves to the Church, as well to shew the purity of intention they ought to exercise therein, as to give them a fair discovery of the goodly and glorious actions they ought to pursue in the practice thereof. I here will first offer you a simple draught, which I afterward intend to adorn with the greatness of S. Ambrose, as with more lively colours.

Plato rejoyced to behold Princes and Governours of Common-wealths to become Philosophers, and we have cause to praise God, when we see the children of Noble houses to dispose themselves to Priesthood, not by oblique and sinister ways, but with all the conditions which their bloud requireth, and sacred dignity exacteth in so noble a subject.

Why should we deny them Myters, Crosiers, and eminency in the Church? So far is their birth from ministering any occasions of the contrary, that it rather affordeth them favour both to undertake such charges with courage, and discharge their conscience with all fidelity.

The reasons hereof are evident. For first, we must aver, that by how much the more honourable the charges are, so much the rather they are proper for such as make profession of honour; provided always on the other side, they have qualities suitable to those ministeries they pretend to exercise. And are there any in the world more ambitious of honour than Noblemen? Ostentation is the last shirt they put off, and where can you find a more solid and eminent honour, than that which is derived from the lawfull administration of Ecclesiastical functions?

Aristotle saith, Truths which transmit themselves through the common sense of every man, get into credit as it were by the decree of nature. Now such hath been the esteem of all Nations, that Kingdoms and Common-wealths being established upon Religion and temporal jurisdiction, as on two columns; Religion so much the more excelleth politick government, as things divine transcendently surmount humane. And for this cause, favours, priviledges, and preheminences, have ever been given to Priests in the greatest and most flourishing Monarchies and Common-wealths of the world, as we may see in Histories, and in the policie of the Ægyptians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Medes, Persians, Grecians, Romans, Gauls, and other Nations.

Arist. lib. 1. περὶ ἐρμηνείας. Xenophon. l. 4. de factis & dictis Socratis, tribuit etiam Socrati. Strabo Geograph. l. 14. Ælian. l. 14. c. 34. Var. Euſin Chrō. Agathias histor. l. 2, &c.

The honour of Priesthood gained so much on the hearts of all people, that the Monarchs of the earth seemed not to rule but with one arm, if they made not in one and the same person the alliance of Priesthood and Royalty: so that oftentimes they shewed themselves as depraved in their proceedings, as greedy in matter of honour.

The Roman Emperours, who stretched their authority as far as the point of their launce could be extended, and who needs would be Commanders of arms, arms, to become thereby Masters of laws, failed not to joyn the Myter with the Diadem, and as soon to make themselves great Prelates as great Emperours: thinking by this means to have the more power over the hearts of the people, and the less opposition for resistance, when they had depressed the forces, which might give some remarkeable counterpoize to their greatness. And it is an admirable thing, that the first Christian Emperours, as Constantine and his children, still retained the titles of the great Pontifices of Gentilism, as a Maxim of State, lest forgoing this fantasie of dignity, they should behold themselves bereaved of some jewel of their Crowns.

Baron. ad annum Christi. 383. num. 6. Gratianus primus nomen Pontificis refpuit.

This is to authorize my proposition, which saith, true honour belongeth to Ecclesiastical charges, when they are well administred; since the Monarchs of the world, from the very abuse of these dignities, have derived glory: but to desire them for honour, is to dishonour the dignity by the unworthiness of your desire. So many Ixions now adays cast themselves athwart the smoke to court a cloud, that there is almost no love left, but for false Deities. That which maketh Ecclesiastical men honourable, is, well to use their titles, and embellish their charges with the ornament of their lives. Otherwise all this petty gaudery, which we see sparkling round about them is very little. It is not the Myter which maketh the Bishop, but to be esteemed worthy of the Myter by transcendency in virtue, is to be more than a Bishop without merit.

Superiora non habent coronas, quia nè ventos quidem. Senec. natural. q. l. 1. c. 1.

Sometimes we beholding the Meteors of the air, imagine to see Crowns about the Sun and Stars, which really are nothing but vapours, composed of gross air, which illusion coloureth, our imagination figureth, and the wind scattereth. This is to make fools believe there are Crowns encompassing this mighty Star. The Sun is adorned sufficiently with his proper rays; should he borrow his brightness from the vapours of the earth, he would no longer be the Sun: Even so is it, when with a terrestrial and impure eye we consider some exteriour marks of Ecclesiastical dignity; we think such things make Prelates, and we therein are deceived, for they are vapours of the earth, which the wind sooner or later will dissipate. He that will be truly resplendent, must within himself bear the source of his own light.

Herein consisteth the most excellent form of honour, when a Prelate allieth sincerity of life to the dignity of his place, and that to serve as an example for all noble spirits, who make election to be of the Church, he advanceth his extraction by the lustre of virtues, which are as rays reflecting from the Divine greatness.

I say for a second reason, that when Noblemen hold Ecclesiastical offices, and therein employ their whole extent of duty, we may hope from their ministeries, not onely more radiance, but succour also, as from such as command with greater authority, and make themselves to be obeyed with more advantage.

It is undoubtedly true, that God sufficiently maketh it appear he hath no need of men, when purposing to stretch out his arm to some extraordinary actions, he oftentimes extracteth creatures from dregs and dust, to set them in thrones, and establish them with such authority, that he causeth the powers of the earth to bow under their commands, who bear the decrees of Heaven; which hath been seen in the infancy of the Church, and in the sequel thereof, through all Ages: Yet must we say, that as our Saviour, although he had a science increate as God, a science infused as a Prophet, a science of beatitude, as he who was possessour thereof from the first moment of his life; notwithstanding to accommodate himself to the laws of that nature which he had assumed, spared not to work by humane science, which Divines call experimental; so in the government of the Church, though he sometimes operates without any regard had to dependence on the ordinary course which himself hath established, as when he took simple fisher-men to make them Masters over the Sages, and Instructers of Monarchs, yet at other times proceeding in a common strain, and more usual to nature, he chose men of note and authority, to employ them in the large confines of his Empire and jurisdiction.

S. Thom. 3. part. q. 30.

So drew he Moses from Pharaoh's Court, to make him the God of Pharaoh: so for Princes among the Gentiles, which he meant to enrole under his standard, he elected Kings and Sages: so after he had constituted his Church under the government of a poor fisher-man of Galilie, he took one derived from the bloud of Emperours, whom he made his Successour, to wit, S. Clement: so he caused in divers occasions Ambroses, Gregories, Leoes, Calixtuses, to arise, and so many others of most honourable extraction, that they might bear Nobility as a dowry into the bosom of the Church, which they had so happily governed.

This Nobility was to their dignity as a guilded case to a rich tablet, as gold to the diamond, beauty of body to the soul, habiliaments to the grace and garb of body. They had more lustre, more splendour, more resolution; and the subjects, who have not always intentions so pure in rendring honour to Ecclesiasticks, as not to regard the exteriour ornament of their qualities and conditions, became more obsequious to their commands, having not boldness enough to contradict even those, who by right of their birth had as soon entered into Empire as life.

How many times had secular powers been seen to transgress their limits, to usurp on the Church, and what disorder had we beheld to arise from the prosecution of this confusion, had not the hand of God raised Ecclesiasticks of noble houses, of great authority, of much courage, to sustain the shock, to tie the hands of the factious, and punish the boldness of the most daring, to call back (as Job saith) the prey out of the teeth of iniquity, and make a Diadem to himself wholly composed of actions of justice, magnanimity, religion, in this manner more resplendent, than if he had possessed all the pearls of the Orient?

What a fair field of battel, what goodly palms, what bright glory hath a noble soul, to make it self a brazen wall for the defence of the Church, and obtain of God the blessing pronounced by the Prophet Isaiah, in favour of the High-Priest Eliachim? What a glorious honour is it, to be set in a place of trust, to be planted by the hand of God, to serve as a prop for the house of God, to be the seat of glory for the Lord of Hosts, to carry the moveables, riches, and greatness of the Church on his shoulders?

Isaiah 22. Figam illum paxillum in loco fideli, & erit solium gloriæ domui patris sui, & suspendent super eum omnem gloriam domus patris ejus.

Finally, for a third reason, to conduct the Nobility to Ecclesiastical dignities, is to bring it into its house. All things willingly return to their source. The waters cease not to glide along, to render themselves to the Ocean. The rays of the Sun touch the earth, not forsaking their star; the branches of the tree offer the homage of their verdure, leaves, and fruit, to the root; he goeth well, that hasteneth to his beginning.

Now so it is, that the greatest part of Church endowments came from the Nobility, who then despoiled themselves to cover the Altars, and now many unveil the Altars to cloath themselves. If you (O Noblemen) desire to enjoy the patrimony which your Ancestours have left to the Church, you ought not to seek it by unlawfull, mischievous, and tyrannical ways, but by means proportionable to the intentions of those, who laid those rich foundations. And what intentions had they, but to cut the trees of Basan, to make oars for the vessel of S. Peter, but to lay their wealth at the feet of God, who according to the Prophet, made himself a foot-step of Saphirs, phirs, to ſerve as a ladder for glory; but to entertain on earth an image of the Heavenly Jeruſalem, to grant to the Church men of ſcience and conſcience, men of courage and fidelity, for the ornament, ſupport, and maintenance thereof?

If you approach thither, with ſuch an intention, I am of opinion the gates ought to be opened unto you, and that you ſhould enter into your ſelf to govern the houſe of Jeſus Chriſt, and not deſtroy it. We have, thanks be given to God, a great King, all whoſe inclinations diſpoſe him to goodneſs, as lines to the center: as much love as he hath for juſtice, ſo much zeal hath he for the glory of Altars. As God is pleaſed to ſow the ſtars on the azure of the firmament, ſo hath he a ſenſible delight to furniſh the Church with good Prelates, becauſe they are the ſtars of the earth. Merit under him is in poſſeſſion of good hopes, and hope is not far diſtant to be conſummate in fruition. He is pleaſed to gratifie the Nobility with the goods of the Church, but he will, his intention be ſeconded by the merit of thoſe that ſhall enjoy them. Take the ways of wiſdom and virtue to enter into your inheritance, which ever are moſt aſſured and the moſt honourable. The time hath been when one muſt, as it were, have done evil to receive good; if now good be offered to thoſe who do it, who would willingly be vitious, and ſow crimes to reap miſeries?

The ſecond SECTION.

That the Nobility ſhould not aſpire to Eccleſiaſtical offices, but by lawfull ways.

Lucian. in Jov. Trag.

PRophane Lucian ſpake truer than he thought, when he feigned Gentiliſm was filled with gods, whereof ſome were made of wood and ſtone, ſubſiſting by the prerogative of antiquity, which age and time gave them; the other much more lately formed, were of gold and ſilver, reſenting the profuſe prodigality of the latter Ages. This cauſed a divorce in the Temples: the gods of earth were ſtill willing to hold their ranks, ſhewing beſides the antiquity of their original, that they were framed by the confident hands of admirable work-men, and had lineaments excellently poliſhed. The gods of gold and ſilver, dignified by the riches of the ſtuff of which they were compoſed, ſpake proudly, and needs would have priority, ſince the mettal whereof they were made, tranſcended much in the eſtimation of men. The matter was put into deliberation in the great Parliament of Olympus, and the golden gods carried it, not by merit, but by authority of their riches.

Should this ſcoffing ſpirit be raiſed again in theſe our days, to make a Satyre on the manners of theſe times, he could not be better fitted. For to ſpeak, not univerſally of all Eccleſiaſtical Nobles, ſince thanks be to God, there are many, who moſt happily have linked to Nobility all the other qualities requiſite to their condition; but conſidering in groſs the diſorder and corruption, we may well ſay the gods of gold at this day have the upper hand. We heretofore ſaw divers ſpiritual men, extracted from low condition, who arrived to dignities by the degrees of labour, integrity, knowledge, and were finally crozier'd and mytered by the ſtrength of much merit. Theſe men appeared in the Church of God, as thoſe ancient Statues made by the hand of Policletes, Phidias and Syſippus; there was not a lineament in them which ſpake not. But when gold and ſilver began to ſway more than ever, the rich allured with the wealth of the Church, brake a way through by the help of contentions, authority and command, which ſilver gave them over the courſes of human things; they, maugre induſtrie and virtue, have made golden gods, which baniſh as it were all the gods of the earth, notwithſtanding the excellent forms, and all the gifts of nature and grace they could poſſibly acquite. It ſeemeth for theſe men the Church is at this day become a great Oak over-turned, where men haſtily on every ſide run for prey; there is not a hand ſo little, that will not become outragious to bear away ſome ſpoil thereof.

But you noble and generous ſpirits, who in your minorities dedicate your ſelves to the miniſteries of the Church, behold the firſt ſtep you muſt tread. Be carefull herein, as your lives and ſalvation are dear unto you; aim well your carriet, enter by the gate of honour, to free your ſelf from the diſturbances of life and troubles of death. Be ye aſſured it is the abomination of the deſolation, foretold by the Prophet Daniel, the gall of bitterneſs, and perplexity of ſin, declared by the Apoſtle S. Peter, to enter into an Eccleſiaſtical benefice by unlawfull and ſtrained ways, without vocation. The reaſons hereof are evident.

Daniel. 9. 27. Act. 8. 27.

Firſt, the Saints have called this vice, the iniquity of Libanus, alluding to theſe words of the Prophet Habacuck: The Iniquity of Libanus ſhall cover thee: where the text ſpake to thoſe, who deſpoiled the holy Land, becauſe the mount Libanus is a holy hill of Paleſtine, all covered over with fair Cedars, much renowned in the Scripture: from whence it cometh, it myſtically ſignifieth the Church: and thoſe are truly covered with the iniquity of Libanus, who ſurcharge themſelves with the weight of inexorable juſtice, for attempting on the higheſt pieces of the patrimony of God, which are the offerings of the faithfull, left for the maintenance of Eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Habac. 1. Iniquitas Libani operiet te.

This iniquity of Libanus, is the ſin of Zeb, Zebeus, and Salmana, who are branded with perpetual infamy, for plotting againſt the Tabernacle of God. The Prophet ſaid, that encouraging one another they caſt out theſe inconſiderate words: Let us go and poſſeſs the Sanctuary of God, as our proper inheritance. And what, I pray, do ſuch like now adays? Hold they not the goods of the Church, as one would a Tenement, to paſs it from hand to hand, from nephew to nephew? Although they oftentimes in their conſcience judge them moſt uncapable, yet needs muſt they take good heed how they forgo any thing: the chairs muſt be filled with honour, with fleſh, and hay, and rather will they ſet ſhadows on a pinacle, than render to God what is due to him. And what will happen to theſe Salmanaes or Salmoneans? even that which the ſame King and Prophet ſaid: They ſhall turn about as the wheel of the potter, inceſſantly wandring from purpoſe to purpoſe, from ambition to ambition, from bargain to bargain, in a thouſand embroilments of ſpirit, till death come, who ſhall bruiſe them (as ſaith the Wiſeman) on the ceſtern, and ſhall ſcatter them for ever from the face of God.

Pſal. 82. 12. Hæreditate poſſideamus Sanctuarium Dei.

Pone illos ut rotam.

Confringet rotam ſuper ciſternam. Eccl. 12.

It is no ſmall matter to invade the treaſure of Kings, ſince it is the bloud of the people, the ſinew of war, the knot of peace; and the bloud-ſuckerrs of State which abuſe it, ſooner or later ſhall pour their lives out in the duſt. And what do you think is it, to abuſe the patrimony of God (whereunto ſo many good ſouls have oft-times contributed their bloud and ſweat) and to enter therein as a Fox, a Lion, without any other intention but to ſlay and devour the flock, which they ought not ſo much as to ſhear?

The crimes which do afront the Divinity, ever bear their puniſhments behind them. Craſſus felt among the Parthians the Religion of the Temple of Jeruſalem, which he had deſpoiled; the fortune of the Romans was made a prey, the Army routed, the treaſures forſaken, the lives of ſo many mortals expoſed to the dint of ſword, to chaſtiſe the avarice of one man, who durſt invade the goods conſecrated to the Divine Majeſty. Whileſt he ſtretched out his Harpies hands on the goods of men, God ſuffered him: ſo ſoon as he ſet his tallans on the moveables of the Temple, Plutarch. in Craſſo.

Temple, he felt the steel of Barbarians, as revengers of his sacrilledge.

Daniel. 5.15. 2 Machab. b. 3. A hand from Heaven before for the same cause, charactered the dreadfull decree of a Babylonian King, which hath served as a Tragedie for all posterity: and afterward Heliodorus in the Machebees, was prodigiously punished by exterminating Angels, who in the mid-day scourged him in the sight of all the world, employing the Heavenly whips on his body for the same crime, as he had bestowed his hardiness and hand to steal a jewel from Heaven.

If you say there is much difference between the sacrilegious, who steal the treasures of the Church, and those who by ways unlawfull, seize on benefices, which they unworthily hold to the confusion of Christianity: I answer, there may be the difference that would be between a publick robber, and a private thief; the one proceeding with open force, the other more cautelously, causing his venom to creep, is by so much the more pernicious, as under the skin of a sheep, he bears the heart of a wolf.

Adde hereunto for a second reason, that the Baltazars, Crassuses, and Heliodoruses, and the Hereticks of our time, who have made open war against the treasures of the Temple, having nothing at all hurt the reputation of the Church, which as the Pole-star is ever in motion, and never setteth: but the unjust usurpers of Priest-hood, who sometimes enter into charge with extream defect of science and conscience, besides that they unprofitably devour the patrimony of the Son of God, do burden his spouse with eternal reproach.

It is observed, that in these deplorable times, where all seemeth to tend to the subversion of Laws, still some new monsters have appeared, who by their birth have declared the disasters that should happen to the world.

The tenth Age, which was the true iron-age, wherein all vices were in force, all sciences in eclipse, all abuse in credit, and as it were all crimes in impunity, afforded neither Satyres, Chimeraes, Centaurs, nor other monsters against nature: But for a certain presage of great evils, which we afterward saw to over-flow all Christendom, children of great men were seen, who had nothing great in them but vice, as being such, who were born for disgrace, bred in disorder, naturalized in sin, to enter during their minority, into Ecclesiastical charges, to debase authority, and abolish merit. A Pope, John the eleventh, enormiously vitious, having the malice of a man most debauched, and the age of a child unexperienced, to sit in the chair of S. Peter! A Theophylact, son of the Emperour, by the absolute power of his father, to seize on the See of Constantinople, to become afterwards a Merchant of horses, which he so violently affected, that besides the prodigious race of two thousand, which he ordinarily bred, he many times left the Altar where he sacrificed to the living God, to hasten to see some Mare of his that had foled in the stable! Our France hath not been exempt from this unhappiness: for in the same age, Hugo, a child of five years old, was constituted Archbishop of Rhemes, to possess the seat of the great S. Remigius, which was to paralel the foot of Hercules to the leg of a flie.

Frodoardus histor. Rhemer. lib. 4. cap. 17. Monstrum, inquit, nunquam habuimus in orbe Christiano visum.

All Christendom was amazed to behold such promotions, and held them in the rank of Comets, which make terrour to march before them, and after them sterility, massacres, and disasters. Were there no other consideration but the interests of the Church, this ever ought to touch a heart, which as yet retaineth some vein of Christianity, nor should it ever give consent to any preferment, which might appear so disadvantagious to her, whom Jesus Christ hath by his bloud, made his lawfull spouse. But besides the detriment of Religion, for a third instance, the manifest loss of young men is incurred, who are engaged in Ecclesiastical dignities, not being accommodated with conditions necessary to undergo such a burden: much better were you to send them directly to the house of fools, than to expose them upon the pinacle of the Temple with so little discretion: for in this prison of mad men they should find those that would tie them, thereby to stay their folly; and in these false dignities, they meet with liberty, which freeth them, to precipitate them into all sorts of vices.

Fathers and Mothers, God pardon you, what a torch do you set on fire, to burn and consume the house of God, when blind with affection, and benummed in judgement, you so embrace your young apes, that you strangle them with excess of indulgence? To enkindle ambition in the veins of these yong sots, almost at their coming out of the cradle, to set them on the top of the house, over mens heads, with an arm and sling of silver, be they vitious, be they impious and dissolute, be they stupid and heavy as earth, so that they have the breath of favour and ears of silver (as had the towers of Queen Cleopatra) needs must they be placed on the top of the Turret, to be seen the further off. Many times charges of great importance, and superintendence over the heads of so many mortals, are given to men, to whom a silly farmers wife would not have committed the keeping of a cow. The Idumeans enterprize upon the Sanctuary, and these owls endeavour to drink up the Lamp-oyl of Churches, by an ambition of so strong a flight, that it will admit no limits but infinitie. Have you no commiseration of the publick? The Commonwealth is at this day an old song (say you) whereof little care is to be had, we desire to know more than an air, which is that of our own proper interest, since it is an act of prudence well to accommodate ones affairs. Yet are you no whit ashamed of your selves? though silver furnish you with a brow of mettal to regard no man, yet is it a shamefull thing to be desirous to erect in the world the tree of Nebuchadnezzar turned topsie-turvie, where four-footed beasts are above, and little birds beneath? Were it not a goodly thing to see horses, asses, and bulls to neigh, bray, and bellow upon the branches of trees, while the small birds of Heaven, so many celestial spirits, thrust from the rank which wisdom and virtue giveth, go mourning up and down among the thorns of a necessitous life? But we must prefer our children, answer you. Who says the contrary? Raise them on the steps of actions, Christian, solid, and illustrious; cause them to pass through the Temple of virtue, before they go to that of honour; examine their talents, their capacity, their ability, otherwise you do not advance, but precipitate them into publick scorn, into loss of reputation, and danger of soul.

This benefice is not a benefice, but a malefice, but a golden snare, a carcanet of Medea, a Trojan horse, which will produce arms. You, in procuring such an honour, resemble those idolatrous parents, who sacrificed their children to the God Moloch (that is to say, to the Sun) and caused them to be burnt alive in the hollow statue of the Sun, not caring to forgo their lives, so they might loose them in those flames and lights, which were the Hieroglyphicks of honour. Oh meer madness! for the life of a flie, which we daily share with death, to be willing to damne your self and posterity; to stand on the brink of the abyss, and not deign so much as onely open your eyes to behold the precipice?

Seldenus de Diis Syris. pag. 78.

The third SECTION.

Of vocation or calling.

IF you desire to know how you should proceed in the preferment of your children to Ecclesiastical degrees, first understand it is true, Mercury is not made made of all wood. If question be concerning a husbandman, merchant, artificer, or shepheard, we trie the nature of the children, and endeavour to accommodate each one of them according to their dispositions and natural inclinations.

Suppose you it is onely fit for the Church to expose them at adventure, without election or discretion? What exorbitancy is it to think it lawfull to take the simpleſt and weakeſt for Priests and Religious? What tyranny to divert some with all sorts of cunning and violence, and thrust others on as it were with a fork? To have in all your proceeding no other aim but the benefit of your family, to force the Laws of Heaven to bow under the interest of your house, to give that to God, which you cannot settle else-where, and if any accident happen, to take that from God which you have given him? Hereby it cometh to pass, that after many years, we behold birds, which change both their plumage and kind upon some very slight cause (not speaking of those who do so by way of counsel and conscience) the scarlet Cloak succeeding the Church Cassock, and the sword the Breviary: wherein they do much worse than the wooers in the house of Ulysses, who being not able to gain access to the Mistress, made their address to the servants. But these forsake the Ladie, whom they have espoused, to court the chamber-mayds; professing all their life time the infidelity of their promises, by the exchange of their habits.

Vocation is most necessary for admittance into the Church, which appeareth in two points: The one ordinary, the other extraordinary. Extraordinary calling hath marks and signs that draw near to a miracle. So we see those who have been great and eminent in the Church, have had some Genius, which hath even in their infancy made the first glimmers of their greatness to appear, drawing the whole world after them with astonishment.

Ioseph Antiq. lib. 2. cap. 5. So Moses, though he were a little child, tossed Pharaoh's Diadem like a shuttle-cock; which gave a very ill presage to the Ægyptians of their approaching ruin. So Elias seemed from his mother to suck fire with milk, which was a prediction his mouth should one day be (as indeed it was) the Arsenal of the God of hosts. So the cradle of S. Epiphanius (as Enodius relateth) was seen all on fire: A vine in a vision issued out of the mouth of little S. Ephræm: A flaming pillar environed the head of S. Modestus: And it is written that Gregorie the seventh, who from a base extraction was born to the throne of S. Peter, heaping together the chips he found in his fathers shop, who was a Joyner, and arranging them in divers figures, innocently wrote, without thinking thereon, as a child in sport, Dominabor à mari usque ad mare.

Epiph. de Prophetis. Enodius. Anonymus in ejus vitâ. Radevus. Cranzius l. 4.

All these callings, and many other of the like kind, are known by extraordinary signs; the rest take the ordinary way, and are observed to be in the good nature of children fit to be dedicated to the Church, which is a matter very considerable. If you ask wherein this good nature consisteth: I answer, It is not in the influence of stars, nor in the Genius, as Pagans have placed it, nor simply in the beauty of mind, in the goodness of constitution, health, strength, vigour of body, though these may much contribute thereunto; but it appeareth in two principal rays, of which the one is tranquility from passions, by making a reposed calm in a soul, fit to entertain the spirit of God; the other, which ariseth from the first, is the docibleness of a mind tractable, with ease to dispose it self to inclinations of honesty. Behold these two principal heads, whereon this excellent nature of an inestimable price is established.

And first, forasmuch as concerneth the tranquility of passions, it is undoubted, that every man being composed of four elements, by consequence draweth along four roots of all the motions thereof, which are, Love, Fear, Pleasure, Sorrow. There is not a man which feeleth not some touch. But as every sea hath his winds, though Mariners observe that some are more tossed than others, so though every soul have its passions, we must confess there be some of them are mildly disposed, and others more roughly distempered. You see men, who from their most tender age tast of strange extravagancies, choler, harshness, rage, despight, which maketh them to be of a spirit fantastical, uncivil, and obstinate, against which you must ever fight with an armed hand. Others from their cradles are endued with a peaceable soul, as a sea in the time that Halcyons build their nests on the trembling agitation of waters; they have inclinations to virtue wholly Angelical, in such sort, that they seem to be as it were conveyed therein, as fishes in their element. From this repose from passions, ariseth the second condition of good nature, that is, docibleness of spirit, the beginning of education, and happiness of life. For as Divines require in those who receive faith, a certain Religious affection to divine things, discharged and purified from all spirit of contradiction; so in matter of moral virtue and piety, we stand in need of a tractable soul, which fixeth it self on good instructions, as the ivie cleaveth to trees and pillars. Go not then about, when you make choice of an Ecclesiastical man, to tender some Esau, some spirit of the field, who is onely pleased with arms and slaughter of beasts: Take rather a Jacob under the pavilions, a sweet and temperate spirit, that is, wholly disposed to the sound of virtues.

But you, Noble Spirits, who have met with this excellent nature, I may speak the words of the Prophet unto you: God hath given you a soul wholly covered with precious stones, enriched with gifts and admirable talents; he hath enchased it in a body endowed with a singular temperature, as a diamond set in the head of a ring. Much hath he given you, and therefore much requireth at your hands.

Ezech. 28. Omnis lapis pretiosus operimentum tuum, & foramina in die quâ condituses preparata sunt.

The seventh SECTION.

Of Virtues requisite in the carriage of a Prelate. The first is Wisdom.

DO you demand what God requireth from you? I answer, five principal virtues; which were very wel represented in the ephod of the high-Priest of the old law, as S. Gregorie the great (a) hath well observed. This ephod was a certain mantle that covered the shoulders, composed of four colours, of hyacinth, purple, white, and scarlet, the whole wrought all over with threeds of gold, enterlaced with curious work-manship. Why this dressing? why these colours? To teach you seasonably to bear on your shoulders the conditions requisite to your profession. The hyacinth, or skie-colour, signifieth the first thing you ought to do, is, to flie, as the plague of virtues, from these extravantly and unworthy spirits, who have no other object in the possession of the goods of the Church, but flesh-pots and play: you are to frame for your selves a soul totally noble, wholly elate, meerly celestial, which conceiveth strong resolutions one day to dedicate it self to God, not in a mercinary manner, but with the utmost endeavour of its power. Think not (b) (saith S. Ambrose) that being called to an Ecclesiastical state, you have a slight commission from God. Wisdom requireth you consider the mysteries of Heaven, and that you be highly raised above the ordinary strain. Justice willeth you to stand centinel for the people, who expect aid from your prayers. Strength desireth you to defend the Tabernacle and Camp of the God of Hosts.

(b) Mediocre ne putes quod tibi commissum est: Primum, ut alta Dei videas, quod est sapientiæ, Deinde ut excubias pro populo Dei defendas, quod est justitiæ, castra defendas, tabernacula tuearis, quod est fortitudinis: Tertium continentem ac sobrium præstes, quod est temperantiæ. Amb. de Offic. lib. 1.

Hosts. Temperance ordaineth you live with singular sobriety and continency. You are (said Saint Isidore of Damieta (c) placed between divine and humane nature, to honour the one with your sacrifices, and edifie the other by your examples. A Priest (d) ought to be as a young child, issued out of the school and bosom of the son of God, even as an Angel, to govern the Church, not to despoil it, to treat with God in prayer, not to handle a sword. He should be entire in his judgements, just in his resolutions, devout in the Quire, firm in the Church, sober at table, prudent in recreations, pure in conscience, serious in prayer, patient in adversity, affable in prosperitie, rich in virtues, sage in words, upright in preaching, and free in all good actions. Great S. Denis the Areopagite, (e) addeth a notable sentence, saying: That he who most especially seeketh to transcend others in holy Orders, ought most nearly approach to God in all sorts of virtue.

(c) Isido. Polusiota lib. 3. ep. 2

(d) Sacerdos debet esse Christi alumnus, à peccatis segregatus rector, non raptor; speculator, non spiculator; dispensator, non dissipator; pius in judicio, justus in consilio, devotus in Choro, stabilis in Ecclesiâ, sobrius in mensâ, prudens in letitiâ, purus in conscientiâ, assiduus in oratione, patiens in adversitate, lenis in prosperitate, dives in virtutibus, expeditus in actibus, sapiens in sermone, verax in predicatione. Alphons. Torrez.

(e) S. Dionys. ep. 3. ad Demophilum.

For which cause your education should not be in the ordinary way. If you have brothers that are to be bred for the world, let them live in the practice and fashions of the world. O how unworthy are you of the hopes to which God calleth you, if you envie them the favour of the house, and of those, I know not what kind of petty trifles of their own profession! Your condition is much other, if you follow that spirit which guideth you.

(f) Heretofore Monasteries were the chief schools of Kings, and the Great-ones of the earth, to cause them to suck in virtue with the milk: your abode should be in places, where you have engaged your heart and your faith; which best can prepare and manure you for the life you have chosen.

(f) Bern. l. 4. de consid. c. 6. Ubi de comitatu Episcopi inter mitratos discurrere calamistratos non decet.

It is truly a scandal to your profession, if you be ashamed to wear a habit proper for an Ecclesiastical man, and blush at the standard of your warfare: A shame likewise, if you must be terrified by way of menaces to make you say your Breviary; or if it be needfull to allure you thereunto by I know not what kind of worldly allurements: these verily relish of the unworthiness of a childish spirit. (g) See you not that benefice draweth an office after it? that no man should enlarge your conscience by soothing your neglect, and extenuating the obligations you ought to have? If you observe not therein that which you shall be advised by a sage and exact spiritual Father, you may very well most dangerously wander. We are in the Church (saith S. Bernard) (h) to sow joy and good example: Joy for Angels, by our devotions and the secret aspirations of our prayers; example for men, by our good works. The mind in the judgement of Philo (i) should hold a little household Consistory, where discharged from sense and the mass of sensible things, it may study the knowledge of it self, and the search of truth.

You should love your condition even from your tender age, and live in the Sanctuary like a young Samuel. The toyl of affairs and secular recreations, is not for you. Leave the onions of Ægypt to sensual souls; your entertainments are in the society of Angels. (k) Priestly dignity, to which you aspire, requireth a sober gravity, alienated from the ordinary way, a serious life, weight, and maturity. How would you have the people honour you, if you have nothing above them? How should they admire you, beholding vices and imperfections in your manners?

The fifth Section.

The second virtue of a Prelate, which is Fortitude of spirit against avarice and riot.

THe second livery of your colours is the purple, which adviseth you to have a strong and truly noble soul. When there is occasion to defend the glory of God, you must have the arm of God (a) and the thundring voice of God, not to gain respect by austere looks and affectations of severity, which many times proceed from much infirmity of spirit.

(a) Si habet brachium sicut Deus, & simili voce tonet, circunda tibi decorem, & in sublime erigere Job 40.

The Councel of Aix saith, (b) the Church is a dove, which teareth no man with her tallans, but is pleased sweetly to strike with her wings: The true gravity of a Priest consisteth in manners, not countenance. (c) It ought to be a seal of diamond, firmly to preserve the characters of virtue, and sign others by example. This fortitude will come upon you, by accustoming not to comply with any vice whatsoever. There is not a worse slavery than to put your liberty into the hands of sin. It is a long chain, and hath many gordian knots: cut them resolutely, as did Alexander, and conquer the Kingdom of your passions, which is of more worth than the Persian or Indians. Above all, if you desire to rule, avoid two rocks most dangerous for a Church-man; whereof the one is the thirst ever to get a new, the other laziness and profuseness in a living already acquired.

Think not to advance your state, and increase the number of your benefices, otherwise it were to seek out God for bread, not for miracles: It were for living to loose well-living, so to become a bad merchant, not a good Pastour. What cause have you of disturbance? A reasonable benefice is enough for you. If you desire to have a shoe over-wide, and not fit for your foot, you deceive your self. Say not you are poor, there can be no poverty where you have God for inheritance, and he whom God all-rich, sufficeth not, deserves to be perpetually poor. This desire which men without ceasing have, to be ever on increase, much villifieth Ecclesiasticks. It affords them as many dependences as they have pretensions. It makes them servilely sooth the passions and vices of those Great-ones, from whom they expect a recompence. It robbeth them of the Kingdom of God, to tie them to the chain of men; who many times are more enthralled than galley-slaves.

It is a great shame to intrude wickedly hereinto, to surprize an honour by the way of a dishonour. Saints have obtained benefices by flying them, and now we must run over the heads of a man and beast, to overtake them. That brave Architect Vitruvius thought it very strange, that an Artisan presented himself to a great man, to be employed in his own faculty and profession, and thereupon spake a most remarkeable sentence: (d) I see Architects who beg, and under-hand sue to be employed: As for my self, I have learned of my Masters, that we should not ask of any man, but rather be intreated by others, to use care and endeavour. He must be blameless, who blusheth not to require that which may be denied him. What would this noble spirit have said, had he seen Churchmen to debase themselves, not onely to supplications, but to services most unworthy their quality, to obtain cure of souls, which others in solitary wildernesses have fled from, through bryars and thorns, among savage beasts?

(d) Vitruvius in præfat. l. 6. Cæteri Architecti rogant & ambiunt ut architectentur: Mihi à Præceptoribus est traditum rogatum non rogantem opertere suscipere curam, quòd ingenuus color movetur pudore, peteridorum suspicionem.

You should imitate that worthy Grecian wrastler, of whom Clemens Alexandrinus (e) speaketh, who after long preparation, going to combate, stayed himself on the way, and looking on a Statue of his god, said unto it: I have done my duty, do you yours. Become a good man, and a deserving, and believe God will not fail to give you what shall be most behooffull.

Our great King Robert, made one day upon this occasion, an observation for ever to be remembred, noted by Glaber an ancient Authour. He saith, that a certain Abbot having presented the King with a goodly horse, in imitation of those who fish in giving, and cast out one gift as a hook to draw another, hoped this horse would run so well for his Master, as to bring him home a Bishoprick.

But

But the good King seeing the sinister intention of this man, sent him to the Church, commanding him to return with his Crozier, which he quickly did, proposing to himself in his mind an augmentation of livings, as his avarice had represented to him. But as soon as the King espied him afar off: "Hold "down that Crozier (saith he) you are unworthy of "it, since you think to have it from a man: To the which he obeyed, though much ashamed, and was as one dropped out of the clouds. Our Robert, endowed with a natural goodness, was not willing he should too long suffer this disgrace, but commanded the Crozier to be put into the right hand of the image of our Saviour, which stood directly upon the Altar, then turning himself to the Abbot: "Take "(saith he) your Crozier, and learn, that it is he "there that gives it you. I would not have you so "much as give thanks to a mortal man, but that you "freely use it, as the honour of your charge requi-"reth. What a King? What a lesson?

As for the other rock, which concerneth the use of goods, God forbid, when you come to maturity of age, that you employ the patrimony of Jesus, the sweat and bloud of the faithfull, in good chear, excess, and play, to fatten beasts, or men worse than beasts, who live but on the sins of others, to raise unto your self a heap of anger in the day of judgements. God forbid, the buildings of an Abbey should fall to decay, the Altars become naked, the images of Saints shivered in pieces, the lamps and lights be eclipsed, the walls weep, and spiders there spin their webs, rats run up and down, and Religious men famish: that Priests there should present themselves before the Altar with ridiculous habits, which tast of a Tavern, whilest I know not what little neece drags silk at her heels, at the charge of the Crucifix.

My God! who will bring back to us a Guy the Gross, that flourished in the time of S. Lewis? I would kiss his ashes, and put them, were it possible, over Myters and Crowns. (g) This great personage, first a Proctor, married, and father of two daughters, his wife dying, was made Priest; from a Priest Bishop of Puy, from thence Archbishop of Narbone, afterward Cardinal, and lastly Pope. It was expected that his two daughters, which he left to the world, should become great Princesses: but the good Pope made one Religious, with a pension of thirty pounds, and married the other, giving her for full dower three hundred pounds in marriage, to a nephew-Priest, who promised himself many titles, Myters, and Croziers, of three Prebends he possessed, he took two away, commanding him to content himself with one alone, and by his letters signifying, it was not reason his advancement to the Papacy, which gave him cause of terrour and tears, should minister matter unto his of pride and riot. This act of simplicity is a thousand times more admirable, than if he had made his daughters Queens of Antioch, and turned all his house into gold.

(g) Vita Clemen. 4. apud. Alphonsum Ciaconium.

Behold the prudence of S. Augustine, of whom Possidius (b) writeth: He used his own kindred as the rest of the faithfull, giving to them, if the case so required, not to enrich them, but to free them from necessity, or at least to make them live in the less penurie.

(h) Nec suos consanguineos in suâ vitâ ac morte more vulgi tractavit, quibus dum adhuc superesset, id si opus fuit, quod & cæteris erogavit, non ut divitiis haberentur, sed ut non egerent, aut minus egerent. Possidius de S. Aug.

(i) Non cui propriæ sunt, sed communes Ecclesiæ facultates. Prosper. lib. 1. de vitâ contemplativâ cap. 6. Sacerdotes bonorum Ecclesiæ non possessores sed dispensatores sunt. Aug. Ep. 50.

To what purpose should you be prodigal of an estate whereof you are but a steward (i)? One part thereof is due to the Ministers of the Altar; another part to the poor (k), and a third part to the fabrick. If there be any magnificence in the Church, it belongs to the publick, particulars should be satisfied with modestie. Why should you pass into the other world, charged with crimes and debts, drawing the malediction of Heaven and earth on your heads?

The sixth SECTION.

The third quality of a good Prelate, which is Puritie of life.

YOur third attire is of white linnen, which signifieth the Angelical purity you should observe from your most tender years, to carry it with you to the Altar. The Prophet Isaiah (a) telleth, they should have their vessels very clean, who are chosen to bear the vessels of God. And for this purpose all the Saints advise us to avoid the daily and familiar conversation of women, who are manifest snares of chastitie (b). Believe me, it is one of the most important points of your carriage. A Prelate abiding within the limits of this purity, would appear in the commerce with men, as if he came from a Quire of Angels. But as soon as he falleth into a licentious life, he forsaketh the dignity of his character, and goeth out from the throne of Majesty, as the unfortunate Babylonian King, to feed on hay among beasts. The night discovereth not more stars in the Heavens, than it openeth eyes on the earth to observe his most secret pleasures, ears to hearken to his deportment, and mouths to divulge them through all Provinces. He is looked on as a strange bird, that is newly gone out of his element; and God permits, that having sold his soul for hogs-draff, he should still rest unsatisfied, finding eachwhere a long web of perplexities, and a rouling wheel of immortal punishments. To some he serves for matter of mirth; to others as a shuttle-cock; he giveth occasion of tears to few, of indignation to all. Men for him are wounded with jealousie, and women, have they never so little honesty, abhor him. There are none but certain Harpies, which (as saith Cardinal Petrus Damianus) flie round about Altars to pillage them, who bear him the like good will, as Ravens do to carrion. He lives in a kind of stupidity of spirit, in continual indisposition of body, disgrace in his temporal fortunes, the fable of the world, the object of Heavens anger, and earths execration. Finally, he resembleth an old sepulcher, that hath nothing in it but stench and titles. Happily then ponder in your heart, what the life of a Priest ought to be, who is the house of God, of the cabinet, and as it were of the bosom of God. To think a wickedness, is a crime; to commit it, a sacriledge; to bear it to the Altar, is a sin which hath no proper name: there are titles and offices of all vices. Oh how pure should that mouth be, which approcheth to kiss the son of God! Oh how clean should those hands be, which are chosen to purge away the worlds ordures! Oh how chaste ought that heart to be, that is bedewed with the bloud of the Word Eternal!

What a horrour, when a faithless soul from the bed of wolves, goeth out to find the Lamb, and carrieth the pollutions of the earth to the Sanctuary of the living God: like to that beastly Empress Messalina, spoken of by the Satyrist (c) who bare to the Imperial bed of Claudius her husband, the infamy and noisomness of places, which should not be so much as named in the Palace of a Roman Emperour.

(c) Fœda lupanaris tulit ad pulvinar odorem.

S. Peter (d) said, we must break all ill thoughts by the exercise of the presence of Jesus Christ, as the waves are dashed against the rocks. And S. Chrysostom (e) advised Priests to be pure, as if they were in Heaven amidst the Angels.

(d) Instruebat Petrus discipulos, actus vitæ suæ omni horâ custodire, & in omni loco Deum respicere, firmiter cogitationes malas cordi suo advenientes non ad Christum allidere. S. Clem. Ep. 1. ad Jacobum.

(e) Necesse est sacerdotem sic esse purum ut in Cœlo collocatus inter ipsas Cœli virtutes medius staret. Chrys. de Sacerdotio.

Chastity, saith holy Zeno, is happy in virgins, strong in widdows, faithfull in the married, but with Priests it ought to be wholly Seraphicall. It is fit he should have little of the body, who is made to manage and handle the body of the Son of God. It is fit he ſhould have ſmall commerce with the fleſh, who knoweth how to incarnate the living God in his hands. A carnal ſoul ready to ſell his patrimony for a meſs of pottage, as the unworthy Eſau, is more fit for hogs, than the Sanctuary. They heretofore ſacrificed to the Sun without effuſion of wine, and thoſe who ſacrifice to the Maſter of the Sun, ought to entermarrie ſobrietie with chaſtitie, which are ever mutually linked together. The banquets of rich ſeculars (ſaid S. Jerome f) are not ſo proper for Church-men. It is much fitter to comfort them in afflictions, than to accompany them in their feaſts. A Prieſt who is ſtill preſent at weddings, is never well eſteemed of. He that would behold the modeſty which is to be obſerved at the tables of Eccleſiaſtical men, let him at the leaſt take a model upon that which Tertullian writeth in his Apologetike of the Primitive Chriſtians. Our table, ſaith he, hath nothing in it which taſteth of ſordidneſs, ſenſuality, or immodeſty; we eat there in proportion, we drink according to the rules of temperance, ſo much we ſatiate our ſelves as is neceſſary for men, that muſt riſe in the night to offer their prayers to God. We there ſpeak and converſe as in the preſence of God, our hands waſhed, and candles lighted, every one reciteth what he knows of holy Scripture, and of his own conceit, all to the praiſe of God. Prayer endeth the banquet, as it gave beginning thereunto. From the table we go to the exerciſe of modeſty and honeſty: You would ſay if you ſaw us, it were not a ſupper we had in hand, but a leſſon of piety.

(f) Convivia vitanda ſunt ſecularium, maxime eorum qui honoribus tument. Conſolatores nos potius meroribus ſuis, quàm convivus proſperis noverint. Facile contemnitur Clericus, qui ſæpe vocatus ad prandium, ire non recuſat. Hieron. Ep. 2. Nepoſian.

The ſeventh Section.

The fourth perfection of a Prelate, which is obſerved in Zeal and charitie.

YOur fourth mark is ſcarlet, the ſign of the ardent charity and zeal you ought to retain towards the houſe of God. The buckler of brave Champions of the God of Hoſts ſhould be a buckler of fire, and all his ſouldiers muſt appear in crimſon caſſocks. You muſt early learn to bay the hares skin in the hall, that you may afterward go into the field for the hunting of ſouls. You muſt become a wall of fire, to ſerve as a rampart in the houſe of God. You muſt be a ſtar, to run over and enlighten the little world recommended to your charge. You muſt oppoſe the power of great-ones, the ſtrength of the ſturdy, the wiles of the crafty, the cloſe practiſes of the wicked, to divert ill actions, advance good, leave unprofitable, deſtroy vice, plant virtue, chaſtiſe delinquents, recompence men of merit, protect the poor, juſtifie the innocent. You muſt be an eye to the blind, a foot to the lame, arm and hand to the maimed, a Sanctuary to all the world. You muſt have as many chains to oblige men to you, as God hath given you means of well-doing. Let the miſeries which in a right line would haſten to you, if it be poſſible, may paſs no further than you: Let your houſe be a ſhop, where from ſtones the ſons of Abraham may be raiſed.

Num. 2. Clypeus fortium ejus ignitus, viri exercitus in coccineis.

The High-Prieſt heretofore bare the whole world on his habit, of which he was as it were the Advocate; and you muſt think, when you are in office, all the world is on your ſhoulders, and that both the living and dead ſhall have a ſhare in the duty which you ſhall render thereunto. It ſhall be your act to carry the torch of example before the people, to inſtruct men to cure and comfort their infirmity, to pray, and ſacrifice both for the world of the living, and thoſe whom death already hath divided from our converſation.

What charity think you can you have to be diſcharged from theſe obligations? You muſt learn to love ſouls, as the moſt pretious moveables you have in the world, to pleaſe your ſelf with the places, where the objects of your zeal are, and the knots of your charge, rather than the Courts of Princes; when you ſhall have untamed ſpirits to govern, let them ſerve as an arreſt for your heart, a ſubject for your induſtry, an exerciſe for your virtues. Satban, in Job, went round about the earth to entrap man; Do you think you do too much, in your opinion, if you advance ſome ſteps to ſave men? Noe was ſhut up in the Ark with about three hundred kinds of beaſts, peaceable among the waves and deſtruction of the world, becauſe ſuch was the will of God: and you cannot reſt among ſouls created according to the image of the Divinity, whereunto you are by duty engaged under the peril of your ſoul. What a ſhame is it for a Church-man, if he cannot live unleſs perpetually among horſes, dogs, and apes, when God ſummons him to the charge of ſouls? Julius Cæſar wondred to ſee men, who dandled apes, having children in their houſes; and who cannot but admire, if God allotting you ſo many ſpiritual children, you perpetually kiſs monkeys, play with little dogs, and carry hawks?

Nullum omnipotenti Deo tale ſacrificium, quale eſt zelus animarum. Greg. ſuper Ezech. hom. 12.

The eighth Section.

The fifth excellency of a Prelate, which is Science and Prudence.

FInally for concluſion, you muſt ſprinkle gold over your Hyacinth, purple, and crimſon. Theſe are the rays and lights of knowledge and prudence, which are as neceſſary for a Prelate, as the eye for a beautiful body. Diſcretion (ſaith S. Bernard is not a ſimple virtue, but the governeſs of all virtues, the guide of paſſions, and the Miſtreſs of manners, which if you take away, virtue becometh vice (a). Prelates (as Pope Zozimus aſſureth us) are the eyes of the Church, and if theſe eyes be eclypſed, what darkneſs may we expect over the other parts of the body?

We muſt not tell a noble ſpirit, how ſhameful a thing it is to be in high degree of dignity, and play the golden beaſt. You cannot brook this affront, the very infants and the dumb world ſpeak, and with a finger ſhew it you, as did the Aſs of which Ammianus writeth, who in the City Piſtoia mounted at mid-day into the tribunal of a Judge, & began with much earneſtneſs to bray, as if he had done well to the purpoſe.

Tribunali ſi cenſo audiendus deſtinatus rugiens. Ammian. l. 27. c. 1.

It is a lamentable thing, if for your ſake we be enforced to ſay, that fortune is a daughter of a good houſe, but that ſhe poſtitutes herſelf to ſervants; that the Church is abſolutely wiſe, but becomes the ſhare of the ignorant. It were a ridiculous thing if on you the fable of the owl ſhould be verified, which telleth, that the ſmall birds had found a roſe on the way, and preparing to ſing for maſtery, they appointed Judges to give it to the victorious, under title of recompence for his ſong, as the prize of his conqueſt. But as they were diſpoſing themſelves for trial, came a miſchievous owl in the night, and carried away the flower without ſinging. Can a noble heart well endure this application ſhould be juſtly made upon him, and to be held an infamous bird, which hath ſtollen away the flower due to the little nightingals? Glaſs will not preſent the figure objected, if it be not leaded; whatſoever you may have either of luſtre or talents, will have no ſubſiſtence, if you lead not your head with the ſtrength of endeavour.

Should you have the pome-granate, which is the fruit of Kings, and were you of the bloud Royal, if you have not little bels on the border of your garment, as had the High-Prieſt of the old Law, to make the doctrine of the word of God to reſound, you would would be despised. Why then do you intermeddle with so many toys and petty trifles of children? You should be an Alexander, who better loveth the launce of Achilles, than the lyre of Paris. You must in these schools be fed with the marrow of lions, as that yong Prince, and not entertain your self with catching of flies. When you grow aged, you should not be in a Bishoprick, like a blind Cyclop in a hollow cave.

The ninth SECTION.

The Motives which Noble Prelates have to the duty of their profession.

IN the Name of God, permit you may be rectified in these five virtues, which I have before alledged. The obligations which you have hereunto, if you well consider them, are very great. First, you see that such as are of the same bloud with you; endeavour to make good what they profess. Those who manage arms, will part with nothing of the glory of arms. The most timorous would be flayed, and piece-meal torn for a poor punctilio of honour, which is oft-times meerly imaginary. They flie among naked swords, flames, and musket-shots, to purchase a little reputation, which hath not ever the reward it expecteth. And you, O Noblemen, that are in the pay of the Sovereign King, whose liberality cannot deceive you, in a most honourable profession, and which should not be blemished with remisness, would you spare your endeavour to do something worthy your birth? Do you not behold a flourishing Nobility round about you, which being consecrated to the Church, discovereth marvellous hopes unto us? Some do as the vines of Smyrna, that whilest they are in blossom, bear their fruit. There is nothing now every where but studie and servour. There are those who win Troy the magnificent, now wholly enflamed, and will you under hatches lie snoring in the ship?

(a) Omnis Pontifex ex hominibus assumptus pro hominibus constituitur in ea quæ sunt ad Deum. Hebr. 5.

(b) Aristotoles lib. 4. Politic. c. 15. vocat Magistratus. ὀφθαλμοὺς λαμπάδας lumina obelisci præfixa, quod sacerdotibus proprium. In te oculi omnium diriguntur: domus tua, & conversatio quasi in speculo constituta, magistra est publicæ disciplinæ. S. Hier. Epist. 3.

In the second place, see who you are. You are destined to treat the cause of men with God; (a) would you betray it? You are selected to be the Oracles of God; would you make your self a weather-cock? you are chosen to be the Ark of the Testament; would you become a vessel of reprobation? You are an Angel, and in hope a little God; would you be an Angel of darkness, and a god of straw? Apply your self wholly to God, to whom you owe all. It is not a matter of discretion for you to do well, it is a point of necessity. Angels hover over your heads, and men are on every side to observe your actions. Those who are blind as moles in their own errours, have the eyes of a Linx to espie your imperfections. (b)

Do you not enjoy a goodly honour, when it shall be said of you, that you have a dignity which becomes you, as a ring of gold the snout of a hog (as speaketh the Scripture, (c) and when the King, who is pleased to take the pain to look into the deportments of men Ecclesiastical, who are of eminent extraction, shall perceive you are in the Church as an unprofitable burden, (d) to disgrace the charge which honoureth you, and that all those that name you, when you happen to be mentioned in honourable assemblies, will wish a cloud of darkness at noon-day, to cover the shame of their foreheads?

(c) Prov. 12. Circulus aureus in naribus suis.

(d) Principatus sine meritoria sublimitate, bonorum titulus sine homine, dignitas in indigno, ornamentum in luto. Salvia. l. 1. ad Eccles. Cath.

Adde that the Church stretcheth out her arms and intreateth you would not suffer her laurels to wither in your hands, to defile her victories, nor eclipse her lights. She hath seen many miseries, many hath she born, many vanquished; but never felt any wounds more dolorous than those which fell upon her by vice, (e) ignorance, and the negligence of her Prelates. That is it which hath opened the gate to heresies, which hath fomented infidelities, enlarged impiety, disposed the brows of the wicked to impudence, the tongue to slander, the hands to rapine, which hath darkened the present times with horrible confusions, and which vomiteth upon the times and Ages of posterity. Will you increase these calamities, and with your corruptions make a bridge for the faithless to ruin Christianity? For that perhaps shall be the last scourge, which God will use to punish the abuses of ill Prelates, and the sins of the people in general.

(e) Nescio criminum an numinum turbam Tert. adverf. Valentinianos de eorum diis cap. 8.

For conclusion I demand, what will become of you in the end at the last judgement of God, under which the Angels tremble, who govern the world? What will become of you, when you shall be accused to have been a viper in the Church, a scandal to the simple, an ill example to the most corrupt, a fiery torch that would enflame the house of God? Where may one find punishments sufficient to inflict on you, and where can you get members enough to furnish out so many punishments, when the stones and marbles of those places you have possessed, will crack in pieces to flie into your eyes? On the contrary, if you take the right way, which I propose, you shall lead a peaceable life in the security of a good conscience, rich in honour and ability, honourable in reputation, terrible to the wicked, reverenced by honest men, fertile in good actions, abundant in infinitie of fruits, fruitfull in recompences, prosperous in successes, glorious to posterity, attended on earth with the odour of virtues, and crowned in Heaven by Eternitie.

The tenth SECTION.

The examples of great Prelates are very lively spurs to virtue.

TO come to this effect, often represent before your eyes the lively images of so many worthy Prelates, who have flourished through all Ages, and behold them as stars, which God with his own hand hath planted in this great firmament of the Church, as well that he there might make his glory shine, as here to prepare a way for our direction. Think sometime within your self what a spirit one S. Nilamon had, who died with terrour, as they bare him to the Throne of a Bishop, for which so many other pine away with ambition, he forgoing life with apprehension he should loose his innocency? What humility in S. Peter of Alexandria, who being the lawfull Successour of S. Mark, would never mount to his chair, but contented himself to sit the residue of his days on the foot-stool, until after his death, the people, having attired him with his Pontifical habit, did carry his body to the seat which he never had possessed? A man truly humble, whose death must be expected to honour his merit, as if honour were incompatible with his life. What zeal in Eustatius Bishop of Epiphanium, whose heart was so surprized with onely notice of the profanation of a Church, that he fell down dead in the place, making himself a tomb furnished with the triumphs of his own piety, a thousand times more pretious than gold and richest diamonds? What liberality in Saint Exuperius Bishop of Tholouse, to give away the gold and silver of his Church, for the necessities of the poor, yea, even to the carrying of the Blessed Sacrament in a little basket of osier? What charity in Saint Paulinus, who after he had in alms spent his whole patrimony, which was both very rich and abundant, sold himself, and voluntarily became a slave, to redeem the son of poor widows? What faith in Saint Gregorie Thaumaturgus, to remove mountains, and command over elements, with as much liberty as a Master over his servants? What power in S. Leo and S. Lupus, to stay Attila, and make head against an Army composed of seven hundred thousand men, drawn from the most dreadful Nations of the earth? What confidence in S. Martin, to submit his shoulders to receive the fall of a huge tree, on condition he might thereby banish the Idols? Let us lay aside all other actions, which are miraculous: behold the lives of those, who have traced a more ordinary way. Imitate the contemplation of a S. Denis, the fervour of a S. Ignatius, the constancy of a S. Athanasius, the contempt of the world of a S. Hilarie, the generosity of a S. Cyprian, the austerity of a S. Basil, the mildness of a S. Augustine, the majesty of a S. Ambrose, the vigilancy of a S. Gregorie, the vigour of a S. Cyril, the wisdom of a S. Remigius. Propose to your self the acts of S. Vedastus, Herculanus, Eleutherius, Medardus, Lupicinus, Nicetius, Romanus, Sulpitius, Pretextatus, Germanus, Amandus, Claudius, Lambertus, Wolphranus, Swibertus, and many such like. Consider the deportments of S. Thomas of Canterbury, S. Lewis of Thoulouse; and above all, let not your eye pass over Saint Charles Borromeus, whom God hath made resplendent in our days, to teach us that no Age is secluded from sanctity.

A man is powerfull to perswade virtue, when in one and the same instant he alledgeth three-score thousand reasons, each of which weigh a Crown of gold (hath one of the best Writers of this Age said:) and so did S. Charles, forsaking three-score thousand crowns of yearly rent for one mornings Mass.

He was a Bishop, who often fasted with bread and water, even in the time of feasts; who every day said his Breviary on his knees, and moistened it with his tears; who celebrated Mass every day with a majesty more than humane; who had two retirements in the year to attend to spiritual exercises; who read the Bible on his knees, sheading brinish tears; who gave alms above his ability; who in person waited on the infections; who wore hair-cloth under his scarlet habit; who slept on the bare boards; who stirred not out of his Dioceſs; who visited it on foot; who in his charge made himself indefatigable; who ever was the foremost in good works, in the Church, in the hospital, with the sick, at a Sermon; who was most exact in not giving orders nor benefices, but to persons very capable and of good life; who never did any matter important, without communicating it to the Pope and his Cardinals, whom he as an Oracle, honoured. These are the words of this fore-mentioned Authour, which seem to have very little busk, but much weight. Is it not sufficient to make you undertake by necessity, that which you cannot refuse without crime? No longer think upon piety as a thing impossible, and do not like ill Physitians, who make the sick despair of health, because they cannot cure them.

The Reverend Father Binet.

These latter Ages are not so barren of good men, who are most excellent plants in the orchard of Almighty God, but that it hath born, and doth still produce plenty of good Prelates, who honour their profession by the merit of their virtues. If you cast your eye upon those, whom the nearness of time doth make us as it were almost to touch, you shall behold a Cardinal George of Amboyse, who was marvellously potent, but employed all his power to the maintenance of the Church and State, and never sought to be great, but to oblige inferiours, nor approach to the Court, but there most gloriously to serve his Prince.

A Zimenes, Archbishop of Toledo, who amidst the magnificence of Court, retained the austerity of a Religious man; who was such an enemy of pomp and ostentation, that he hath been seen to visit his Dioceſs on foot, without train or attendance, who employed his ample revenues, to make war against Barbarens, build Monasteries, found Universities, imprint those admirable Bibles in many languages, which are the treasures of all the Libraries in the world. A Pool, who was not onely free from the ambitions and avarice of the world, but made as small an account of his body, as of his shirt, since he being violently persecuted by King Henry the Eight, plainly said, that for defence of the faith, he would as willingly disarray himself of life, as of his habit, and would ever be as ready to enter into his tomb, as into his bed to sleep. You shall there behold the four Cardinals of Bourbon, who have equalled their virtues to the bloud of Kings, and the purple of their sacred Colledge. The great Cardinal of Lorain, who hath had the honour to anoint three of our Kings with his own hands, to assist in their Councels, to enlighten them with the rays of his spirit, to defend them by his fidelity, fortifying his hand from his tendrest youth, for the conservation of the State. In all these pomps he wore austerity under scarlet, he preached, and ardently cathechized the most simple of his Dioceſs, he supported, as an adamantine pillar, the faith, which was both in France and Germanie so shaken by the unspeakable disorder of the times: he received the remnants of the English shipwrack with most pious liberality, he instituted Religious Orders, he raised Seminaries, he on every side armed against impiety.

A Cardinal of Tournon, who served four Kings, to wit, Francis the First, Henry the Second, Francis the Second, Charles the Ninth, and that in France and Rome, in all the most important affairs, being likewise Arbitratour of the great Potentates of the earth, with a most remarkeable loyalty, a prudence inestimable, a courage invincible. A Baronius, who hath eternized himself by the endeavour of his hands, a thousand times more honourable than all the Monarchs of Ægypt in their rich Marbles, Pyramids, and Obelisks. But from whence think you have the large blessings of his labours proceeded, but from a most innocent life, which was as the Sun without blemish? but from a most ardent charity, which caused him for the space of nine whole years to visit hospitals morning and evening, to help the necessities of the poor? but from a most singular piety, which wasting his life in the fervour of his prayers, consumed also his revenues with good works in most sacred liberalities?

A Tolet, a Religious man out of Order, who, raised to the dignity of a Cardinal, employed the most part of the hours of day and night in prayer; living on nothing almost but herbs and pulse, fasting the saturdays with bread and water, and adding a particular Lent besides the ordinary, to the honour of the most glorious Virgin Mary, as the Reverend Father Hilarian de Costa, observeth in the Treatise of his life. Cardinal D'Ossat, writing to Monsieur Villeroy, affordeth him the titles of sanctity, learning, prudence, integrity, worth, fidelity, and faith it is an admirable thing, to see the handy-work of God in raising this great man for advancement of the affairs of France, and absolution of the late King of most famous memory. And the great Cardinal Peron, in a letter he wrote to this triumphant Monarch, dated the second of September. in the year 1595. saith among other things, speaking of the negotiation of Tolet upon this affair: Besides that he hath renounced all worldly respects, to embrace the equity and justice of your cause, that he hath shut up his eyes from the natural obligation of his Prince, Countrey, Parents, that he hath trampled under foot all sorts of menaces, promises, and temptations; he hath also taken so much pain both of body and mind upon this treaty, that we much wonder he shrunk not under the burden; combating hating, sometimes by writing, sometime by conference with those who were opposite, removing and animating such as were stupid, and in sum, carrying this business with such zeal and constancy, that your Majesty could not hope for so many trials, not to say, so many masterpieces, yea miracles, from the most affectionate and courageous of all your servants. Behold the testimony of a most untainted Prelate.

I say nothing of the excellent Bellarmine, nor of that prime man among the learned, the most illustrious Peron, nor of the great light of sanctity my Lord Bishop of Geneva, whose lives are printed. I likewise behold most eminent personages on the Theater of France, who as celestial bodies, have sufficient height and lustre, and are of ability to exercise a pen more powerfull than mine; but since I have put my self upon limits, not to speak here of any man now living, I better love to resemble those, who being not of stature able to affix crowns on the head of the Suns statue, burnt flowers to it, to make their odour mount to the Heavens. So since I cannot crown their merit with humane praise, I will offer up prayers and vows for their prosperities, with all submission due to their eminent qualities. As it is not my humour profusely to enlarge upon the panegyricks of the living, so is it not my intention to insert all the dead in this little Treatise. If you seek for those, who speak and write purposely, you will be overwhelmed with a main cloud of witnesses, which will shew you men who have been greater than Kingdoms, who have parallel'd the passed Ages, edified the present, enlightened the future, and upheld great fortunes by a much greater sanctitie. All these will tell you, we have nothing immortal in us, but the riches of the mind, and all this exterior lustre of the world which charmeth the eyes of men, is but a cloud in painting, a petty vapour of water, a fable of time, a dyal, which we then onely behold, when the sun of honour reflecteth on it, and which must in the end be buried in an eternal night of oblivion. Let us now see the great S. Ambrose, whom we among thousands have selected to serve as a model for this first discourse. You therein shall observe a man of a most noble extraction, endowed with admirable parts, and who by necessity of duty, and considerations of charity, was conversant in the Courts of Emperours, and in the infinite perplexity of many affairs, which he with all manner of prudence and courage handled, shewing in his deportments a vigorous sanctity, chosen by the Divine Providence, to make as it were the whole State of Christendom most eminent.

The first SECTION.

His Calling.

THe first mark of perfection, which we require in a good Prelate, to wit, Divine calling, is in great S. Ambrose so manifest, that were it written with the rays of the Sun, it could not be made more perspicuous. We may in some sort speak of him, what he said (a) of S. John Baptist, That it seemeth God began to prepare him from his mothers womb, to exercise his virtue one day in main battels. First, it is a thing remarkeable, that seeing resolution was taken in Heaven, to make this Prelate one of the most courageous and eloquent men of the world, he should be extracted from the Nobility, which is ordinarily full of generosity, being derived from a father, honoured with one of the chief charges of the Empire, which was the Lieutenancy over the Gauls. Besides, he came into the world first breathing French air, which hath been esteemed (according to S. Hierom) (b) the Countrey of the most noble and learned spirits of the earth: and Sidonius (c) another Prelate hath said, the valour of a French-man extendeth further than his life; for he liveth even then, when the soul and body are divided. Secondly, as we have observed before, God many times declared the calling of infants by sundry presages: It was a great sign of the eloquence of Saint Ambrose, to behold a swarm of bees (d) all together settle on his cradle, which was at that time brought out into a court of his fathers Palace, that the child might thereby take a little fresh air. The nurse seeing these little honey-creatures buzze about him, much nearer than she could have wished, coming and going to his lips, was affrighted and thought to drive them away; but the father, who walking in the same place with his wife and daughter, beheld this pretty sport, made a sign she should hold her hands, lest by exasperating these little creatures, she might provoke their stings. In the end, they peaceably forsook the place, and soared away so high, that they lost sight of them. At that time Ambrose, father of our great Prelate, spake aloud, as with the spirit of prophesie: This infant shall be great. And verily, these bees much better alluded to S. Ambrose than to Plato, who is said to have had the like hap in his infancy. For we must affirm, the eloquence of Plato had honey in it, and no sting: but this of S. Ambrose, besides the exceeding sweetness thereof in peaceable arguments, had, when there was occasion of combate, stings that pierced to the quick.

We may well say, he was the most elaborate in his style of all the Doctours of the Church, especially if we speak of the Latins. For many, as S. Hierom, and S. Augustine, oftentimes dictated with much vehemency of spirit, what came to their mind: but S. Ambrose did not so much accustom himself to dictate to a writer; for he in composing ever had his pen in hand, (e) to polish his works at leisure, and as we say, lick his own bear.

(e) Ambros. Epist. 65. ad Sabinum. Nobis autem quibus cura est similem sermonem familiari usu ad unguem distinguere, & lento quodam figere gradu, aptus videtur propriam manum nostro effigere stylo, &c.

Adde hereunto another sign of his vocation, in the childish sports he exercised without consideration, as did heretofore Saint Athanasius, being then, as he, an infant, which was, to cause his sister, and the children which attended her, to kiss his hand, as the hand of a Bishop, he therein taking much pleasure. It seemeth, God sometimes sheweth children as with his finger, the way they should pursue. It is an admirable thing, that there was in Paris found a young begger, called Maurice, so far transported in his own fancy, that he one day might become Bishop of Paris, that many offers being jestingly made unto him in his infinite necessity, to move him to renounce the right he pretended to the Bishoprick of this ample Citie, it proved meerly impossible: which a wealthy man perceiving, he so furthered him in studie, as in the end he came to the degree, which to himself he had prefigured. What shall we say? God unlooseneth even the tongues of mothers, to speak prophetically touching the state of their children. Witness a most honourable Ladie, named Ida, mother of three sons, Baldwin, Godfrey, Eustace, who one day sporting with her, and hiding themselves under her gown, and many times shewing their heads with diverse pretty childish dalliances, the father casually coming thither in the midst of their play, as they were all covered with their mothers garment, demanded, Who have we there? The Ladie readily answered, not knowing what she should say, It is a King, a Duke, and a Count. So it proved: Baldwin was King of Jerusalem, Godfrey succeeded in the Dutchy of Lorrain, to his father the great Godfrey of Boüillon, and Eustace was Earl of Boloigne. God made use of this womans tongue, as of the hand of a dyal, which pointeth out the hours as the great wheel guids it, leaving no memory where it touched. Ambrose did the like at that time, directed by the spirit of God. He made himself Bishop in his own imagination, but when he pursued the way of his proper reason and natural judgement, he therein used all resistance, not thinking he was called thereunto.

In the third place, his calling was altogether extraordinary and miraculous, in that being sent into the Territory of Milan in the quality of a Governour, Probus, who substituted him, merily said: Go, rule like a Bishop, rather than a President, recommending mildness unto him, that he might apply a lenitive to the great rigours that were used in matter of justice. This fell out much otherwise than Probus and Ambrose had projected, for as the history telleth, Auxentius, an Arrian Bishop, who had much longer lived than was fit for a man so wicked, some little time before deceased at Milan, the Metropolitan place of his Dioces, and when there was question to proceed to election, there were many difficulties between the Catholicks and Arrians, every one coveting to create a Bishop of his own party. The emulation which was much enkindled, threatned to draw bloud from the veins of both sides before it could be quenched. Ambrose, as a Magistrate, went thither to redress it. And behold at the same instant a little child, as if it had been an Angel, descended from Heaven, cried out in the midst of the assembly, Ambrose must be created Bishop. This loud voice was seconded by all men, as a voice sent from the mouth of God. The fire of dissention was quenched in an instant, the most outragious courages forsook their arms, and thought on nothing but to raise Ambrose, who was not as yet baptized, to bear him by ordinary degrees to the Episcopal chair.

Vade, age, non ut Judex, sed ut Episcopus.

The election of S. Ambros.

There were some obstacles herein on every side. For first, it was against the laws of the Church to choose a Bishop, since the Councel of Nice condemneth those Prelates, who give Orders to Priests presently after baptism. Secondly, there was an Edict of the Emperour, which forbade the advancement of his Officers and civil Magistrates, without his expres consent. In the third place, Ambrose, who was wholly dedicated to a secular life, had neither vein nor artery which enclined to election. But who can resist the spirit of God, when he is pleased to strike a stroke with his own hand beyond the imagination and judgements of men? All difficulties one after another, were taken away: and this election was approved, not onely by the holy See, but of all the Eastern and Western Bishops, who much rejoyced and congratulated with S. Ambrose, by their letters. The Emperour Valentinian gave his assent thereunto, boasting, he had sent such good Governours to Provinces, that they were thought capable of Bishopricks. There was no body but Ambrose to subdue, who used all sort of engines and practises to divert this purpose. He, who ever of his own nature was exceeding mild, feigned himself bloudy, causing racks and tortures to be publickly exercised on offenders, yet needs would they have him for Bishop. He, who was most chaste, made men and women of ill life haunt his house and descended even to the shadow of sin, to flee the light of glory, yet ceased they not to pursue him. He fled, and after he had for a whole night travelled hard, thinking he was far off, found himself at the gates of Milan, from whence he departed. In the end he was forced to yield to the spirit of Almighty God who gave him such evident tokens of his calling. Needs must he undergo the charge charge he ſo conſtantly had refuſed, and where humane prudence looſeth its ſight, we muſt ſuffer it to attend the direction of Eternal Providence.

The ſecond Section.

A ſhort Elogie of the life and manners of S. Ambroſe.

I Will do as Geographers, who put the whole world into a little map. I intend to comprize in few words, that which deſerveth a volume, and give you a brief table of the life and manners of this great Saint.

Rare endowments of a Prelate.

S. Ambroſe was a man, in whom it ſeemed virtue was incorporated, to make it ſelf viſible to mortal eyes. Goodneſs, which cometh to others by ſtudie, ſeemed his by nature, ſince he had conſecrated his infancy by the ignorance of vice, and whiteneſs of innocency. Others think it ill to commit a ſin, and with him it was a great vice to omit a virtue. When he lived in the houſe of his father, with his good ſiſter Marcellina, he attended to the practice of virtuous actions; they both were as flint-ſtones, which by proximity make the ſparkles flie: ſo the holy emulation they uſed in the purſuit of good, enkindled the ſenſible apprehenſion of God in their hearts, by a mutual reverberation. He went from this ſchool, as Samuel from the Tabernacle, to bear innocency to the Epiſcopal Throne, and there to receive dignity. His life ſerved as a rule, his example as a torch, his learning as an ornament, and his very ſilence as an admonition.

If you regard the virtues, which ordinarily lay the foundations of ſpiritual building, ſuch as are ſobriety and continency, Ambroſe undertook faſts for delight, commonly eating but once aday, and that with moderation; he tyed himſelf to the one for the love of the Croſs, and admitted the other by way of neceſſity. This exercise much ſerved him to conſerve his purity, which moſt inviolably he kept even in the very courſe of ſecular life, as it was found in his private papers, where he very ardently begged of Almighty God, that he would give him grace to maintain in his Epiſcopal dignity, the gift of chaſtity, which he had afforded him in a ſecular life. He daily roſe from his bed, as the Phenix from her neſt, having no other flames, but thoſe of that great Sun which ſcorcheth Angels in Heaven, and the moſt Angelical hearts on earth. From this temperance proceeded his admirable converſation, which gained all hearts, and who ſo well knew how to joyn the wiſdom of the ſerpent with the ſimplicity of the dove. He was prudent with good men, ſharp againſt the practiſes of the wicked, yet crafty never. His diſcourſe came from him with ſuch an Oeconomy, that the ignorant found inſtruction therein; the curious, light; the learned, ſolidity; the eloquent, grace; the vitious, terrour; the virtuous, edification; the timorous, confidence; the afflicted, conſolation; and the whole world admiration. There was nothing idle in this man, all ſpake in him, all tended to praiſe-worthy actions; his ſtudy was holy letters, his care to expreſs in his manners what he had read in books; he was prompt in all which he did, and had but one hinderance in the world, and that was prayer, which he would never have left, if diſcretion had not taught him to forſake God to find God. His intentions were moſt ſincere, his negotiations honourable, his ſilence diſcreet, his words ever profitable, his heart full of compaſſion; and although the eminency of his life raiſed him above all men, yet the ſweetneſs of his nature made him familiar with all ſuch as ſtood in need of his aſſiſtance. As much as his zeal made him terrible to thoſe who durſt contend with his Maſter, ſo much his mildneſs rendered him communicable to all the world: his exteriour employments nothing diminiſhed his interiour, nor did retirement for contemplation hinder the manage of affairs.

Never was he imperious, but to ſupport the Empire of the Saviour of the world. As he elevated himſelf towards Heaven, when there was occaſion to defend the Church, ſo he humbled himſelf to loweſt degrees, when he was to condeſcend to humane infirmities. Honour always ſeemed to him the tribute of God, and whileſt he lived, he conſtantly yielded it to his Maſter, without keeping ought elſe for himſelf, but the burden of his miniſtery. His continual exerciſe was to inſtruct Monarchs, exhort people, convince hereticks, comfort the afflicted, feed the hungry, cloath the naked, redeem priſoners, entertain pilgrims, ſhew the way of ſalvation to the erring, ſave the deſperate from ſhipwrack, enflame the luke-warm, cheriſh the fervent, provide for all thoſe who were under his charge, and punctually to act all the duties of his profeſſion.

He thought all the miſeries in the world were properly his, and bewailed them as his own. He likewiſe accounted the good hap, commodity, and advancements of his neighbour, were his own riches and enablements, as if in one ſole heart, all the hearts of the world were included. There was neither need of Porter nor Page in his houſe, to give him notice of ſuch as would ſpeak with him, for he was ever expoſed to commerce, as writeth S. Auguſtine. Every one ran to him, nor did any man think the time long in his company; ſuch pleaſure they took in his converſation. The needy who arrived at his houſe, went not away without relief. From the time he entered into office, he conſecrated his whole patrimony to the poor, giving as it were all he had, without reſerving ſo much as himſelf. Although tranſitory goods are conſumed, faith never is waſted. Faith ſerveth for alms, and alms fail not to faith. Theſe temporal aſſiſtances gave paſſage to grace and ſpiritual viſits; by which he endeavoured to ſweeten, as with oyl, the yoke of Jeſus Chriſt, and adorn with virtue the ſouls of all his ſubjects, as his own heart, which was a true receptacle of charity. Never was man more beloved or feared than he; ſo well did he know to diſpence theſe two different affections. Every man reverenced him as his Lord, and obſerved him as his father; each man thought he found his countrey, kindred, and accommodations, where S. Ambroſe was.

Expreſſa ab Hilar. Arel.

The third Section.

His Government.

THe Eccleſiaſtical government of S. Ambroſe, is the rule of all the noble actions of the Clergie, as heretofore the ſicle of the Sanctuarie was the model of other coins. This great man hath left ſuch an idæa hereof in his writings and manners, that the ſenſual find therein how to conſider their end, the luke-warm wherewith to be enflamed, the imperfect to be corrected, and the moſt perfect what they may daily learn. His fair ſoul was as the Ibis, a bird of Ægypt, which buildeth her neſt in the palms. It was perpetually converſant in great contemplations, and had no more impreſſions of the earth, than the ſupream ſphere of celeſtial bodies.

The principal Maxim on which he eſtabliſhed the perfection of his Eccleſiaſtical life, was that which he afterward digeſted in writing, in the Epiſtle to Irenæus, whereof I have ſpoken heretofore: Go to Ambroſe, (ſaith he within himſelf) behold thy ſelf a Prieſt, and which is more, a Biſhop. This condition requireth quireth a sober gravitie, alienated from the manners of ordinarie men, a life wholly serious, weightie, and solid, in degree of singularitie. It is a folly to think the dignitie of a Bishop consisteth in the exercise of ceremonies, or exteriour gestures in publick. How shall he be regarded by the people, who hath nothing in his manners different from the people? What wouldst thou have the world admire in thee, if it behold nothing in thee above it self, if it find its imperfections there, if after it hath blushed at one vice to which it is subject, it observe thou hast placed it in the throne of dignitie with thee? Since needs I must be a Bishop (a) let me seek out a life free from the tongues of the most insolent, and which hath nothing common with the works of weak-ones.

(a) Quæramus nobis viam inaccessam sermonibus insolentium, invisam oculis imperitorum.

Following this rule, he in his heart detested the practice of those, who enter into charge by sinister ways, and seek after nothing therein but exteriour lustre or temporal commodities: in such sort, that speaking of such a Prelate in the book which he composed of Episcopal dignity, he saith: (b) We behold him with carnal eyes as a great Bishop, and God with his eyes, which cannot be deceived, sees him as a foul leaper. Flesh took the dignity, and the soul hath lost honesty. Flesh predominateth over people, and the soul is a slave to devils.

(b) Lib. de dignitate Sacerdot. c. 5. Oculis quidem carnalibus videtur quasi Episcopus magnus, & divinis obtuitibus insicitur quasi leprosus magnus. Caro suscepit dignitatem, & anima peraidit honestatem. Caro dominatur populis, & anima servit demonis.

It is no hard matter to perswade a man to virtue, who believes it to be his principal business. This sage Prelate, having laid the foundations of good and sincere intentions, applied himself so to his charge, that day and night he admitted no other thought. For, leaving the manage of household affairs to his brother Satyrus, he addrest himself wholly to Episcopal functions, which he exercised with so much perfection, industrie, and readiness, that Paulinus, an eye-witness of his actions, said, He did as much alone, as five other Bishops.

First, seeing he succeeded a man who had sown dissention, he found it was very necessary often to preach Catholick verities, which he performed with much fruit, but labour indefatigable. For, coming from the order of Magistracy to Episcopal dignity, he must learn that which his first profession never had taught him: and although he might in such necessity have made use of others labours, notwithstanding he, who prudently thought fit, that the doctrine we teach should bud in our hearts, and take beginning in our inventions, to produce it with the more utility, put himself seriously to the reading of Scriptures and holy Fathers that were of his time, to bring forth afterward in his soul what he should speak and observe; for it was the counsel, which he afterward gave to Bishop Constantius. You (c) must (saith he) gather together the water, which distilleth from the Prophets, as the clouds from many places, to the end your land may be moistened and watered with their familiar fountains. His preachings were solid, pure, gently flowing, and full of good instructions, and although his discourse had much sweetness in it, yet had he not so suck'd honey from those bees which courted him in his cradle, that he retained not their stings. A nature too flexible resembleth the air, which as soon giveth place to beggers, as Cæsars; and as there is nothing more insupportable in a charge than a spirit opiniative, so nothing is more fruitless than a weather-cock, who turneth with every wind, and hath no other direction, but the passions of al those that nearest approach him. S. Ambrose endeavoured to cure all the world, as much as he might possibly, with sweetness, mixing oft-times his own tears with those of his penitents: but if he met with obdurate and rebellious hearts, he took upon him a marvellous predominancy both of authority and eloquence, to tame vice and disarm insolence. Constantine (d) a great Physitian observeth, that it is not good to feed those with hony or milk, who are dangerously wounded; for seldom by this course is death escaped. Our great Bishop made the like judgement upon the maladies of the soul, and never bent himself to cherish by supple indulgences, those hearts which he saw to be ulcered with any malice. His admonitions were not upon idle discourses, for they were seen to be waited on with good effects, and as it were a general reformation in all orders.

(c) Collige de pluribus locis aquam quam effundunt nubes prophetæ, ut terra tua humescat, & domesticis irrigetur fontibus. Lib. 3. Ep. 1.

(e) Reformation of the Clergy.

(e) He began to measure the Temple by the Sanctuary: for esteeming that the sinews of words are laudable examples, he endeavoured to make a good Clergy, to serve as a mirrour for the Laity. The waters of Jordan heretofore offered homage to the feet of Priests, because they bare the Ark on their shoulders. There is not any thing that gives not way to a good Ecclesiastick, who carrieth sanctity in his heart; his words are thunder-claps, when his life is the lightening. Behold why this great Saint desired nothing so much, as to see the house, not of Cæsar, but of Jesus, free both from crime and suspition of it. Above all, he strove to extirpate two plagues, fatal and opposite enemies of all sanctity, avarice and lust; not onely desiring the Priests of his Diocess should have chaste bodies, but innocent hands also, and not covetous to draw superfluities to their condition of life. He voluntarily bred them in poverty and frugality, as in the first mansion from whence the glory of the primitive Church proceeded, well knowing, the augmentation of riches doth not equally increase piety.

One would not believe what choice he made in Ecclesiastical preferments, even to the refusing many times of some, who had been very much recommended unto him, and had nothing to give occasion of rejection, but some petty uncomelines in gesture or exteriour parts; that alone offended the eyes of Saint Ambrose, who was not willing to see any thing but lustre in his Clergy. And although such things seemed idle to many, yet was he no whit in his judgement deceived; for having one day dismissed two for one sole levity in their gate, he found they afterward made shipwrack of faith, and already discovered the unconstant perfidiousnes of their mind, in this wanton action of their carriage.

Where reasons could not avail, he employed a severe censure, having no regard to exteriour semblances, when there was occasions to chastise a crime. Witnes one Gerontius, who lived in Milan, under his rule, a man of a spirit most pregnant, and curious beyond his profession, who was not contented to seek into the secrets of physick, and excessively endeavour to polish his tongue, which was very pregnant, but he descended to some folly of Nigromancy. Now this man having an itch of speech, and especially of all that which he thought might make for his advantage, vaunted in some company that he one night had taken one Onoscelides, that is to say, a devil, who appeared to him with the legs of an Ass, and that he had shaved him, and led him to the mill: whether it were that he in effect had seen such a spectre, his brain being already much disposed to illusions, or whether it were through vanity and imposture, that he boasted himself of what he had done, as it oftentimes happeneth to such kind of men, who make tropheys of great crimes, whilest it raiseth them in the opinion of the world above the ordinary sort. These words being related to Saint Ambrose, he very sharply reprehended him, and imprisoned him in his own house, injoyning sundry penances for expiation of this fault, most unworthy of a Deacon of the Church of Milan, such as he was. He, who was not capable of such a remedy, fled, and went to Constantinople, with intention to disgrace S. Ambrose, which he did as much as possibly he might. There by the soft insinuation of his wit, joyned to an incredible vain tattle, in stead of seeking out a wholesom playster for his ulcers, he covered them with cloath of gold, in such sort, that through the favour of Great-ones, whom he had had gained, he was preferred to the Bishoprick of Nicomedia. S. Ambrose effectually wrote to Nectarius, discovering the impostures of this man, and beseeching him for the honour of the Church, and his own proper interest, he would not suffer that Episcopal See to be defiled with ordures that astonished heaven and earth. Nectarius employed all his power in this affair, desiring both to discharge his own conscience, and oblige the Bishop of Milan: but he found this Impostour had by his charms got so much favor, that to remove him was very difficult. The glory hereof was reserved for S. John Chrysostom, who afterward removed him, as soon as he was preferred to the dignity of Patriarch of Constantinople.

Religious cherished by S. Ambrose.

Behold the severity this great Pastour used in the institution of his Clergy: and as he saw that good Religious men and women served for a great ornament of the Church, so he took a most particular care to entertain them, and manure them as worthy plants of the garden of the Church. Never could be rest till he saw a Monasterie erected in the suburbs of Milan, where many holy personages dedicated themselves to a solitary life, to perform on earth what the Angels do in Heaven. As for Virgins who took the veil irrevocably to consecrate their virginity to Jesus Christ, he trained them up in the Church, with so much study, fervour, and zeal, that we cannot imagine more. For he dedicated to them the first fruits of his labours, writing in their favour the books of Virginity, which he composed in the first year of his charge, in a most flourishing and elabourate stile; where to shew the respect he bare to this profession, he spake these words unto them:

Excellent speeches to virgins.

My holy daughters, It is not yet three years since I undertook this charge, and you know from whence I was drawn, and the small time given to dispose me to so weighty a burden: notwithstanding, I afford you the fruits of my tongue, since I have learned more in your manners than in books. The flowers which grow in my discourses, come from your garden. It is not precepts for Virgins, but examples drawn from the life of Virgins. Your manners have breathed a certain grace into my soul, & I may say, that all that which my endeavour hath of good odour in it, is derived from your prayers. For who am I but a barren thorn? But God, who heretofore spake to Moses among thorns, will now to day speak by my mouth.

His Sermons and books had so much effect, that Virgins came from the utmost limits of Christendom to be veiled at Milan; which S. Ambrose seeing, he could not wonder enough that he perswaded virginity where he was not, it not being in his power sufficiently to multiply it according to his desire, in places where he resided (f).

(f) Hic tractio, alibi persuadeo: sic ita est, alibi tractemus ut vobis persuadeamus. L. 1 de virginibus.

He caused the Bishop of Bologna to come unto him, led on by the same spirit as himself, to assist in this design, of whom he one day said in full assembly: (g) Behold the fisher of the Church of Bologna, fit for this sort of fish; Lord afford fish, since you have given us conditours. And considering that some murmured at these his proceedings, as if the world should instantly fail by this means, he shewed in a most eloquent Sermon, that no one had cause of complaint either married or unmarried; the married, because they had wives, not virgins: the unmarried, because they should find sufficient: and that the carnal, who opposed virginity under pretext of multiplication, resisted by this means the chastity of marriages, where continency is oftentimes exercised, even by necessity: as for the rest, we are not to believe the world will be ruined through virginity: For, admit it should fail, it would ever be a matter more honourable for it to decay by virtue than concupiscence. But it is so much otherwise, said he, that we should lay hold of that, which we see by experience in the Churches of Africa and Alexandria, where there are most virgins, they have the greatest number of men.

(g) Adest piscator Bononiensis, aptus ad hoc piscandi genus: Da Domine pisces qui dedisti adjutores.

This employment nothing lessened the assistances, which he afforded for the instruction of those who lived in an ordinary course.

(b) Superstitions and excesses taken away.

(b) Above all, he endeavoured to root heresies out of their hearts, and certain customs of Gentilism, which easily stole in by contagion into the houses of the faithfull. Among other things, there was a Pagan-guise much practised at Milan and other places of Christendom, which was, to celebrate the first day of the year with riots and disorders: a matter much resenting the Bacchanals. He so cut off this abuse by his great authority, that of a day prophaned with so much sensuality, he in few years made it among Christians a day of penance and fasting: which for some space afterward was observed in the Church, until such time as the memory of the superstitions of Gentilism was wholly extinct. Others entertained this foolish belief, that when the moon was eclipsed, she suffered much through the persecution of ill Angels, who then endeavoured to exile her; and therefore they went out of their houses with many pans and cauldrons, making a loud noise to dissolve, as they said, the design which evil spirits had against the Moon. The sage Pastour made an expres homily against this superstition, wherein he much confounded those who were infected herewithal. Moreover, it being a custom very ancient, and introduced by the Apostles, to make in Churches, which then were the houses of the faithfull, Agapes, that is to say, bankets of charity in favour of the poor, this by little and little was changed into liberties unworthy of Christianity. For sensuality had got such ground, that stifling charity in this action, it rather seemed a sacrifice to the belly, than an act of piety. S. Ambrose abolished all these rites, and cut off such abuses even in the least root, that it was never seen again to sprout in the Church. S. Augustine, incited by his example, practised the like in Africa, and afterward caused the decree to be inserted in the third Councel of Carthage.

In the proportion that he extirpated vice, he planted solid virtues in the hearts of the faithfull, whom he ordinarily entertained with these ensuing instructions, counselling other Bishops to do the like. (i) First he sought in all places to form in minds a strong imagination of the presence of God, unwilling that Christian virtues should be petty hypocrisies, guided by the natural extent of humane respect, but rather intentions wholly celestial; and for that cause he said: (k) If any man be alone, let him regard himself more than any other in the world.

(i) Puritie of intention.

(k) Si quis solus est, seipsum præ cæteris erubescat.

(l) Secondly, seeing the inordinate desire of riches was a petty apostacy of faith, and root of all disorders, he very often did beat on this anvile, labouring by all sort of good endeavours to withdraw hearts from the love of earth, that he might raise them to Heaven. Among other things, you have these excellent words in the epistle to Constantius: (m) To enjoy much, is to have a great burden: Great riches are a vain ostentation: the indifferent, for use. We are all Pilgrims in this life, all the business is not in going, perfection consisteth in a ready passage. To what purpose do you so torment your self with the desire of boarding? Be wise, and you shall have sufficient. A virtuous man thinks nothing is without him but sin. Whereseever he sets his foot he finds a kingdom. All the world belongeth to him, because he useth all the world as his own.

(l) Covetousnes opposed.

(m) Multa onerosa, moderata usui. Viatores sumus vitæ hujus multi ambulant, sed opus est ut quis bene transeat. Sat is enti nihil alienum, nisi quod virtuti incongruum. Quocunque accesserint sua omnia. Totus mundus possessio ejus est, quoniam eo toto quasi suo utitur. Ep. ad Constantium.

In the third instance he made sharp war against the ambitions and vanities of the time, disposing minds as much as he could to Christian humility by this Maxim: (n) The greatest knowledge in the world is well to act your part: It importeth not in what condition of life we are, so that we discharge our conscience, and the dutie of our places. We must so use the matter, that our manners may recommend our condition, and not derive their worth from our dignities.

(n) Ambition. Nihil interesse in quo statu quis se probabilem præstaret, sed illum esse finem bonorum, ut quocunque quis statu probaretur. Illud præcipuum, ut magis mores commendarent statum, quam statum mores.

In the fourth place, he used infinite care to maintain conjugal chastity in the lives of the married, oftentimes shewing by pregnant reasons, that lust (o) was a fire, which burnt the garment of the soul, and wasted mountains even to the bottom. And because bravery is ordinarily the nest where dishonesty hatcheth, he courageously opposed profuseness in that kind, using sharp reprehensions against women, vain and dissolute in attyres. One day amongst the rest, he proved they were as in a perpetual prison, loaden with punishments and condemned by their own sentence (p) It is pity (saith he) to see a woman, that hath upon the one part a great chain about her neck, and on the other gyves about her feet. What matter is it whether the body be charged with gold or iron, if the neck be alike bowed under a yoak, and the gate bindred? The price of your bands serves for no use, but to give you cause to fear your torments. Miserable that you are, who condemn your selves by your own proper sentence; yea, more miserable than criminals, for these desire nothing but their own liberty, and you love your captivity.

In the end, he much recommended charity, justice, government of the tongue, flight from ill company, and modesty in all deportments; whence it came to pass, that he wrote those admirable books of Offices, which set out all Christian virtues with an eminent lustre. The good Prelate was in his Bishopprick, as the Pilot in the ship, the soul in the body, the sun in the world, labouring in all kinds, and having no other repose, but the vicissitude of travailes.

(p) Excess in apparel. Hinc collum catenâ, constringit, inde pedes compes includit. Nihil refert auro corpus oneretur aut ferro, si cervix premitur, si gravatur incessus, nihil pretium juvat, nisi quod vos mulieres ne pereat vobis pœna trepidatis. Quid interest aliena sententia an vestra vos damnet? Hinc vos etiam miserabiliores quam qui publico jure damnantur, quòd illi optant exui, vos ligari. Lib. 1. de Virginib.

The fourth Section.

His combates, and first against Gentilism.

Evident danger of Christendom.

IT is time now that we behold our strong Gyant enter into the list against monsters; for armed with weapons of light, he enterprised sundry battails against Sects, vices, and the powers of darkness, which sought to prevail. I will begin his prowess by the encounter he had with Symmachus, Governour of the City of Rome, who endeavoured by his eloquence and credit, to re-advance the prophane superstitions of Gentilism. This combat was not small, nor less glorious for the memory of S. Ambrose, with him that will well consider it, the danger was very great, for the name and design of Julian the Apostata, as yet lived in the minds of many men of quality, and of maligne spirits, who had conspired with time to stifle Christianity, making corrupt and imaginary Deities to re-enter into the possession of the world. This Symmachus was the Enfign-bearer, a subtile man, well spoken, and of great authority; to whom the Emperours had caused a golden Statue to be erected with the title of The Prime man of the Empire, both in reputation, wisdom, and eloquence: and for that cause he promised himself he had power enough to set God and the devil upon one and the same Altar. He practised to disguise Pagan Religion by his artifices, drawing it from the ordures and bruitishnes thereof chanted by Poets, to give it a quite other face, and represent it with a mask, which he had framed out of sundry Philosophers under the reign of Julian, to render it the less odious. And seeing the times favoured him, by reason that after the death of Gratian, a most Christian Prince, Valentinian, who was an infant under the guardianship of an Arian mother, held the stern of the Empire, he resolved therefore to fish in a troubled water, and by surreption obtained certain Edicts in favour of Paganism, against which S. Ambrose framed most powerful oppositions. I will render you heer the two pleadings in those terms they were pronounced, to confront the babble of a Politician with the eloquence of a Saint.

The understanding Reader shall heer observe two most rich peices of eloquence, which I have rendred rather as an Oratour than a Translatour, to give them the lustre they deserve. I am desirous you may see in the Oration of Symmachus, what a bad conscience can do, which hath eloquence to disguise truth, and how we must ever judge of men rather by their works than their words.

The Oration of Symmachus to Theodosius and Valentinian the Younger, for the Altar of Victory, exercise of Pagan Religion, and revenue of Vestals.

SACRED MAJESTIES,—

SO soon as this sovereign Court, wholly possessed by you, hath seen vice subdued by laws, and that you through your piety have razed out the memory of passed troubles, it hath taken upon it the authority, which the favour of this happy Age hath afforded, and discharging the acerbities long time retained upon the heart thereof, hath once again commanded me to bring you its complaints in a solemn Embassage.

Note that he feigneth Theodosius as present, who knew nothing what had passed.

Those that wish us not well, have hitherto bereaved us of the honour of your audience, thereby to deprive us of the effect of your justice. But I now come to acquit me of two obligations; the one as Governour of the City, the other as Embassadour: As Governour I do a work which concerneth the Weal-publick, and as Embassadour I present you the supplications of your most humble subjects.

Dissentions we have no more amongst us, for the opinion is ceased, that one to become a great States-man, must be particular in his opinions.

All the Pagan Senatours agreed not before upon this Embassage

The greatest Empire which Monarchs may enjoy, is to reign in the love and estimation of their subjects: so is it also a matter intolerable in those that govern the State, to nourish their divisions to the hurt of the publick, and establish their credit upon the loss of the Princes reputation.

We are far distant from those imaginations; for all our care perpetually watcheth for your interest, and for that cause we defend the decrees of our Ancestours, the rites of our Country, and fatal happiness thereof, as a thing which concerneth the glory of your age, to which you gave a new lustre, when you publickly protested never to enterprise any thing upon customs established by our Ancestours.

Behold wherefore we most humbly beseech you to restore the Religion, which so long hath preserved this Empire. If we will remember those Princes under whom we have lived, though divided in Sects and opinions, we shall find some have retained the Religion of their Ancestours, the other not rejected it. And if authority of the dead suffice not to give us example of what we should do, at the least let us take it from the dissimulation of the living, who in tolerating antient ceremonies have discovered they had no purpose to condemn them.

We at this present require the Altar of the Goddess Victory may be restored to us, thereon to offer our sacrifices. Is there any man in the world such a friend to the Barbarians our enemies, who will oppose this desire? The experience of passed times teacheth us wisdom for the future. It is time we avoid so many dreadful prodigies which menace us, and at last yield the honour to the name of Victory, which we have denied to its Divinity. Victory, o Sacred Majesties, hath already powerfully tyed you, and will yet much more oblige you. It is a work for the wicked, who never have had experience of its benefits, to have the honours thereof: but your worth cannot choose but adore that which serves as a favourable support for your triumphs.

A subtile insinuation of Symmachus

Victory

Victory is a Divinitie that hath her Altars charged with vows of the whole world. The man is most ungratefull, who will dishonour that which he professeth to desire: and were it not an action of justice to afford veneration where it is due, yet ought we not to be deprived of the ornaments of our Senate.

Suffer our old age, most sacred Majesties, to leave to posteritie the Religion received from our Ancestours, when we were as yet in our infancie. The love of ancient rites is a marvellous tie. The Emperour Constans, who would have cut it off, therein lost his labour, leaving an example to others to decline severitie, which nothing availed him. We, who are much affected to the eternitie of your Name and Divinitie, must so use the matter, that the succeeding Ages may find nothing which requires alteration in your actions.

Where shall we hereafter swear to your laws and commands, when we shall find all the Altars demolished? Who shall serve as a terrour to the perfidious to arrest their falshood, if they no longer apprehend the Divinities, which they in foregoing time reverenced? We are not ignorant that all this great Universe is filled with the presence of God, and that there is no place of safegard for perjuries: yet it is a matter most important to repress the libertie of crimes by the visible presence and marks of an ancient Religion. This Altar of Victorie is the knot of our concord, and the mansion of publick faith. All that which giveth authoritie to our Decrees, is, that we pronounce them after we have sworn fidelitie upon Altars: and shall we then without difference prophane an Altar so Religious, where we at other times have taken oath, and prophane it under the reign of Princes, who more entrust the securitie of their persons on the faith of their subjects than force of their arms? But the Emperour Constans is said to have shewed the way thereof. Why do we imitate in a Prince who hath so many other perfections, that, which hath worst succeeded with him, and which he never had done, if good fortune had made him see another to miscarrie before him? The faults of a predecessour are not unprofitable to a successour, who from them will derive profit: and oftimes a man lays the first ground of his virtues on the vices of another. It happened, that this good Emperour foresaw not the discontent which would arise from this action, the matter being as yet new and without president: we who now have other knowledges than he, cannot have the like excuses for our errours. Your Majesties shall find in this Prince actions enow worthy of imitation, which you may pursue with more glorie and lesse envie. Neither did he cut away any thing of the privileges of Vestal Virgins; he replenished the Temples and Ministeries of the Gods immortal with Nobilitie, and was willing coyn should be taken from his coffers, to defray the charges of ancient ceremonies. Coming to Rome he marched through all the streets of this eternal Citie, accompanied with his Senate, most glad to behold him: with a favourable eye he saw the Temples, which bare the titles of our Gods on their forehead; he enquired the original of their goodly buildings, and applauded the founders. And though he were of a Religion different from ours, yet was he not desirous to make his piety triumph in the extinguishment of that of our Ancestours. He preserved for the Empire its ancient customs, well knowing, that in matter of Religion each man hath his opinion, his rites, and ceremonies; all which require freedome.

The spirit of God, which governeth this great world, hath distributed its protectours to every Citie; and as Heaven hath given us souls, so it every where decreeth, certain geniuses and fatal powers for the government of mortals, which oblige us to regard them more by the profit we derive from them, than any other consideration. All the reasons which we here below have of the Divinitie are obscure, and we cannot know God better than in his benefits, in the memory, and experience of posperities from him derived.

If antiquitie be of power to give any weight to a Religion, why shall we not maintain a faith established by so many Ages? Why shall not we follow the steps of our fathers, who have so happily succeeded their grand-fathers? Propose to your selves, that Rome at this time presents it self before your eyes, and in these terms speaketh to you:

O most excellent and just Princes, who are the true Fathers of the Countrey, have regard to the old Age whereunto I am arrived, in pursuing the piety of my founders: give me leave to exercise the ancient ceremonies, since they are not such as I ought to repent my self of, and to practise my ordinary guises, since libertie is the inheritance of my birth. The Religion of which you would bereave me, is that which hath vanquished the world, that which hath chased Hannibal far from my walls, and driven the Gauls from my Capitol. Have I then been preserved among so many armies and perils, to be now at this day dishonoured by my children? Have I then given Law to the whole world, to receive it in my elder days from simple fisher-men? I yet do not know what they will teach me, but I well understand, the correction of old age must needs be heavie, and in much danger also to become the more ignominious. I honour the Gods of my Fathers, the Gods of my birth; I beg peace of them, will any man teach me ought else? I think after we have well disputed, we shall find we have all but one and the same God, but that we honour him under sundrie titles. We all live subject to the same stars, we all are covered with the same Heaven, involved all in the same world; let us suffer every one to seek out truth according to his poor industrie. God is a great secret: it is no wonder if we endeavour to find him by so many divers ways.

But I leave the disputation hereof to those who have more leisure than I: I come not to give a battel, but to present you with our humble prayers. I would willingly know whether your Majesties coffers have been throughly filled since the small revenews have been taken from those poor Vestals, which before they enjoyed? They see themselves frustrated of the recompences, which the most avaricious Emperours have decreed them, and in so great a liberalitie of your Majesties, which enricheth all the world, they alone have cause to complain of necessitie.

It is not gain which leadeth them, but the honour to receive the wages due to their chastitie. It is to violate the holy veils, which attyre their heads, to deprive them the ordinary priviledges of their profession. The poor maids ask nought else of you but a bare title of prerogative, as their great povertie hath freed them from surprize of their enemies: for nakednes is that alone which violence cannot disarray. The more you have cut off from their priviledges, so much the more have you robbed them of the honour of their charges, since their virginitie which is vowed to publick safety, hath so much the more merit, as it findeth the less recompence. God forbid your treasures which are most innocent, should be defiled with prey drawn from the Vestals. The revenews of good Princes still encrease, rather from the spoil of enemies than loss of Priests. There is no gain can recompence the wrong done them by this decree. The further off your dispositions are estranged from all manner of avarice, so much the more is their condition miserable, since they behold themselves so tormented under such great clemency, and frustrated of a happines, which they cannot lose but with honour. For were they despoiled by Harpyes, we should deplore their miserie in the compassion we take of their innocency: but the world, which seeth them deprived of their fortunes under Emperours so reserved and moderate, will say, needs must there be crime on their part, since on yours they behold nought else but sanctity.

Temples, are ſtill withheld: I humbly beſeech you, O ſacred Pontifes, who ſit in the place of juſtice, why would you make void the publick Religion of your Empire with the ſucceſſion of a particular? Let dying men make their Wills with all ſecuritie; ſuffer them to depart with this belief, that they have princes not covetous, who will maintain what they ſhall bequeath in leaving the world, of their abilities. It is your honour and contentment, to ſee ſuch a happineſs in the ſtate which you manage, and likewiſe to deliver dying men from the diſturbances they may have upon the nullitie of their Teſtaments. Is there any thing in the world that more concerneth the Roman right, than the Roman Religion? How would you have the change of propertie to be called, made upon moneys, which their nature nor the laws have not put into the condition of unclaimed and periſhable goods? Legacies are permitted to freed men, ſlaves are not denied the pettie profits given them by Wils. Is there none but virgins, and thoſe virgins ſo noble, yea virgins vowed to the exerciſe of Ceremonies, fatal for preſervation of this Empire, muſt be deprived the poſſeſſions, which come to them by lawfull ways of inheritance?

What availeth them to conſecrate the chaſtitie of their bodies to publick ſafety, to lay the foundation of an eternitie for this Empire on the ayd of their prayers, to tie to your ſtandards, your arms, & your eagles, the favour of heavenly aſſiſtances, to preſent vows powerfull for the whole world, and be bereaved the rights that are denied to no man? It will hereafter be better to ſerve men than Gods, ſince we, deſirous to make our Empire religious, make it ungratefull.

It is not the ſole cauſe of the Veſtals which I plead, it is that of all humane kind; for the diſhonour of their profeſſion is the ſource of all our evils. The law of our fore-fathers hath honoured theſe holy maids, and all thoſe that are vowed to Altars, with ſome ſmall revenew, and ſome very juſt privileges. This hath ever been for them maintained, until new ordinances were made by ſome Bankers, who degenerating from the care of their Anceſtours, have employed the revenews dedicated to virginitie on the entertainment of certain Porters. From thence conſequently came that great dearth, the effect whereof the whole world hath felt, where lean harveſts have deceived the hopes of every Province. Let us not accuſe the earth of this diſaſter, for it is innocent: Let us not quarrel againſt heaven, for it is juſt: Let us not complain the worm hath gnawn the ear of corn, or wild oats have choaked the fruits of the earth: Our ſacrileges have made the year drouthy, and good reaſon it were, the whole world ſhould be fruſtrated of a benefit it hath taken from Religion. Were there any example of our unhappineſs in former times, we might ſay this famin happened by a certain revolution of years, fatal in ſuch accidents. But where ſhall we find any thing like to this in the paſſed ages? Where ſhall we find a ſterilitie ſo knotted together by the malignitie of the ayr? Where ſhall we find that the people hath been enforced to have recourſe to wild plants and accorns of the forreſt Dodonia, to ſatisfie their hunger?

Famin.]

When did our Fathers ever behold a ſpectacle ſo cruel, whileſt they cheriſhed the miniſters of Religion at the charge of the publick? When did they ever ſhake oaks but for hogs? When did they ever pull herbs up by the roots to feed men? When did the fields, which for the moſt part accuſtomed enterchangeably to reſt, as it were on purpoſe, fail in one and the ſame year? Hath this been when the people ſhared their proviſions with the Veſtal Virgins? Liberalitie uſed towards Prieſts graced the years revenews, and it rather ſeemed a remedie againſt barrenneſs, than a larges of pietie. Now God in the neceſſitie of each one avengeth the detention of a benefit, which he would have common for all the world.

Some one will ſay, it is no wonder, if we refuſe to entertain a ſtrange Religion at the charge of the publick. God forbid your Majeſties ſhould think the revenews, which were heretofore ordained for the Veſtals by the Common-wealth, ſhould at this preſent be ſummed up as the coyn of the Weal-publick.

As the Common-wealth is compoſed of particulars, ſo hath it no more right over donatives, than it hath on particular perſons. Your ſelves, who govern all, preſerve for each one what appertains to him, and would have juſtice extend it ſelf further than your power. Conſult, if you pleaſe, with your magnificence, and it will tell you, that what you hitherto have given to ſo many particulars, is no more a publick good, for the gifts are no longer theirs who beſtowed them, and that which was in the beginning a benefit, by cuſtom and ſucceſſion of time, becomes an obligation. It is to affright the conſciences of your Majeſties with panick fears, to think to make you believe you give to our religion, that which you cannot take from it without injuſtice.

I pray God the ſecret aſſiſtances of all Sects may favour your Clemencie, and that this ſame, which hath ſo long time ayded your Anceſtours, if it can no longer ſtand in credit with you, may at leaſt keep you in its protection. We will on your Majeſties behalf afford it all rights, and it towards you ſhall continue ordinarie favours. We demand nothing new in requiring the exerciſe of a Religion, which hath preſerved the Empire for your father (now with the Gods) and which hath bleſſed his bed with lawfull heirs of his crown. This good Prince being entered into the condition of the Gods immortal, beholdeth from Heaven the tears of theſe poor Veſtals, and well ſees cuſtoms cannot be violated, which he with ſo much affection maintained, but by the diminution of his authoritie. Afford at leaſt this contentment to your good brother, received into this celeſtial companie, as to ſee a decree corrected, that was not his own. Cover an act under oblivion, which he had never ſuffered to paſs, had he foreſeen the diſcontent of the Senate, and for which the deputies were diverted, which we ſent unto him when he was alive, for the fear his enemies had of his equitie. It much importeth the publick to take away a foul blame from the aſhes of a good Prince, and juſtifie the paſſed by aboliſhment of the preſent.

The fifth SECTION.

The Oration of S. Ambroſe againſt Symmachus.

MOST SACRED MAJESTIE,

ALthough your Minoritie gave us undoubted ſigns of the ſtrength of your ſpirit and conſtancie of your faith, yet the rank I hold near to your perſon obligeth me to prevent the ſurprizes of a craftie diſcourſe, which creepeth amongſt ſo many golden words as the ſerpent amongſt the flowers.

It is drawn from his reaſons, conceptions, and as it were from all his own words.

It is ill the Governour Symmachus hath employed ſo fair a tongue on ſo foul a ſubject. The deceit of his eloquence makes us ſuſpect the weakneſs of his Gods: for ever a bad cauſe ſeeketh that ſupport in words, which in truth it cannot find. Such are the ordinarie proceedings of Pagans, when they ſpeak of their ſuperſtitions.

Their Orations reſemble thoſe ancient Temples of Ægypt, which under golden Tents lodged Idols of Rats and Crocodiles. But the Scripture teacheth us rather to live than talk, and recommendeth the contempt of language to oblige us to ſoliditie of virtues. That is the cauſe, why (moſt ſacred Majeſtie) after I have entreated you to take my diſcourſe rather in the weight of reaſons than number of words, I will anſwer to three points, which the Governour ſeemeth to comprize in his ſpeech. The firſt toucheth the Religion of Pagans. The ſecond the revenews of Veſtals. And the third the cauſe of the famin we have felt.

A ſingular refutation of Symmachus his ſtrongeſt argument.

I underſtand in the firſt article it is Rome which ſpeaketh with her eyes full of tears, & ſighs at her heart, demanding the exerciſe of Pagan ſuperſtitions, becauſe they they are such (saith the Governour) which drave Hannibal from the walls, and the Gauls from the Capitol.

It is to publish the infirmitie of false Gods to defend them in this manner, and better we cannot refute Symmachus, than by shewing him armed against himself. For I ask, if those Gods are the Protectours of this Empire, why they so long time suffered Hannibal to triumph in the ruins of Italie? Were their hands so short they could stretch them no further than their walls and Temples? As for the Gauls, what shall I say? I much wonder how the governour doth mention it, since it is in effect a thing most ridiculous, to say, that the enemies being in the heart of the Citie, all these protecting Gods should stand idle in their Temples, in such sort, that all histories have published, the people of Rome owed their preservation, not to the Gods or sacrifices, which nothing availed them, but to the gagling of a goose, which by good hap awakened the drowsie Centinels, if it be not, that Symmachus, as he is inventive enough, will say, that Jupiter had then forsaken his burning Chariots and thunder-bolts, to shut himself up in the throat of this gosling. But as a lye is ever industrious to hurt it self, did not Hannibal adore the Roman Gods? If it be true, that they always bear victorie in their hands, why did not Hannibal surprize Rome with the assistance of those Gods? Or why did not the Romans vanquish Hannibal in all their battels? Why had both the one and the other oftentimes the worst? On what side soever you turn, you must see Gods conquered, who cannot denie their impotencie, if they avow not their nullitie.

Rome speaketh with Majestie.

It is not Rome then that speaketh in this manner as Symmachus makes it, never gave she him this commission: but she says by the mouthes of her brave Captains:

Romans, what have I done to become a butcherie, and to be imbrued with the bloud of so many creatures? Victories abide not in the entrails of beasts, but the arms of souldiers. It is not the death of oxen hath made me subdue Monarchs, but the valour of men. Camillus by force of arms displayed my standards on the Capitol, which your ceremonies suffered to be taken away. Attilius exposed his life for the trial of his fidelitie & safety of the Weal-publick. Scipio Africanus found triumph, not among the Altars of the Capitol, but in the field of battel. If you desire to see the goodly effects of your superstitions, behold Nero, who was the first that drew the sword of Cæsars against the Christians; behold Emperours monethly made, and unmade like the moon; behold those who were the most zealous in your ceremonies, whereof some having shamefully enthraled the worlds Empire to forreigners, & the other promising themselves great victories under the favour of their Gods, have found servitude. Was not there then an Altar of Victorie in the Capitol? From whence I pray proceeded so many sinister accidents, if good hap be divinely destined to those who obey it? I much repent me of these barbarous ceremonies, though too too late. You that have made me so many times become red with bloud, suffer me once to be ruddie with shame, that I so lightly have been deceived, to the end I may not blush to see my self converted with all the world. And tell me not, I pray, that I am old. Decrepitnes is not in years, but in manners. It is never too late to learn ones salvation, and it is ever seasonable to do good. Shame is but for those, who have neither power nor will to correct their vices.

Notable answers to the libertie of Symmachus.

Come & learn a new warfare of Christians with me, which in earth beareth arms, and in Heaven its conquests. From whom should I learn the mysteries of Heaven but from him that made it, and not from man, who doth not so much as know all that passeth in his own house? Whom would you have me confide in the matter of belief we ought to have of God, but God himself? How shall I take you for a Master, since in the seeking to teach me, you confess your own ignorance? You say, God is a great secret, and must be sought by many ways: but he who once hath hit on the readie way, why should he amuse himself with crooked turnings? You seek him blindfold, and we find him in the light. You enquire him with suspicions and minds disturbance, and we find him in the revelation of the wisdom and veritie of God himself. It is a malicious stupiditie to think we can serve this sovereign Master in all sorts of Sects. As there is but one sun in the world, so is there but one truth. It is a streight line which is to be made, but one way. All other superstitions are crooked lines, that have as many semblances as defects. How can we reconcile our Religions, you adoring the works of your hands, and we accounting it an injurie done to God to worship the works of men? How shall we have one and the same God, if you adore stocks and stones, which our God instructeth us to trample under foot? To whom shall we entrust this veritie in such a great diversitie of opinions, but to a Man-God, whose words were no other than propheses, wisdoms, and verities; his life innocencie, sanctitie, and virtue; his actions power, wonders, & miracles in all parts of the world? What secret spirit set the Cross on the top of your Capitol? You demand proofs of the Divinitie, and I shew you the conquest of a world, under the feet of one crucified: the less this action hath of man, the more you behold therein the work of God.

Grave words for the Emperour.

Then Symmachus, you redemand the Altars of Idols, of whom? Of a Christian Emperour, whose heart is in the hand of God, & arms are for the protection of faith. Would you him employ his chast and innocent hands, which he never lifted up but to the living God, to repair the monuments of a false Deitie? In what Historie find you, that the Pagan Emperours have built Chappels and Temples for us? And think you our great Prince hath less zeal for truth than his Predecessours for falshood? They have made all the parts of the world ruddie with our bloud for defence of their Idols: but God hath blasted their purposes, and overthrown by his power, what they would have raised by their injustice. Would you that a Christian Emperour should from the ruins of your Gods, restore for you, in contempt of his own Religion, objects of sin on the Altars?

A pertinent reply to the act of Vestals.

But let us a little further see the sequel hereof. They demand revenews for the Vestals, for they cannot otherwise serve their God. Behold how couragious the Gentiles are. We have imbraced and maintained our faith in povertie, injuries, and persecutions, and they crie out their ceremonies cannot subsist without their own interest. It is a shamefull thing to sell virginitie, and to fix themselves on profit through the despair of virtues. What armies have these maids to maintain, who have such care of their revenews? Their number exceedeth not seven, which they have chosen amongst so many thousands to guard a mercenary virginity, that still reserves a right to make experience of marriage. Is it for this they must be mytred? for this scarletted? for this endowed with a thousand priviledges, and entertained in magnificent Caroches, with a train of Princesses to brave it through the streets of a Citie? Behold the holy virgins and poor maidens of Symmachus. By my consent let him reflect the eye of his understanding and bodie on the state of our Religious women: he shall see companies replenished with honour, integritie, shame-facednes, who know how to use the gift of virginitie as it ought to be. They wear no atyres nor pompeous myters on their heads, but a poor veil which borroweth its worth from the lustre of their chastitie. They know not what belongs to attractives of beautie, for they have renounced all curiosities of the world. Purple and superfluitie never dwels in their house, but rather fasts and austerities. It is not their custom to flatter, or sell at the price of honour and priviledges the puritie of their bodies, but much otherwise, they do all as if their sufferings were to be the recompence of their virtues. Never will they learn the trade of setting their flesh to sale to the best bidder, & sell the abstinence from pleasures to them that offer most: well knowing the first victory of chastitie, is to triumph over greedines of riches, which are the most dangerous baits of sin.

If we should give great revenews to all the maids which are now readie to receive the veil, what treasures would furnish out such an expence? And if they dare affirm that none is due but to Vestals, is it not an impudence to be desirous to deprive Christian virgins from goods given in favour of virginitie, as if to be Christians were to be the less chast, or as if the Religion they profess, were on their foreheads a mark of infamie? Who can endure under the reign of most Christian Emperours, customs, which are onely tollerable in the Empire of Nero's? Symmachus demandeth moneys of the Common-wealth for entertainment of his Vestals, & we by certain modern laws have been bereft the successions, which we might expect from particulars, without making complaints; so temperate we are in our proceedings. Some Ecclesiasticks likewise have been made to renounce their patrimony, to be freed from Court-obligations, and enjoy the priviledges of the Church. Were this done to the Pagans, they would cast flames from their mouthes, for how could it be but very troublesome to purchase the vacancy of a holy ministery with the prejudice of his means, & in consecrating himself to the safety of the whole world, to have necessitie for recompence in his house? Wils are valid in favour of the ministers of Idols: Be they never so profane in superstition, so abject in condition, so prodigal of their honour, they are not frustrated of what appertains to them by this article. There be none but the Priests of the living God, who are deprived of common right, because they are vowed to service of the publick. Their manners most innocent are not punished, but their degree; as if it held the rank of crime: That which a superstitious widow bequeatheth to sacrificers of Idols, shall remain inviolable; & what a Religious widow leaves by Will to a Priest of the eternal Religion shall be condemned as a nullitie.

I speak not this now by way of expostulation, but to shew how I suppress lawfull complaints by strength of patience. They answer, they touch not legacies given to the Church in general: And I require of them, who ever hath robbed the riches of their Temples? Christians have heretofore been bereaved their substance, which is the marrow of men; of ayr, which is common to all living creatures; of earth, which none ever have denied to the dead, since even the enraged sea hath oft-times sent back the bodies of our Martyrs to the haven, as it were to give them burial. I notwithstanding say not a word, nor do I now accuse any man of crueltie, the condemnation whereof the victorie of the Cross hath gained of the whole world. But if a piece of land be seized from a Southsayer, who contrary to all Religion holdeth wealth given in favour of Religion, all the world must be summoned with an alarm. If they will possess lands by our examples, let them imitate the charitie we practice for the publick. Where are the prisoners they have redeemed? the poor they have fed? the banished they have succoured? Of all our wealth we nought retain but faith, the rest is spent in the necessities of men, and they think it reasonable to employ it in massacre of beasts, to see if they have not the death of Princes in their entrails. Is not this insupportable?

An answer concerning the dearth.

Yet notwithstanding their Gods, saith he, have revenged on our heads the injurie done to their Priests, by a general famin. That is it which hath caused us to eat roots & barks of trees, which hath made us shake oaks to eat acorns, and envie hogs their food, since we unjustly detain the sustenance of men. Behold great prodigies, and which never happened to the Gentiles. To whom doth Symmachus think he tels these fables? To us, who know the Pagans were heretofore so accustomed to eat acorns, that for this onely cause deified their oaks? Is it possible their Gods should appoint that for punishment, which these have so oft bought with price of incense & bloud of beasts? And then, what injustice were it that for a small handfull of sacrificers & Southsayers, who pretend to be interessed herein, these cruel Divinities should take revenge by a general desolation of all Provinces? How should they so long stand with arms acrosse in the ruins of so many Temples, fallen on their Idols, to come to contest with us, upon a just retention of the superfluities of a silly Sacrificer? Behold now alreadie how many years the Pagan Sect hath been declining, hath any one seen for all this the river Nilus overflow to revenge what hath passed at Rome, since the conquest of Egypt hath been tolerated under the arms of the Cross? And if these Gods have this last year avenged their injuries, enforcing us to feed on acorns, why this present year, when the contempt of their name is much greater than ever, have they not made us eat thorns? The living God be praised, who husbandeth good & evil for us with a most wise œconomie; we have seen the billocks smile under the beautie of vines, we have beheld the earth curled with ears of corn, and to yield us so plentifull harvests, that they have given joy to some, admiration to others, and satisfaction to the whole world. Yea we can say, the last year hath not been so barren, but that it hath left in many Provintes marks of the fruitfulnes thereof. The Gauls have been more enriched than ever, the Sclavons have sold corn which they never sowed. The Grisons have had such store that they have given to their neighbours more cause of envie than compassion, and those who were friends in a great scarcitie, are made enemies in large fertilitie. Genova and Venice have tasted the commodities of the fruits of autumn, and in a word, the year hath not been every where so prodigious as the eloquence of the Governour

Nay, these objections are more tolerable, but that which we cannot endure nor dissemble with your Christian Majesties, is, that the Gentiles out of braverie dare affirm, they offer sacrifices to their Gods in your names, and they protect you. Who hath given them this commission? Who makes them account your connivences so criminal, as to take them for commandments? Let them guard their defenders whom they have hitherto ill protected, and let them not presume their Gods, being so feeble for preservation of those who yield them such honour, should be able to shield others who handle them with such contempt.

A reply concerning the antiquity of Paganism.

Yet must we (saith the Governour) defend the ancient Religion. Nothing is elder than the truth, which hath seen the world in its cradle; but a false Religion, the more ancient, the more dangerous it is, since it is an antiquitie of errours, the presumption whereof time doth augment. Virtues are not measured by the ell of times, but the greatnes of perfections. If we in like manner will consider the works of nature, we shall find the last to be the best.

The world, as you say, was nought els in the beginning, but an assembly of little atomies, which flying in the ayr wove one within another the web of this great work: afterward it became a confused mass, full of horrour & darknes, till such time, as the great work-man came to separate the elements, adorn the heavens with lamps, & distend light over the face of this universe. Then the earth disarraying it self, as from a robe of sorrow, seemed to admire the sun it had never seen. Consider you not how the day at its birth disperseth darknes, with a little dawning of brightnes, which insensibly increaseth till the time it discovereth it self in the glittering light and fervours of the mid-day? Behold you not how the moon, which monthly waxeth and waneth, now seemeth lost to us, then shows her self as it were a little threed, streight she becomes a well-formed crescent, afterward in the proportion that she looketh on the sun she is augmented, and lastly composeth for us a great globe of light? Know you not how the earth was before rude, not having felt the iron coulter, but so soon as the husbandly labourer began to exercise a power upon it, and cultivate the barren plains, they took upon them a much other aspect? for mollifying in this tillage all which was wild, they spred out unto us grapes and harvests, where we before had seen nought els but nettles and bryers. See you not also how at the point of the first season the earth is wholly bare, then in the springs progress it beginneth to produce certain small flowers, which are as the eyes of the medows; but eyes, which spring and eclipse in one and the self-same day; and the best of all is kept for the latter season? And we our selves, when we are born, are nothing else but a little lump of flesh, which is pollished with time, and changed into a more lively infancie, but still ignorant, untill our soul be perfected by time, for then we leave the rudiments of minoritie to become perfect men. Behold the course which Religions have held in the world: all that which is gone afore, hath been either in part gross and carnal, or deceitfull and lying, by the cunning of the devil. Grace in latter times hath set a seal on the work it began from the birth of the world. If things the less antient be the less perfect, we must prefer the Chaos before the sun, acorns before harvests, March-violets before grapes, and say we have done ill to cover the earth with silver, and change shepherds cottages into the gilded marble of the Capitol.

But

But they are industrious to wound themselves crying up the ancient ceremonies. If this antiquitie be so recommendable, why did Rome yearly change her Religion, as certain birds do their feathers, introducting daily some innovation in matter of superstitions, derived from the same Nations they by their arms had captivated? Shall it be said she will open her Temples to all the Idols of the earth, and onely shut them up from heavenly verities? He now here speaketh to us of a victory, which is a gift of God, and not a Goddess: a gift, which is oftentimes granted to the strength of legions, and never allotted to the impietie of superstitions. They will set up their Altar in the midst of a sovereign Court, and say, that maugre our opposition we must swallow the smoak of their sacrifices, hear their goodly musick, and receive the ashes of their prophane victims on our forehead, where we bear the character of the living God. Is it not absolutely to out-brave Christianitie under most Christian Emperours? What shall now presently be done at Court by the better part of the Senate which is Christian? It will be necessary that they either in refusing untruth oppose your Edicts (if the unhappiness of the time should make them favour a request so uncivil) or by connivency confess their sacriledge. I will speak freely, it is not an Altar they desire to plant in the Capitol, but rather faith, which they now would tear from our hearts. If you command such a sin, you commit it.

The Emperour Constans, of most worthy memorie, being as yet but a Catechumen, would not so much as behold this Altar, for fear that by the sole sight thereof his conscience might be polluted: he caused it presently to be taken away, and will you restore it, to make them hereafter swear to your laws before false Gods? What need have we of such an oath? The Senat is assembled by your commands, and for you. To you they ow their fidelitie and conscience, not to Gods who are of no account. It preferreth you before their own children, but not before their Religion; then is it a charitie much greater than your Empire, to preserve that pietie which safeguards your Empire. All here below in the affairs of men is most uncertain, all therein is transitorie, and great fortunes, which have the sun in their face, have ice under foot: we possess nothing immortal but true Religion, which raiseth us above Monarchs to equal us with Angels. Pompey, after he had measured three parts of the world, more by his triumphs than travels, is defeated, repelled, banished, and dead on the frontiers of the Empire, by the hand of a half man; and the earth which seemed too scantie for his conquests, was seen to fail him for a tomb. Cyrus, after he had overcome so many potent enemies, after he had equalled his victories to his clemencie, is vanquished by Tamaris, and his head, crowned with so many laurels, served as a matter of sport for a woman, who drencht it in a leathern sack filled with humane bloud, saying unto him, Satiate thee with that thou so much hast desired. Hamilcar, Captain of the Carthaginians, one of the most superstitious Princes that ever the earth bare, after so many trophеys, threw himself through despair into the fire, which he had caused to be kindled for the sacrifice of his Gods, seeing it had no whit availed him. I will not say Christian Emperours shall ever be fortunate in temporal affairs: but I dare affirm, that if we must needs be afflicted as men, although we should loose all, yet never ought we to forsake Religion, as Julian that unhappie Monarch hath done, who joyned the ship-wrack of his faith to the loss of his Empire.

Ambros. epist. 11. ad Valent.

Most sacred Majestie, remember that all the men of the world fight for you, and that you should combat for the true Religion, without which, there is neither protection in the Empire, nor safety in the world. If there be occasion to resolve a matter of arms, make address to your Councel of War, but if a point of Religion be handled, you neither ought nor may determine it without the advise of your Bishops. You should see them all here assembled, if the practice of our enemies had not prevented them. I answer for all, and in the name of all I implore the pietie and justice of your Majestie, that no man here may pretend to abuse your Minoritie to the prejudice of your soul. Take heed how you precipitate any thing in this affair, without imparting it to the Emperour Theodosius, whom you have hitherto honoured as a father.

If you do otherwise, I will not conceal that from you which my profession commandeth, and conscience obligeth me to tell you: You will come to the Church, but you will find no Bishop there; or if you do, it will be but to resist you. What would you answer him, when he should tell you, The Church hath nothing to do with your liberalities; since you have adorned the Temples of Gentilism, you shall never build the houses of Sion; the Altar of Jesus Christ cannot endure your offerings, since you have erected Altars for Idols. Your word, your letter, your signet, is the work of your heart, of which our enemies make a trophey, and which you cannot denie. Your service can no longer be pleasing to the Saviour of the world, since you are engaged to false Divinities. Think you to serve two Masters? Think you it will be lawfull to entertain Vestals to the contempt of Religious women of your name and belief? You have no more to do with Bishops, since you have preferred Sacrificers to the devil before them. What answer you to this? That you have committed a fault pardonable in a child? Every age is perfect for Jesus Christ, and there is no infancie, but is repleniſhed with God, if it render it self not unworthy thereof.

Little Infants heretofore have confronted executioners, and born away the crown of martyrdom, and will you betray our altars? What will you answer to your good brother the Emperour Gratian of holy and glorious memorie, when he shall say, My brother, I never thought my self vanquished by mine enemies, whileſt I left the Diadem on your head. It hath not grieved me to die, since my place was repleniſhed with so good a Successour. I freely have forsaken the Empire, being perswaded the ordinances I made in favour of Religion would remain inviolable to posteritie. Brother, these are the spoils I gained over divels: these are my titles and trophеys; these the pledges of my pietie and monuments of my faith, which you have since taken away from me by your Edicts. What may an enemie do more? You have violated what I so piously ordained for the glory of Altars. It is a thing which he who so unworthily bare arms against me, never did. The sword which transfixed my bodie did me less hurt than your Edicts: more sensible am I of the wound you impressed on my cinders, than that which the Tyrant fixed on my members. The one took from me the life of bodie, but this bereaves me the life of memorie and virtues. On this day it is that I loose an Empire, since I see my self deprived of that I always preferred before Empires, and that it is taken from me after my death, yea by the hand of a man whom I infinitly loved. Brother, If you have done this of your own accord, you have condemned my faith; and if by constraint, you have betrayed your own: and being wholly dead as I am, you make me die in you, who are of my self the better part. On the other side, think you not but that the Emperour Valentinian your father, whose name you bear, will say unto you, Son, you have done me much injury, so to condemn my conscience, and to believe I ever had any purpose to tolerate superstitions so prejudicial to Christianitie. I punished all crimes that came to my knowledge: But never have I heard of an Altar of Victorie nor profane sacrifices to be made in a Sovereign Court before the eyes of all Christendom. Dear son, you greatly dishonour the respect which is due to the memorie of your father, if you think he oweth his Empire to superstition, and not to his Religion.

I heartily beseech God, most Sacred Majestie, if this affair be so important, as you see, to your conscience, to the memorie of your father, the ashes of your brother, your own reputation, to the judgement which posteritie shall give upon you, and that which transcendeth all other considerations, to the universal Church, you now do what you will one day wish to have done, when we shall appear before the eyes of the whole Church Triumphant, to the end your actions may be free from reproof, as my counsels are of Repentance.

Who could resist these thunder-bolts? Symmachus reputed at that time, as we have said, the prime Statesman in the Roman Empire, both for eloquence and authoritie, was ashamed of his superstition, and in pleading for Victorie lost it, well shewing it was nothing, since it had so little countenanced a man who ascribed so much unto it, which made Ennodius say, Symmachus in pleading for Victorie, hath lost the victorie, left by him in the hands of S. Ambrose, plainly discovering, the Goddess was very unreasonable, to forsake those that served her, and gratifie such as offended her.

Dicendi palmam Victoria tollit amico, Transit ad Ambrosium: plus favet ira Dea. Ennodius.

The triumph of S. AMBROSE in the conversion of S. Augustine.

The sixth SECTION.

Of the Nature and Condition of this great Man.

The greatnes of S. Ambrose in this conversion.

I Come to one of the most remarkable actions of S. Ambrose, resplendent in the conversion of great S. Augustine, the benefit whereof heaven and earth have divided, since this incomparable man serves as a support for the Church Militant in the revolution of so many Ages, and an ornament to the Church Triumphant through all eternitie. It is none of the least gifts from Heaven, that our Ambrose was selected for an affair of so great importance, that the whole world might find its interests therein, and for a victorie so eminent, that were the Angels as capable of envie as they are repleat with charitie, as they have loved the Conquest, they would envie the glory thereof. Happie voice of thunder, which made this hind to bring forth her young, after the throws and agitations of twelve years. Happie the Beseleel, who so well hath laboured in the Tabernacle of the living God. Happy the David, who hath subdued this Rabbath, so many times shaken by the arms of great Captains. Happy the Alexander, who with the sword of the word hath cut so many Gordian knots, as held this great Spirit in disturbance. I here defie all the Amphitheaters which have been in the world, and so often mixed the bloud of men with that of Lyons and Elephants: I call those spectacles, which so many times have attracted the eyes of Cesars. I desire the jousts, turneys, races, chariots, triumphs, and those magnificences may be proposed, which have drawn bloud from all the veins of the world, to establish superfluitie; and that it may be considered whether there were ever combat comparable to this which I present; where a holy Bishop entred into the list against the prime Spirit of the world, where God sits enthroned, where the Angels, ranged before the gates of Heaven, contemplate, where three parts of the world expect the issue of this duel, where Heaven applaudeth, the earth trembleth, where hell frowneth, the divels houl to see themselves deceived of their prey: Where the victorious Ambrose triumpheth, where the unvanquishable Augustine yieldeth, to be confirmed by his fall, to be raised by his abasing, fortified by his weakness.

Exod. 31.

2. Kings 12.

Gentle Reader, I intreat you, as my purpose is no other but to enchase in this historie of S. Ambrose the acts of Ecclesiasticks, who to him are so particularly tied, that you think it not strange if I more at large distend my self upon a narration so proper for the subject which I treat of: I doubt not but the manner wherein I shall unfold it will render it wholly new, as the greatnes thereof made it honourable, and the utilitie still seaseneth it with some particular delight.

Impediments in the conversion of S. Augustine.

That we may here well observe the ways of the Divine providence in the direction of mans salvation, and the strength of S. Ambrose quickened with the Spirit of God, it is necessarie to consider the powerfull oppositions, that so long time hindered this conversion, which I reduce to three principal heads, Curiositie, Presumption, and Carnal Love.

It is a dangerous pestilence in matter of Religion to take the wind of Curiositie, which ordinarily fixeth it self on the fairest Spirits, as it is said Cantharides rest on the beautifullest Roses. A great train of vices is ever waited on by a great curiositie, and he that can well know them, shall find, that to be Curious is to forsake innocencie, to draw near to sin, according to the eloquent S. Zeno, Curiositie maketh more offenders in prison than learned in schools; and ever the desire to know what God would have hidden, is paid with ignorance of ones self.

Curiositas rerum efficit, non peritum. S. Zeno 2. de æternâ Filii generatione.

Were I a Painter or Pourtrayer, to represent to youth the vanitie of this passion, I would make the statue thereof on a moving globe, what can be more inconstant? I would give it wings; what is lighter? I would sprinkle it all over with eyes; what more watchfull? I would fill it with ears; what more industrious in the discoverie of so great a diversitie of things? I would give it a mouth perpetually open, for it is no sooner filled by the ear, but emptied by the mouth. I would lodge it at the sign of Vacuum, for what is more vain? I would afford it spiders webs for attyre; what is more frivilous? For table and viands, smoke; what more slender and hungry? I would ordain for officers many lyers and impostures, for such people are its favourites: Before it a certain itch of generall knowledge should go; for it is the ordinarie messenger thereof: at the right hand Opinion, for it is it which deceives her: at the left, Tattle, it is that, which instructs her: after it I would set disturbance of Spirit, ignorance, and miserie; for it is its inheritance in the end.

Curiositie & the description thereof.

Augustine, as it were from his most tender years, made himself tributarie to this false Deitie; and instead of taking the way of true Religion by the paths of holy simplicitie, needs would he dive into it by reasons and humane subtilities, which alienated him as far from truth as they were of power to encline him to vanitie.

The wit of S. Augustine.

He had a great wit as it were like a prodigie, and it seemeth that Africk which produced him, would then bring forth nothing which was mean: It must still bring forth huge monsters, or mightie men. He notwithstanding was over-sharp, being not as yet in his consistence, but resembled the glass of a mirrour, which cannot render forms till it be leaded. So this admirable wit through want of the virtue of humilitie, which is in men as lead in the mirrour, sparkled with a vain presumption, which bringeth with it no other profit, made more illusions in eyes than it left good examples in manners. Now to specifie the qualities of this excellent nature, we must consider it from his tendereſt years; since the disposition makes it self soon appear in children, as the rose in his bud.

His inclinations.

Augustine began almost as soon to studie as to live; for he burned from his younger dayes with a thirst of knowledge, so eminent, that he surmounted his age. And for a note of his curiositie, which alreadie rather aimed at splendour than utilitie, young though though he were, he resembled the children, who make themselves Preachers before they can read. Nothing was he pleased with the elements of Grammar, which he reputed too low for his spirit. He would climb without a ladder, and scorned to learn of a Grammarian how the name of Æneas was written; but rather readily disputed whether Æneas had been at Carthage or not. Greek to him was a pill, which he swallowed not but by constraint, and better loved he to speak Latine by custom, than the rules of Donat. All his delight was to know fables and histories, to weep over the disastrous loves of poor Dido, and to be angrie with Juno with so good a grace, that composing thereupon certain imitations of Virgil, he ravished his Masters and companions in the school; which made it well appear he one day should become more fruitfull in strong imaginations (which are the principal pieces of eloquence) than religious in choice of words and polished in periods. His father, who discovered the riches of this wit, had an ardent desire that he might swim in a large water, for he as yet studied at Oran a pettie village of Africk, having not the means to go to Carthage.

Want of enablements is many times a counterpoize to the height of the understanding: but in depressing it he crowned it, since generous studies (according to Plines saying) are lodged at the sign of povertie, and ever sciences are refined by necessity. Augustine, not then knowing what God would do with him, sought to make a fortune, and such likewise was the will of Patricius his father, who more desired to see him eloquent than chast. Behold why the good man, who had much courage and little means, strove beyond his abilitie to send his son to Carthage, the most famous Universitie of Africk. As great fishes are found in great seas, so Augustine had there wherewith to satisfie the passion of his curiositie, and measuring his own strength with that of others, saw matter enough how to make his wit be held in esteem, to which he alreadie had sufficient inclination.

He was not contented to exercise himself in eloquence, which in all Ages hath had much reputation among arts, as the fullest of noise and that which unfolds it self with most ostent; but he throughly studied Philosophy and all other sciences, which are of power to make an able man, in such sort that there was not then a book which he had not with undefatigable industrie perused. The poor young man went like a torrent whither passion transported him, and where the blast of ambition breathed, having the feeling of Christianitie in him very faint: for much better he loved to measure the world in his vanitie, than possess it in the love of God; not as yet considering the difference between a good countrey swain, who at full ease enjoyeth the fruits of his tree, whereof he knoweth no other secrets, and a Philosopher that observeth the ten Categories, and remains almost famished, not tasting of any one fruit.

Astrologie. His curiositie failed not to transfer him to judicial Astrologie, wherein he imployed much time, still thinking to discover some secrets in this labyrinth of fools, which better knoweth how to involve minds than give them satisfaction. He happeneth one day to confer with an old Physitian, a man grave, and of great capacitie, who seeing him passionately in love with these books of Astrologie, said, Son, if you desire to transcend others in any profession of the world, rather take eloquence, in which, as far as I can see, you have greatly profited, than to stick on vain sciences unworthy of your judgement. Verily I will herein confess the ignorance of my youth, I have been as much addicted to judicial Astrologie as ever was any man of my condition: for I not onely sought the satisfaction of my mind, but the establishment of my fortune. Notwithstanding I have wholly left it, through a most undoubted knowledge that we cannot resolve on any thing solid therein. Judge you what you please, but ever a well rectified spirit will be ashamed to profess a science not supported by reason, and which knows almost no other trade but to deceive. This at that time somewhat startled him, but stayed not his purpose, so much he loved to deceive himself, and so much he resolved to find out this secret in the end. But ever as he waded further, not discovering firm land, he found trouble in a barren labour, and much vanitie, where he to himself proposed some solidities.

Nothing confirmed him so much in contempt of this folly, as the discourse he had with Firminus, a young man of eminent qualitie, sick of the same disease that he was: for the curiositie of Astrologie ceased not to incite him, as being born of a father an Astrologer, a man of honour, but so curious, that he calculated the very horoscope of cats and dogs that were whelped in his house; yet so little had he profited therein, that at the same time his son came into the world, a servant of his neighbours being delivered of a male-child, he foretold, according to the rules of his art, that both of them being born under one same constellation, should run the like fortune: which was so false, that this Firminus his son being born of a rich family, progressed far into the honour of the times, whilest the son of the servant, notwithstanding the favours of his goodly horoscope, waxed old in servitude.

This young man, who made this narration, though convinced by his own experience, still suffered himself to be beguiled with his proper errour, so difficult it is to take away this charm by force of reasons. Our Augustine by little and little dispersed those vapours, both by the vivacitie of his own excellent judgement, and the consideration of others folly. He was likewise solicited to attempt a kind of magick, much in request among the heathen Philosophers of that Age; which was to seek predictions from the shop of the devil, by means of the effusion of the bloud of beasts, and sometimes of children. But God who as yet held a bridle on this uncollected soul, and would not suffer it to be defiled with those black furies, gave him in the beginning so much horrour upon all these proceedings, that a Negromancer promising him one day to bear away the prize of Poesie in a publick meeting of Poets, if he would assure him of a reasonable reward, he answered, that were the Crown to be given in those games of profit, of gold wholly celestial, he would not buy it by such kind of ways, at the rate of the bloud of a flie. Which he partly spake through some sence of pietie, partly also by the knowledge he had of the illusion and barrennes of such sciences.

His Religion. He was much more troubled about the Articles of Faith; for though from his childhood he was educated in Christian Religion, under the wings of his good mother S. Monica, yet suffering his mind to mount up unto so many curiosities, he had greatly weakened the sence of pietie. And being desirous to penetrate all by the help of humane reasons, when he began to think on the Christian maxims of Faith, he therein beheld much terrour and abyss. He came to this condition, that not content with the God of his forefathers, who taught him holy counsels, and the universal voice of the Church, he put himself upon masterie, now wholly ready to shape a Divinitie on the weak idæas of his own brain.

The Manichees at that time swayed in Africk; who having found this spirit, and seeing he might one day prove a support to their Sect, they spared nothing to gain him: and he being upon change, it was not very hard to bring him into the snare. This Sect sprang from one named Manes, a Persian by birth, and a servant by condition, who having inherited the goods of a Mistres whom he served, from a good slave which he had been, had he remained in that state, became by studie an ill Philosopher, and a worse Divine; for mingling some old dotages of the magick of Persians with other maxims of Christianitie, partly by the help of his purse, partly also by an infinitie of impostures derived from his giddy spirit, he made himself head of a faction, professing he was the holy Ghost. His principal folly consisted in placing two Gods in the world, the one good, the other bad, who had many strange battels. The bodie, as he said, was the creature of the evil God, and the soul a portion of the substance of the good, enthraled in matter. And following these principals, he gave a phantastical bodie to the Saviour of the world, esteeming it a thing unworthy of the Word to be personally united to the flesh, which he held in the number of of things execrable. Behold the cause why those who were ingulfed in this Sect, made shew to abstain from meat and wine, which they termed the dragons gall.

I do not think that ever Augustine fully consented, to all the chymeraes of Manes, which were innumerable, but at the least he relished this Sect in the opinion it had of the original and nature of the bodie and soul, and in many other articles, even to the believing (as himself witnesseth) fables most ridiculous. Great God! who thundereſt upon the pride of humane spirits, and draggeſt into the dust of the earth those that would go equal with Angels! What Eclypse of understanding! What abasing of courage in miserable Augustine! To say that a man, whose eye was so piercing, doctrine so eminent, and eloquence so divine, after he had forsaken the helm of faith and reason, became so abandoned, as to make himself a partie of the Sect of a barbarous and phantastical slave, who in the end, for his misdeeds was flayed by the command of the King of Persia; as if the skin of this man could no longer cover a soul so wicked.

Behold whither curiositie transporteth an exorbitant spirit. Behold into what so many goodly gifts of grace and nature are dissolved. Behold now the Eternal Wisdom besotteth those, who forsake him to court the lying fantasies of their imagination.

A second impediment, Presumption.

A second obstacle went along with this extravagant curiositie, to settle him fixedly in errour, which was the presumption of his own abilities, an inseparable companion of heresie. He that once in his brain hath deified crocodiles and dragons, not onely adoreth them, but will perswade others, that he hath reason to set candles before them, and burn incense for them. It is a terrible blow, when one is wounded in the head by his proper judgement, whose ill never rests in the mean. We come to the end of all by the strength of industrie: Stones are pulled forth from the entrails of men, the head is opened to make smoak issue out: but what hand hath ever drawn a false opinion out of the brain of one presumptuous, but that of God? All seemeth green, saith Aristotle, to those who look on the water; and all is just and specious to such as behold themselves in proper love. Better it were, according to the counsels of the ancient fathers of the desert, to have one foot in hell with docibilitie of spirit, than an arm in Paradise with your own judgement.

Augustine, not to acknowledge his fault, would ever maintain it, and thought it was to make a truth of an errour, opinionatively to defend it. He had that which Tertullian saith is familiar among hereticks, swellings and ostentation of knowledge, and his design was then to dispute, not to live. Himself confesseth two things long time made him to tumble in the snare: the first whereof was a certain complacence of humour, which easily adhered to vicious companies; and the other an opinion he should ever have the upper hand in disputation. He was as a little Marlin without hood or leashes, catching all sorts of men with his sophisms; and when he had overcome some simple Catholick, who knew not the subtilities of Philosophie, he thought he had raised a great trophey over our Religion. In all things this Genius sought for supereminence; for even in game where hazards stood not fair for him, he freely made use of shifts, and were he surprized, he would be angry, making them still believe he had gained: as a certain wrestler, who being overthrown, undertook by force of eloquence to prove he was not fallen. This appeared more in dispute than game: For having now flattered himself upon the advantages of his wit, he was apprehensive in this point of the least interest of his reputation, and had rather violate the law of God, than commit a barbarism in speaking, thereby to break the law of Grammer, to the prejudice of the opinion was had of him. It was a crime to speak of virtue with a solecism, and a virtue to reckon up vices in fair language. When he was publickly to enterprize some action of importance, the apprehension of succes put him into a fever: so that walking one day through the Citie of Milan with a long Oration in his head, and meeting a rogue in the street who confidently flouted him, he fetched a great sigh, and said, Behold, this varlet hath gone beyond me in matter of happiness. See, he is satisfied and content, whilest I drag an uneasie burden through the bryers, and all to please a silly estimation. The ardent desire he had to excel in all encounters, alienated him very far from truth, which wils, that we sacrifice to its Altars all the interests of honour we may pretend unto: and besides it was the cause, that the wisest Catholicks feared to be engaged in battel with so polished a tongue, and such unguided youth. Witness this good Bishop, whom holy S. Monica so earnestly solicited to enter into the list with her son, to convert him: for he prudently excused himself, saying the better to content her, That a son of such tears could never perish.

3. Impediment, The passion of love.

Besides the curiositie and presumption of Augustine, the passion of love surprized him also to make up his miserie, and to frame great oppositions in matter of his salvation. But because this noble spirit hath been set by God, as the mast of a ship broken on the edge of a rock, to shew others his ship-wrack, I think it a matter very behovefull to consider here the tyranny of an unfortunate passion, which long time enthraled so great a soul, to derive profit from his experience. The fault of Augustine proceeded not simply from love, but from ill managing it, afoarding that to creatures, which was made for the Creatour. Love in it self is not a vice, but the soul of all virtues, when it is tied to its object, which is the sovereign good; and never shall a soul act any thing great, if it contain not some fire in the veins. The Philosopher Hegesippus said, that all the great and goodliest natures are known by three things, light, heat, and love. The more light precious stones have, the more lusture they reflect. Heat raiseth eagles above serpents; yea among Palms, those are the noblest, which have the most love and inclination to their fellows. These three qualities were eminent in our Augustine. His understanding was lightening, his will fire, and heart affection. If all this had happily taken the right way to God, it had been a miracle infinitely accomplished: but the clock which is out of frame in the first wheel, doth easily miscarry in all its motions; and he who was already much unjoynted in the prime piece which makes up a man, viz. judgement and knowledge, suffered all his actions to slide into exorbitancy. As there are two sorts of love, whereof the one is most felt in the spirit, the other predominateth in the flesh, Augustine tried them both both in ſeveral encounters. Firſt he was exceſſively paſſionate even in chaſt amities; witneſs a ſchoolfellow of his, whom he ſo paſſionately affected. He was a ſecond Pylades, that had always been bred and trained up with him in a mervellous correſpondence of age, humour, ſpirit, will, life, and condition, which had ſo enkindled friendſhip in either part, that it was tranſcendent: and though it were in the liſts of perfect honeſty, yet being as it was too ſenſual, God who chaſtiſeth thoſe that are eſtranged from his love, as fugitive ſlaves, weaned his Auguſtine, firſt touching this friend with a ſharp fever, in which he received baptiſm, after which he was ſomewhat lightened. Whereupon Auguſtine grew very glad, as if he were now out of danger. He viſited him, and forbare not to ſcoff at his baptiſm, ſtill purſuing the motions of his profane ſpirit: but the other beholding him with an angry eye cut off his ſpeech with an admirable and preſent liberty, wiſhing him he would abſtain from ſuch diſcourſe, unleſs he meant to renounce all correſpondence. He ſeemed already in this change to feel the approaches of the other world: for verily his malady augmenting, quickly ſeparated the ſoul from the body. Auguſtine was much troubled at this loſs, inſomuch that all he beheld from heaven to earth, ſeemed to him filled with images of death. The country was to him a place of darkneſs and gyddy fancies; the houſe of his father a ſepulcher; the memory of his paſſed pleaſures a hell: All was diſtaſt, being deprived of him for whom he loved all things. It ſeemed to him all men he beheld were unworthy of life, and that death would quickly carry away all the world, ſince it took him away whom he prized above all the world. Theſe words eſcaped him, which he afterwards retracted, to wit, That the ſoul of his companion, and his, were expreſſie but one and the ſame, ſurviving in two bodies, and therefore he abhorred life, becauſe he was no more than halfe a man, yet would he not die, for fear the part of his friend, which yet lived in himſelf, might periſh.

All this well declared he had great diſpoſitions to love, and that to what ſide ſoever his affections tended, they never would be with mediocrity. It ſeemed now all things conſpired againſt him to kindle a coal in his veins, which the revolution of many years could not extinguiſh. Firſt, as nothing is more dangerous to foment this paſſion than ill example, he lived in a place, as contagious for chaſtity as the North wind for plants. Saluianus a great Writer ſpeaking of Africk, which bred S. Auguſtine, ſaith, It was the Country of loves, and that it was as ſtrange a man ſhould be an African without being an African, as to be an African and not laſcivious. Secondly, theſe dangers ſo frequent, which ſeemed to require much retention, found liberty enongh in the houſe: for the tears of the bleſſed S. Monica were not as yet ſufficient to ſtay the courſe of inſolent youth, ſince the father little cared: for that he having one day beheld his ſon in the baths, ſpake ſome free words, which ſerved rather as a ſpur for ſenſuality than a motive to continency. In the third place, as the eye muſt be open to direct occaſions, ſo he therein uſed ſo little ſtudy, that having a ſoul as it were of ſulphure, ſo much was it diſpoſed to take fire, he haſtened to throw himſelf into the midſt of flames.

Salvian. l. 7. de gubernat. Tam novum eſt impudicum non eſſe Afrum, quàm Afrum non eſſe Afrum.

He haunted the company of Libertines, who are the moſt dangerous enemies to chaſtity, and being of a humour very gentile and pleaſing, gave love, and reciprocally received; and although he had none, needs muſt he counterfeit. When he came to Carthage, about the ſixteenth year of his age, there was not a ſtreet where love ſpread not his nets. He as yet knew not well what it was to love, and yet deſired to be beloved, and grew weary of living in innocency. He hated his liberty, and ſought a hand which captived him. He went to Theaters there to behold loves repreſented, where he fervently was enamoured of the paſſions of imaginary lovers: yea, his very eyes hunted in the Church after objects of concupiſcence, by glances too too diſſolute; for which he confeſſed to have been very particularly chaſtiſed by the hand of God, ſince he mingled the ſanctity of the place with the enterainment of the profane actions. This ulcered ſoul threw it-ſelf out of its compaſs, and took wind and fire on every ſide. It ſeemed to him he muſt excel in vice as well as in ſcience. He made himſelf more vicious than he was, to appear more gentile in the eyes of evil men, and there remained for him nothing more as it were in this point but one ſhame, not to have been ſufficiently impudent. In the end he fell into the ſnares he deſired, and was involved in admirable labyrinths, where ever the end of one love was the beginning of another.

This life ſo carnal was a perpetual hinderance to the viſitations of God. For as Platoniſts ſay, ſtars cannot exerciſe their virtue on the ſphere of fire: So all the light of good counſel had no force in the flames of ſuch a paſſion. His ſpirit was depraved by ſenſuality, allured by the bait of worldly beauties, and darkned with the obſcurity of his blindneſs, in ſuch ſort, that the light of the ſpirit of God in him found no place, If there be a vice in the world which tyeth the ſoul to fleſh, and makes it ſtupid to the feeling of God, it is this foul ſin: and although it be not wholly incompatible with ſcience, yet never accorded in the wiſdom of heaven, which is more converſant in the taſt of heavenly things, than in knowledge.

The ſeventh SECTION.

Diſpoſitions towards the converſion of Saint Auguſtine.

BEhold the principal impediments of the converſion of S. Auguſtine: but God, who inſenſibly wove this work, and draws good even from the evil of his elect, cauſed him to uſe the remedy of the ſcorpion that ſtung him. For as he purſuing his ordinary curioſity, plunged more and more into ſolid ſciences, he began by little and little to diſtaſt the doctrine of the Manichees, finding it very ſtrange, that a man ſhould make all kind of dreams and ſottiſhneſs to paſs for verities, under the falſe ſeal of the holy Ghoſt. Thoſe of his faction, who ſaw him waver, oft lent their helping hands, too weak to ſupport him; and knowing their own inability, promiſed quickly to cauſe the prime man of their Sect to come from Carthage, who ſhould diſengage his mind from ſo many doubts, and afford him ample ſatisfaction.

Fauſtus and his qualities. Pretioſorum poculorum decentiſſimus miniſtrator. Conf. 5. & 6.

They failed not in their promiſe: for in few days the falſe Biſhop Fauſtus arrived; who was as the ſword and buckler of the Manichees. He was a man of a fair preſence, had charms in his tongue, and many attractives in his converſation, able to enſnare the moſt ſubtile wits. He inſtantly ſet himſelf to frame ſome ſtudied diſcourſes upon the maxims of his ſuperſtition, which were heard with great applauſe by the whole faction. For indeed he was an Eagle among Parrets. Theſe men ſuppoſing that Auguſtine was fully ſetled in all their apprehenſions and approbations, asked him what he thought of the Biſhop Fauſtus, and whether he were not an incomparable man? He very coldly anſwered, he was eloquent, and throughly able to tickle an ear: but his malady daily encreaſing, could not be cured by a man, who perpetually ſpeaketh, and ſhuffles up the matter; and threfore beſides his goodly ſermons, there was need of a particular conference, where he might fully diſcharge charge his mind. Faustus endowed with a natural curtesie, thinking he had to do with a young spirit, whom he with words would amuse, accepts the disputation; where instead of finding a crane he encountred an eagle, who handled him roughly from the beginning of the battel. This man made him presently appear to be of base gold, and that this tallent was no other, than that he was an indifferent Grammarian, had read some orations of Tully, the memory whereof were very fresh in him, some epistles also of Seneca, with a mixture of poesy, but in the books of his own Sect, he had very little knowledge. All that which made him esteemed in publick consisted in a grace of language, which proceeding from a fair body was exposed with the more exteriour pomp. Behold that which now throughout the world authorizeth an infinite number of men, who are in the opinion of ignorant, or the indifferently knowing, as flying fires in the air. When Augustine put him upon the solstices, equinoctials, eclypses, the course and motion of stars, wherewith the books of Manes are replenished, this man then found himself in a new world: but yet was wily; for he was not as the sottish Manichees, who promising evidence upon this doctrine, made as many slips as steps: he roundly said, his curiosity had never born him so far that way, and that he better had loved to contemn such things than study them. As for the rest, the doctrine of Manes depended not upon the knowledge of eclypses, since never had it been eclypsed. Augustine perceived his Doctour was not wholly ignorant, since he understood at the least how to acknowledge his own ignorance, but was otherwise absolutely distasted with the divinity of the Manichees, seeing so little support in Faustus, who was the prime pillar of the faction; and the snare which he would make use off to stay him was the beginning of his liberty. It was to make a banquet of flowers and songs for one almost famished, to seek with words to give him satisfaction.

Non usquequaquè imperitum erat imperitiæ suæ. Confes. 4. c. 7.

In the end, after a long abode in Africk, he resolved to go to Rome, not so much to find verity in its source, which as yet he proposed not to himself to be in the Church of Rome, as to dissolve the irksomness of teaching Rhetorick at Charthage, the youth whereof was extreamly insolent: His friends propounded unto him for his aim a far other air, much different successes from his former labours, and another recompence for his merit; adding besides, it was a sweeter climate, where young men held within the lists of good discipline, yielded their Masters full satisfaction. It was the strongest bait could therein be found; for the sweetness of his spirit was incompatible with the boldness of the schollars of Carthage, which was the cause that secretly stealing away from his good mother, who could not with her tears hinder the voyage, he set sail for Italy, and came to Rome. Behold him in the chief Theater of the world, where he began to shew himself, and entertain an Auditory in his Chamber, to be known, and forthwith appear in publick Courts, where he learned, the students of Rome gave their Reader good words, but the time of payment being come, they inconsiderately many times forsook the Teacher to exercise elsewhere the like deceit, which infinitely displeased him: and seeing that by good fortune a Rhetorician was sought after for Milan, he handled the matter so, by the assistance of some Manichees whom he yet courted for his own ends, and by the favour of Symmachus Pretour of the City, that this charge was stayed for him.

Hidden passages of divine providence in reclayming souls.

Behold him then at Milan, where the providence of God had marked out his lodging. Behold him in the field of battel, where he was to be assaulted. Behold him in the Amphitheater, where he should be disarmed. Behold him in the sphere, where he must be illuminated.

As we have beheld the strong oppositions which stopped up the way in the salvation of this great soul, let us now see, the means God used for his conversion. Here is an admirable spectacle, and worthy the consideration of noble spirits, since of all the works which God doth out of himself, nothing hath so much manifested his wisdom, bounty, mercy, and power, as the conversion of men. We observe in the effects and experiences of nature, that one thing draweth another in four especial manners, to wit, sympathy, motion, heat, and secret attraction. Sympathy say I, or natural conformity; so the stone tendeth downwards into the bosom of the earth, because it there finds reposes: Motions; so the hammer drives the nail, and one man leads another by the hand: Heat; so the sun raiseth up the vapours of the earth, after it hath subtilized and heated them: Secret attractions; so amber draws the straw, and the adamant wyns the iron. The spirit of God, ingenious and powerful in our conversions, makes use of these same four attractions to draw us to him. Attractions, which are able to gain the harshest, disarm the most savage, heat the remissest, and startle the stupid. Attraction of sympathy, consisteth in good nature and sweet inclination, which the Master-workman giveth us for virtue. Attraction of Motions is seen in the conuersion of good company, where examples of piety sweetly stir a soul to that which is its good. Attraction of heat is insinuated by the word of God, which is a sword of fire to make strange divisions between the soul and flesh. Secret attraction, is a most particular touch from God, who taketh men by ways hidden, interiour. and extraordinary. So, many times we see conversions infinitely strange. Such was that of S. Paul who felt a blow in the bloud of S. Stephen, when he shed it by so many hands as he gave consents to the furie of his executioners. Such was that of the Jugler Genesius under Diocletian, who in a full Theater scoffing at the ceremonies of Christians, at the same time became a Confessour of the faith, and Martyr of Jesus Christ. Such was that of Mary, neece of Abraham the Hermit, who was gained to God in a supper which she had made in a bourdel. Such likewise was that of Irais a poor maid-servant of Alexandria, who as the Samaritan going to draw water, left her pitcher to run to Martyrdom, and joyning her self to Christians which were led to execution, bare away the first crown. Such was that of a thief, who forsook his wicked life, beholding a young Monk that ate wild roots, and another converted, having seen Paphnutius the Hermit drink a glass of wine who never had drunk any before, and then onely did it by a resignation of his own judgement and proper will into the hands of another who commanded it: The thief at that instant thus concluded. That if this holy man were so enforced by virtue for an action so contrary to ordinary life, he himself might well by the help of resolution undertake the same predominance over his passions, and of an ill man become a Saint, as he did. Briefly, such was the conversion of Parentius, a man of quality, who exercised a place of judicature in a City of Italy: For having seen a young swyn-herd, who taught his companion a trick to make his hogs readily run into into the Sty, which was to say to them: Enter hogs into the sty, as wicked Judges into Hell; and then perceiving that these beasts readily obeyed this word, he laughed heartily; but presently changing all his mirth into serious actions, he set himself to ponder on the difficulties he found of salvation in the great corruptions of justice, and was so touched, that he tooke the habit of Franciscans, where he so far proceeded in virtue, that he became General of the Order, and visited bare-foot all the houses of S. Francis. It must be confessed there are great priviledges of Gods providence in such affairs. I am willing briefly to recite exam ples of these secret attractions, because they are very famous; and I set before you the four sorts of conversions, by reason they will not be unprofitable to make us discover the singular œconomy of God in that whereof we are now about to treat.

The œconomy of God in the conversion of S. Aug.

The Saviour of the world used all these pieces in the conversion of S. Augustine, as we may observe in his progression. For first, concerning attraction of sympathy or natural conformity, it is true, that this great man was of an excellent nature, and though it were a long time smothered up in flesh and bloud, yet was it as a sun in eclipse, which should one day appear in full liberty, and illuminate the bodie, which then was its obstacle. In his most tender infancy, he made amorous inclinations to his Creatour appear. For then he had recourse to prayer, as to a Sanctuary of his small afflictions: and like a child placing felicity in that which touched him neerest according to his esteem, he ardently besought God that he might escape the chastisement of rods, and disgraces of the school. He was of an humour free and liberal, gracious, mild, affable, obliging, and full of compassion toward men in want, which is a good way to represent great actions of virtue, and dispose one to receive the spirit of God in abundance. Affections, with tears of sweetness and devotion, were to him very familiar, which appeared on the day of his being made Priest, some time after his conversion; for he spared not to weep in that ceremony, where by chance a simple man interpreting that this happened to him through disturbance, that he was not yet a Bishop, who so well deserved it, he came near to comfort him, saying He should be patient; that Priesthood was the next degree to the dignity of a Bishop, and that in time he should enjoy the accomplishment of his desire. S. Augustine afterward related this speech to his friends, as an example of the errour of judgements made upon mens actions. As for his vices, he had nothing therein black or hydeous: for his loves though inordinate, were bounded in limits most tolerable; and his ambitions were not haughty and disdainful, but consisting onely in a sleight vanity to make shew of that which he had either of wit or learning; a passion very natural to those who feel themselves endowed with any perfections. Otherwise he had no design, pretence, engagements, as have they, who often cover their petty interests with the pretext of piety, and are ever ready to imbrace the Religion wherein they find most accommodation for their temporal affairs. Augustine was so free from worldly avarice, that he knew not what it was to make a fortune, or reach at wealth. Scarce would he ever learn to carry a key, possess money in a coffer, and take accounts, as observeth Possidonius in his life. All his mind was upon books, and all his intentions aimed to the finding out of truth that he might offer homage to her for all he had, and faithfully serve her all his life, after he once had well known her. These dispositions gave a full passage to such as were to treat with him.

On the other part, attraction of motion, which commeth from good example, was to him very advantagious in the person of his good mother S. Monica. And if certain people, as the Lycians, took the name of their mothers, as of those, whom they thought most contributed to the production of man into the world, Augustine had great cause to take the title of his nobility from S. Monica, who brought him forth more profitably for the life of grace, than that of nature.

Herod. l. 2.

This woman verily was the pearl of women, whose life had not great lightnings of extasies, nor raptures; for all her virtues passed with little noyse, like to great rivers that glide along with peaceful majesty: but all was there very inward, as in her who ever was hidden within the better part of her self.

The qualities of S. Monica.

Much hath she done in affoarding a S. Augustine to the Church; and whosoever cannot discover the secret virtues of the sun, let him content himself to measure it by his rays. She pretended to consecrate her Virginity to Altars, God drew her to marriage, to gain from her a Doctour for his Church. This Saint knew not as yet what she did; when in her tender years by a laudable custom she rose from her bed in the deep silence of night, to offer her prayers to God, and when she shortned her diet at each repast, to divide the moity of her life with the poor: but the spirit of God, which guided her, disposed her then by these actions to some matter of importance. She was married to a Pagan, and one of a humour very untractable; which she so softened by her long and discreet patience, that in the end he set aside all his moody extravagancies, as it is said the furious Unicorn sleeps in a maidens bosom. It was with her a great consolation to have married an infidel, and after some years to see him dye a Christian, saying to God, She had received a lion, and restored a lamb. All her care aimed onely at this son, whom she first saw ingulfed in a life most licentious afterward, by mishap involved in the heresy of the Manichees. The poor mother endured nine entire years the throws of this spiritual child-birth, the most sensibly that may be imagined. What grief and sighs in her retirement? What fancies in her sleep? What prayers in the Church? What alms in necessities of the poor? What prudence and discretion in all her proceedings? She sought out all the passages into this spirit, which she could imagine: but seeing it was a torrent not to be restrained by her forces, she peaceably expected the assistance of Heaven. She despaired not of his malady through fear to cure him. She undertook not in the fervent accesses of his feaver to upbraid his disorders: She went not about manacing him with fire and cauteries: But did as God, who acteth no ill, but ever so useth the matter, that the evil is extenuated. When she could not speak to her son, she caused the apple of her eyes to speak to God, deploring all night, and watering the Altars, not with bloud of victims, but that of her soul, which were her tears. We may say, that as the waters which have pearls in them, run for the most part to the south, so this holy woman being in Africk, a Southern Region, became in the abundance of her tears the true fountain of the South, fit to bear a great pearl, which afterward brought forth for Christendom many millions of pearls. Never had the Angel Raphael so much care of young Toby, as this celestial intelligence of her son, being perpetually in Centinel, and observing the visitations of Gods providence. Her Paralitick was ready at the fish-pool, and expected nothing but the stirring of the water.

Aquæ defluentes ad Austrum generant margaritas. Tarentinus Philosophus.

Behold she came from Afrik to Milan, through so many perils both of sea and land, such travels and sufferings, to conclude her deliverance. She found her son much already shaken by the shocks which the eloquence of S. Ambrose had given him. Soon the holy woman knew it was this great Bishop, whom God had chosen to set a seal upon this work of the conversion of a man so important: and her son relateth, that from that time she esteemed S. Ambrose as a very Angel of Heaven (a). She was still in the Church to behold him, ever she hung on his lips, as the sources which distil from the Paradise of God.

Here is the attraction of heat, or rather the sun that must on high exhale this cold vapour, after so much resistance it had made against the spirit of God. Augustine himself very particularly decipher-eth, how being at Milan, he saw the Bishop Ambrose, known through the whole habitable world (b) as one of the best men upon the earth, who ceased not to administer to his people the word of God, which in it bare corn, oyl, and the wine of sobriety. This man of God, ſaith he, at my arrival imbraced me, as a father would his ſon, and ſhewed he was much pleaſed with my coming to Milan, obliging me with many charitable offices. Behold the cauſe why I began to affect him very much: not ſo much yet as a Doctour of truth (for I expected it neither from him nor any other Catholick) but as a man, who wiſhed me well. I continually was preſent at his ſermons; in the beginning for curioſitie, to eſpie and found whether his eloquence were equal to his great reputation. I was very attentive to his words, little caring for the matter, and I found he really had a ſtile very learned and ſweet, but not the cheerfulneſs and quaint attractions of Fauſtus (c) though for ſubſtance of diſcourſe there was no compariſon: For Fauſtus recounted fables, and this man taught moſt wholeſome doctrine. Behold the firſt apprehenſions that Auguſtine had touching the abilitie of S. Ambroſe. In the end he continuing to hear him for delight, truth entered through his ears, which were onely opened to eloquence, and he found in the beginning, that our Religion had not thoſe abſurdities which the Manichees obtruded, and were it not true, it might at leaſt be profeſſed without impudence, which he could not hitherto be perſwaded unto. The old Teſtament, which with the Manichees he ſo much had rejected, ſeemed to him to have a quite other face, after the learned interpretations of S. Ambroſe. The chymeraes and fantaſies, which environed his imagination, were diſſolved at the riſing of ſome pettie rays from him. Notwithſtanding it was yet neither day nor night in his ſoul: Errour was below, and Religion had not yet the upper hand. His ſpirit over-toiled with ſo many queſtions by the wiles of Satan propended to neutralitie, being neither hot nor cold, as it happened to thoſe, who forſake truth through the deſpair they have how to know it.

Agitations of ſpirit in S. Auguſtine upon his converſion.

BUt God ſtill enflaming his chaſt deſires, he bent himſelf to conſider S. Ambroſe, whom he perpetually had for object; and ſeeing how this man was honoured by the chief Potentates of the earth, & how he flouriſhed in ſuch glorious actions, all appeared compleat in ſuch a life, but that it went on without a wife; he thinking at that time the want of a great burden to be a main miſerie. He as yet proceeded but to the bark of S. Ambroſe, obſerving onely what was exteriour, and not penetrating into thoſe great treaſures of lights, virtues, contentments, and heavenly conſolations, ſtored up in the bottom of the conſcience of this holy Prelate. He had vehement deſires to ſpeak to him ſomewhat more familiarly, to underſtand his opinion, to ask queſtions at large, to diſcover his heart all naked, and unfold the miſeries of his paſſed life: "And becauſe (ſaith he) "I ſtood in need of a man full of great leaſure to re- "ceive the ebbe and flow of thoughts which were in "my ſoul, now I found all in Ambroſe, except time "to hear me: not that he was difficult of acceſs, for "he was ever in his Hall expoſed to the ſervice of the "whole world; but my unhappineſs was, to be like "the Paralitick of the fiſh-pool, ſtill out-gone by o- "thers more ſtrong than my ſelf. What diligence "ſoever I uſed, I found Ambroſe environed with a "large troup of ſolicitous men, whoſe infirmities he "comforted to my excluſion; and if any little time "remained for him it was imployed either in repaſt, "which was exceeding ſhort, or at his book. The "good Prelate ſtudied in his Hall in ſight of all the "world, where I oft beheld him, and ſaw that in "reading, he onely ran over with his eye one page of "a book, then ruminated it in his heart, not at all "moving his lips, whether it were that he would "not engage himſelf to diſcourſe upon his reading "to all there preſent, or whether it were, he did it "to preſerve his voice, eaſily weakened with much "exerciſe of ſpeach, or for ſome other cauſe. I thought "time was very precious to him, and ſeeing him ſo "ſerious, I ſuppoſed it a kind of impudency to in- "terrupt him. After ſo long a ſilence I went away "with the reſt, not having opportunity to ſpeak to "him.

Verily this diſcourſe ſheweth a mervellous repoſe of ſpirit in S. Ambroſe: and as it were over much modeſty in S. Auguſtine: for it was a wonder that he who ordinarily lived at Milan in the reputation of a great wit, and was already known by the Biſhop to be ſuch, brake not the preſs at one time or other, to gain ſome hours of audience in affairs of ſo great importance. I ſhould think either that he uſed a forbearance too ſhame-faced and irreſolute, or that S. Ambroſe would not enter into diſputation with a young man as yet ſo well perſwaded of his own abilities, before he had ſuffered him to ripen, and to be throughly ſeaſoned by the reſentments of piety. However, it put the mind of S. Auguſtine into great diſturbance. "Behold (ſaith he) almoſt eleven years, "that I have ſought the truth, and ſee I am arrived at "the thirtieth year of my Age, yet ſtill perplexed. To "morrow infallibly it muſt diſſolve: ſtay yet a little; "perhaps Fauſtus will come to Milan, and tell thee "all. But how will he tell that which he ſhall never "know? Let us hold with the Academicks, and ſay "all is uncertain, for every man maintaineth what he "liſt. It is the property of man to imagine, and the "nature of God to know. But the Academicks (be- "hold gallant men) do leave a ſpirit in perpetual do- "tage. Let us rather ſet our feet on the ſteps of Ca- "tholick Religion, where we planted them from our "tender age. It is not ſo cloudy as the Manichees "ſuppoſe it, Ambroſe hath already much freed me "from errours: let us purſue the reſt. I, but Ambroſe "hath not leaſure for thee. Let us read: where ſhall "we find neceſſary books, and where have ſit time? "Thy ſchollars buſy thee all the mornings; take at "leaſt ſome hours after noon to enjoy thy ſelf. But "when ſhall I admit the neceſſary viſits of friends "that muſt be entertained? and when the prepara- "tions for my lectures? and when my recreations? "Let all be loſt, ſo I may gain my ſelf. This life, as "thou ſeeſt, Auguſtine, is moſt miſerable, and death "uncertain. If it catch thee upon a ſurpriſe, in what "eſtate wilt thou leave this world? And where doſt "thou think to learn that, which here thou haſt neg- "lected? But how if death alſo ſhould conclude the "faculties and life of the ſoul? It is a madneſs to "think onely on it, ſince all the greatneſs and choiſe "of Religion, wiſdom, and ſanctity fights for the "immortality of the ſoul. We ſhould never ſo much "employ the ſpirit of God in ſo great advantages "as he hath given us, if we had no other life but "that of flies and ants. Auguſtine, thy evil is thy ſen- "ſuality. If thou wilt find God, thou muſt forſake "thy ſelf, and from this time forward bid a long "adue to worldly pleaſures, Thou art deceived: when "thou haſt left them, thou wilt have the repentance, "to have done that too ſoon, which thou oughteſt "not to do; nor canſt thou any more make an ho- "nourable retreat into the world. Let us live, we "have good friends; we may in the end have an "office, a wife, means, and all ſort of contentments: "There are too many miſerable enough through "neceſſity, that conſent not to it by any act volun- "tary. To conclude, a wife and the truth of the "Goſpel, are not things incompatible.

Diſturbances of mind in S. Auguſtine.

Behold

Behold how this poor ſpirit turmoiled it ſelf in the retirement of his cogitations, as himſelf hath declared in his Confeſſions. He beheld the life of Saint Ambroſe and his chaſtity, with an eye yet benummed and ſurcharged with terreſtrial humours, and it reflected ſome rays upon him; but he found it ſo high mounted in the throne of its glory, that the ſole aſpect affrighted him: he meaſured continency by his own forces, not by the grace of God. Behold why he deſpaired of a ſingle life, and thought a wife was a chain, ſometime unhappy, but ever neceſſary. He lived at that time with Alipius and Nebridius, two noble Africans, his intimate friends, who followed him charmed with his doctrine and ſweetneſs of his converſation: and from this time they propoſed that life to themſelves, which they afterward led. He often put them upon the intention to eſtabliſh a good manner of life, to paſs the reſt of their days in the ſtudy of wiſdom. Alipius, who was very chaſt, maintained this could not be done in the company of women, according to an ancient ſaying of Cato, who affirmed, If all the world were without a woman, it would not be exempt from the converſation of gods. Auguſtine, that was leſs chaſt than Alipius, and much more eloquent, prepared himſelf to diſpute this queſtion ſtrongly and firmly againſt him, ſo that it ſeemed (ſaith he) that the old ſerpent ſpake by his mouth, ſo much he connected together reaſons and allegations to maintain his opinion. The good Alipius was much amazed to behold ſuch a great ſpirit ſo tyed to fleſh; and as he attributed much to all his opinions, reſpecting him as his Maſter, it was a great chance he had not drawn him into voluptuouſneſs through a ſimple curioſity of experience. This miſerable ſnare ſtayed all his good purpoſes, and needs muſt he break them, to put this great ſoul into full libertie.

Confeſ. 6. 11. Amans beatam vitam, timebam illam in ſede ſua.

The ninth SECTION.

Three accidents which furthered this Converſion.

IT happened, either by the induſtry of holy Saint Monica, who failed not to obſerve opportunities for the ſalvation of her ſon, or by a ſecret inſpiration of God, that the woman, whom he had brought with him from Africk, and with whom he had always lived in fair correſpondence, preſerving to him inviolable faith, as if ſhe had been his lawfull wife, reſolved to leave him, ſaying: That ſhe had now fulfilled the meaſure of her ſins. That it was time to think upon a retreat; that ſhe ſhould die with this onely grief, not to have tears enow to waſh the offences of her youth ſo unthriftily waſted. For the reſt, never man ſhould poſſeſs her after him, and that all her loves ſhould be from this time forward for him who made her; onely ſhe recommended unto him a ſon which ſhe left, praying he would ſhew himſelf as a father and mother unto him.

Auguſtine was much amazed at this ſpeech. It ſeemed his heart was pulled away from him, to ſee himſelf ſeparated from a woman he ſo faithfully had loved: and on the other ſide he was full of confuſion, to behold that ſhe ſhewed him the way which he ſought, he not yet feeling himſelf ſtrong enough to follow her example. It was not in his power to ſtay her any longer, nor to approve what ſhe did. His ſpirit was penſive and divided, not knowing upon what to reſolve. After the departure of this woman, the mother, who as yet knew not the will of God, ſpeaks to him of marriage, and he caſt his eyes upon a young virgin of a very good houſe, which much pleaſed him, who, though ſhe were two years younger than the lawfull age of marriage permitteth, he reſolved to ſtay for her; but in the mean ſpace he found out new loves, taking another unlawfull woman in the place of her whom he had forſaken.

Yet for all that he deſiſted not from the enquiry of truth, feeling none of all thoſe engagements more than that of love, which made the ſharpeſt reſiſtance againſt him; and ſeeing he could not accoſt S. Ambroſe in his great multiplicity of affairs, with that facility he wiſhed, he made his addreſs to Simplicianus, Holy Simplicianus. Prieſt of the Church of Milan. He was one of the moſt venerable men that was then in Europe, endowed with infinite piety, and excellent literature. For this conſideration he was delegated by his holineſs to ſerve as a ſpiritual Father to S. Ambroſe. Otherwiſe he was ſo humble and modeſt, that to give his Biſhop the upper-hand, he very often counterfeited ignorance in queſtions which he right well knew, conſulting with S. Ambroſe as an Oracle, becauſe of his dignity, and giving a perfect example to all, of the duty we ow to the Prelates of the Church.

Beſides theſe ornaments of virtue and ſcience, this holy man had ſtrong attractives in the facility of his converſation, and ſweetneſs of entertainment: ſo that a certain particular grace was ſeen to ſhine in his face, which was the cauſe every one deſired to ſpeak to him for his converſation, nor was any one weary of his company. Auguſtine having met with this Simplicianus, whom he called the Man of God, throughly openeth his heart unto him, relating all the diſturbances of his life paſſed. Simplicianus moſt tenderly embraceth him, and ſhews the Port now much nearer than he imagined. For, as he mentioning, that among other readings, he had peruſed the books of Plato, tranſlated by Victorinus a Senatour, and heretofore Profeſſour of Rhetorick in the Citie of Rome: I like very well (ſaith this good old man) that you have read the books of Plato, rather than the impieties of other Philoſophers. I doubt not but you have obſerved many paſſages in this good Authour, which make for our Religion: but ſince you have read the Tranſlation of Victorinus, and much eſteem of it, why do you not imitate him in his converſion? You muſt underſtand that I moſt familiarly knew him, when we were at Rome: he was a very learned old man, having his hairs grown white in the long ſtudy of all ſorts of ſciences, which he taught, manured, and illuſtrated the ſpace of ſo many years, partly in declaming, partly by writing. There was not almoſt a Senatour in Rome, which acknowledged him not for his Maſter, and he arrived to ſuch a degree of reputation, that they erected a Statue unto him in conſideration of his great learning. Who could ever have hoped in the decrepitneſs whereunto he was come, to ſee him born again among the little children of the Church? Notwithſtanding, to ſhew you the force of Gods ſpirit, after the reading of almoſt all the books in the world, he ſet himſelf in the end of his age, to peruſe the Bible and other Writings of Chriſtians, where he found himſelf ſurprized at unawares, ſaying afterward to me: Simplicianus, know I am a Chriſtian. I thinking he meant to ſcoff me: I will not, ſaid I, believe any thing, till I ſee you at Church. And imagine you (replied he) the walls of a Church make a Chriſtian? He ſpake this, much fearing to offend the Cedars of Libanus, which were his parents, eminent in qualitie, though Infidels: but he afterward was well reſolved never to bluſh more for the Goſpel. Let us go (ſaith he) to the Church. I am a Chriſtian. I was at this word ſo tranſported with joy, I could no longer contain my ſelf. I led him to the Church, and cauſed him to be inſtructed in the Articles of our Faith, and commanded a name to be given him among thoſe that required holy Baptiſm. When he came to make his profeſſion of faith, ſome one, thinking to pleaſe him, would have him pronounce in ſecret. No (ſaith the good old man) in publick: It is no longer fit to be aſhamed of ſo glorious an action. As ſoon as he was mounted into an eminent place to pronounce the Articles ticles of his belief, all the world which knew him, began to crie Victorinus, Victorinus. The admiration was so great, the contentment so universal, the joy so sensible, that it seemed every one would snatch him from thence, to set him in his heart.

Ob God! how you honour those that faithfully serve you? Behold him now, who in stead of tying himself to those dying Palms of Rhetorick, is fastened to the tree of life, which never perisheth, and is eternized with a glorious memorie in the estimation of Christendom. Who would not think himself most happie, by following his example to participate in his crowns? For mine own part, I will truly confess unto you (dear son) that at such time as Julian the Apostata forbade all the Christians to use humane learning, I was as much addicted to it as any man of mine age, being then in the flower of youth very curious: but seeing matter of faith was in question, I most freely forsooke those Syrens, to arrive at the haven of salvation, where I speedily hope to enjoy your companie. For so excellent a nature as yours, is not made to be lost. It were over-much to resist the inspirations of God; your age and fashion require you to lay arms aside.

This discourse quickened with love, reason, wisdom, and examples so sensible, penetrated far into the heart of S. Augustine, causing him to speak these words, which he did afterwards couch in his Confessions: I knew not what to answer, convinced by varieties so palpable, but in dull and drowsie words, saying always, this shall soon, very soon be: yet had this soon no measure in it, nor did this delay I desired find any end.

Confes. l. 8. c. 5. Non erat omnino quod responderem veritate convictus, nisi tantùm verba lenta & somnolenta, modò, ecce modò: sed modò & modò non habebant modum, & sine paululùm, in longum ibat.

God recharged again, and laid a fresh battery upon Augustine by the mouth of a secular man. A certain gentleman of Africa, called Pontianus, who following the Emperours Court, came to visit him in his lodging, found by chance on the table, the Epistles of Saint Paul. This being a man much given to devotion, and who knew Augustine to have a wandering wit in the curiosities of prophane books, smiled to see him now seeking out his entertainment with an Apostle. Augustine replied, there was no cause of wonder, for it was now become his principal exercise. The gentleman seeing him in this good humour, sets before him divers discourses of piety, and among others, some narrations of the life of Saint Anthonie. Wherewith Augustine and his companion Alipius were ravished, having never before heard this great Saint spoken of: So little curious were they to know that, which could not be omitted but by such as were willing to be perpetually ignorant of themselves. The other proceeding in his discourse, represented to them the companies of Religious then in great account, esteemed by all the world as the paps of the Bride, repleni shed with celestial odours, which streamed even as far as the deserts, with immortal sources of their milk; and added, that they had a Monasterie in the suburbs of Milan, erected by Saint Ambrose, wherein were many great examples of virtue. They heard this man with some small shame to be ignorant of so large a treasure, even at their gate, whilest they turned over the writings of many wits which lived in flames, tormented where they are, and applauded where they are not. This good man seeing they relished this excellent discourse, following the point, said: Being one day at Trier, with three gentlemen, my companions, as the Emperour after dinner beheld the Turneys, and race of horses with all his Court, it came into our heads to go take the air in certain gardens near the Citie. Two of the four of us walking along, arrived by chance at a little Cel, where they found Hermits, and a book of the life of Saint Anthonie. One takes it up, reads, and admireth it, and in reading is so moved, that he determined in his heart to change his course of life. And being no longer able to contain himself (so replenished was he with the love of God, and confusion of his own infirmities) he turned to his companion, and said: And what (I pray) do we seek with all our travels? Whither tend all our ambitions? Why bear we these arms? What pretend we with so much toyl? To gain the favour of a man, which is more light than the wind, more frail than glass, more thin than smoak? Out alas! by what perils hasten we to a greater danger? By what steps mount we up to a promontorie of ice, where our foot is ever upon the precipice? Behold, I may from hence forward be the friend of God, if I will. He persisted to read this book, all on fire, and became big with a new life, which he brought forth; then again he cried out as a man rapt with an extasie: It is done; I have broken my bands from this step, from this hour, in this place I am resolved to serve God. Go (my dear friend) if you will not imitate me, at the least oppose not my resolution. The other replieth: I am wholly yours; God forbid I forsake you in so fair a way, by frustrating my self of so honourable a warfare, and so rich a reward. Behold them from gallants in an instant become Hermits. I and my associate enquired for them in the mean space on every side, and about evening found our selves in the same Cell, condemning them that they must be sought for, and saying it was now time to end our walk with the day-light, and return to the Citie. They seriously made answer: They had found their lodging, we might do well to go whither we pleased, but they were throughly determined never to depart from thence.

I thought in the beginning it was a counterfeit merryment, but better sounding it, upon relation what had passed, I in effect saw they were men wholly changed. We were ashamed to leave them, and as yet felt our selves much unable to follow. In conclusion, we parted with many tears, we dregging our hearts in the dust, they by supereminence lifting the better part of themselves to Heaven. We went to bear this news unto two Ladies, their betrothed wives, who, enkindled with the same spirit, afforded a free consent thereunto, vowing their virginitie to God, at the time when their marriage was almost on the point of consummation.

The tenth Section.

The admirable change of S. Augustine.

WHile Pontianus related this, Saint Augustine was enchained to his discourse, and already felt flashes of lightening and battels in the bottom of his conscience, which he had much ado to dissemble. It seemed that God took him as a fugitive, who was hidden behind him, to set him in full view before himself. He saw himself (saith he) in this discourse as in a mirrour, foul, crooked, disfigured, and repleat with blemishes and ulcers. When he made comparison between his own unworthiness, and the life of those brave Champions, a holy horrour of his vices so surprized him, that he seemed desirous to be dis-engaged, and to flie from himself. And in this conflict he was still much confounded before his own eyes. The resolution of these two gentlemen unveiled his memory, embroiled from his youngest years, when he remembered he had great inclinations to serve God in the state of continency, and to have begged it of him, who is the Authour thereof, but with so much weakness, that he feared that God would not then take him at his word. He much wondred how these men in one after-noon could resolve on an affair of so great importance, and that he in the space of twelve years stuck fast in the snare. In the end, he could contain himself no longer, but brake the air with a deep sigh, saying to his faithfull Alipius: What is this? What have we heard? These simple men are raised, and win Heaven by a brave warfare, while we with our knowledge wallow low in flesh and bloud. Do we blush to wait on them? Nay, rather let us be ashamed not to follow them.

He spake this very suddenly in great agitation of spirit, which appeared in his forehead, in his eyes, visage, colour, and voice. Alipius very sad, beheld him, judging there was some transportation in this act. From thence he stole into a garden (which was very near the chamber where they discoursed) as a man distemper'd, knowing well what he had been, and not as yet understanding what God would do with him, at the least he had an intention to give free liberty to sighs, which he could withhold no longer. Alipius thinking there should be nothing concealed from him, step by step follows him, and both in private began a good work. Augustine said in this retirement: My God, what binders me that I break not my chains to day, to put my self into the libertie of thy children? What monster is this? Behold my will commandeth my eye to be opened, my hand to work, my foot to walk, this is done without resistance: now this same will commandeth it self to forsake a wicked puddle, and set it self in the path of virtue; why so much resistance? Doubtless it will and it will not, otherwise it would be obeyed. I am yet fastened to the earth by some great root, and to day I must cut it off. See you not, Augustine, two messengers from God, to wit, shame and fear, armed with whips, which are by thy sides to wyne thee from the way of thy customarie pleasures? Turn thy face boldly, cut off from henceforth all the knots, which have hitherto entangled thy libertie. It is done, Behold me free. I deceive my self, I am not as yet where I think. Then let us do it now without further promise. What is that? I feel, what I do, and do not; notwithstanding I believe what is good, and recoyl not; I draw near, I mount up; the cause why I stay is but to take breath. In the end, by pure force behold I am there; I touch, and almost reach the good so oft desired. Out alas! I say, almost. For in effect I touch not, nor as yet hold any thing. Must I so much doubt to die to death, and live for life eternal?

An admirable combat.

As I was (saith he) upon these resolutions, near approching my happines, if I did see behind me the image of that I left in forsaking the world, I might see abysses and horrours which congealed my heart, and yet notwithstanding I stood fair, not proceeding nor retiring, as a bodie hanged in the air.

Behold in an instant all the sensual pleasures of my youth, which I had so cherished, were presented to my imagination, as Nymphs and Syrens. They seemed to pull me by the garment, and say: Augustine, What? Will you forsake us after we so sweetly have trained up your youth? Wherein have we disobliged you, but in suffering you to enjoy contentments which the law of nature permitteth? You now become very hardie in this transportation of your thoughts. It is a feaver which possesseth you, it will pass away, and you will be much ashamed to have no longer made use of us. You hasten to go whrie, which shall cost you dear if you take not heed. When you have done, you will be ashamed to return this way back again, and for fear to be thought a fool, you will live miserably all the rest of your dies. What? can you live without us? You are not so ignorant of that which God hath created for you. You have affection for beautie, and will have as long as you live. To love, and not enjoy, is to be set on the torture; and to be there voluntarily, is to loose your wits. What? this moment of time here being ended, are we yours no longer? What? shall neither this nor that be permitted us for ever? Is it enough when one saith for ever? What hell is there in the world, if it be not to be deprived for ever of what we most affect?

These blameless Syrens altered not their discourse; for still they batter'd me with such like words, but found I had changed mine ears. Behold the cause, why as I then shewed my self verie resolute, they much lessened their boldness. Their speech was no longer a command, but a request: and when I turned my face from beholding them, it seemed their voice was lost in the air, like a languishing eccho, to which proximitie affordeth no more reverberation. The more I fortified my self with reasons, the more they desisted. All they could do was but to speak some slight words softly in mine ear, or by stealth pull me by the cloak, to cause me to turn my face once again towards them: but I stood firm as a rock, beholding the beautie and sweetness of the life, to which I felt my self called by God.

It seemed unto me that I saw before mine eies fair chastitie, the mother of holy loves, encompassed with a large troup of virgins and chast ones, all white with innocencie, and resplendent with light of glorie. She smiled upon me with a brow more brightsom than the clearest summers day, and stretching out her arm full laden with palms; Come confidently (saith she) why do you any further dispute with your thoughts? Forsake those Syrens, they too much have abused the flower of your age. I will acquaint you with their deceits, their vanities, and infamies, if the experience of a dozen years have not taught you more than I am able to discover. What else have you done the space of so many years, but till a barren field, which promised fruits, and gave you thorns and ill savours, sprinkled with some slight blossoms? As for their words, were they not full of promises, their promises of oaths, and their oaths of perjuries? What illusions and fantasies have you experienced? And if you have in some sort enjoyed them, hath it not been worse than your own desires, so much was it mingled with gall, and attended by remorse, which made you bear gibbets and tortures with your pleasures? Must you purchase a hell with so many mischiefs, which seemeth wide open to receive the desperate? Where think you to find pleasure out of God, from whom all pleasures are? I am not hydeous nor barren, as your thoughts, O Augustine, do figure me: I am the mother of holy delights, ever fruitfull by the visitations of God. My joys are gardens, which never wither, since they perpetually are watered with immortal graces. Ask those children, those maids, those men and women. Behold of all ages, and all conditions: Ask them, if they ever found any bitterness in my conversation. You turmoil your self upon the frailties of flesh; how simple are you? why cannot you do what such and such have done, who have waxed old in virginitie? Think you they have other flesh, bloud, and other qualities than you? You equal them in all, except in a strong resolution to be a slave no longer. Imagine you that all this they do is by their own power? God gives them the will, God grants the power, God affords them the accomplishment. Child of diffidence, why do you still handle your infirmities? Cleave to God, as doth the ivie to the wall, and fear not that ever he will bereave you of his support, if you to him remain faithfull.

He entertained his mind with such cogitations, and it seemed unto him this consideration at that instant drew all his misery, as from an abyss, to represent it before his eyes. Then was it when the secret attraction, which consisteth in the particular touch of the Holy Ghost, did manifestly appear. Behold the prophesie of David accomplished: Behold the God of Majestie who thundereth. Behold the voice of God on the waters, and on the great waters, since it forceth tears to issue out in abundance. Behold the voice of God, which cometh with a strong hand, since it over-beareth all resistance. Behold the voice of God, which cometh with magnificence, since it operateth so glorious a conversion. Behold the voice of God, which breaketh the Cedars of Libanus, since it overthroweth all the pride of the world. Behold the voice of God, which divides the flames since it scattereth the fires of concupiscence. Behold the voice of God, which shaketh the desert, since it removeth from the bottom to the top the sterilities of this desolate soul. Behold the voice of God, which prepareth the Hind for her deliverance, since it removes all the obstacles.

He was near his Alipius, who expected the issue of these agitations of mind, and suddenly behold he felt in his heart a tempest raised, which in it contained fire and water, and seeing the cloud began now to be divided with the ardent sighs and fountains of tears, which he poured forth, he left Alipius the Secretary of all his thoughts, to engulf himself further into retirement, and give free rains to his passion. He threw himself under a fig-tree, which Isidorus of Pelusium holds to have been the tree of the first unhappiness of the world, so, as if to wipe away this stain, it had then been the beginning of his happiness. There he made rivers run from his eyes, which were wasted with his heart in a noble sacrifice of love, and seemed willing to wash the victim with the waters of Libanus, before they were burnt in the fire of Sion.

Thereupon he cried out with redoubled sighs: My God, how long? My God, how long? No longer remember the sins of my foolish youth, but treat with me according to the greatness of thy mercies. Shall we yet say, to morrow, to morrow? And why not to day? And wherefore is it not time to give end to a life so exorbitant? I am troublesom to my self, nor can I any longer endure my self. Must I ever be to Heaven an object of vengeance, and to earth an unprofitable burden? My God, how long? My God, how long? Speaking this with an abundance of brinish tears, he heard a voice sweet and harmonious, which said these words as it were singing: Take and read, often repeating them. Admiration stopped the flood of tears, and he began to examine in himself, whether such a voice could come from any neighbour-place by some ordinary means. All which well weighed, he found it could not be humane, but that God by this voice instructed him what he was to do. He went from this place thither where he left S. Pauls Epistles with his friend Alipius, imagining, that as S. Anthonie had been converted by the reading of one word in the Gospel, on which he casually happened, God might likewise work somewhat in his soul by the words of his Apostle. He openeth the book with a holy horrour, and the first sentence he encountered, was that which said: It was time to live no longer in good cheer, feasts, and the drunkenness of the world. That it was time to live no longer in unchast beds, quarrels, vanities, and emulations, but that we must be clothed with Jesus Christ, as with a robe of glory, no more obeying the flesh, nor the concupiscence of the heart.

Rom. 13. Non in commessationibus & ebrietatibus, non in cubilibus & impudicitiis, non in contentione & æmulatione, sed induimini Dominum Jesum Christum & carnis providentiam ne feceritis in concupiscentiis vestris.

There was no need to read any further. Behold in an instant the ray of God, which did directly beat upon his heart, and opened to him a delicious serenitie. Behold him throughly resolved. He sheweth this passage to his faithfull Alipius, as the decisive sentence of a long process, which he had with sensuality. And Alipius casting his eyes upon the subsequent words, found: (a) Receive him who is weak in faith. Behold me (said he) If you determine to forsake the world, take me for your companion. They rose and went both to the good S. Monica: Mother (saith Augustine) you shall not need to take the pains to find me out a wife. Behold me a Catholick, and which is more, resolved to leave the world, to live in continency. The resolution is made, and concluded with God, there is no means at all to retire. Had not God withheld the soul of this holy widdow of Naim, it was already upon her lips to flie out for joy, beholding this dead son, this son of so many tears, to come unexpectedly out of his tomb, and present himself before her eyes with a splendour of incomparable light. She made bon-fires of joy in her heart, and triumphed with celestial alacritie, blessing God, who had stretched out the power of his arm on this conversion, and who by the bounty of a true father, had surmounted the vows of an afflicted mother.

(a) Rom. 14. Infirmum autem in fide recipite.

Augustine in the mean while thought sweetly to begin his retreat from the Rhetorick Lectures wherein he was engaged. There yet remained but twenty days to the time of vacation, which had the continuance of twenty years, to a man, who then entertained far other affections: notwithstanding, through great wisdom and modesty, he would not break with exteriour pomp, by publishing a change of life in the Citie of Milan, but suffered the time to steal away with little noise. When the term expired, he quietly discharged himself thereof, and likewise freed himself from the importunity of fathers, who passionately sought him to be Tutour to their children for his great capacity, he alledging for his excuse, that the exercise of the School had brought a difficulty of breathing, and an indisposition of the breast upon him, which threatened him with a ptysick, if he desisted not. This was very true, but yet not the principal point of his resolution. Behold how this great man avoided the occasions of ostentation, and the divers interpretations he might make to himself for a gloss of actions: and although God (as he said) had put into his heart flaming darts, and juniper-coals against slanderous tongues, he chose rather to take away occasion of calumny, than to see himself put upon the necessity of defending himself; very far different therein from the nature of those, who make great flourishes, to end them in nothing.

After he was discharged from his profession of Rhetorick, he retired himself into the Grange of Verecundus, where he stayed a long time, as yet a Catachumen, leading a most Angelical life, spent wholly in prayer, and the study of holy letters. From thence he wrote to S. Ambrose of the errours of his passed life, and the estate wherein he presently was by the grace of God, as also of the aid he had contributed to his conversion, demanding besides what book he should read, the better to prepare himself for the grace of Baptism. S. Ambrose certified him of the contentment he took in this so particular visitation of God, and advised him to read the Prophet Isaiah; but he seeing he could not yet understand it, did defer it till another time, wherein he might be better practised in holy Scriptures.

In the end, the day so many times desired being come, wherein he was to be born anew by Baptism, it being in the thirty fourth year of his age (as Cardinal Baronius accounteth it) he went from the Grange of Verecundus to the Citie of Milan, where he was christened by the hand of Saint Ambrose, and had for companion of his Baptism his faithful friend Alipius, and his onely son Adeodatus, at that time about fifteen years of age; so prodigious a wit, that his father could not think upon it without astonishment. I had nothing therein (saith he) my God, but sin; the rest is from you, who so well know how to reform our deformities. But all was there admirable, for at the age between fifteen and sixteen years, he already surpassed many great and learned men. He also verified the saying of Sages, affirming, these such sparkling wits are not for any long continuance upon earth, for he died some years after his return into Africk, leaving a repose in the father, who already apprehended the course of this youth: and although he grieved to see him taken away in the flower of his age, yet on the other side he was much comforted in the innocency of his life, & hope of his immortality, knowing it was the will of the gardener, who had gathered the fruit according to his good pleasure, to lay it up in store. After this baptism, there were nothing but hymns, songs, lights of eternal verities, thanksgiving, and tears of joy.

S. Ambrose baptized S. Augustine.

Ingenium nimis maturè magnum non est vitale.

This done, he must take the way of Africa, and they were now arrived to the port of Ostia, expecting the opportunity of navigation, when the holy and venerable mother, Monica, of fifty six years of age, and worn with many labours, rendered to nature her tribute, and soul to its Creatour.

The death of S. Monica.

This

This admirable woman resembleth the Ark in the deluge, which after it had born the whole world in the bowels thereof, amongst so many storms and fatal convulsions of universal nature, reposed on the mountains of Armenia: So S. Monica, when she so long time had carried in her entrails and heart a spirit as great as this universe, among so many tears and dolours, so soon as she was delivered of this painful burden, went to take her rest on the mountains of Sion. A little before her death, beholding Heaven from a high window, which opened on a garden, she seemed there already to mark out her lodging, so much she witnessed resentment and extasie towards her son Augustine, who at that time made this admirable colloquie with her, couched by him afterward in his Confessions. The conclusion was, that she said unto him: My son, I have now no more obligations to the world, you have discharged all the promises of Heaven to me, and I have consummated all the hopes I might have on earth, seeing you a Catholick, and which is more, resolved to perfection of the life you have embraced. When it shall please God to call me, I am like fruit ripe and falling, that holdeth on nothing.

Soon after she betook her to her bed, being surprized with a feaver, which she presently felt to be the messenger of her last hour. Behold the cause why she being fortified with arms and assistances necessary for this combat, took leave of Augustine and his brother there present, affectionately entreating them to remember her soul at the Altar, onely meditating on Heaven, and neglecting the thought of the land of Africa, which she had seemed at other times to desire for the sepulcher of her body.

And as her other son said unto her: Madame, my mother, we as yet are not there, we hope to close your eyes in our own countrey, and burie you in the tomb of your husband; this holy woman seeing this man would still tie her to the present life, and divert her from cogitation of death, which to her was most sweet, beheld him with a severe eye, and then turning her self towards her son Augustine, Hearken (saith she) what he saith; as if we absent from Africa, must needs be further from God. She often cast her dying eyes towards this son, who was her precious conquest, and who in her sickness served her with most particular assistances, affirming, that Augustine had ever been a good son towards her, and though he had cost her many sorrows, he never had forgotten the respect due to a mother.

Verily there was a great sympathie between the soul of such a mother and such a son, which was infinitely augmented after this happy conversion, and therefore we must give to nature that which belongs to it. The child Adeodatus, seeing his Grand-mother in the last agony, as possessing the affections of his father, threw out pitifull out-cries, in which he could not be pacified. And S. Augustine, who endeavoured to comfort them all upon so happy a death, withheld his tears for a time by violence, but needs must he in the end give passage to plaints so reasonable. The Saint died as a Phenix among Palms, and they having rendered the last duties to her, pursued the way begun directly for Africk.

(b) Aug. contra Julianum Pelagianum. l. 1. c. 6. Excellens Dei dispensator, quem veneror ut patrem, in Christo enim Jesu per Evangelium ipse me genuit, & eo Christi ministerio lavacrum Regenerationis accepi.

Behold how the conversion of S. Augustine passed, and though many cooperated therein, yet next unto God, S. Ambrose hath ever been reputed the principal Agent; and for that cause his great disciple said of him: (b) Ambrose is the excellent steward of the great father of the family, whom I reverence as my true father, for he hath begotten me in Jesus Christ by the vertue of the Gospel, and God hath been pleased to make use of his service to regenerate me by Baptism. Whilest stars and elements shall continue, it will be an immortal glory to the Bishop Ambrose to have given the Church a S. Augustine, of whom Volusianus spake one word worth a thousand: (c) Augustine is a man capable of all the glorie of the world. There is much difference between him and other Bishops. The ignorance of one Church-man alone, prejudiceth not Religion, but when we come to Bishop Augustine, if he be ignorant of any thing, it is not be, but the law which is defective, because this man is as knowing as the law it self.

(c) Volusian. Epist. 2. Vir est totius gloriæ capax Augustinus. In aliis sacerdotibus absque detrimento cultus divini toleratur inscitia: at cum ad Antistitem Augustinum venitur, Legi deest, quicquid ab eo contigerit ignorari.

The eleventh SECTION.

The affairs of S. Ambrose with the Emperours Valentinian the father, and Gratian the son.

LEt us leave the particulars of the life of S. Ambrose, to pursue our principal design, which is to represent it in the great and couragious actions he enterprized with the Monarchs of the world. Let us not behold this Eagle beating his wings in the lower region of the ayr, but consider him among lightenings, tempests, and whirl-winds; how he plays with thunder-claps, and ever hath his eye where the day breaketh.

The state of Christianitie stood then in need of a brave Prelate to establish it in the Court of Great-ones. The memory of Julian the Apostata, who endeavoured with all his power to restore Idols, was yet very fresh, it being not above ten years past since he died, and yet lived in the minds of many Pagans of eminent quality, who had strong desires to pursue his purpose. On the other side the Arians, who saw themselves so mightily supported by the Emperour Constans, made a great party, and incessantly embroyled the affairs of Religion. Jovinian, a most Catholick Emperour, who succeeded Julian, passed away as a lightening, in a reign of seven moneths. After him Valentinian swayed the Empire, who had in truth good relishes of Religion, but withal a warlick spirit, and who to entertain himself in so great a diversitie of humours and sects, whereon he saw this Empire to be built, much propended to petty accommodations, which for some time appeased the evil, but took not away the root. He made associate of the Empire his brother Valens, who being a very good Catholick in the beginning of his reign, suffered himself to be deceived by an Arian woman, and did afterward exercise black cruelties against the faithfull, till such time as defeated by the Goths, and wounded in an encounter, he was burnt alive by his enemies in a shepherds cottage, whereunto he was retired; so rendering up his soul in the bloud and flames wherewith he had filled the Church of God.

The state of Christendom.

The association of this wicked brother, caused much disorder in the affairs of Christendom, and often slackened the good resolutions of Valentinian by coldness and tollerations, which were rather esteemed the feaver of times, than men.

S. Ambrose entered into charge, as is most probably thought, about the end of the reign of this Valentinian, and had not much occasion to intermedle with him; yet from his entrance sheweth he would become a Lion. For seeing in the State some practises in Magistrates, which turned to the prejudice of the Church, he with much freedom and generosity complained to the Emperour; and though this Prince was one of the most absolute who had swayed the Scepter, he was no whit offended, but answered to S. Ambrose: It is a long time I have foreseen your nature, and the libertie you would use when a Myter was set on your head. Yet notwithstanding did I never oppose your election, and though I might exercise the resistance which the laws allow me, without any other authoritie, yet I gave my consent, for the desire I have to behold a stout man in this charge. Do what the laws of God appoint you, the times are sick, and need a good Physitian. Theod. lib. 4. cap. 6.

The death of Valentinian the father.

This ſo favourable beginning promiſed good effects for the future. But this Prince lived not long after: for, having reigned about twelve years in a very harſh manner, he being haughty, and exceſſively cholerick, it happened that hearing one day the Deputies of a Province in Bohemia, who excuſed themſelves upon certain incurſions and roberies imputed unto them, he entered into ſo violent and thundering diſtempers, that they laid him on the bed of death; for, from the Councel-table he at that inſtant was carried into his chamber. The veins of his body ſhrunk up, his ſpeech ſtopped, his members were turmoiled with horrible convulſions, and his face ſpread all over with purple ſpots. In concluſion, he was waſted with fervours of anger, more dãgerous than the dog-ſtar, which in few hours took him hence, who under the ſword of the Roman Empire had made ſo many Armies of Barbarians to tremble, to teach us we have no greater enemies than our ſelves.

Valentinian left two ſons, the one by his firſt wife Severa, which was Gratian: The other by Juſtina, which was Valentinian the Younger. Let us ſee how S. Ambroſe treated with them both.

The holy Biſhop, who had already exerciſed ſo much authority over the father, retained it on the ſons with ſo much the more priviledge, as their age and the neceſſity of the affairs of the Church required. Valentinian ſome years before his death, foreſeeing as it were what would happen, declared his eldeſt ſon Gratian Succeſſour of his Empire, and from that time aſſociated him to his dignity. As he was a Prince very awfull, and who among his ſharp proceedings, ſpared not to mingle many ſweet attractives when he undertook an affair, ſo he made himſelf appear in his latter days as a ſetting Sun in his Royal Throne, and having made a moſt ſpecious Oration to all his Captains and ſouldiers there then about him, flattering, and calling them companions by way of Court-ſhip, he exhibited many large demonſtrations of amity to them: then taking his little ſon Gratian by the hand, clad in an Imperial robe, being then of fourteen or fifteen years of age, he told them, that this was his Heir, whom they were one day to have for companion, and who ſhould with them tread under-foot the powers oppoſed againſt the Roman Empire: adding, he ſhould equal his father in valour and in affection, due to their good ſervices, but ſurpaſs him in ſweetneſs, having been made happy with a better education than himſelf. This young youth (as ſaith his hiſtory) was beautifull as a ſtar, for his eyes ſparkled like two lightening-flaſhes, his face very amiable, and complexion mingled with white and red. When the ſouldiers beheld him in this habit, they began ſoftly to ſtrike their targets, and at that inſtant the trumpets ſounded with a thouſand acclamations to ſalute him.

Gratian the ſon of Valentinian.

This action was the cauſe that the ſudden death of his father, made him inſtantly Emperour with his uncle Valens, who yet lived, when for a ſingular tryal of friendſhip, he divided his dignity with his brother, the little Valentinian, who was not yet above five or ſix years old, being then left an orphan under the charge of his mother Juſtina. Afterward the great neceſſities of the Empire, made them likewiſe aſſociate Theodoſius to the Crown, one of their fathers chiefeſt Captains.

The young Gratian, who was endowed with an excellent diſpoſition, preſently put himſelf under the wings of Saint Ambroſe, to direct him in affairs of his ſalvation and conſcience, which he eſteemed the moſt important of all might concern him. Our great Prelate entered ſo far into his ſoul, that living and dying, nothing was ſo ſweet nor familiar in his mouth, as the name of Biſhop Ambroſe. And well to diſcover the apprehenſions of this fair ſoul, and the eaſie enterance it gave to all the forms of virtue propoſed by this great Saint, you muſt obſerve, even in the judgement of Pagan Hiſtorians, who never graced him above his merit, that he was the moſt accompliſhed Prince for his age, which ever bare the Diadem of Cæſars. And if a life ſo precious could have been redeemed with the bloud and tears of the faithfull, it had repleniſhed the Church with ſanctity, the Empire with glory, and the whole world with wonders.

The beauty of body which he enjoyed, contained a ſpirit wholly celeſtial enchaſed therein, for it was full of generous vivacity; and as fire out of his ſphere ſeeketh its nouriſhment in the conqueſts thereof, ſo he lived by ſciences and lights, that they became tributary by his judgement and travel, as well as men by his arms. He laboured much in the matter of eloquence, ſeeing it was then a ſtudy as it were abſolutely neceſſary for Emperours, to reign over people, and that words were the cement, which united wills and arms for the ſafety of the publick. By good chance he had Auſonius for Maſter, eſteemed even in the judgement of Symmachus, the moſt able man of his time; moſt happy Maſter of an excellent ſcholar, who made him change the ſchool of Rhetorick, for the purple of Conſul-ſhip. Gratian was naturally eloquent, nor was it hard to manure ſo generous a nature. When he pronounced ſome Oration, he had early in his young years, the majeſty of his father, conjoyned with an admirable modeſty, and a little acrimony, which gave an edge to his actions. The ordering and inflection of his voice, were rarely proportioned: He ſeemed eloquent in pleaſing arguments; grave, in ſerious; polite, in laborious, and when the ſubject required fervour and invective, his mouth ſpake tempeſts. This enforced no diminution upon his military exerciſes, wherein he was infinitely dexterous; whether he were to run, wraſtle, or leap, according to the cuſtom of the Roman ſouldiers, his agility made the world wonder; or whether he were to manage a horſe, or handle arms, the Maſters who had trained him up, confeſſed he had dainty paſſages, inimitable for any practice. The Pagans, who would blame him for diverſity of Religion, have never ſaid ought elſe of him, but that he was to good an Archer, and over-fervent in hunting of wild beaſts. That notwithſtanding, ſet him in the eſtimation of warlike men, and as he was ſingularly affable and liberal, ſo was there nothing to be found in the world more charming than his nature.

Excellent qualities of the Emperour Gratian.

Saint Ambroſe, having underſtood his ſpirit, much affected him, and endeavoured to joyn the moſt ſolid virtues to ſo many fair natural parts; and above all, perceiving that among ſo many Pagans and Arians, who ſtretched out their ſnares on every ſide to ſurprize him, it was neceſſary to prevent them, he laid in his Royal ſoul deep foundations of faith, and moſt chaſte grounds of Religion, to which Gratian ſhewed himſelf from the beginning much enclined. There is alſo a letter found, written in his proper ſtile, and with his own hand, where when he had heard the learned inſtructions of his Prelate, he demands them in writing, and becauſe it is an excellent monument of his ſpirit and Religion, I will here inſert it.

The

The Emperour GRATIAN, to Ambroſe the Religious Biſhop of God Omnipotent.

Apud Ambroſ. in præfat. l. de fide.

I Have a vehement deſire to ſee my ſelf united to you by corporal preſence, as I ever have you in my memorie, and as I cohabit with you in the better part of my ſelf, which is the ſoul. I beſeech you (moſt holy and Religious Biſhop of the living God) haſten unto me, to teach me what I believe before I have ſufficiently learned. For it is not my purpoſe to argue upon matter of faith, better loving to lodge God in my heart, than conclude him in my words. My deſire onely is to open my ſoul at large to the Divinitie, to receive its lights the more abundantly. God will inſtruct me, if it ſhall pleaſe him, by your words, ſince I confeſs and reverence his moſt Sacred Majeſtie, well obſerving not to call Jeſus Chriſt a creature, or to meaſure him by the weakneſs which I acknowledge in mine own perſon: but rather I avow our Saviour to be ſo great, that our thoughts, which are almoſt infinite, can adde nothing thereunto. For if the Divinitie of the Son could increaſe, I would dilate my ſelf in it for augmentation of his praiſes, ſuppoſing I could not better gain the gracious favour of the Celeſtial Father, than in glorifying the Son Eternal. But as I fear no jealouſie on Gods ſide, ſo for my part I make no account to eſteem my ſelf ſo great an Oratour, that thereby it may be in my power to adde any thing to the glory of the Divinitie by my words. I acknowledge my ſelf to be infirm and frail, I praiſe God proportionably to my forces, and not anſwerably to the meaſure of his greatneſs. As for the reſt, I beſeech you to afford me the Treatiſe of faith, of which you heretofore gave me a taſt, adding thereunto the Diſputation of the Holy Ghoſt, in ſuch ſort, that you prove his Divinitie by the Scripture and reaſon. Hereupon I pray God (dear Father, and true ſervant of God, whom I adore) that he many years preſerve you in ſafetie.

Excellent faith and modeſtie of the Emperour.

This Letter, he that will conſider it, ſhall find to be full of much ſenſe; and verily Saint Ambroſe was ſo raviſhed herewith, that he confeſſeth never to have ſeen nor read at that time the like. This good Emperour (ſaith he) wrote to him with his own hand, as Abraham, who himſelf prepared the dinner for his gueſts, not giving commiſſion thereof to his own ſervants. He wrote holy words unto him, as if he had an ear in Heaven; and which is more remarkeable, it was in a time when he was upon the point of a journey to reſiſt Barbarians, and therefore he purpoſely took the arms of faith from this great Biſhop. For obſerve, this young eaglet from the ſecond year of his Empire found buſineſs enough For Athanaricus King of the Goths, entered into Thracia with a formidable Army: and as Gratian amaſſed together all his Eaſtern troups to make head againſt him, the Barbarians imagining with themſelves that the Weſtern Empire was unfurniſhed, fell upon the Gauls, whither the Emperour went with admirable expedition to ſuccour them, and it was at the time when he wrote this letter, and moſt particularly recommended himſelf to Saint Ambroſe, taking the ſtandard of faith from him, to bear it in the front of his flouriſhing Legions. This was not without very notable ſucceſs: for by relation of Ammianus Marcellinus, he bare himſelf moſt valiantly in this journey, although very young, undergoing toyls, and ever appearing in the head of the army to encourage the ſouldiers by his preſence, which ſo enkindled them, that they reſolved to confront the enemy, as ſoon as might be, and defeated them at Straſbourg, with ſo horrible a ſlaughter, that of ſeventy thouſand Barbarians, threeſcore and five thouſand covered the field with their maſſacred bodies, leaving young Gratian to make a harveſt in the chief field of Mars, moiſtened with the palms of his own ſweats, but above all, bleſſed by the prayers of great S. Ambroſe. As the Emperour returned from this conqueſt, he received letters from the holy Prelate, where among other things, excuſing himſelf that he had not accompanied him, he ſaith:

Genes. 18.

Triumphant victory.

It is not the want of affection, Moſt Chriſtian Emperour (for what title can I give you either more true or more glorious?) It is not, I ſay, the want of affection hath abſented me from your perſon, but modeſtie joyned to the decorum of my profeſſion; yet at your return I preſent my ſelf before you, if not with bodily ſteps, at the leaſt with the whole affections of my heart, and all the vows, wherewith I could charge the Altars; and in this, the dutie of a Biſhop principally conſiſteth. But it is miſtaken to ſay, that I came before you, as if I had been ſeparated from you, having perpetually attended you in mind, marching along with you in your thoughts, heart, and good favour, which is the moſt noble preſence I can deſire. I meaſured your journeys, I went along with your Armie, I was in your camp day and night, with all my cogitations, and with all my cares; I ſtood centinel with my prayers, and thoſe of my Clergie, at your Imperial Pavillion. How much I was little in merit, ſo much the more did I raiſe my ſelf in diligence and aſſiduitie. And rendering this dutie for you, I did it for the whole Church: herein do I uſe no flatterie, for you love it not, and well know it to be far from my nature, and the place which I hold, but God is a witneſs with us both, how much you have comforted my heart by the ſinceritie of your faith, to whom he hath afforded ſuch proſperitie, and ſo much glorie. I ow this acknowledgement both to the publick and your particular amitie: for you have granted me the repoſe of my Church, you have ſtopped the mouthes of the perfidious (and by my good will I wiſh you had as well ſhut up their hearts) and this have you done with marvellous authoritie, fortitude, and faith.

Affectionate words of S. Ambroſe to the young Emperour.

The holy Emperour ceaſed not afterward to oblige the Church in all occaſions, by the favour of his Edicts, and ſhewed himſelf ſo openly zealous, that even he, firſt of all the Emperours merited the title of Moſt Chriſtian, given afterward to our Kings. His Predeceſſours who profeſſed Chriſtianity, ever ſuffered their reputation to be diſhonoured with many blemiſhes, which much weakened the worth of their actions; but Gratian was the moſt royal and ſincere of them all; for he ſo little complied with the Gentiles, that their Prieſts coming together to offer him the title and habit of Great Pontife, which all the Chriſtian Emperours had yet for ceremony and reaſon of State, retained, this good Prince confidently refuſed it by the counſel of Saint Ambroſe; and although the Gentiles were ſo much moved, they could not abſtain from words of menace, he contemned all humane reſpects, where the glory of God was intereſſed. As for the reſt, to conſider further the energy of the diſcretion of this holy Biſhop, it is to be noted that the faith of Gratian, his tender plant, was not a languiſhing and idle faith, but much employed in the exerciſe of good works, which Auſonius, a worldly man, could not ſufficiently admire in his ſchollar, well ſeeing he knew much more than his Maſter.

Zeal and virtue of Gratian by the direction of holy S. Ambroſe,

He who obſerved the moſt particular actions of the life of this Emperour, hath left in writing, that from the time of his childhood, never did he let any day paſs, without praying to God moſt devoutly, daily rendering ſome vow to Altars; and that thoſe who knew his moſt ſecret thoughts, gave aſſurance he lived in unſpeakable purity of heart, and moreover, he was very ſober and abſtinent in his ordinary courſe of life: and for as much as toucheth and concerneth chaſtity, it might well be ſaid, that the Altar of Veſtal Virgins, where perpetually burned a ſacred fire which purged all, was not more holy than the chamber of Gratian, nor the couches prepared in the Temple for ceremonies, more chaſte than his Imperial bed. He had the heart of a mother towards his poor ſubjects, and the beginning of his Empire was conſecrated by the comfort of the people, for whom he much ſweetened the taxes and ſubſidies, freely cutting off what was due to his own coffers; and to take away all cauſe of enquiry in time to come upon that which he liberally had granted, he commanded through all Cities, papers, and obligations of publick debts to be burnt. Never bon-fire more clearly blazed than the ſame; not a creature complained the ſmoak hurt his eyes. Every one praiſed the Emperour, beholding, that as his benefits were not frail and tranſitory, ſo the evils he took away, were never to return.

Singular qualities of a young Prince

Admirable charity in an Emperour.

How could he but do well for the publick, ſeeing he was moſt liberal towards particulars? He was not contented to viſite the ſick, but himſelf led Phyſitians along with him thither, cauſing them to miniſter at his charge, and in his own preſence, that which was neceſſary for their recovery. He was ſeen after the defeat of the Barbarians which I ſpake of, to run into the Tents of his ſouldiers to enquire the number of the hurt, and himſelf with his own victorious hands to touch the wounds, and cauſe them inſtantly to be dreſt, haſtening and encouraging the ſurgeons. And if any poor ſouldier through diſtaſt refuſed to take broath, he would ſit down by him, and charm him with ſuch ſweetneſs of words, till he obtained of him that which conduced to his health. He ceaſed not to comfort the moſt afflicted, to congratulate with the moſt happy, to enquire into the neceſſities of all the world, even to the making the packs of a poor ſubject to be carried by his own mules: and all this did he indefatigably with ſingular promptneſs and alacrity, void of oſtentation, giving all, and reproching no man.

Behold the fruits of the good education of S. Ambroſe, which well ſheweth, that in making a good man of a great Prince, the whole world is obliged.

The twelfth SECTION.

The death of the Emperour Gratian, and the afflictions of S. Ambroſe.

BUt alas! Eternal God, who art elder than the beginning of time, and more durable than the end of Ages, muſt great gifts be ſo freely given to the world to become ſo ſhort? My pen abhorreth to paſs beyond the bloud of this poor Prince, in whom the earth had nothing to wiſh but immortality. Behold what a wound it is for the Empire, what ſorrow in the Church, and a touch-ſtone to the virtue of S. Ambroſe.

Gratian, after the death of his father, had reigned about ſeven years, when behold a monſter ſtarted up in England, to diſpoſſeſs its natural Prince, and caſt fire and confuſion into the Empire. It was Maximus, who according to the relation of Zoſimus, was a Spaniard by Nation, companion of the great Theodoſius, and Captain of the Roman troups, which were then in great Britain.

Maximus rebelleth againſt his Prince, and his wicked diſpoſition.

This wicked man, vexed to the quick that the Emperour Gratian had aſſociated Theodoſius in the Empire, without ever mentioning himſelf at all, reſolved to enter into the Throne by tyranny, ſince he could not arrive thither by any merit. Never Tyrant uſed more induſtrie to cover his ambition than did this man: Never hath any ſought more ſupport from the diſſimulation of ſanctity and juſtice; yet I beſeech thoſe who make account by the like ways to bring their purpoſes to paſs, to learn by the ſucceſs of Maximus, that if the arm of God ſuſtain not an affair, the more exaltation it receiveth, the deeper ruins it findeth.

Maximus then, a ſon of the earth, who had nothing great in him but the deſire of reign, made himſelf ſometime an Engliſh man, other-while a Spaniard, ever leaning to that ſide, where he ſaw moſt ſupport for his affairs. As an Engliſh man, he laboured to have it thought he had ſome correſpondence of affinity with Saint Helena mother of great Conſtantine, and he was ſo impudent as to take the very name of that family, cauſing himſelf to be proudly called Flavius Clemens Maximus. As a Spaniard, he would be reputed the allye of Theodoſius, whom he ſaw to be powerfull in the affairs, and whoſe force he more feared, than loved his advancement. As for Religion, he well diſcovered by the effect that he had no other God but honour. Notwithſtanding like thoſe who provide oyl to burn in the lamps of Idols, as well as in that of the living God, he embraced all ſorts of Sects, making his arrows of every wood, ſo to hit the white of honour.

Deteſtable hypocriſie.

Verily, if there be any vice deſerving the execration of all mankind, it is that which diſtendeth ſnares over Altars, and which under colour of piety and zeal, entrappeth men, Cities, and Provinces, with a kind of theft, which ſeeketh to make it ſelf honourable under pretence of piety and Religion. This was very familiar with this bad man: for ſeeing many Pagans of quality, who bit the bridle, expecting the re-eſtabliſhment of Idols, he under-hand entertained them with very fair hopes. On the other ſide, he favoured the Synagogue of Jews in ſecret, ſuppoſing theſe men being loſt in Religion and conſcience, might one day ſerve his turn, though but to fill up ditches. But then beholding the Catholick Church in an eminent height, he openly courted it, and that with demonſtrations of reſpect and ſervice, which might ſeem to proceed from none but the moſt zealous.

Letters alſo of his were found written to the Emperour Valentinian the Second, where he made many declarations of the duty he owed to the Catholick Church, ſo compleat, that they ſeem much fitter for the mouth of a Biſhop, than of a Tyrant. He ſpeaketh of God like a Saint, ſaying: (a) Great heed muſt be taken not to contend with ones Maſter, and that ſins committed againſt Religion admit no excuſe. He talks of Rome (b) as a Pope, calling it in full voice, The moſt Venerable, and Princeſs of Religion. He ſeemed to ſweat bloud and water in defence of S. Ambroſe, whoſe virtue he infinitely feared, it being joyned to a liberty, which never accuſtomed to bow under tyranny. In another Epiſtle, where he writeth to Pope Siricius, he tells, how going from the Font of Baptiſm, he had been tranſported to the Imperial Throne, which being ignorant of the life of the children of God, he eſteemeth an incomparable favour from Heaven, and in recompence thereof promiſeth all ſervice to the Church of Rome, ſatisfying himſelf onely to execute that, which ſhould be commanded him, without any deſire to enter into the knowledge of the cauſe.

(a) Periculoſè, mihi credè, divina tentantur: Inſanum, ut i error excuſabilis non ſit, ibi velle peccare. Baron. an. 387. 35.

(b) Roma Venerabilis, cui in hac parte Principitatus ſit. Epiſt. ad Siricium cod. anno ſect. 65.

Moreover, if he ſaw any forlorn Hereticks, who were feeble in faction, and much out of favour, he ran upon them with all manner of violence, and then ſhewing ſpiders webs, of one ſide filled with little flies, and on the other ſide all broken by creatures of a larger ſize, he raiſeth mightie tropheyes, thinking ſo to piece out his fortune by the effuſion of contemptible bloud. In this manner he cauſed Priſcillian, and many other of his Sect to be put to death, who were Hereticks poſſeſſed with a black and melancholy devil; and ſuch as in truth, according to the laws both divine and humane, well deſerved puniſhment, but not according to the proceedings ceedings were obſerved in their proceſs, much blamed by S. Martin and other wiſe Biſhops, who took notice of paſſions over-bloudy, even in the Eccleſiaſticks, that ſought after ſpoil.

Virtutibus vitia. ἐγχίδνες. Ariſtot. Origen. Baſil. Albertus in Paradiſo animæ, Prolog.

O God! it is verily one of the greateſt unhappineſſes of humane life, to ſay, that vices keep ſhop near to virtues, and often deceive the beſt experienced merchants with their artifices. That is moſt true which is ſpoken by Albertus the Great, Maſter of Saint Thomas: Severitie counterfeiteth juſtice: melancholy calleth it ſelf gravitie: babble ſtealeth into the name of affabilitie, as doth diſſolution paſs under colour of free mirth. The prodigal ſaith he is an honeſt man; the covetous, provident; the ſelf-conceited, conſtant; the craftie, prudent; curioſity borroweth the title of circumſpection; vain-glory, of generoſity; preſumption, of hope; carnal love, of charity; diſſimulation, of patience; puſillanimity, of mildneſs; indiſcreet zeal, of fervour in matter of Religion: and the worſt of all is, hypocriſie puts on the mask of ſanctity. Yet if with theſe ſemblances and borrowed faces, they onely deceived vulgar ſouls, it were ſomewhat tollerable; but it is a thing moſt deplorable, that the ſubtile, who have no other God but their own intereſts, by ſlight complacences and petty affectations of devotion, enſnare noble and Religious ſouls, who, meaſuring all by their own innocency, daily afford more ſupport to credulity. A little outward ſhew handſomly expreſt, raviſheth men with admiration, and cauſeth Altars to be raiſed to them, for whom God hath prepared gibbets. There are alſo many ſilly birds, who ſeeing the fowler with blear and running eyes, role a huge pair of beads in his hands, ſay, this is a holy man, and full of compaſſion: but the more judicious anſwer, We muſt not regard his eyes nor beads, but the bloud and rapine which is in his hands.

Pretext of devotion dãgerous.

A parable of the fowler.

Had Maximus been beheld upon this ſide, he had never deceived the world, but his plaiſtered devotions ſerved his turn to amuze eaſie natures, whileſt his ambitions cleft mountains to climb to the Throne of Cæſars. Pope Siricius, beguiled with the maſk of this falſe piety, gave demonſtration of much affection to him; and when he was declared Emperour, many Biſhops uſed with him at Trier ſundry complements, which too near approched to ſervitude. There was none at that time but our Saint Martin, who held a ſtrong power over this ſpirit: and the wily Maximus, who well foreſaw there was no reſiſtance to be uſed againſt a ſtroke of thunder, ſubmitted with all pliantneſs and poſtures, to draw this great Prelate to his amity. He, who heretofore made himſelf to be petitioned unto by the Biſhops, received the commandments of S. Martin as decrees, and endeavoured to yield him all ſatisfaction.

One deſire onely he fixed in his heart, which was ſome one time to invite this holy man to his table, to wipe away all the ill reputation of which the moſt judicious could not be ignorant: but S. Martin conſtantly refuſed it, until Maximus upon a time having made a thouſand proteſtations of the ſincerity of his intentions in that point, which concerned the uſurpation of the Empire, the man of God, whether perſwaded by reaſons, or mollified by ſo many prayers, went thither, and uſed there paſſages of generoſity, which you ſhall know.

Sulpitius in vitâ S. Martini. cap. 23.

In this banquet were preſent the falſe Emperour Maximus, with his brother, and his uncle, a Conſul, and two Counts. S. Martin for his honour was placed in the middle, near the perſon of Maximus, and when about the midſt of dinner, the cup-bearer preſented a goblet to his Maſter, he for a ſingular teſtimony of his affection, put it into the hands of the good Biſhop, ſeeming to have a holy ambition to drink therein after it was conſecrated by the touch of his lips: but S. Martin not uſing any other complement, when he had drunk, gave the cup to his Deacon, as eſteeming him the moſt worthy perſon of the feaſt next himſelf. Maximus, who infinitely ſeemed to be pleaſed therewith, although he inwardly felt himſelf gauled with this liberty, did ſo outwardly diſſemble it, that he cauſed S. Martin to be applauded through all his Court, proteſting that none but he was worthy the title of a Biſhop, and that he had done at the table of an Emperour, what the other Biſhops would never have acted in the houſe of a mean Judge. On the other ſide, the wife of Maximus, who already poſſeſſed the title of Empreſs, made her ſelf a Magdalen at the feet of Saint Martin; and although never woman touched this chaſte creature, he ſuffered her to exerciſe all ſort of ceremonies towards him, undergoing a thouſand troubles to rid himſelf of her importunities. This ſeemed not ſtrange in the age of threeſcore and ten, and in the reputation of ſanctity wherewith he had filled the world, that a woman ſhould kiſs his feet: but it was a thing very unuſual to behold a Princeſs, humbled in the duſt of the earth, to perform this office: She regarded neither purple, diadem, quality, nor Empire, ſhe had no eyes but for S. Martin, being blind to the reſt of the world.

After this firſt banquet, Maximus and the Ladie went to the Saint, and beſought him again to take a bad dinner, which the Empreſs would in private prepare for him with her own hands: and although he in the beginning refuſed, it was impoſſible for him to eſcape from theſe Saint-like invitations. For theſe are ſnares which catch eagles as well as ſparrows. Needs would the Queen do all offices in this ſecond feaſt: She played the cook, dreſſed the dining-room, laid the cloth, gave to the holy man water for his hands, was his cup-bearer, and waited on him all the time of his meal, ſtanding bolt upright as a ſervant, with her mind intentive on her office. Dinner being ended, ſhe did eat the ſcraps and remainder of the table, which ſhe preferred before all the Imperial delicacies. Verily, we may ſay women are violent in their affections, and, when once they go the right way, their virtues have no mean. I will not ſeek to penetrate the Ladies intentions, which I ſuppoſe were very good; but conſidering the proceedings of Maximus, there is great cauſe to think he endeavoured by his infinite courtſhip, to charm the nature of Saint Martin, which to him ſeemed ſomewhat harſh. Yet the great man, endowed with the ſpirit of propheſie, freely told all which ſhould befal him.

Behold ſome part of the diſpoſition of Maximus, which I was willing to preſent on paper, that it might appear of what condition they ordinarily are, who bear arms againſt the obedience due to Kings, who are the lively images of God. The Tyrant began a revolt in England, and from that time determined to eſtabliſh the Citie of Trier in Germanie, as the ſeat of his Empire, and thence to raiſe a pair of wings to flie above the clouds, which were Italie and Spain. He choſe for his Conſtable, a man very conſonant to his humour, and of great reſolution, who cauſed himſelf to be called the Good man, the better to colour the wickedneſs of his Maſter. With this bad Councellour he endeavoured to ſtir up the ſouldiers, and on every ſide drew the warlick troups to his party. The good Emperour Gratian ſpeedily armeth, to ſtiffle tyranny in the birth thereof, and in perſon goeth to encounter his adverſary. He had then very freſhly drawn good ſouldiers from the Kingdom of Hungarie to his aſſiſtance, of whom he made much account. Others ſeeing that he much eſteemed of them, were ſtung with jealouſie, and grew cold in their Maſters behalf. The poor Prince being on the point to wage battel, found himhimſelf careleſly and traiterouſly abandoned by his legions, who daily ſtole away to increaſe the Army and ſtrength of Maximus.

This black and hydeous treaſon much amazed the Emperour, who complained, as the Eagle in the Emblem, that his own feathers gave him the ſtroke of death, ſeeing his ſouldiers, who ſhould have born him on their wings, delivered him to his enemy, through a neglect, which ſhall make the Roman hiſtory to bluſh eternally. So that ſeeing there was no ſafety for his perſon, he ſought to regain Italie as ſoon as poſſible, accompanied onely with a full troup of horſe, conſiſting of about three hundred men.

Maximus well diſcovered, that he would at any price whatſoever have the bloudy ſpoil of his Maſter: For he charged this Good man to purſue him with all violence, and not to deſiſt till the prey were in his clutches; which he did, taking horſes with him, who ran like a tempeſt, and could well endure any tedious travel. In the end, he met with the Emperour at Lyons, and fearing he might eſcape, bethought himſelf of a miſchievous ſtratagem. For he ſecretly cauſed the Emperour to be enformed, the Empreſs his wife was in danger of her perſon, if he ſtayed not ſome while to expect her, becauſe ſhe was reſolved to follow him, thinking no place capable of ſafety or conſolation where her husband was not.

This falſe report much ſoftened the heart of Gratian, who was as good a husband as an Emperour; he therefore reſolved to haſten to the Empreſs, though not without evident danger of his life. There is an unſpeakable power in the love of neighbours, which is the cauſe that birds and fiſhes are oft-times voluntarily caught with twigs and nets: not fearing to put their life in danger, where they ſee ſome part of themſelves to be. This Prince, who in the extreameſt diſaſters of his fortune, was full of courage, and flew every where like a flaſh of lightening, to give order to his affairs, at the news that the Empreſs was on her way to follow him, was much terrified; nor was there an object of peril which he framed not in his thoughts: Moments ſeemed days unto him, and days as Ages. A thouſand fantaſies of affrightment ſummoned his heart in his ſolitude. There was no living for him, if he beheld not his deareſt love in his arms. She was a Princeſs of much merit, daughter of the Emperour Conſtantius, born after the death of her father; whom Gratian faithfully loved, though he as yet had no iſſue by her.

Pitifull death of the Empe rour Gratian.

Socrat. lib. 5. cap. 11. Zozom. lib. 7. cap. 13.

The Tyrant underſtanding his game ſucceeded to his wiſh, made a litter to paſs along much like to that of the Empreſs, and diſpoſed his ambuſhes round about in the way. The Emperour perceiving it afar off, and ſuppoſing his wife Conſtantia was in it, ſpurs his horſe, and flyeth with thoſe wings which love and joy gave him, being at that time followed by few of his people. The murderers aſſailed and maſſacred him, but he ſtill ſhewing the courage of a Lion, bare himſelf bravely amongſt ſwords and halbards, leaving the mark of his hand all bloudy on a wall, as S. Hierom hath obſerved, and ever having on his lips the name of S. Ambroſe. His body, after the ſoul departed, was taken up to be preſented to Maximus, as the monument of a faithfull aſſaſſinate.

Cruentæ manus veſtigia, parietes tui Lugdune teſtantur. Hieron. ep. 3.

O God! who ſhall here be able to cleave a cloud, to read through ſo much darkneſs, and ſo many ſhadows, the ſecrets of your Providence? This poor Abel butchered by the hand of a Cain, with a cruelty ſo barbarous, a manner ſo perfidious, and a ſucceſs ſo deplorable! A Prince, who ſheltered the whole world under the valour of his arms, forſaken by the moſt truſty ſervants of his houſe! An Emperour moſt Religious, ſeparated by death from the aſſiſtances of Altars! A Monarch moſt juſt, given as a prey to injuſtice! One of the beſt Maſters of the earth ſlain by ſervile hands, and uſed like a beaſt among the halbards, and courtelaxes of his own ſervitours! So many rare qualities as were in him, leave nothing elſe to mortals, but the ſorrow to have loſt him.

A man, who deſerved to have lived Ages, torn from his Throne and life in his 28 year, after a reign ſo advantagious to the Church, and wiſhfull to all the world! O Providence! Muſt he paſs away, as the foam glideth on the face of the water? Muſt he be hayl-ſtrucken, as the Crown Imperial, the honour of a garden, in the height of his beauty? Muſt he wither, as lightening cauſeth pearls in their growth, leaving them in ſtead of a ſubſtance, nought elſe but a ſhell? O God! What bloud of Abels muſt be ſhed in all Ages, to teach us a leſſon, which telleth, the reward of our children conſiſteth not in the favour and proſperities of the world, but that ſeeing in ſuch innocency they are ſo roughly handled, your juſtice hath infallibly diſpoſed them for another life, where they live covered with the purple and glory of your Son, whoſe ſufferings they have imitated.

The poor Conſtantia, wife of Gratian, hearing this lamentable news, was ſeized with overwhelming ſorrow, and as ſoon as ſhe came to herſelf again, Ah Gratian (ſaith ſhe) my Lord, and dear husband, I have then found an evil worſe than your death, which is, to have been the cauſe of the ſame. Muſt my name be ſo much abuſed? Muſt the love of a creature ſo caytive as I am, engage into danger a life ſo important as yours?

I began my unhappineſs from the day of my birth, being born after the death of my father Conſtantius, nature not permitting me to ſee him, who gave me life. That little age I have, hath not ceaſed to be turmoiled with many uncertainties, which enforce me to reap thorns in the fortune of Cæſars, where the world imagineth roſes. Yea, I avow (my moſt honoured Lord) that this accident hath outgone all my apprehenſions. For although I figured you mortal as a man, I could not ſuppoſe that he in whom all my charities and hopes ſurvived, ſhould be taken from me ſo ſuddenly, in a fortune ſo eminent, in an age ſo flouriſhing, with a death ſo unworthie of his goodneſs, not leaving me at the leaſt a ſon in my entrails to be born of me, as his mother; and which is worſe, that I inſtantly muſt (Oh my deareſt Gratian, the ſweeteſt amongſt all men living) redeem your bloudie bodie with the price of gold, from the hands of a wretched ſlave. My God, I confeſs I have no ſtrength to bear theſe calamities ſo violent, if you afford it not.

Ambroſ. in Pſal. 61. Meminit Gratiani, moriſſe magis eſſi peccati fuga, quàm morientis detrimentum.

The news of this death, which flew like a fatal bird through all the world, transfixed the hearts of all good men. The little Valentinian reſented it beyond his age, ſeeing himſelf deprived of a brother, whom he ſo faithfully had loved. S. Ambroſe, though moſt couragious, felt himſelf as it were ſurprized with ſorrow and ſadneſs, not being able to unloſe his tongue to pronounce any funeral Oration. All the Court was infinitely affrighted, as if Maximus had already been at the gates of Milan to finiſh the cataſtrophe of the Tragedy. Juſtina the Empreſs, mother of young Valentinian, taking the care of affairs for her ſon in minority, inſtantly made her addreſs to S. Ambroſe, and beſought him to undertake an Embaſſage, and preſent himſelf before Maximus, ſo to divert the ſtream of his arms, which came to pour themſelves on Italie, and to demand the body of his pupil; humbly praying, not to neglect him dead, whom he alive had ſo faithfully ſerved.

The thirteenth SECTION.

The Embaſſage of S. Ambroſe.

OUr great Prelate couragiouſly undertook the buſineſs, fortifying his heart with aſſiſtances of Heaven,

Heaven, to treat with the murderer of his ſon, for one may well ſay, the love he bare to the dead, equalled that of fathers towards their children.

The acts of his firſt Embaſſage are loſt, although the effect hath been ſufficiently publiſhed. Which was the diverſion of the arms of Maximus, ſo much feared by the Empreſs Juſtina. But as for the Emperours body, it was impoſſible to gain it from him: for Maximus ſaid, he with-held it upon a point of State, well knowing this ſpectacle would have no other effect, but to exaſperate the memory of what was paſt, and that the ſouldiers through fury might revenge the dead body, much aſhamed they had betrayed their living Emperour.

This wicked man inſatiable in his deſires, and perfidious in his promiſes, ſoon repented to have ſigned the peace, complaining that Ambroſe had with his fair words caſt him into a ſleep; he was full of impetuous paſſions, and inceſſantly threatned to paſs into Italie, nor ſhould any thing hereafter hinder his intentions, which made S. Ambroſe enterprize a ſecond Embaſſage, at the ſollicitation of the Empreſs Juſtina, of whom we have a moſt faithfull narration from the pen of the Saint himſelf, in an Epiſtle which he wrote to the Emperour Valentinian, to yield him an account of his Commiſſion. There he relateth, how being arrived in the Citie of Trier, where Maximus had placed his Throne, that he the next morning went to the Palace to ſpeak to him in private. The treacherous man, who with ſo many Legions could not endure the counterbuff of truth, delivered by a Biſhop, thinking to ſilence him, ſent one of the gentlemen of his chamber, to demand if he had any letters from Valentinian to deliver him, if ſo, he ſhould receive anſwer, but that he might not ſpeak to the Emperour himſelf, but in full Councel. S. Ambroſe replieth, that was not the audience, which is uſually given to perſons of his quality; that he had moſt important affairs to handle, which might better be privately expreſſed in his cabinet, than at the Councel-table. He prayed the gentleman of his chamber, to let him know this his requeſt, which indeed was moſt civil. He did ſo, but brought back no other anſwer, but that he ſhould be heard in Councel. The good Biſhop ſaid, that was ſomewhat too far from his profeſſion; but he notwithſtanding, would omit nothing of his duty, preferring the memory of the dead, and the affairs of his living Prince, before all the intereſts of his own perſon.

Majeſtie of S. Ambroſe.

He came then to the Councel-table, where Maximus ſate on his Throne, who ſeeing S. Ambroſe, roſe up to give him the kiſs, according to the cuſtom of that Age: but the Biſhop taking place among the Counſellours, who very honourably invited him to ſit uppermoſt, freely ſaid to Maximus: I wonder how you offer the kiſs of peace to a man of whom you are ignorant, for were I well known in the rank I hold, you ſhould not ſee me here. Maximus amazed at this liberty, could not ſay ought elſe, but, Biſhop you are in choller. S. Ambroſe replieth: I have more ſhame than anger in me, to ſee my ſelf in a place where I ſhould not be. Notwithſtanding (ſaith Maximus) you might have learnt the way, having been here once already. It is a double fault in you (replieth the Prelate) to have ſummoned me twice. Thereupon Maximus: Why came you hither? To demand peace of you (anſwereth S. Ambroſe) which I have required as of an inferiour, and you now enforce me to ſeek it as from an equal.

The proud man who thought himſelf leſſened, if compared to the Emperour Valentinian, was moved at theſe words, and cried out: How equal? By whoſe favour? By the favour of God (anſwereth S. Ambroſe) who hath preſerved that Empire in Valentinian, which he gave him. Maximus at this word entered into violence. It is you (ſaith he) that have deceived me, and your goodly Count Bauton, who under pretext to preſerve the Empire for a child, made other accommodations for himſelf, and for this effect is joyned with Barbarians, to invite them to paſs into the Empire. And who hath more credit than I, to cauſe them to march under my Standards when I liſt? I have thouſands under my pay, by whom I can be ſerved before all the men in the World, and had you not ſtopped the courſe of mine arms with your goodly Embaſſage, no man living had been able to oppoſe me. He ſpake this with quick flaſhes of choller.

The holy Biſhop coldly anſwered: It is diſhonourable in you to reproch my Embaſſage, and put your ſelf upon theſe extravagancies. For to whom appertaineth it to defend Widows and orphans, if not to a Biſhop? That is it, which the law of my Maſter commandeth me. Judge in favour of the orphan, and defend the widow, and deliver the weak from oppreſſion. Notwithſtanding, I will not give ſo much credit to my Embaſſage, as to perſwade my ſelf it hath ſtaid the courſe of your arms. What ſquadrons have I oppoſed againſt you? What walls? What rocks? Have I ſtopped up the paſſage of the Alpes with mine own bodie? By my will could I ſo have done; I ſhould account all your objections as a glorie to me. But you your ſelf ſent the Count Victor, whom I met at Mentz, to treat of peace: Wherein hath Valentinian deceived you, if he have granted the peace, which you demanded of him? In what hath the Count Bauton played falſe with you, unleſs you term it deceit to be faithfull to his Maſter? In what have I beguiled you? Was it then when you ſaid, that Valentinian need not put me to the trouble of this Embaſſage, but come himſelf in perſon, as a ſon to his father; and that I freely anſwered you, There was no likelyhood to ſee a Princeſs, widow of a great Emperour, to put her ſelf into the way with her ſon, tender of age, and feeble of body, to paſs the Alpes in the extremities of winter: and that as for the child, whom you deſired onely to ſee, the mother ſo much affected him, ſhe could in no ſort ſuffer him to be ſeparated from her? Is not this the anſwer was given to your Embaſſadour in the Citie of Milan, when I was then preſent with you? What deceit find you in this proceeding? Did I ever promiſe you the coming of the Emperour, and have I failed you in my faith? Have I diverted your troups? Have I ſtaid your Eagles? Where are thoſe Barbarians, which the Count Bauton cauſed to paſs into Italie? Verily if he who is a ſtranger ſhould have called people of his Nation to the ſuccour of his Maſter, it would be very excuſable, ſince you, who are ſo much intereſſed in the preſervation of the Roman Empire, threaten us that you have Barbarians under your pay, whom you can make to over-run us when you pleaſe.

Behold a little, the difference that is between the ſweetneſs of Valentinian, and your menaces: You are much troubled not to have fallen upon Italie with Barbarian Legions, and Valentinian hath graciouſly diverted the forreign Gauls, whom he had invited to his ſervice, whileſt you in the mean time make waſte on the Grizons, with your Barbarians: he hath bought peace for you with his own money, and you with ingratitude repay him.

Behold your brother, who is now by your ſide, and you ſhall ſee an irreproachable teſtimonie of the Emperours clemencie. He held in his Province, and hands, that which is moſt dear to you in the world. Every one thought it was reaſon to revenge the aſhes of the Emperour Gratian upon a near allie of him, who was the authour of his death, and yet Valentinian upon the news of the aſſaſſinate committed upon his moſt honourable brother, and in the greateſt fervour of his moſt juſt paſſion, hath ſo moderated himſelf, as to ſend him back with honour, whom he might with juſtice have bereft you. Compare your ſelf preſently with him, and make your ſelf Judge in your proper cauſe. He hath reſtored you your brother in perfect health: render him his at the leaſt thus dead as he is. Why do you denie him the aſhes of his brother, ſince he hath not refuſed your ſatisfactions yea to his own prejudice? He hath afforded you a man in like degree of alliance, though in quality much different. He hath granted you one alive; render him one dead to yield him the last offices. A Tartarian covered with sand a Pyrate, which be by chance found dead upon the sea shore; and you denie us to bury with our own hands the prime Monarch of the world? You take from a Queen-mother, from a widow-Empress, from an orphan-Emperour, the bones of a son, a husband, a brother, whom you have deprived of life and scepter. The bodies of reprobates are taken down from the gallouses, to put them into the arms of their mothers, what hath the bodie of Gratian done to be bereaved after death, the charitie of his Allies? Why do you forbid us tears, which very Tyrants themselves, who have torn eyes out, have never denied to the afflicted? You fear (say you) it may exasperate minds, that is to say, you fear a death, which you have caused, and which you have unworthily procured, even then, when you might and ought to save it by all ways of justice and humanitie. And tell me not he was your enemie, you were his, but he never yours. For hostilitie comes from an usurper, and defence from a lawfull Prince. You do well to justifie your self upon this attempt, but there is not a man will believe your justifications. Who sees not you hated his life, whose burial you hinder?

Paulinus addeth, that for conclusion he dealt with him as one excommunicate, and seriously adviseth him to expiate the bloud he had shed, by a sharp penance.

This liberty of our admirable Prelate amazed all the Councel: and Maximus, who never thought that a Priest in the heart of his State, in the midst of his Legions, in the presence of his Court, could have the courage to tell him, that which he would never endure to hear in his Cabinet, commanded him speedily to depart from the Court. All those who were friends of the holy man, advised him to be watchfull upon the ambushes and treason of Maximus, who found himself much galled, but he full of confidence in God, put himself on the way, and wished Valentinian to treat no otherwise with Maximus but as with a covert enemy, which did afterward appear most true. But Justina the Empress, thinking S. Ambrose had been over-violent, sent upon a third Embassage Domnin, one of her Counsellours, who, desirous to smooth the affairs with servile sweetness, thrust them upon despair of remedie.

The fourteenth SECTION.

The persecution of S. Ambrose raised by the Empress Justina.

WE may well say there is some Furie, which bewitcheth the spirits of men in these lamentable innovations of pretended Religions, since we behold effects to arise which pass into humane passions, not by an ordinary way. Scarcely could Justina the Empress freely breath air, being, as she thought, delivered from the sword of Maximus, which hung over her head, tyed to a silken threed, when forthwith she despoiled her self furiously, to persecute the authour of her liberty. O God, what a dangerous beast is the spirit of a woman, when it is unfurnished of reason, and armed with power! It is able to create as many monsters in essence, as fantasie can form in painting. Momus desired the savage bull should have eyes over his horns, and not horns over his eyes: but Justina at that time had brazen horns to goar a Prelate, having eyes neither above nor beneath, to consider whom she struck. Authority served as a Sergeant to her passion, and the sword of Monarchs was employed to satisfie the desperate humours of a woman surprized with errour, and inebriated with vengeance. Saint Ambrose like a sun darted rays on her, and she, as the Atlantes, who draw their bowe against this bright star, the heart of the world, shot back again arrows of obliquie. As women well instructed and zealous in matter of Religion, are powerfull to advance the Christian cause, so when they once have sucked in any pestilent doctrine, they are caprichious to preserve their own chymeraes. The mistresses of Salomon, after they had caused their beauties to be adored, made their idols to be worshipped: so Justina, when she had gained credit as the mother of the Emperour, and Regent in his minority, endeavoured to countenance the Arian Sect, wherein she was passionate, that the sword of division might pass through the sides of her own son into the heart of the Empire.

Herod. lib. 4. Solem orientem execrantur.

Sect of Arians

The Arians had in the Eastern parts been ill intreated under the Empire of Theodosius, and many of them were fled to Milan under the conduct of a false Bishop, a Scythian by Nation, and named Auxentius, as their head, but who for the hatred the people of Milan bore to this name of Auxentius, caused himself to be called Mercurinus.

He was a crafty and confident man, who having insinuated himself into the opinion of the Empress, failed not to procure by all possible means, the advancement of his Sect, and did among other things, very impudently demand a Church in the Citie of Milan, for the exercise of Arianism.

Justina, who in her own hands held the soul of her son Valentinian as a soft piece of wax, gave it such figure as best pleased her, and being very cunning, there was not any thing so unreasonable, which she did not ever colour with some fair pretext, to dazle the eyes of a child. She declared unto him, that the place she possessed near his person, wel deserved to have a Church in Milan, wherein she might serve God according to the Religion which she had professed from her younger days, and that it was the good of his State, peacefully to entertain every one in the Religion he should chose, since it was the proceeding of his father Valentinian, which she by experience knew had well succeeded with him.

Justina an Arian demandeth a Church in Milan.

To this she added the blandishments of a mother, which ever have much power over a young spirit: so that the Emperour perswaded by this Syren, sent to seek S. Ambrose, and declared unto him, that for the good of his State, and peace of his people, it was in agitation to accommodate his thrice-honoured mother, and those of her Sect, with a Church in Milan.

At this word S. Ambrose roared like a Lion, which made it appear he never would yield to the execution of such requests. The people of Milan, who honoured their Prelate as the lively image of the worlds Saviour, when they once perceived that Valentinian had suddenly called him, and that some ill affair was in hand, they left their houses, and came thundering from all parts to the Palace, whereat Justina was somewhat astonished, fearing there was some plot in it, and so instantly commanded the Captain of the Guard to go out and disperse the rude multitude, which he did, and presenting himself with the most resolute souldiers, he found no armed hands to resist him, but huge troups of people, which stretched out their necks and cried aloud, They would die for the defence of their faith and Pastour.

These out-cries proceeding as from men affrighted, terrified the young Emperour, and seeing the Captain of his Guards could use no other remedie, he besought S. Ambrose to shew himself to the people, to mollifie them, and promise, that for the business now treated, which was to allow a Church to the Hereticks, never had those conclusions been decreed, nor would he ever permit them. S. Ambrose appeared, and as soon as he began to open his mouth, the people were appeased, as if they had been charmed with his words; whereupon the Empress grew very very jealous, seeing with the arms of sanctity, doctrine, and eloquence, he predominated over this multitude, as the winds over the waves of the sea.

Strange conference pretended by the Empress.

A while after to lessen the great reputation of S. Ambrose, she determined to oppose her Auxentius against him in a publick reputation: and though she in her own conscience wel understood that he in knowledge was much inferiour to S. Ambrose, notwithstanding she reputed him impudent enough, and a great talker, to stupifie weak judgements. She perswaded her self, that of two things one would happen; either that S. Ambrose, refusing disputatiõ, would leave some suspition of his inability, or, accepting it, engage his authority. This powerful woman, unable to bow heaven, resolved to stir hell. She obtained a Mandat from the Emperour her son, by which it was enjoyned to S. Ambrose to be on a day nominated at the Palace, to confer in his presence upon points of Religion against Auxentius, on this condition, that Judges should be appointed for both parts, to decide their difference. The Tribune Dalmatius was the bearer of this Mandat, who wished S. Ambrose by word of mouth, that he should hasten to name the Judges, which he intended to choose for his party; and that Auxentius had already nominated his, who were all Pagans, to take away thereby the suspition might be framed against those of his Sect. He caused also certain words silently to slip from him by the subtility of Justina, by the which he advised him handsomly to escape, and go whither he thought good, if he would not accept of this challenge. S. Ambrose had a strange horrour upon this Mãdat, seeing how the cunning of a passionate woman, & the impudence of a shameless Heretick tyrannized over the feeble spirit of an infant, enforcing him to demand this hateful Conference, which seemed to be permitted for nothing, but to expose the venerable Mysteries of our Religion to the scorn of Pagans. He would by no means go to the Palace to excuse himself, fearing he might seem to transfer a cause meerly Ecclesiastical, to a Princes Court: but he made a grave answer to the Emperour, which is now extant in his Works, where among other things, the Arians condemning his refusal, and taxing him of contumacy for giving occasion of jealousie to the Emperour, upon the over-great authority of S. Ambrose, he saith:

Lib. 2. ep. 15.

Resolution of S. Ambrose.

"Sacred Majesty, He that accuseth my refusal of "contumacy, accuseth the law of your father of injuslice. He, who was a man most accomplished in arms "and great affairs, who signed his faith with the seal "of his constancy, and the wisdom of his counsels by "the happiness of his State, ever witnessed both by "his words and Edicts, that it appertained to none "but Bishops to judge of Bishops. You, who are "tender of age, little experienced, nay, a Catechumene "in faith, will judge of mysteries, which you have "not yet learned. If this seem reasonable unto you, the "laity may hereafter mount into the Chair, and have "those for their flock, whom they have had for their "Pastours, which can never be done but by perverting "the order of this Universe. God forbid I should "choose Judges of the laity, to make them either Prevaricatours of faith, or victims of the vengeance of "our enemies. It sufficeth me to leave my life therein, "which I so long have consecrated to the defence of "the Church, and not engage others in the peril. "I hold the faith of the Nicene Councel, from which "neither the sword nor death shall ever separate me. "I am ready to defend it at the Church; not in the "Court, where never had I been, but for you; and "whereof I better love not to know the customs, "than learn the cunning. As concerning this which "I hear, that your Majesty offereth me peaceably to "retire where I shall think good; God himself "knows with how much endeavour I avoided the "burden your father himself, of glorious memory, laid "on my shoulders: Now I cannot with freedom discharge my self in conscience, since the Bishops, my "associates, crie out aloud unto me, that it were one "and the same crime in my person, either to leave or "betray the Altars.

Justina, much moved with the liberty of these words, complained in her Palace, that among so many Legions there could not be a man so faithfull, as to deliver her from the importunities of a Priest, promising offices and singular favours in Court, to any that would lead him into exile.

One named Euthymius offered himself, who having purposely hired a house near to the Church, provided a Coach well furnished to carry away S. Ambrose at his coming from divine Service: but never was it possible for him to perform his promise, by reason of the great press of the people, which perpetually environed their Pastour. But much otherwise, this miserable undertaker, the year circumvolving, the same day whereon he resolved to execute his design upon the holy man, after he had shamefully been disgraced, was banished, and carried away in the same Coach he had prepared for S. Ambrose; as it is said, Perillus Authour of Phalaris his bull, was the first that hanselled it; and Hugh Ambriot, who caused the Bastille to be built, was the first that went into it in the quality of a Prisoner, there to end his days. Another named Caligonius, a Groom of the Chamber to the Emperour, threatned S. Ambrose to cut off his head with his own hands; the holy man answered: If God permit thee to execute what thou sayest, thou will act but what Eunuchs do, and I shall endure that which ordinarily the Bishop suffer. Genebrar. Chronic.

Some time after, as if Heaven had fought against the Prelates enemies, this wicked man, although an Eunuch, being accused of some impurity by a Curtezan, passed the dint of the sword, which he would have drawn against his Bishop. In the end, the Empress resolved to play out the rest of her game, and exercise the whole extent of her power. She obtained bloudy Edicts, which she her self made to satisfie her own passion: She armed her Auxentius, as the instrument of her fury: She caused it to be published aloud, that all Ecclesiasticks, who would not deliver the Church which was in question, should be held as criminals of treason. She caused Squadrons of insolent souldiers to run up and down the streets, and cast terrour into the minds of the most confident. That was the time, when the bruit of peril wherein S. Ambrose was, being spred through the Citie, universally drew all the people to the Church, each one endeavouring to make a bulwark for him of his own body, and never forsaking him either day or night. Tribunes and Captains were dispatched to him, who signified the Emperours pleasure, which consisted of three articles. The first was, he should speedily deliver the holy vessels, and all the moveables of the Church. The secõd, he should leave the place questioned in the Empresses dispose. The third, that in all haste he must go out of Milan, and that he should have free liberty to travel whither he pleased. The Bishop made answer, That those holy vessels were the inheritance of Jesus Christ, and as the Emperour had not abandoned the state of his Ancestours to Tyrants, so Ambrose would never betray the patrimony of his Master. Were gold and silver demanded which were his own proprieties, he would make no difficulty to afford them, but as for the goods of the Church, they were sacred pledges, which the Emperour had no right to require, nor he to give. Then, for the Church demanded, It was the house of God, which his Predecessours Dionysius, Eustorgius, Myrocles, and others had courageously defended & conserved, not to be profaned by Arians, but reverenced by Catholicks. Moreover, for that which concerned his banishment, it was a thing now incompatible with his life, for he more feared God, who had given him this charge, tha the Emperor, who would take it away; and that if Valentinian were ready to do that which an exorbitant power permitted, Ambroſe was bent on his part to ſuffer whatſoever a good Paſtour ought to endure for his flock, yea, ſhould his body be torn piece-meal under the rack of perſecution, yet his ſpirit ſhould remain faſt fixed to the Altar.

The hiſtory of the vine of Naboth was then read in the Church, and one part of it, where there paſſed in figure, was here expreſſed in verity. The denial of Saint Ambroſe being reported in the Palace, the ſouldiers had commandement to invade the Church on every ſide, like a Town beſieged. Never was a ſpectacle beheld more intermingled with terrour and piety. The Church of Milan was then as a Tabernacle of the Lord of hoſts, which marched between the battalions under the conduct of the burning Pillar. There was nothing without, but ſouldiers, lances, pikes, and ſwords; within, but prayers, ſermons, hymns and canzonets. One while this admirable Prelate offered Sacrifice at the Altar, with great effuſion of tears; then he mounted into the Chair, to encourage and conſolate the people; preſently he introduced the ſymphony of Pſalms; anon he gave anſwers to the Emperours Deputies. He travelled indefatigably, and appeared as another Judas Machabeus, ſometimes in the head, ſometimes in the rere, and ſometimes in the midſt of the Army. He was in his Church like the Patriarch Noe in his Ark, confident in perils, peaceable in tempeſts, immoveable in all violences conſpired to his ruin. The people by his example in the tumult of the whole Citie, and deluge of roaring waters, were in this Tabernacle of peace, as if they had enjoyed the antipaſts of Heaven. All were divided by companies to pray and watch, as in Heaven the Quires of Angels.

Strange ſpectacle.

The good mother of S. Auguſtine was then by chance in Milan very far engaged in the buſineſs, for ſhe was a Mary, ſiſter of Moſes, who ſerved as an example to all other women. At that time it was, when God more and more to comfort his faithfull creatures, diſcovered to S. Ambroſe the ſacred bodies of S. Gervaſius and Protaſius, who heretofore had been martyred for the faith. When the holy Reliques were ſeen to be drawn out of vaults ſtill bloudy, every one was enflamed with an incredible zeal for defence of Religion, much like the Elephants in the book of Machabees, who were ſtirred up at the ſight of the juice of grapes. There was nothing but lights, muſical conſorts, exultations, and triumphs.

The miſerable Empreſs, who cauſed all things that paſſed, to be hourly related unto her, was now come to the condition of rage. Nothing was heard in the Citie but prohibitions, menaces, penalties, chains and impriſonments. In the end, the Provoſt was ſent to Saint Ambroſe, to perſwade him, that he at the leaſt would allow a Church in the ſuburbs, to ſatisfie Juſtina, and appeaſe the ſedition. The people prevented his anſwer, and cried out aloud, that could not be done. S. Ambroſe ſtretched out his hands, and ſhewed his neck, ſignifying he was ready to receive fetters and ſwords, yea, to be ſacrificed on the Altar, rather than deliver up the Altar. They went to take the Church in the ſuburbs by force: the people ran thither to ſtand upon the defence thereof. The Emperial Enſigns thereon already fixed, in ſign of poſſeſſion, were abuſed even by little children.

It is a ſtrange thing that Heaven, earth, and all the elements, men and women, great and ſmall, noble and ignoble, ranged themſelves on Saint Ambroſe ſide. Yea, the ſouldiers themſelves who were ſent to take poſſeſſion of the Church where the holy man was, entered therein, which at the beginning gave occaſion of much terrour to the moſt timorous: but they lifting up their peaceable hands, cried out aloud, They were come to pray with the Catholicks, and not exerciſe violence on any man; letting alſo the Emperour know, that the Church belonged to him, as to a Catholick Emperour, there he ſhould pray, there receive favours from above, there be in the Communion of true Chriſtians. If it appertained to Hereticks, it would no longer be a place where the Emperour ſhould feed on the Lamb, which is never eaten but in the true Church. His wicked mother ceaſed not to bewitch his mind, and breath in his ears, that Ambroſe aimed at his State: for which cauſe a Commiſſary was diſpatched to the Biſhop, who roundly told him, he onely deſired to know one thing of him: Whether he would uſurp the Empire, to the end he might hereafter be treated withal as with a Tyrant?

S. Ambroſe made anſwer, That his tyranny was infirmity, and his arms prayers and tears, which made him powerfull before God. That heretofore Prieſts had given Kingdoms, but not uſurped them. That there were ſome Emperours, who had deſired Prieſthood, but that Biſhops never had aſpired to Crowns. That Prieſts had often felt the ſword of Tyrants, but Tyrants themſelves had not at any time ſeen the ſword of Prieſts un-ſheathed againſt them. Let Maximus be asked, whether he were a Tyrant, for he was very well able to make relation of ſtrange things. His tyranny was to ſerve the Emperour at the Altar, and to be ſacrificed, if God ſuffer, in ſerving him.

It well appeared this was to run his head againſt a rock, to think of ſuch an affair. The Emperour fearing to engage his authority any further, by the adviſe of ſome good Councellers, gently ſtruck ſayl, leaving all matters whole and entire. S. Ambroſe, who then in the Church explicated the hiſtory of Jonas, much wondered, how the tempeſt being ceaſed, he in an inſtant came out of the whales belly.

The fifteenth SECTION.

Maximus paſſeth into Italie.

YOu need but to caſt a little earth abroad to ſcatter an army of Ants, to break their Oeconomy and ſport, making them rather to think upon flight than the pleaſure of their pillage: ſo whileſt Juſtina with the Arians was ſtill employed in riots, and practiſes how to be revenged on S. Ambroſe, making uſe of the innocent ſpirit of her ſon, and authority of the Empire to ſatisfie her revenge, God raiſed an accident which made her think of other matters.

Domnin her goodly Embaſſadour, who departed from Maximus loaden with preſents and fair words, little thinking thereof, was preſently waited on by an army of the Tyrant, who had in him as much fervour as fire, and more infidelity than ice. So ſuddenly fell he upon Italie, that it was a great chance he had not taken the mother and her young-ones upon the neſt. All which the Empreſs Juſtina could do, was ſpeedily to ſave her ſelf with her ſons and daughters, to ſet ſayl on the ſea, and paſs to Theſſalonica, a Citie of Greece, much renowned, were it but in S. Pauls Epiſtles.

Maximus finding no reſiſtance, flowed like a torrent over the fair fields of Italie, and made furious havock; though to take away the blemiſh of the bloud of the Emperour Gratian, and to gain the reputation of a good Prince, he ſhewed in the end ſome moderation.

It is verily a miracle of God, that he having been treated with by S. Ambroſe with ſo much liberty, as we have ſaid before & holding ſtill the bloudy ſword in the ruins of Italie, in a time when he might have done any thing which his paſſion dictated, he ſo bridled himſelf, that he not onely abſtained from wronging the holy Prelate, but for his ſake uſed the whole Territo-

Territory of Milan with the more humanity. It ſeemed the Citie of Milan under the influences of its Paſtour, had the virtue of thoſe ſacred forreſts, which tamed wolves: It tied up the throat of a ravenous wolf, and made him court his prey. Yet though ſhe were without peril, ſhe was not void of fear, ſeeing ſo many armed troups round about her, and ſmelling the ſmoak of thoſe fires which waſted her neighbours. Then was the time, when the admirable Biſhop acted things likewiſe worthy of his perſon. For, all the Citizens wavering, and almoſt ready to leave the Citie deſolate, to ſave their lives, he by his eloquence and authority held them back ſo well, that he ſeemed to have enchained them. This ſcourge (ſaith he) proceedeth from our diſorders: let us ceaſe to ſin, and God will give over to afflict us. It is a folly to flie from your countrey. If you deſire to be ſafe, flie from your ſins. The arms of Maximus will have no power over bulwarks of ſanctity. Beſides, as it is ſaid, he is bad, who is good for none but himſelf, the charitable Prelate, not content to conſolate and confirm his own, but ſeeing that all Italie was filled with extream miſeries, not onely ſpent all the means which he had to comfort them, but employed therein the very gold and ſilver veſſels of the Church, for which cauſe the Arians ſought occaſion to calumniate him, diſpoſing themſelves to condemn virtues, ſince they could find no vice to lay hold on.

Ambroſ. ſerm. 99. Prudence and Charity of S. Ambroſe.

The holy man anſwered that which he afterward couched in his offices. It is the effect of a moſt ardent charity to compaſſionate the miſeries of our neighbours, and to aid them according to our power, yea, above our power. I rather chooſe herein to be accuſed of prodigality, than inhumanity: there is no fault more pardonable, than that of bounty. It is a ſtrange thing to find men ſo cruel, as to be troubled, when they ſee a man redeemed from death, an honeſt woman delivered from the violence of Barbarians, which is worſe than death, or poor forſaken infants, drawn from the contagion of Idols, which they are forced to adore with menaces of death. Let our enemies murmure as long as they pleaſe, but I more affect to keep ſouls for God, than to treaſure up gold.

Offic. lib. 1. cap. 18.

Enterview of Theodoſius & Juſtina.

Whileſt all this paſſed in Italie, Theodoſius came to viſit Juſtina and her children at Theſſalonica, who failed not to preſent all their complaints, and ſolicite him to undertake the war againſt Maximus. But he therein at firſt ſhewed himſelf very cold; inſomuch that (not to diſguiſe the truth partly touched in Zoſimus) although Theodoſius was a very great Captain, as one who arrived to the Empire by his own merit, notwithſtanding ſeeing his fortune now at the height, he was pleaſed to taſt the repoſe and delights of the Court, under the ſhadow of his own palms, and not conteſt again with any man, fearing the hazard of wars, and the ſlippery foot of felicitie. Moreover Maximus, who defied the force of all the world, played the fawning dog before him, and ſent expreſs Embaſſadours to draw him to ſome agreement. This ſo wrought, that when the offended Empreſs ſounded an alarm, Theodoſius endeavoured to pacifie her with fair promiſes and good hopes, ſaying, Nothing muſt be precipitated; that Maximus would become dutifull; that it was better to give him ſome bone to gnaw on peaceably, than enkindle a war which would never be extinguiſhed, but with rivers of humane bloud. But the Ladie infinitely vexed, purſued this affair with all extremity, and was much diſpleaſed to ſee, that he who held all his advancement from her husband, her ſelf, and her children, ſhewed ſome remiſneſs in ſo urgent a neceſſity. She bethought her ſelf of an excellent ſtratagem, which was, to enflame the war with the fire of love. The Emperour Theodoſius had loſt his wife Placilla, and was much enclined to a ſecond marriage.

Juſtina, who heretofore had enjoyed the ſhort tyranny of beauty, making two Emperours Maxentius and Valentinian the Elder, tributary thereunto, was no longer in ſeaſon to afford that which might very eaſily win Theodoſius: but ſhe had a daughter, named Galla, then in the flower of her age, and a perfect image of the mother; ſhe determined to pierce this man by the arrow of the eye of this Princeſs, which was moſt eaſily done, for ſhe took her along with her to diſſolve this heart of ice; and caſting her ſelf at his feet, humbly beſought him by the ſervice he heretofore had vowed to the houſe of great Valentinian, by the ruin of her orphans, and by the bloud of poor deceaſed Gratian, whom he had aſſociated in Empire, to take the matter in hand. In the ſame proportion as ſhe uttered thoſe words with great fervour, the daughter compoſed her ſelf to weep with a good grace, and even as tears in ſuch perſons have a ſtrong ſpur in them, Theodoſius beholding her, felt the wound of Turnus, when he beheld Lavinia in the like caſe. He quickly took the Empreſs and her daughter up, promiſing all aſſiſtance, and from that time plainly diſcovering that he was powerfully touched. He alſo failed not in few days to require Galla in marriage, which the mother promiſed him, as ſoon as ſhe had irrevocably engaged him in the war ſhe pretended. The marriage was haſtily enough ſolemnized, and from the feſtival hall they paſſed into the field of Mars. Maximus, who ſaw Theodoſius entertained his Embaſſadours with words, not giving them any abſolute anſwer, much doubted the affair, and bent his whole force upon defence. He did all which humane prudence may, that hath not the eyes of God. He ſet his Good man, the furtherer of all his treacheries, to ſea, commanding him to guard the Archi-pelagus with a great fleet. On the other part, he gave commiſſion to his brother Marcellinus to keep paſſage of the Alps with a ſtrong Army. He himſelf with the moſt reſolved troups deſcended into Sclavonia, to prevent his enemy.

Theodoſius advertiſed of all this, after he had moſt particularly invoked the aſſiſtance of the God of hoſts, he put himſelf on the way to caſt the lot of the worlds Empire. Never was there a more proſperous war. It ſeemed the Angels of Heaven led the Emperour by the hand; and that the bloud of Gratian ſo traiterouſly ſhed, raiſed Furies in the Camp of Maximus. The encounter of the two Armies was at Siſſia, where thoſe of the contrary party accounted themſelves ſtrong, having the river for bulwark, which ſeparated them from approches, terrible to their treachery. But the brave ſouldiers of Theodoſius, nothing amazed, although already much wearied, and all duſty with the long journey they had taken, laying hold of occaſion by the forelock, ſpeedily paſſed the river, and furiouſly charged the enemy.

These wicked men were ſo aſtoniſhed to ſee themſelves ſurprized by ſuch an action of courage, that ſo ſoon as they had taken a view of them, they turned their backs. Maximus, hardy for a black miſchief, and remiſs in a field of battel, ſhamefully abandoned his Army; inſtantly the earth was covered with bodies, the river filled with bloud, and good ſucceſs reſerved a part to the clemency of the victour. Theodoſius purſued his fortune, and grapling with Marcellinus, who was no abler man than his brother, defeated him, returning now very freſh from the victory he bare away in the firſt battel. And as at the ſame time he had notice that Maximus was retired into Aquileia, he, who deſired to cut away the root of war, went thither with his army to beſiege it. The juſtice of God fought powerfully againſt this Cain, and the time was come, in which with his bloud he muſt waſh the ſpots of his crime. God, who in puniſhments holdeth ſome conformity with the ſin, would that as this miſerable creature had ſtirred the military men againſt his Prince, he ſhould be betrayed by the ſame ſouldiers, in whom he had all his hopes repoſed. It is a ſtrange thing, that theſe people abhorring the wickedneſs of this man, took, ſeized, and ſhamefully deſpoiled him of the very habiliments and marks of Emperour, which he had arrogated to himſelf; then tying and binding him like a Galley-ſlave, they preſented him to Theodoſius.

It was the greateſt extremity of unhappineſs, which might befal him, to ſay, that in ſtead of meaſuring with his dead body the place he ſhould have defended, living with his ſword in hand, he was uſed as a King diſarrayed, to let him be ſeen by all the world as a ſpectacle of infamy.

Theodoſius beholding him ſo humbled, had ſome pitie of him, and reproching him with his treachery, demanded who cauſed him to enterprize this tragedy? He being a coward and a flatterer, anſwered in ſo humble terms, that he diſcovered to have had this belief, that his deſign no whit diſpleaſed his Majeſty; in other things excuſing himſelf with great ſubmiſſion, and making it appear, he was a true lover of life. He never had ſo good an opinion of his wickedneſs, as to hope for an ordinary death, yet ſeeing the Emperour changed colour, and ſpake to him in a ſweeter tone, he was in ſome hope to obtain life, when the enraged ſouldiers haled him, and tore him in pieces, or, as others have written, delivered him to the hangman, who cut off his head.

His death. Inter innumeros manus fertur ad mortem. Pacatus.

At the ſame time Theodoſius diſpatched Count Arbogaſtus to ſeize on his ſon, who was a young child, as yet bred under the wing of his mother, whom Maximus cauſed to be called the Victorius, and had already declared him Cæſar, when ſuddenly he was taken and maſſacred, to accompany his father.

The Good man, his Admiral, underſtanding the general diſcomfiture of affairs, voluntarily drowned himſelf, preventing the hand of a hangman which would not have failed him, but all the water in the ſea was not ſufficient to waſh away the ſtain of his Maſters bloud from his ſoul, ſince the eternal flames never can free it.

Behold the iſſue of Maximus, after the rapine of four or five years. Behold to what the deſigns of the wicked tend, who under pretext of Religion, ſeek the advancement of their temporal affairs. Behold to what hypocriſies and goodly humane policies, which make uſe of God as a maſk for their wickedneſs, are finally reduced. Behold a ſtroke of thunder, which hath left nothing on earth behind it, but noiſe and ſtench. O beſtial and bewitched men, who having ſo good leſſons of the juſtice of God, written with the bloud and ſweat of ſo many miſerable Sacrifices, purſue ſtill the ranks, to be companions of the like misfortune.

S. Ambroſe is much glorified for treating with this man, who deceived ſo many others, as with one excommunicate, unwilling to be ſo much as ſaluted by him, who vowed ſo many ſervices at his feet; and freely fore-telling the miſery ſhould befall him, if he appeaſed not the celeſtial vengeance with a ſincere repentance.

The ſeventeenth SECTION.

The affliction of S. Ambroſe upon the death of Valentinian.

WHoſoever hath ſaid that Scepters are made of glaſs, Crowns of perfumed thorns, and the ways of great men are all of ice, bordered with precipices, hath ſaid no leſs than truth. It is verily a thing moſt ſtrange that the golden ſeelings of Palaces tremble over crowned heads, and that in the heat of feaſts, the hand of Heaven viſibly on the walls figureth the ſentence of their death. In the mean time we deſperately love the vanities of the world: nothing is thought on, but to ſet our foot on mens throats, that we may the more eminently be ſeen, to draw the bloud of this univerſe out of its veins, to cement up the ruins, and tie our ſelves to a miſerable world, which daily falleth apieces even in our own hands. The poor Valentinian was reſtored to the Throne by Theodoſius, after the death of Maximus, and had onely paſt three or four years in peacefull tranquilitie, diſpoſing himſelf to good according to the latitude of his own heart, and giving way to be wholly governed by the Counſels of Saint Ambroſe, whom he heretofore had perſecuted. When behold him taken away at the age of one and twenty years, by a horrible treaſon, which did as it were mingle his bloud with that of his brother Gratian.

The good Prince paſſed into France, being then at Vienna near Lions, accompanied by the Count Arbogaſtus, a French-man by Nation, who had lived till then in ſingular good reputation: for he was a man of worth, having a well-compoſed body, a quick ſpirit, a generous behaviour, and much practice in the exerciſe of arms, which had ſo dignified him, that he held the prime place in the Empire, to the which he had rendered good ſervices. He was very well beloved by the ſouldiers; for beſides his excellent parts, he bare an irreconciliable hatred to avarice, and appeared ſo little curious to enrich himſelf, that being ſo great a Captain as he was, he would be Maſter of no more than an ordinary ſouldier. This ſeemed commendable in him, but he was ſo deſperately proud and cholerick, that he would have all things carried according to his own counſels, much offended with the leaſt contradiction, and accounting himſelf ſo neceſſary, that nothing could be done without him. Arbogaſtus.

On the other ſide the young Emperour, who was jealous of his authority, ſeeing that through his preſumption he took too much upon him, he in all occaſion ſought to depreſs him, which the other ill digeſted: but he continuing in this arrogant and harſh diſpoſition, Valentinian violently moved, did reſolve to be rid of him. Behold why one day, as Arbogaſtus approched to his Throne to do him reverence, he looked awry on him, and gave him a ticket, by which he declared him a man diſgraced and deprived of his charge. He furious, as a dog who byteth the ſtone thrown at him, after he had read the ticket, tore it in pieces in the preſence of the Emperour, through extream impudency, and cried out aloud: You gave me not the charge which I hold, nor is it in your power to take it from me This he ſpake, preſuming of ſupport from the ſouldiers, whom he had ever eſteemed. From this day forward he ceaſed not to make his diſtaſts appear, and to bend his ſpirit to a miſchievous revenge.

There was by misfortune at that time in the Court one named Eugenius, who was accounted a wittie man, but cold and timorous, that heretofore had profeſſed Rhetorick, and acquired a good talent in ſpeaking. Arbogaſtus ſuppoſed his own boldneſs would make an excellent temper with the coldneſs of this man, and having along time much confided in him, he made him an overture to ſeize on the Empire, which he at firſt refuſed. But the other having promiſed him the death of Valentinian, and his ſword for defence, gave conſent to a moſt enormous aſſaſſinate.

All men were amazed, that the poor Emperour in a fatal morning was found ſtrangled by the conſpiracy of Eugenius and Arbogaſtus, aided by the Gentils, who deſired nothing but the liberty of Paganiſm.

This news brought a moſt ſenſible affliction upon Saint Ambroſe, for the Emperour was aſſured, that the the Bishop came to Vienna expresly to entreat his return into Italie, which having understood, he reckoned up the days, and expected his arrival with unspeakable impatience. But S. Ambrose, who would not by importunity thrust himself into unnecessary affairs, as he through charity was unwilling to be wanting in necessary, having understood that the Emperour was daily upon his return, deferred this voyage, which had been most requisite to hinder Arbogastus, over whom he had a great power. Valentinian advertised of this delay, wrote to him, and earnestly pressed him to come, adding, he meant to receive Baptism at his hands, for he was as yet but a Catechumen. The good Prelate having received the Emperours letters, speedily undertook the journey, using all expedition, when at his coming to the Alps, he heard the deplorable death of the poor Prince, which made him return back again, and wash (as he saith) his own steps in his proper tears, most bitterly every moment bemoaning the death of his dearest pupil.

Manners of Valentinian. Ambrosius de obitu Valent.

The Providence of God was very manifest in his death, for Valentinian was drawn from Empires of the world in a time, when he seemed now fully ripe for Heaven. It is an admirable thing how the direction of S. Ambrose, whom in his latter days he onely affected, had metamorphosed him into another man. In the beginning, he was thought to be over-much delighted in tourneys and horse-races: he so took away this opinion of him, that he would hardly permit these sports in the great festival entertainments of the Empire. The Gentiles, who made observations on all his life, had nothing to reproach in him, but that he excessively delighted in the slaughter of savage beasts, whom he caused to be taken and fed for his pleasure, saying, it diverted him from cares of the Empire. He, to satisfie all the world, caused instantly all those creatures to be killed, and disposed himself to attend the affairs of his Councel, with so good judgement, and so great resolution, that he seemed a Daniel in the midst of the Assembly of Elders. These envious people having watched him so far, as to observe him at the table, objected, he anticipated the hour of his repast; yet he so addicted himself to abstinence, that he was seen in feasts rather seemingly than effectually to eat: for sometimes in entertaining others he fasted, tempering devotion and charity with a singular discretion. Finally, to give testimony of his infinite chastity, it was told him there was in Rome a female Comedian, endowed with a singular beauty, having attractives which ravished all the Nobilitie. This understood, he deputeth one expresly to bring her to the Court: but they being passionately in love with her, corrupted the messenger, so that he returned without doing any thing. The Emperour rechargeth, and commandeth that she with all expedition should be brought. It was so done, but she coming to the Court, the most chaste Emperour would not so much as onely see her, but instantly sent her back again, saying, That if he being in a condition which gave him the means to satisfie all his pleasures, and in an Age which ordinarily useth to be very slippery in matter of vice, and which is more, not married, abstained from unlawfull loves; his subjects might well do somewhat by his example. Never servant (saith S. Ambrose) was more in the power of his Master, than the body of this Prince was under command of the soul; nor ever Censor more diligently examined the actions of others, than he his own.

Though all these dispositions infinitely much comforted the holy Prelate, and namely, the desire he expressed to receive Baptism two days before his death, asking every instant if Bishop Ambrose were come, notwithstanding his heart was transfixed to see him taken away in a time, when he went about to make himself most necessary for all the world. His death was generally bemoaned by all men, and there was not any, nay, not his enemies, which for him poured not out their tears.

It is said that Galla his sister, wife of the Emperour Theodosius, at the news of his death, filled the Court with incontolable lamentations, and died in childbed, which came by excess of grief; for which Theodosius was pitifully afflicted.

The other sisters of the Prince, who were at Milan, ceased not to dissolve into tears, before the eyes of S. Ambrose, who had no word more effectual to comfort them, than the assurance that his faith and zeal had purified him, and the demand he made of Baptism had consecrated him, to the end they should no longer be in pain with the ease of his soul.

The good Bishop took a most particular care of his obsequies and burial, where he made a Funeral Oration, found yet among his Works. In the end remembering his two pupils: Go (saith he) O you most happy, gone as you are out of the desert of this world, dwell now in the everlasting delights of God, united in Heaven, as you have been on earth. If my prayers have any force before God, I will not let a day pass of my life, that I remember you not: I will not make a praier, wherein I insert not the names of my dearest Pupils Gratian and Valentinian. In the silence of the night the apple of mine eyes shall be waking and full of tears for you, and as often as I approach to Altars, my sacrifices shall mount to Heaven in the odour of sweetness. By my will (dearest children) if I could have given my life for yours, I should have found consolation for all my sorrows. Then turning himself to his sisters, those mourn full turtles, whom this good Prince had so passionately loved, that in consideration of them, he deferred his own marriage, fearing lest the love of a wife might diminish his charity towards them, the good Bishop thus spake unto them: My holy daughters, I will not bereave you of tears; this were to be over ignorant in the resentments of your hearts. I wish that you bewail your brother, but bemoan him not as lost, he shall live more than ever in your eyes, in your breasts, in your hearts, in your embracements, in your kisses, in your memorie, in your praiers; nor shall any thing draw him from your thoughts: but you ought now to consider him with a quite other visage, not as a man mortal, for whom you were ever in fear, but as an Angel in whom you dread nothing: An Angel, who will assist, comfort, and hold you day and night in his protection.

S. Ambrose speaketh to the souls of his two pupils.

The seventeenth SECTION.

The tyranny of Eugenius, and notable libertie of S. Ambrose.

IN the mean while Eugenius, drawn from the school to the Throne of Monarchs, to serve as a specious game for the fortune of the times, changeth his ferula into a scepter, and makes himself an Emperour, like the ice of one night. The faithless man, who had been a Christian, shutting up his eyes then from all consideration of piety, and onely opening them to the lustre of this unexpected greatness, made himself an arm of towe, forsaking the direction of God, to support in humane policie. He put all his hope in the sword of Arbogastus, and counsel of Flavianus, a Gentleman of prime quality, and much versed in judicial Astrologie, who promised him a golden fortune, if he would leave Christian Religion, to re-advance the worship of false gods, towards which Eugenius, blinded with his presumption, discovered great inclinations.

He chose the Citie of Milan, to begin the web of his wicked purposes, where S. Ambrose did not desire him, not through fear of his arms, but for the horrour he had conceived of his ſacriledges. The falſe Emperour failed not to write to the holy Biſhop to require his friendſhip, which he would make uſe of to ſupport his authoritie: but holy Ambroſe ſhewed ſo generous a contempt of his letters, that he deigned not ſo much as to make anſwer, untill ſuch time that being informed how Eugenius under-hand favoured the Sect of Pagans, having already allowed them this Altar of Victorie, for which ſo many batels had been fought, he wrote to him a moſt couragious letter; where, not touching his election nor affairs of State, as then not well known, he reprehendeth him for his impietie, and ſaid among other things:

Epiſt. Ambroſ. ad Eugenium.

How the retreat, which I made from Milan, not attending you, to the fear of God, which ſhall perpetually be the rule of my actions. The grace of our Saviour ſhall ever be more precious with me, than that of Cæſars, nor will I at any time flatter a man to betray my conſcience. I wrong no perſon, if I render to God that which is due to him; and I profit all men, when I conceal not a truth from great-ones. I underſtand you have granted to Pagans that which conſtantly hath been denied by Catholick Emperours. God knoweth all the ſecrets of your heart. It is a very ill buſineſs if you unwilling to be beguiled by men, think to deceive God, who ſeeth all that is to be done, even to nothing. The Gentiles, who ſo much have importuned you to ſatisfie their paſſion, taught you to be urgent to make a good refuſal of that which you cannot give, but with committing ſacriledge. I am no Controller of your liberalities, but an interpreter of your faith. Give of your treaſures what ever you think good; I envie no man: but you ſhall not give any thing of the rights of God which I will not reſiſt with the utmoſt extent of my power. You make a goodly matter to preſent offerings to Jeſus Chriſt; you will find few, that make account of theſe diſſimulations, every man hereafter will regard, not what you do, but what you have a will to do. As for my part, I enter not now into conſideration of your eſtate, but if you be true Emperour, you will begin with the ſervice of the divine Majeſtie: This is it which I cannot hide from you, becauſe my life and flatterie are two things incompatible.

As for the reſt, the Emperour Theodoſius ſeeing the tyrannie of Eugenius in a readineſs, well foreſaw neceſſitie muſt needs put arms into his hands to be mannaged with pietie. Whileſt the infamous Eugenius made ſlaughter of beaſts, amuſing himſelf on the conſideration of their entrails, from thence to judge the events of war, the brave Theodoſius proſtrated himſelf before the Altars of the living God, covered with hair-cloth, imploring the aſſiſtance of Saints for his ſuccour, and all the prayers of ſouls the moſt purified, which at that time lived within Monaſteries. He departed from Conſtantinople with theſe aids, cauſing the Standard of the Croſs to march before him. Eugenius was alreadie encamped on the Alps to hinder the paſſage of his adverſarie, and had in a manner covered them with Statues of falſe Gods, as of Jupiter and Hercules, ſo beſtial was this man.

Theodoſius maketh the Court holy.

The Emperour ſeeing he needs muſt fight, commanded Gaynes, Colonel of the Goths, who led the vanguard, to break the trenches of his enemies, which he quickly did: but they being yet very freſh, and having a notable advantage of place taken by them, ſuſtained the firſt aſſault with much reſolution, and infinite loſs on the Emperours part; for it is thought that Gaynes, who was a valiant Captain in his own perſon, yet too wilfully opinionative to force this paſſage of the Alps, loſt there about ten thouſand men, which were killed like flies: ſo that needs a retreat muſt be made, very ſhamefull for Theodoſius his army.

Eugenius, whoſe head was not made for a diadem, thinking the whole buſineſs ended, after ſo great a ſlaughter of his enemies, was ſo puffed up with this ſucceſs, that he rather thought how to glorifie his victorie, than foreſee his defence. The ſage Emperour on the other ſide, ſeeing his Army grown very thin, and the courage of his ſouldiers wavering, more ſtedfaſtly made his addreſs to God. He was ſeen upon the top of a rock proſtrate on the earth, and crying aloud, My God, you know that I in the name of your Son enterprized this war, and have oppoſed the arms of the Croſs againſt Infidelitie. If in me their reſt any blame, I beſeech you to revenge my ſins on my culpable head, and not abandon the cauſe of Religion, leſt we become a reproch to Infidels.

Remarkable pietie of Theodoſius.

The ſame night God for his aſſurance ſhewed him a viſion of two Apoſtles, S. John and S. Philip, who ſhould be, as indeed they were, the Conductours of his Legions. The next morning about break of day, he ranged his forces in battel array, and charged Eugenius, not as yet througly freed from his drunken proſperitie: And when he ſaw that thoſe who had the vanguard proceeded therein ſomewhat fearfully, remembering themſelves of the uſage of their companions, he did an act of admirable confidence, for he alighted from his horſe, and marching on foot in the head of his Army cried out: Where is the God of Theodoſius? At this word the ayd of Heaven was ſo propitious, that a furious whirl-wind was raiſed, which perſecuted the enemies of Theodoſius, caſting a huge cloud of duſt into their eyes, and returning all their own darts back to their proper faces, in ſuch ſort, that as it is confeſſed by Claudian, a very obſtinate Pagan, it ſeemed the good Emperour that day had the winds and tempeſts at command, and that he had nothing to do but to give the word, to make them obedient to his Standards. Heaven fought for its beloved Theodoſius, and all the powers of the ayr were in arms to favour his victories. The ſouldiers at this inſtant were all changed, ſo much hope had they in their hearts, & fire in their courages.

Victorie of Theodoſius over Eugenius. Ambroſ. in oratione funebri Theodoſii

Bacurius, one of the Emperours greateſt Captains, with his enflamed Legions, brake through the ranks, penetrated the ſtrongeſt reſiſtances, and gained the Alps. Eugenius, his people dejected as men fallen from the clouds, could not ſufficiently admire this alteration. The diſcreeteſt among them diſpoſed themſelves to treat of peace, crying aloud, that never would they bear arms againſt a man, who had the ayr and winds in his pay.

Theodoſius fortified them with his clemencie; all diſpoſitions by a moſt remarkable miracle of God, who exerciſeth his power as well over hearts as winds, were changed in an inſtant, and that which is admirable, the moſt faithfull to Eugenius promiſed the Emperour to put him into his hands, which they performed: for they went to take this miſerable man, who ſat on his Throne entertaining his goodly imaginations, and crying, Bring him alive, (ſpeaking of Theodoſius) when they laying hold of his collar, and moſt ſhamefully binding his hands: It is you (ſaid they) we muſt bring alive to Theodoſius, and that inſtantly. They truſſed him up like a beaſt aſtoniſhed, and preſented him to the Emperour, who having reproched him in preſence of all the world for his impietie and treacherie, cauſed him preſently to be put to death, to make an end of his imaginarie Empire.

The wicked Arbogaſtus who had at other times been ſo happy, when he followed the counſels of S. Ambroſe, ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of his deſigns, became ſo enraged, that himſelf thruſt two ſwords through his own bodie, being not able to endure life nor light, which ſeemed to upbraid him with his crimes.

Some hold that Flavianus died in the throng, that he might not ſurvive his own ſhame: others think he eſcaped, and that Theodoſius extended his ordinarie clemencie to him.

Briefly behold the courſe of the tyrannie of Eugenius, ſtill more and more to verifie the Oracles of S. Ambroſe.

S. Ambroſe. The Emperour came to Milan, where he caſt himſelf at the feet of the holy Biſhop, attributing theſe victories to his wiſdom, counſels, and virtue of his prayers.

The eighteenth SECTION.

The differences of S. Ambroſe with the Emperour Theodoſius, and his death.

PHiloſophers ſay, there are four things which divert thunder, to wit, wind, rain, noiſe, and the light of the Sun. And behold a thunder-clap arreſted by Saint Ambroſe, with the wind of his mouth, the holy rain of his eloquence, the noiſe of his voice, and reſplendent light of his moſt unſported life.

Theodoſius verily was a great Prince, but as it is ſo difficult to be on earth, and not participate of earth, as that the Moon being diſtant by ſo many thouſand leagues, yet ſeemeth to bear the marks thereof on the forehead; ſo is it very hard to be in Court, and not reſent the manners of the Court, and ſouls eſteemed the moſt temperate, not to have ſome blemiſhes appear on the face. This brave Emperour was naturally enclined to choller, which was enkindled by the breath of thoſe who converſed with him, nouriſhing himſelf with the food of over-much credulity. For this cauſe he had two great conteſtations with S. Ambroſe, which eminently manifeſted the authority of the holy Biſhop.

Synagogue burned.

The one was for a Synagogue of Jews; the other for the murder committed at Theſſalonica. The matter for the Jews was, for that one of their Synagogues was burnt in the Eaſt, at the ſolicitation of a Biſhop, with which Theodoſius offended, as if it had imported much prejudice to his Edicts, cauſed a carefull Inquiſition to be made, and adjudged the good Biſhop, who was ſaid to be the Authour of this fire, to re-build the Synagogue, now turned to cinders. Saint Ambroſe, although he had a peaceable ſpirit, and that he in his Dioceſs had never undertaken the like, avoiding popular commotions as much as he might, which ever tranſport affairs into ſome exceſs, yet could he not tolerate the rigours uſed againſt Chriſtians, on this pretended injury, but he very ſharply wrote thereof to Theodoſius, as it appeareth by the letter which is yet found among his Works; ſome words whereof behold:

Ambroſ. epiſt. 17. lib. 2.

My life paſſeth away in many cares, wherein I am engaged by obligation of my charge: but I muſt avow that I never reſented any thing more lively, than to ſee my ſelf as it were accuſed of ſacrilege before your Ma-jeſtie. I beſeech you patiently to hearken to me; for if I be unworthie to be heard by you, I cannot be heard of God for you. You do wrong to commit your praiers and vows to me, to be carried to Altars: if you denie me the audience of your ears, you declare me by the ſame ſentence unworthie to bear your complaints to the ears of the living God. It is not a thing to be done by a good Emperour to take away the libertie of ſpeech, nor for a good Biſhop to conceal a veritie contrarie to his conſcience. All that which Monarchs have in them moſt amiable, is, to love libertie, even in the tongues of the ſouldiers; but by a much ſtronger reaſon, ought they to cheriſh it in the mouthes of Biſhops. There hath ever been a notable difference between good and evil Princes, which cauſeth that the one deſires the libertie of their ſubjects, and the other love nothing ſo much in them as ſlaverie. God commandeth us to bear his word to the face of Kings, and not be aſhamed of juſtice. I do not intrude through importunitie, but preſent my ſelf of dutie. That which I do, I do for your good, and in conſideration of your ſafetie. If I derive not the effect which I pretend, yet ever will I better love to be by your Majeſtie eſteemed troubleſom, than unprofitable or infamous. You have commanded enquiries ſhould be made of thoſe who have burnt the Synagogue of the Jews, to inflict puniſhment, and that the Biſhop by whoſe ſolicitation this fire hath been kindled, ſhould be condemned to re-edifie the waſted buildings. What have you done (O Emperour) in impoſing ſuch a command, which by neceſſitie will make of a Biſhop, either a Prevaricatour or a Martyr, although neither the one, nor other be proper for your time? I deſire a Biſhop may be found ſo fervent as to burn a Synagogue of the Jews; and for that cauſe you have deputed for him a Commiſſarie, to the end, that if he obey your commands, he ſhould betray his own law; and if he reſiſt, make you to do that which the Neroes and Domitians have acted. Behold to what this affair will come, if you take not heed. For my part, I propoſe to my ſelf, that the Biſhop will rather encline to matter of Martyrdom, than of treaſon: he will ſay that he hath ſtirred up the people, ſounded the alarm, taken the flaming fire-brands in hand, and that he will expoſe himſelf for his whole flock. O happie lie, which ſhall ſerve others for abſolution, and him for a Crown! But what need is there to enquire into the abſent? Behold me preſent, behold me avowing the act. I publiſh, and proteſt, if needs you will have it ſo, I my ſelf burned this Synagogue now in queſtion, that there might no longer be a place where Jeſus Chriſt ſhould be denied. And do not tell me, that I have not burned any in mine own Dioceſs; Heaven hath done it for me, Heaven hath prevented the negligence, which I then thought to be reaſonable. And if men have in it ſeconded the will of Heaven, would you ſend one of your Counts to puniſh them, and re-build the Synagogue of the Jews at our charge, that ſo the hand of a Captain, which carrieth the Standards of the Croſs, may not henceforth bear them, until he hath been defiled with a ſacriledge intended againſt the Croſs of Chriſt.

We have heretofore ſeen on the front of the Temple of Idols, how they have been built of the ſpoils of Cimbrians, but we ſhall hereafter read over the portal of Synagogues, that they were made with the bloud of Chriſtians, by the commandment of a Chriſtian Emperour. The Jews paſſionately deſire to ſee Chriſtians at the chain, and they ſhall find a Chriſtian Emperour miniſter of their furies. You will make them triumph over the Church of God, you will cauſe them to put our tears and afflictions among their days of Feſtivals, and the victories they will gain upon us, with thoſe they have had from the Amorrheans and Cananeans.

He purſued this ſubject with great vigour of ſtrong reaſons, and good words, and ſeeing the Emperour made no reckoning of this adviſe given him in particular, he failed not, according to promiſe, to ſpeak of it in publick, in a Sermon he made of the waking-rod of Jeremie; where deſcending upon the hiſtory of Nathan, who reproched David for his ſin, by conſideration of the benefits he had received from God, he made a long apoſtrophe to the Emperour Theodoſius, to him applying the word of God: I have then made thee Emperour of a private man, I have ſubjected barbarous Nations to thee, I have afforded thee iſſue to ſucceed in thy Empires, I have given thee peace, I have put thine enemies fettered into thy hands, I have opened land and ſeas to thy Legions, I have ſheltered thee under the buckler of my protection, I have confounded the counſels of thy adverſaries, to make thy enterprizes proſperous, I have rendered thee dreadfull to people, marking thee on the forehead with the rays of my Majeſtie, that thou mayeſt re-edifie the Synagogue of the Jews.

He ſpake many things in the like terms, with ſo much lightening, thunder, and tempeſt, that Theodoſius was wholly amazed, nor could ſay any thing elſe to him coming from the pulpit, but: Biſhop you have preached to me to day. Sacred Majeſtie (anſwereth S. Ambroſe) it is for your good. It is true (replieth the Emperour) I did ill to give this command. And for that (ſaith Saint Ambroſe) I will not go to the Altar to offer the pledge of our ſalvation for you, till you have revoked this Edict. I from this preſent revoke it, ſaith Theodoſius. On this aſſurance which you give (anſwereth the Biſhop) I will offer ſacrifice.

As for the other conteſtation of Saint Ambroſe with Theodoſius, which was concerning the murder of the Theſſalonians, of one part the matter is ſo notorious, that it needeth no declaration, but on the other it is ſo important, that it were a crime to let it paſs under ſilence.

The Theſſalonians in a popular commotion, ſlew one of the Emperour's Captains, who had cauſed a Coach-man to be impriſoned. The news reported at Court, incenſed all men of arms, who think, wearing ſwords, they have right over the bloud of people. Theodoſius could do no otherwiſe but ſhew himſelf offended with this death: For the Emperours then thought the ſouldiers were as neceſſary for their fortunes, as feathers for birds. As the thunder already roared in the cloud, and the thunder-ſtroke of the Imperial Eagle menaced the miſerable Citie, tainted with this murder, S. Ambroſe came thither very fitly, who much ſweetened the affairs, and wholly diſpoſed the Emperour to clemency. But as it is the wind which worketh all the miſchief on the Sea, this element being of its own nature very peaceſull, ſo they are ill officers, who often cauſe thoſe diſturbances which happen in the lives of Great men, their good natures very frequently affording them inclinations to ſweetneſs. Theſe Captains which poſſeſſed the ears of the Emperour, ceaſed not to breath and murmur ſo ſtrongly, that after the departure of S. Ambroſe, they raiſed fire and tempeſt. Theodoſius giveth freedom to the ſouldiers, for the revenge they were to exerciſe upon the Citie of Theſſalonica: They who were willing to drown all their paſſion in bloud, bethought themſelves of a wicked and barbarous invention, putting the poor people into a large publick place encloſed with rails, comonly called the Circus, where ordinarily games were preſented, divulging they had an admirable ſpectacle to ſhew, for entertainment of the Burgeſſes of the Citie. Curioſitie of its nature is ever credulous, and he that hath the image of pleaſure in his head, regardeth the bayt, not conſidering the hook. Theſe unfortunate men ran by heaps to take place in the morning very early; they were entertained in the beginning with certain ſopperies, which they beheld with much ſatisfaction, clapping their hands at every word, and crying, Vivat Rex, when behold from the rayls, where tourneaments were expected, horſ-men covered with ſteel were ſeen to iſſue out, with ſword in hand, who ſet upon this multitude encloſed as in a pit-fall, and made a lamentable ſlaughter of theſe ſilly ſheep. The bloud ſtreaming among ſo many out-cries and horrible images of death, was a hydeous ſpectacle, even to thoſe who were out of danger. As a coal enkindled, ever gaineth more and more, eating out his way, it was not known whether any reſiſtance redoubled this fury, but going out of the compaſs of the Circus, they ran all the Citie over, in ſuch ſort, that in the ſpace of three hours there were numbred about ſeven thouſand bodies ſlain in the market-place.

Maſſacre of Theſſalonica.

O you Great-ones, whom God hath ſet over the heads of men the higher, to behold the images of your own miſery, and not to cruſh and rent them in pieces; what Ocean will ſuffice to waſh your mouths when to content a vanitie of ſpirit, you let words fall, which carry along with them the maſſacre of mortals? The ſea is leſs furious, a thunder-clap leſs dreadfull, the gall of Dragons and poiſon which ſwelleth up the neck of Aſpicks, is much more tollerable, than an inconſiderate word proceeding from the mouth of a Great man, which unlooſeth the hands to violence, and ſhuts them up to juſtice. In three hours, behold a poor Citie diveſted of Citizens, and peopled with dead bodies, become a deſert Iſland encompaſſed with a river of bloud: ſo many women calling upon their huſbands, and ſo many little children crying for their fathers among the dead, who had voice no longer to anſwer.

Theodoſius never to himſelf propoſed this miſchief, but his word falling into the hands of men of war, fleſhed in revenge, could by no means be recalled.

When S. Ambroſe, being in the company of other Biſhops, heard the news of this pitifull tragedy, it drew ſobs from his heart, and tears from his eyes. The Emperour tormented in his conſcience, cauſed ſecretly the opinion of the good Biſhop to be ſounded, and inſtantly knew that he, who in matters of much lighter importance had not ſpared him, would handle him in this action according to his demerit. Whereupon he immediately by letter denounced him excommunicate, and that if he came to Milan, he could not otherwiſe entertain him, but as one excommunicate: His ſin having reduced him to that ſtate, that the very ſight of Altars would be a crime, unleſs he reſolved upon a perfect penance.

Theodoſius in this matter well diſcovered his mind was good. Some other, beholding himſelf in condition of a power to diſturb the Church, would have reſiſted the rod with moody extravagancies, and imperious menaces, or admit he would have taken more temperate ways, had ſought the means of diſpenſation from the ordinary rigours of a publick penance, for reverence due to his perſon: but this good Emperour, knowing his maladie ſtood in need of a good Phyſitian, made choice of the moſt ſevere, and never had any reſt in his ſoul till he ſaw Saint Ambroſe; much better loving to be reprehended by him, than flattered by another. He came to Milan, and taking the ready way to the Church, the holy Biſhop cauſed ſpeedily all the gates to be ſhut, and went out of the circuit of the ſacred place to encounter him, and at the firſt meeting, ſpake to him in this manner:

Brave words of S. Ambroſe to Theodoſius.

It is not credible, Oh Emperour, that you as yet know the enormitie of the murder you have committed. As choller at that time blinded you, ſo now the opinion of your greatneſs, and rays of your Diadem dazle your eyes; yet ought you not to reflect on the earth from whence you were extracted, and to which you muſt return. It is fit you think the purple which covers your bodie, cannot defend you from putrifaction and worms. The ſtate wherein you then ſhall be, ought to ſerve for a counterpoize to the elevation of that, which at this time tranſporteth you out of your ſelf. You command over men, who are of the like nature with your ſelf, who are derived from the ſame elements, who have equalled you in birth, and ſhall alſo parallel you in a tomb. God hath made you man, and Emperour, to uſe them as men and ſubjects; and they by your commandment are worſe treated than the moſt ſavage beaſts.

With what eyes pretend you to behold the Church of the living God, who is your Sovereign Maſter? Have you any other than thoſe, which are poiſoned with the gall of your anger? With what feet will you touch theſe marbles, which are not made but for the feet of the faithful? Shall it be with them, which go upon ſlaughters? What hands will you extend to Altars? Have you any other than thoſe, which yet diſtil the bloud of thoſe unfortunate victims? Dare you with thoſe hands to take the bodie of the Son of God? Dare you to lift his bloud to that mouth, which hath denounced the ſentence of this maſſacre? Retire, retire, adde not crime to crime. Take about your neck the yoke of penance, which is the onely remedie of your evils.

Theodoſius amazed at this liberty, made no other anſwer, but that David had been a great ſinner as well as he; but ſo ſoon as he opened his mouth, the Biſhop replieth: Well then, ſince you ſpeak of David, imitate him in his penance, as you have in his ſin.

Thereupon the Emperour departed, and went to his Palace, touched with an amazed grief, where he endeavoured punctually to perform the works of penance impoſed upon him by the holy Prelate. He already had paſſed about eight moneths in this eſtate, when the feaſt of Chriſtmaſs being come, he fetched many deep ſighs, and ſhed abundance of tears, bitterly deploring his condition, for which cauſe Ruffinus, who was at that time the chief favourite of Theodoſius, and after that cut in pieces under the reign of his children, perceiving it, asked him the cauſe of this unmeaſurable ſorrow. Then Theodoſius redoubling his ſobs: Ah Ruffinus, you are merry (ſaith he) and ſee not where the evil woundeth me. Have not I cauſe to bemoan my miſhap with bitter tears, ſeeing the Altars, made even for ſlaves and beggers, cannot endure me, and needs muſt I be cut off, as a rotten member, from the ſociety of men and Angels? For I am not ignorant, that what is bound on earth by the mouth of Prieſts, ſhall be bound in Heaven.

Ruffinus, who then thought himſelf as ſtrong as Heaven, ſaid, If there were nothing elſe but that which afflicted the Emperours mind, he would quickly afford a remedie. Theodoſius replieth: You know not Biſhop Ambroſe; but I know, neither thy credit nor induſtry can ought avail me. Ruffinus notwithſtanding inſiſted, proteſting he would inſtantly perſwade the Biſhop what ever he pleaſed. He failed not to find out the Biſhop, but the Saint gave him a very ſharp reprehenſion, adviſing him rather to dreſs his own wounds, than intercede for others; for he partly underſtood, that he had a hand in this fatal counſel. Ruffinus notwithſtanding, plyed it all he could, and endeavoured to charm this man with fair words, ſaying finally for concluſion, he would immediately accompany the Emperour to the Church. S. Ambroſe, who was ever very ſerious, anſwered: If he come thither as a Tyrant, I will ſtretch out my neck: but if in quality of a Chriſtian Emperour, I am reſolved to forbid him entrance. Ruffinus well ſaw the Biſhop was inflexible, and went in haſte to adviſe the Emperour, not yet on this day to hazard his approach to the Church. He found him on his way, as a man diſtracted, that had the arrow in his heart, and haſtened for remedy: and he ſaying he had dealt with the Biſhop, It is no matter (ſaith Theodoſius) let him do with me what he pleaſe, but I am reſolved to reconcile my ſelf to the Church.

Ædicula jaculatoria. S. Ambroſe advertiſed that Theodoſius came, went out, and expected him at the door of a little Cell, ſeperated from the body of the Church, where ordinarily ſalutations were made. Then perceiving him environed with his Captains, Come you, oh Emperour, (ſaith he) to force us? No (ſaith Theodoſius) I come in the quality of a moſt humble ſervant, and beſeech you, that imitating the mercy of the Maſter whom you ſerve, you would unlooſe my fetters; otherwiſe my life will fail. What penance (replieth the holy man) have you done for the expiation of ſo great a ſin? It is (anſwereth Theodoſius) for you to appoint it, and me to perform it.

Then was the time, when to correct the precipitation of the Edict made againſt the Theſſalonians, he commanded him to ſuſpend the execution of the ſentence of death for the ſpace of thirty days: after which, having brought him into the Church, the faithfull Emperour prayed, not ſtanding on his feet, nor kneeling, but proſtrated all along on the pavement, which he watered with his tears, tearing his hair, and pitifully pronouncing this verſicle of David: My ſoul is faſtened to the pavement, quicken me according to thy word.

Pſal. 118. Adhæſit pavimento anima mea, vivifica me ſecundum verbum tuum.

When the time of Oblation was come, he modeſtly lifted up himſelf, having his eyes ſtill bathed with tears, and ſo went to preſent his offering, then ſtayed within thoſe rayls, which ſeperated the Prieſts from the Laity, attending in the ſame place to hear the reſt of Maſs. Saint Ambroſe asked him, who ſet him there, and whether he wanted any thing? The Emperour anſwered, He attended the holy Communion: of which the ſage Prelate being advertiſed, he ſent one of his chief Deacons which ſerved at the Altar, to let him underſtand that the Quire was the place of Prieſts, and not of the Laicks, that he inſtantly ſhould go out, to rank himſelf in his order, adding, the Purple might well make Emperours, not Prieſts. Theodoſius obeyed, and anſwered, that what he had done was not on purpoſe, but that ſuch was the cuſtom of the Church of Conſtantinople. Yea, it is alſo remarkable, that returning afterward into the Eaſt, and hearing Maſs at Conſtantinople, on a very ſolemn feſtival day, after he had preſented his offering, he went out of the Quire, whereat the Patriarch Nectarius amazed asked him, why his Majeſty retired in that manner? He ſighing, anſwered: I in the end have learned to my coſt, the difference between an Emperour and a Biſhop? To conclude, I have found a Maſter of truth, and to tell you mine opinion, I do acknowledge amongſt Biſhops, but one Ambroſe worthy of that title.

Behold an incomparable authority, which was as the rays of his great virtue and ſanctity, from whence diſtilled all that force and vigour, which he had in treating with all men.

I imagine I hitherto have expoſed the principal actions of S. Ambroſe to the bright ſplendour of the day, and ſo to have ordered them, that all ſorts of conditions may therein find matter of inſtruction. It hath not been my intention to diſtend them by way of Annals, but hiſtorical diſcourſes, proper to perſwade virtue: So likewiſe have I not been willing to charge this paper with other particular narrations, which may be read in Paulinus, Sozomen, Ruffinus, and which have exactly been ſought out by Cardinal Baronius, ſuitable to his purpoſe. I conclude, after I have told you that Paulinus his Secretary witneſſeth, he writing by him a little before his death, ſaw a globe of fire, which encompaſſed his head and in the end entered into his mouth, making an admirable brightneſs reflect on his face, which held him ſo rapt, that whileſt this viſion continued, it was impoſſible for him to write one word of thoſe which Saint Ambroſe dictated.

Death of S. Ambroſe. As for the reſt, having attained the threeſcore and fourth year of his age, he was accounted as the Oracle of the world; for they came from the utmoſt bounds of the earth to hear his wiſdom, as unto Solomon, and after the death of Theodoſius Stilicon, who governed all, held the preſence of Saint Ambroſe ſo neceſſary that he eſteemed all the glory of the Roman Empire was tied to the life of this holy Prelate. In effect, when on the day of holy Saturday, after his receiving the Communion he had ſweetly rendered up his ſoul, as Moſes by the mouth of God; a huge deluge of evils overflowed Italie, which ſeemed not to be ſtayed but by the prayers of this Saint. Let us (I beſeech you) paſs over his death in the manner of the Scripture, which ſpeaketh but one word of the end of ſo many great perſonages; and let us never talk of death in a ſubject, wholly repleniſhed with immortality.

Oh what a life, what a death, to have born bees in his firſt birth on his lips, and at his death globes of light in his mouth! What a life, to be framed from his tender age as a Samuel for the Tabernacle, not knowing he was deſigned for the Tabernacle! What a life, to preſerve himſelf in the corruption of the world, in a moſt undefiled chaſtity, as a fountain of freſh water in midſt of the ſea! What a life, to arrive to honour and dignities in flying them, and to have enobled all his charges by the integrity grity of his manners! What a life, not to have taught any virtue before he practiſed it, and to become firſt learned in examples, before he ſhewed himſelf eloquent in words! What a life, ſo to have governed a Church, that it ſeemed a copy of Heaven, and an eternal pattern of virtues! What a life, to have born on his ſhoulders the glory of Chriſtendom, and all the moveables of the houſe of God! What a life, to have ſo many times trampled the head of Dragons under-foot, and rendered himſelf the Oracle of the world, and the Doctour of Monarchs! And what a death, to die as in a field with palms planted by his hand, manured by his induſtrie, and watched with ſweats!

What a death, to have built himſelf before his death a tomb ſtuffed with precious ſtones of ſo many goodly virtues! What a death, which hath made it known that S. Ambroſe was born for all the world, and could not die without the tears of all the world; ſince as every one had his intereſts in the life of this Prelate, ſo he found in his death the ſubject of his ſorrow! What a death, to die with theſe words in his mouth: I am neither aſhamed to have lived, nor fear to die, becauſe we have a good Maſter! What a death, to return to Heaven as the dove of the deluge to his Ark, bearing words of peace, as an olive-branch in his mouth! What a death, to ſee vice trodden under his feet, Heaven all in crowns over his head, men in admiration, the Angels in joy, the Arms of God laden with recompences for his merits!

Prelates, who pleaſe your ſelves with Myters and Croziers, would to God this incomparable man, as he is the ornament of your Order, might be ever the model of your actions. And if your dignities make you be as Mountains of Sinai, wholly in lights, flames, and thunder-ſtrokes, let the innocency of your life, render you (by his imitation) Mountains of Libanus, to bear the whiteneſs of ſnow in the puritie of your converſation, the odour of incenſe in your ſacrifices and devotions, and fountains in the doctrines and charities you ſhall diſtribute to the whole world.

THE SOVLDIER.

TO SOULDIERS.

O Brave and couragious Nobility, whoſe Anceſtours have fixed the Standards of the Croſs upon the land of Infidels, and cemented Monarchies with their bloud; to you it is I addreſs theſe lines, for you it is my pen laboureth, excited with a generous deſign it hath to honour your profeſſion. Here it is, where I preſent the true figures of valour: Here I diſplay the palms and crowns, which environed the head of your Fathers: Here I do reſtore the value of fair and glorious actions, reſerved for your imitation. Enter with a firm footing and a confident courage into this Temple of glory, perſwading your ſelves that there is nothing ſo great in the world, as to tread falſe greatneſs under foot, and deifie virtues. Worldly honour is the feaſt of Gods, ſaid an Ancient, where the ambitious are not invited, but in quality of IXIONS and TANTALUSSES, to ſerve there as buffons: but that which conſiſteth in valour, joyned to integrity of manners, ought to be the object of your affections, the recompence of your labours, and trophey of your memorie. Reflect onely with a favourable eye on this poor endeavour which I conſecrate to your benefit, and afford by your virtues effect to my prayers, and accompliſhment to my writings.

THE SOULDIER.

The first SECTION.

The excellency of Warlick Virtue.

IF the profession of arms were as well managed, as it is excellent and necessary in civil life, we could not have eyes enough to behold it, nor tongues sufficient to praise it: and although our spirit should arrive to the highest top of admiration, it would ever find wonders in this subject, not to be attained.

God of hosts. We seem to hear the Scripture speak, that God himself affecteth the glory of arms, when he causeth himself to be surnamed the God of hosts, and when the Prophets represent him unto us in a fiery Chariot, all environed with burning Legions, at which time the pillars of Heaven tremble under his feet, the rocks are rent, abysses frown, and all the creatures of the universe shake under the insupportable splendour of his Majesty. In effect, this great Monarch of Heaven and earth ceaseth not to make war; and if we will consider his proceedings, we shall find it is more than fifty Ages, since he hath laid siege to a rebellious Citie, which hath for ditches, abysses of iniquity; for walls and rampires, obstinacy; for towers and bulwarks, mountains of pride; for arms, resistance against divine inspirations; for artillery, tumult and insolency; for houses dens of hypocrisie; for Palaces, labyrinths of dissimulation; for tribunal and bar, impiety; for Temple, proper-will; for Idol, self-love; for Captain, blindness; for souldiers, exorbitant passions; for counsel, folly; and for constancy perverse opinion.

Town besieged by God.

The hurt of man. This Citie in a word, is the heart of man, against which God daily wageth war, to give us libertie by our captivitie, advancement by our fall, greatness by our abasing, and life by death, which maketh us die to all dead things, to live for immortality. God would that we fight by his example, not onely with spiritual arms, but sometimes with material: and it is a thing very considerable, that Abraham, the first Father of all the faithfull, was a warriour; since S. Ambrose reckoning up all his titles, according to the Scripture, sheweth he was a good Religious man, a good Justice, a good Captain, a good hoast, and a good husband. Yea, also it is a passage much more admirable to say, what Clemens Alexandrinus hath observed, that the first Army of the faithfull which ever was, marched, not thinking thereon, under the figure of the Cros, and the name of Saviour, although it were about two thousand years before the birth of the Messias.

Ambros. Offic. lib. 1. cap. 24. Fide primus, justitiâ precipuus, in prælio strenuus, in victoriâ non avarus, domi hospitalis, uxori fidulus.

The fourteenth Chapter of Genesis teacheth us, that nine Kings came into the field with their troups, to fight, four against five. Those of Sodom and Gomorrha were there in person, who like effeminate Princes turned their back at the first encounter, and in flying, fell into pits of sulphure. Their defeat gave leisure to the enemy to pillage all the Countrey: where poor Lot, the nephew of Abraham, was taken, having by mishap, chosen his habitation in a Territory, fertile in wealth and iniquities.

The news coming to the ears of Abraham, he speedily armed his household-servants, who were to the number of three hundred and eighten, and with shepheards assaulted Kings, whom he valorously vanquished, bringing back his kinsman, and all the booty which his enemies had taken. Behold the first battel renowned in Scripture, where this brave Doctour of Alexandria, before alledged, very well subtilizeth and saith, that the number of Abraham's souldiers is represented by three Greek letters T. J. H, whereof the first signifieth the Cros, and the other two the name of Saviour, God being desirous so to consecrate the first arms of believers, by the Mysteries of his Greatness, to declare, that the warfare which is well managed, is his work and glory. Likewise we do not find that the name of Sun hath been given in holy Writ to a living man with so much lustre and applause, as to a souldier, and the best of souldiers: I speak of Sampson, which is so much as to say, Sun in our language: where it seemeth the Scripture leadeth us by the hand, to make us acknowledge that military profession, which is under good direction, so much excelleth the ordinary vocations of men, as doth the Sun the stars. For letters, yea, eloquence and arts, which are set out with so much lustre in the estimation of men, are covered under the wings of military virtue, as very well the Roman Oratour hath acknowledged. We do not read that ever the Sun stood still to hear the gracefull words of an eloquent tongue, nor to behold the Theaters and Amphitheaters of the Romans, nor the Olympick games of Grecians, nor all the other objects of admiration, which are in the industrie of men: But we do well know from the Oracle of truth, that this great Star, admired by all the world, immoveably stayed, as charmed by the voice of a souldier, the illustrious Josuah, at that time, when he acted so many brave feats of arms; as if it would admire his prowess, and enlighten his conquests.

Warriours suns.

And what is there also more admirable in the world, than to see a man, covered with steel, who curvetteth on a generous horse, and hasteneth, his head bowed, to throw himself through the battallions, all bristled with launces and swords, through so many musket-shots, so many hail-showers of iron, and so many dreadfull images of death, which he as freely defieth, as if he were immortal, and as little spareth life, as if he had a hundred to loose? What a spectacle to behold him in a furious conflict, like a thunder-bolt in the cloud, which forceth his prison, and breaks all resistance, flying upon wings of fire, and the whirling roar of thunder, to shake the height of rocks? What an affrightment to see him in another posture, scaling a wal, all beset with arms and terrours, and hastening into danger with the same pace and visage, as another to a feast? What support and what consolation for poor people (whom injustice and hostility would butcher, as sheep ordained to slaughter) to perceive a brave captain, with a flying squadron, dissevering the malignity of those forces, conconspired to the ruine of innocents, and by the splendour of his arms changing all the storms into calms?

The greatnes and excellency of a brave Captain.

O what a beauty is it to receive wounds in those combates, from whence floweth more glory than bloud! O what greatness to reap palms in midst of so many thorns! O what a felicity to behold his battels attended by so many laurels, congratulations, and applauses of the people, preserved by this military virtue! How can all be in this profession but glorious, seeing death it self, the terrible of terribles, sheweth a face all smiling to those, who are buried in their valour, as in the true tomb of honour?

The delight of history to praise Captains.
Induit se loricâ sicut Gigas, similis factus est leoni in operibus suis, & sicut catulus leonis rugientis in venatione.
(a) 1 Mac. 13.
(b) 2 Reg. 23.

It seemeth holy-Histories do likewise describe these great Captains with some delight, when they make them march in the war. So they tell us (a) of Judas Machabæus, who having put on his arms appeared like a Gyant, and that he in the battel was seen like a roaring Lion, seeking out his prey. So they describe in the second of Kings (b) the prowess of David, and other valiant men, who flourished in this time with most particular Elogies. So they depaint unto us in a very admirable manner the strength and stratagems of Gedeon against the Midianites.

Valour is matter of astonishment, which transporteth all men both great and small, wittie and dull, to honour its qualities. Aristotle, the politest judgement which hath been in former Ages, so much wondereth at this warlick force, though far distant from his profession, that he composed an excellent Hymn in praise of it, which is yet to be found in Diogenes Laertius: Where he calleth it a virtue most painfull for mortals, but the faireſt ornament of Civil life: A virtue, which hath such attractive beauty, that the most generous hearts seek for death with strife to enjoy the lustre of its glory. If then this valour have such attraction, considered onely within the limits of nature, how will it be if once advanced by the assistance of grace and virtues, which take al that is harsh from it to make it shine with rays of a true and happy majesty? Is there any thing more lovely in the whole world, than to see a valorous souldier furnished with qualities of piety, prudence, justice, liberality, goodness, honesty, and with all other graces, which are in a sweet disposition, as stars sown in the azure of celestial globes?

Oh Nobility, if you knew your own excellency, and could conform your life to your dignity, what lustre and support would you afford to Christendom? It was the faith of a souldier, and of a souldier issued from Paganism, which the mouth of the living God hath exalted above all the piety of the Israelites, when he so highly commended the Centurion of the Gospel, for acknowledging the Saviour had as much power over maladies and things insensible, as an absolute Captain over his souldiers. It was a souldier, whom Saint Peter by the revelation of the Angel did first of all consecrate to faith, as the first fruits of Gentilism. They are warriours which so often repleniſh our Martyrologes with their names, our memories with their veneration, and mouthes with prayers offered up to them. These hearts have at all times been capable to receive seeds of most noble virtues, and now adays they are suffered to putrifie in neglect, ordure, and bruitishness. Oh Nobility, deceive not your selves in the acknowledgement of the badges of your profession, nor flatter your selves under a false mask of valour. I will here represent to you the Palace of military virtue, and shew the way you must walk in, to arrive thither, not suffering your selves to be seduced by chimerical fantasies and illusions of greatness, onely big-swoln with smoak, and which when they have promised to make mountains, produce nothing but rats and vermine.

The second Section.

The enterance into the Palace of valour, and the illusions of Salmoneans and Rodomonts.

The ingenious Delben, who hath composed all Aristotles moral Philosophie in excellent Tables, figureth unto us at the entery into the Palace of valour, an enraged Mistress, called Audacioussneß, which seduceth an infinite number of Salmoneans or Rodomonts, under colour of virtue. It is true, she is dumb in this piece of painting, but I resolve to shew her full of life in this Treatise, and discover to you the slie practises and damnable maxims, which she makes use of to deceive the spirits of this Age; to the end, that the knowledge of the evil may with more facility furnish us for application of remedies.

Suffer me here, O Reader, to imitate the great S. Isidore, who the more natively to represent the horrour of vices, makes them dispute against virtues, putting into their mouthes all their lewd maxims. Afford me the liberty, that I may manifest the disorders, which are at this day in the corrupt Nobility, by the mouth of a Rabsaces, the wicked souldier, who undertaketh to give precepts to youth, and dictate most pernicious counsels, which shall afterward be refuted by the Christian souldier.

S. Isidorus de conflictu viciorum & virtutum.

Note and behold the damnable precepts of Rabsaces, the false Souldier, which contain a true Satyre of the manners of the depraved Nobilitie.

I Magine to your self, that this dangerous Master goes before the Nobilitie, which seeketh after the glory of Arms, and that he taketh by the hand a young man, whom he sees apt for his impressions, and sheweth him, in stead of the true mansion of fortitude, a Palace all of wind, built upon quick-silver, where palms and laurels grow like the fruits of Sodom, which flie into ashes when we think to touch them. Thereupon he thus discourseth with him, wherein you shall too well know the manners and inclinations predominant in the petty Salmoneans of this Age.

Sir, behold you are in the Palace of valour, and I am he whom you search for, I purposely present my self before you, to receive you with open arms, and dictate precepts from my lips, which shall make you to equal the glory of Cæsars and Alexanders.

I affirm the time hath been when brave souldiers took the sword from the Altar, to employ it for the honour of Altars, and lived in the exercise of Arms, as in the Temple of the God of hosts: but these kind of actions are more found in ancient histories, than in the manners of men that live at this present. If thou wilt be a souldier of the time, I wish thee to become a petty Cyclop, and know very little what God or Religion is, but to swear by the one, and profane the other. I should fear lest this devotion may not soften thy courage, which is esteemed at this day not to be of temper good enough, if it have not much impietie. Thy oaths shall be thy Sacraments; thy mysteries, the cabale of the wicked; the table, thy Altar; the dishes, thy Sacrifices; and thou shalt account thy sword, as a Deitie, which thou shalt bear hanging at thy girdle, without further search. If needs thou must for ceremonie go to Church, pass along as if thou went'st to a dancing, free from apprehension of the Divine Majesty, for that may make thee melancholy: and when thou art there, without any distinction of profane or sacred, dispose

First disorder of the Nobility. Great impietie.

Life bruitish and infamous diſpoſe thy ſelf to laugh and geer upon all occaſions which are preſented: for indeed we muſt pleaſantly paſs away this little ill time. Thou ſhalt ſet thy ſelf into divers poſtures, which ſhall ſavour much of a jugler, to keep the decorum of men of thy condition; and if there be nothing to be talked on, nor jeſt to be broken, at leaſt thou ſhalt turn thy head on every ſide, and make thy eyes and thoughts hunt after objects which may pleaſe the ſenſe. I well know, that all this (taken according to the model of ancient piety) is held for a great ſacriledge: But thou art very capable of it; and if thy countenance deceive me not, thou wilt never be one of thoſe ſcrupulous ones, who think the Churches are made for nothing but prayer.

2. Diſorder, The tongue blaſphemy of and calumny.

Thou ſhalt learn in good time to lie, ſwear, forſwear, ſlander, and blaſpheme: for it is very ordinary Rhetorick in the mouth of our Salmoneans. Go not about to ſearch into old Hiſtories, as Charls the Eighth, who hewed through the Alps, conquered the Kingdom of Naples, and made Conſtantinople with its Ottomans, to tremble with the onely ſhadow of his name, yet durſt not ſo much as ſwear by his faith. We are no longer in ſuch kind of times; men now are ſo accuſtomed to lie, that needs muſt oaths mount by degrees up to the clouds, to aſſure a truth, although with extream ſwearing it is taken for a lie. And were there no other reaſon of ſwearing, but to make an able man, ſince thou canſt not be valiant with thy arm, cut through confidently with thy tongue.

3. Diſorder, The abomination of duels.

Let brags and Rodomontadoes never drie in thy mouth, no more than water in huge rivers. If thou wilt have one of the greateſt virtues of the times, thou muſt be froward and peeviſh, and ſpeak of nothing but duels, of challenges, and aſſignments of the place; and as ſoon as thou ſhalt hear ſome ſpeech of any man of valour, thou muſt ſay, thou much deſireſt one day to ſee him with ſword in hand, and that thou haſt heretofore ſeen others, over whom thou hadſt great advantage. Swear in good earneſt, that ſuch a one hath done thee wrong: but that thou wilt evict reparation from him, ſealed with his bloud: diſpute, ſwagger, tell tales, make quarrels ariſe about a pins point, preſs to be a ſecond to this man, and that man, but ever engage others, and as nimbly as thou canſt draw thy pin back again from the game. Believe me, the whole myſtery conſiſteth onely in ſetting a good face on't. If thou canſt counterfeit wounds, as Hereticks falſe miracles, thou ſhalt not do much amiſs. For all valour now adays bendeth that way. It ſufficeth, it be ſaid, thou art a man to kill or be killed bravely. It is true, that anciently ſome duels were permitted in time of war, enemy againſt enemy, and executed in the view and preſence of Captains of both parts, who beheld them with much ſolemnity. So the brave Chevalier Bayard, the eye and arm of French warfare, ſlew Alphonſus de Soto-major, a Spanyard, in the field of battel, before the eyes of both Armies, who beheld this ſpectacle. This made the ſouldier very confident to enter into liſts with military laws in preſence of his Captain, againſt an adverſary of another Nation. Where ſhall we now adays find the like valour? Of neceſſity night, private places, and ugly corners muſt be ſought out, to fight a duel: yea, I leave thee to conſider what a goodly ſpectacle it would be, if one from a Theater might behold the countenance of theſe Rodomonts, moſt violent in words; you ſhould ſee them tremble, wax pale, quake, be amazed, troubled, and in the end be ſlain, like wretched ſwine; but this is not honeſt, we therefore muſt find out ſome ſcarff to cover the cowardiſe of theſe clandeſtine combats.

The more a man is ignoble, cowardous, or unhappy, ſo much the more ought he ſeek out ſuch kind of duels: I ſay ignoble, though I am not ignorant it hath heretofore been the trade of ſlaves; but opinion hath made it now a way for Gentlemen. Behold why thoſe, who find themſelves to be of baſe extraction, do the more fervently ſeek out ſuch occaſions, as if they ſhould thereby blot out their ignominie. I ſay cowardous, for it is to become confident in a baſe buſineſs, where lackies and butchers may be Maſters. I ſay unhappy, for it is the means to conſummate his miſery, without having many witneſſes: needs muſt the deſperate find ſome gate to eſcape from life, as would enraged beaſts from a liſt, by leaping over the rails. In the end, when thou ſhalt die in this combat, thou haſt nothing to looſe, but a wicked ſoul. And though thou art moſt wretchedly ſlain, our Salmoneans will ſay, thou dieſt in the bed of honour, and that ſufficeth to be valiant to the world.

4. Diſorder, Tyranny in war.

When thou art in the war, thou ſhalt be a kind of Barbarian, in ſuch ſort, that the Peaſants ſhall take thee to be more than an Army of Hunnes or Tartars. If thou haſt any command, thou ſhalt march all puffed up with vain-glory, and make thy ſelf known by the diſaſters of the poor. If thou be called on, to put thy hand to thy purſe, thou ſhalt pay thy hoſteſs with threats, and thy ſouldiers with impunity of crimes. Thou ſhalt endeavour to lengthen out the war as long as thou canſt, and if thou couldeſt kill peace it ſelf it ſhould ſuffer, transfixed through the body with thy ſword, as the greateſt enemy of worthy actions. Thou ſhalt not hazard thy ſelf to go much among muſket-ſhots, unleſs thoſe muskets be charged with powder of Cypreſs, as an Authour of this time hath told us, where piſtolets were ſhot in ſtead of bullets.

5. Diſorder, Impuritie moſt diſſolute

Trouble not thy ſelf to number up thy wounds; thou ſhalt ever more eaſily reckon them than thy crimes. As for that which concerneth the vice of impurity, I ordain no more limits to thy luſt, than health to thy reaſon. Heretofore men affected to become better, and a young Cavalier, who made love to a Ladie by the lawfull ways of an honeſt marriage, ſhewed himſelf virtuous to be beloved, ſuch correſpondence was there then between love and virtue: men always endeavoured to lodge their affections in a good place, to become honeſt by the imitation of their loves, which is the moſt pleaſing way that may be found to innocency. All was treated with ſo much honour, that the leaſt ſpot of blame was apprehended much more than death: at this day matters go not ſo. If thou wilt follow the courſe of times, and the proceedings of Salmoneans, thy pleaſures ſhall be without order, as thy concupiſcence without meaſure: Thou ſhalt make a trophey of diſhonour, nor ſhalt thou have other ſcope in thy love, than vice; nor other means, but thoſe which thy bruitiſhneſs ſhall provide thee. Thou ſhalt make no difference between the bed of married, that of virgins, and women proſtitute; and when thou haſt ſeduced an unhappy maid, thou ſhalt vaunt it, as if thou hadſt gained a Citie.

6. Diſorder, Perpetual wickedneſs.

For this purpoſe it is fit thou entertaineſt bravery, thy belly, and game, for theſe will be the furies moſt familiar to thy humour: thou ſhalt take the moſt coſtly ſtuffs out of the ſhops of Merchants, to cover thy ſtench with gold and ſcarlet, and thou ſhalt hold all the beſt Artiſans in breath to ſerve thee. When thou muſt pay thy debts, thou ſhalt revenge benefits by force of injuries, and cloſe up thy infidelity with all ſorts of ingratitude.

7. Diſorder, Barbarouſnes in government of thoſe under you.

If thou haſt ſubjects, thou ſhalt uſe them like ſlaves, and govern them with all rigour, exerciſing violence on their bodies, and rapine on their goods: one ſhall feed thy dogs, the other thy horſes, the other thy ſervants, which ordinarily are petty Tartarians, whoſe inſolency foſtered by the Maſters and Lords, doth all which may be expected from a ſervile ſoul, that hath authoritie in its hands; yea, thou ſhalt endeavour to make good men believe, that what thou haſt done is for their preſervation; as was ſaid to the poor ſhepheard, from whom the ſacrificers of Hercules had more ſheep than would have ſerved an Army of wolves. Thy table, notwithſtanding the tears and neceſſities of the publick, ſhall ever be abundant in delicacies, and for thy recreation, thou ſhalt play thy gold with a full hand, although it be the bloud of ſo many men, to whom thou art beholden. Thou ſhalt be the chicken of the white hen, and needs muſt the riches of the wealthy, the induſtry of trades-men, the virtues of innocent, even hunger it ſelf, and the miſeries of the moſt wretched, be tributaries to thy riots.

8. Diſorder, Perfidiouſneſs.

I wiſh, that exteriourly thou appear with an open viſage, a ſmiling countenance, a very honeſt deportment; but be thou inwardly full of cauteries, and be thy heart always repleniſhed with more ſtains, than the moſt ſpotted skin of a Panther. Thou ſhalt ſell thy ſoul to ambition, and to advance thy fortune, ſhalt neither hearken to God, Angel, conſcience, nor virtue: Thou ſhalt have no regard to the perſon either of father, mother, brother, or ſiſter, but the meaſure of all thy amities ſhall be thy own intereſts. Thou muſt not think any thing unjuſt, when it ſhall be for thy own accommodation, nor be thou ſcrupulous in matter of conſcience; of what ſide ſoever profit accrew, it hath ever a good ſavour. Thou ſhalt, to ſuit with the time, bear a mind more black than the abyſs, and to ruin an innocent, ſhalt not ſpare ſuch treacheries and treaſons as have heretofore been accounted moſt horrible: but the cuſtom of the Age, which is ſo naturalized in vice, cauſeth that we now grow familiar with monſters. Thou ſhalt raiſe gain out of all, if thou canſt; and let there not be a vice, that yields thee not tribute. Thy words ſhall be full of cunning, thy cunning of promiſſes, and thy promiſſes of wind. Finally, thou ſhalt live in Chriſtianity, as a Janiſſary at the Porta of the great Turk; and for recompence, when thou ſhalt end thy days, which cannot laſt very long, thou ſhalt directly go to the Paradice of Mahomet, with thoſe great lights, Sardanapalus, Epicurus, Bajazet, and Selymus.

Abominable manners.

Behold the infamous and pernicious diſcourſe, which this wicked Maſter held with this young man: wherein you may obſerve a true Satyre of the lives of many, who entitle themſelves Noble, although their manners are far worſe than theſe my words, and that the imagination of a writer cannot ſo much feign, but they in their profane actions will expreſs much more. Let us now behold the Palace of true valour, and take an antidote againſt the poiſons of the times.

The third SECTION.

The Temple of Valour, and ſage Precepts, given by the Chriſtian Souldier, to refute the manners of the times. And firſt, that Pietie helpeth Valour.

THe Souldier purſuing his way, entereth into the Temple of Valour, where, according to the excellent conceits of the painter before mentioned, beholdeth on the frontiſpiece of the Palace a goodly tower of Chryſtal, adorned with lights, as the Globe of glaſs, in which the Perſians heretofore bare the image of the Sun: or elſe by the imitation of that huge Pharos of Alexandria, which enlightened the ſea on all ſides, to guide veſſels to a ſafe haven. This was expreſly ſet down to ſignifie the great and divine lights of wiſdom, which are in a true Chriſtian valour. This Palace ſeemed wholly built of rocks of the colour of iron, ſtreamed with little veins of bloud, which well ſhewed it was purpoſely done, to repreſent the invincible courage of the pupils of this virtue. The Halls were all hanged with proweſs and victories: and in ſtead of columes, it had great Statues of the moſt valorous men of the world, who flouriſhed in the revolution of ſo many Ages. Valour bare ſway within it, ſitting, not on gilli-flowers, or roſes, but encompaſſed with thorns and ſufferings, ever armed, and ſtill with ſword in hand, with which it cut off an infinite number of monſters, and chaſed away all Salmoneans from its houſe.

In this Palace was the brave Eleazar, who, as ſoon as he from far perceived this young Souldier, he cauſed him to draw near, and ſpake to him in theſe terms:

Son, I doubt not but you found at the enterance into my lodging a wicked Sorcerer, who hath by the ear empoiſoned you: It is neceſſary you cleanſe it, to make your ſelf capable of the ſingular precepts of valour and wiſdom, which I am now preſently to afford you, ſeeing you for this cauſe are come hither into my Palace. It hath been told you, that to be a good ſouldier, you muſt become a little Cyclop, without any feeling of God or Religion: for devotion were but to weaken your warlick humours. Thoſe who have ſaid this unto you, have told nothing new. It is an old ſong, which they have drawn out of Machiavel, who thinking to make a Prince, have made a wild beaſt, and yet would perſwade us it was a man; but thoſe that believe it, are ſuch onely as bear their eyes on their heels. Let us not ſerve our ſelves with this Phyloſophie of fleſh, which maketh valour and devotion, as two things incompatible. Verily I go not about to require of you an affected, enforced, and ceremonious piety, that is out of the limits of your profeſſion. I would have you a ſouldier, and not a Monk: but aſſure you the prime virtue of art military, is, to have good thoughts, and pure beliefs touching the Divinity, then to practice ſuitableneſs thereto by offices and exteriour actions of pietie.

Refutation of the firſt diſorder.

Piety the firſt virtue of a ſouldier.

When I ſpeak this, I am ſo ſtrong in reaſons, that I dare take our enemies themſelves for Judges. Behold the ſubtile Machiavel, who upon the Decads of Titus Livius, ſheweth Religion is an admirable inſtrument of all great actions, and that the Romans made uſe thereof to eſtabliſh their Citie, purſue their enterprizes, and pacifie tumults and ſeditions, which roſe in the revolution of State. Becauſe it was (ſaid he) more conſcience to offend God than men, believing his power ſurpaſſed all humane things. So we ſee, that all thoſe who would form, cheriſh, or advance a State, although they had no true Religion in their ſouls, have taken pretexts, as Lycurgus, Numa, Sertorius, Iſmael the Perſian, and Mahomet.

Reaſons which ſhew that true pietry is the ſoul of military virtue. Chap. 13. and 11.

I demand of you thereupon (my ſouldier) if by the teſtimony of this man, who hath made himſelf our adverſary, falſe beliefs have had ſo much power upon minds, that they have rendered them more docible to virtue, more obedient to Sovereignty, more adventerous to undertake things difficult, more patient to tollerate matters diſpleaſing, more couragious to ſurmount thoſe which make oppoſition; if, I ſay, the ſole imagination of a falſe Divinity, accounted to puniſh miſdeeds and recompence valour with a temporal ſalary, was powerfull enough to make Legions flie, all covered with iron, through ſo many perils, muſt we not ſay by the confeſſion of our very enemy, that a true Religion, as ours is, which promiſeth ſo many rewards to virtue, and puniſhments for crime, not for a time, but for all eternity, if it be once well engraven in hearts, ſhall produce ſo many many worthy effects beyond those of other Sects, as truth is above lying, reality above nothing, and the sun above the shaddows?

From whence think you do so many neglects grow, but from coldness in Religion? For how can a souldier but be valiant, when he is confidently perswaded it is the will of the living God that he obey his Prince, as if he beheld a Divinity upon earth; and that burying himself in the duty of this obedience, being well purified from his sins, he takes a most assured way to beatitude? How can he be but the more couragious, having received absolution of his sins, by the virtue of the Sacrament, since by the Confession of all Sages, there is nothing so perplexed, so timorous, so inconstant, as a conscience troubled with the image of its own crimes? How should it spare a transitory life, having a firm belief of immortality, since the wisest have judged, that the valour of ancient Gauls, which was admired by the Romans, proceeded from no other source, but from a strong perswasion which the Druides had given them, touching the immortality of our souls? How could he be but most confident, if he stedfastly beheld the eye of the Divine Providence of God, perpetually vigilant for his protection? How could he be, but most fervent, if he did but figure the Saviour of the world at the gates of Heaven, with his hands full of rewards? See you not that all reasons combat for us, as well as experience?

I will not flatter Christians, under pretext that I call my self the Christian Knight, nor ought I betray my cause under the shaddow of modesty: Let all the ancient and modern Histories be read, let military acts be examined, and courages poized in a just ballance, I challenge the ablest Chronicler to present me any valour out of Greek or Roman Historie, where the most admirable prowesses are to be seen, that I do not shew them perpetually parallel'd, yea, The Acts of Pagans. surpassed by the courage of Christians. When I read those histories of elder times, I behold Grecians that triumphed, for having vanquished Xerxes; who, to say the truth, was a Stag leading an army of sheep: never was any thing seen so perplexed. And although there had been no opposition, yet was this great body composed of a lazie stupified army, onely strong to ruin it self. I see a young Alexander, who, to speak truth, was of an excellent nature, though the most judicious observe great errour in his carriage, he oft-times being rash, and many times insolent; but it was well for him he had to do with such gross Novices, whose eyes were dazled with the simple glimmer of a sword, for had he come to encounter the arms of Europe, his Laurels doubtless would have been seen to wax hoary in the Northern snows. I see the Roman Cæsars, who invade, or those which are already effeminated by their proper vice, or such as are wanderers, and dis-united, not to have an assured State to resist their enemies. My ears are perpetually filled with the acts of Cynogirus, who having both his hands cut off, bit the arms and ships of his enemies with his teeth; of one Otryades, who wrote his victory with his own bloud; of one Sergius, who fought four times with the left hand, which Plinie observeth in his History, as a prodigie; of the one-eyed Horatius, who defended a bridge against the Army of his enemies; of a maid named Clælia, who passed over Tyber on horse-back; of one Sicinnius, that had been in six-score combats, and bare away thirty six spoils of his enemies, with five and fourty wounds at divers times. I will not extenuate their prowesses, nor take away from them the honour they deserved; for to say there was no valour nor vigour in these ancient courages, were to proceed against common opinion. But we now adays see many Aristarchuses in the world, who have spirits so retrograde, that when we speak of bruit beasts, they highly glorifie them above men, as if they were of the race of Ulysses his souldiers, who, as fables tell us, were turned into hogs: so when we come to compare the valour of Christians with that of Infidels, they find nothing, which on our part may give them content, so much have they either of malice, or stupidity.

Let me die, if in the sole life of Captain Bayard, warlick atchievments may not be observed, which in manage and valour surpass those of Alexander's and Pompey's: and he that would number all the heroick actions which have been performed in our wars, sometimes by silly souldiers, sometimes also by Christian women, might as soon reckon the stars in the firmament. And had I now undertaken to make a simple enumeration of great Captains, which have flourished in Christendom, it would weary pens, fill books, and confound readers. Prowess of Christians.

I would willingly know whether Constantine, going out of an Oratory where he prayed with the Bishops, before he had so many battels, was less valiant against Maxentius, Maximianus, Licinius? If Theodosius in recommending himself so particularly to the prayers of Monks, have the less done his devoir against Maximus and Eugenius? Whether Heraclius were the more remiss for carrying the Image of our Blessed Ladie in his hands, when he subdued Cosroes King of Persia in three pitched battels? Whether Clodoveus did the less good, when he caused his standards to march under the conduct of the prayers of Saint Martin? Whether Charls Martel were weakened in his devotions, when at the onely battels of Towers he cut in pieces three hundred three-score and fifteen thousand Saracens, with the most hydeous slaughter that ever was seen? Whether Charlemaine in being so firmly tied to Altars, felt his arm to fail against the Lombards, Saxons, and Moors? Whether the sword of Godfrey of Bovillon, after so many actions of piety were the less keen, when it cleft the Barbarians at a blow, from the crown of the head to the girdle-stead, and glistered in azure all covered with rays of Palms and Laurels? Whether Belliſarius in being a good Catholick, did the less charge the Goths? And whether Simon Momfort in taking his sword from the Altar, were the less dreadfull to the Albigean Hereticks?

Assuredly there is nothing so strong, nothing so invincible, nor triumphant, as a valour which marcheth under the laws of Christian Religion. The Turkish Nation, which seemeth to be born to brandish the sword, and to have ample transcendency in matters of arms, feareth not so much the Persian and Tartarian standards, as the banners of Christians. And Baronius in an Epistle dedicatory of his Annals, which he wrote to the Great Henry the Fourth, of famous memory, observeth, that they hold it as a fatal Prophesie among them, that their Empire shall never be destroyed, unless it be by the hands of French-men. If they have obtained victories against Christians in so many wars, it hath ever been our divisions that have disarmed us, our ambitions that have devoured us, our Apostata-brothers who have betrayed us, our Infidels who have acquainted them with our intentions, our industries, and arms, our mutual quarrels which have wasted us, our sins that have chastised us, the hand of a powerfull God which hath excited the Saracens to purifie, under some colour of temperance and justice, those lands which ours had defiled by so many ordours and sacriledges, for otherwise there could not be any force in the world able to resist Christian Princes, were they well united.

We know it by the success of the battel of Lepanto, and the prowesses of George Castriotb, called Scanderbeg, who with a flying camp defeated seven Generals of the Turkish Army, in seven great battels, wherein he ſlew two thouſand men with his own hand, and in the end made Amurath ſtark mad, to ſee himſelf defied, beaten, and maimed by a petty Lord, and with ſo ſmall numbers. What could this brave courage have done had it been aſſiſted with men, gold and arms, anſwerable to his merits?

Are you not then very ridiculous, O Souldier, when to be accounted valiant, you play the Cyclop, and fear leſt devotion might weaken your courage? Accuſe not your Religion, for it is holy: accuſe not devotion, for it is innocent. Rather accuſe your own impiety, your own neglect, your own unworthineſs of ſpirit, and your own baſeneſs: that is it which enfeebleth you, and cauſeth that you are onely valiant to play the beaſt. No man looſeth courage, but he that never had it, and no man hath it, if he beg it not of the true God of hoſts. Where ſhould we ſeek for light but of the Sun, for water but in rivers, and heat but in fire? And where think you to find true ſtrength, but with the God of the ſtrong? The more you ſhall be united to him, the more able ſhall you be; not that he will ever give you ſtrength of body, as to Milo, that you may bear an ox; but in ſerving him, you ſhall have from him the courage of a man, who hath his root in reaſon, his increaſe in piety, and his Crown in true glory.

The fourth Section.

Manifeſt Proofs, which declare that Pietie and Valour are not things incompatible.

IT is an intollerable thing to ſee certain young Roarers, who think to make themſelves eſteemed valiant by profeſſion of impiety, and have as it were but one ſhame, which is, not to be ſhameleſs at all, as if we had never ſeen, nor as yet was ever heard in the world, of ſouldiers furniſhed before God and men with great and Divine virtues, who fail not to be as couragious as Lions. Let us not ſearch out Saints of the Martyrologe, let us onely behold among a thouſand, one man, whoſe life was very lately printed, written in a low ſtile, I mean the Marſhal Boucicaut, who flouriſhed in France under Charls the Sixth. Theſe petty Rodomonts, who make boaſt of duels, meer cowardice covered with an opinion of courage, durſt not behold this Captain without doing that which heretofore was done to the ſtatues of the Sun, that is, to put finger on the mouth, and admire. For, not to ſpeak of his other acts of proweſs, it is he who was preſent at that furious battel, wherein Bajazet the Turkiſh Emperour, waged war againſt the King of Hungarie; where there were many French-men, the Duke of Burgundie, then called the Count of Nevers, being there in perſon.

Mounſieur Godefroy hath publiſhed this written by an ancient Authour.

The Marſhal Boucicaut.

The hiſtory ſaith, that the Turk coming to fight with dreadfull forces, began ſo furious a charge, the air being thickened with a black cloud of arrows, that the Hungarians, who were reputed good ſouldiers, much trembled at this aſſault, and fled away. The French, who ever had learned in all battels to vanquiſh or die, unwilling ſo much as to hear any ſpeech of the name of flight, preſſed into the Turkiſh Army, notwithſtanding the ſtakes and pyles fixed in the earth to ſerve as hinderances, and attended by ſome other troups, brake the Vanguard of the Turks, by the counſel and example of this brave Marſhal; whereat Bajazet much amazed, was ready to retire, at which time it was told him, there was but a very little handfull of French men, who made the greateſt reſiſtance, and that it were beſt to aſſault them. He, who kept his battalions very freſh, returneth and came to fall upon theſe poor ſouldiers, now extreamly tired. Never did angry Lion exerciſe ſuch violent force amongſt the javelins of hunters, as was then the proweſs which ſhined in this generous Captain. For, he having no further purpoſe but to ſell his own life, and thoſe of his companions, as dear as he could, ſo negligently betrayed, he with the French Cavalry, and ſome few other people who ſtuck to him, did ſuch feats of arms, that it was thought twenty thouſand Turks were ſlain in the place. In the end, this prodigious multitude, able to weary out the moſt hardy, although it had been but to cut them to pieces, did ſo nearly encompaſs our French, that the Count Nevers, with Marſhal Boucicaut, and the moſt worthy perſonages, were taken priſoners.

Piety and valour of a French ſouldier.

The next day after this diſmal battel, Bajazet ſitting under a pavillion ſpred for him in the field, cauſed the priſoners to be brought before him, to drench himſelf in bloud and vengeance, which he ſo paſſionately loved.

Horrible ſpectacle.

Never was ſpectacle ſeen more worthy of compaſſion: the poor Lords, who had done wonders in arms, able to move Tigers, were led as it were half naked, ſtraitly bound with coards and fetters; no regard being had neither to their bloud, which was noble, nor youth, which was pitifull, nor their behaviour, moſt raviſhing; theſe Saracens, ugly and horrible as devils, ſet them before the face of the Tyrant; who in the winck of an eye, cauſed their throats to be cut at his feet, as if he meant to carrouſe their bloud.

The Count Nevers, with two other Counts of Eve and Marche, had now their heads under the ſymitar, and their lives hung but as it were at a thread, when Bajazet having heard by his interpreters, that they were neer kinſmen to the King of France, cauſed them to be reſerved, commanding they ſhould ſit on the ground at his feet, where they were enforced to behold the lamentable butchery of their Nobilitie.

The valiant Marſhal Boucicaut in his turn was produced, covered with a little linnen cloth, to maſſacre him over the bodies of ſo many valiant men. He, who was wiſe, and particularly inſpired by God in this extremity, made a ſign with his fingers before Bajazet, who underſtood not his language, as if he would declare himſelf the kinſman of the Count of Nevers, who beheld him with an eye ſo pitifull, that it was of power to rent rockie hearts. Bajazet being perſwaded by this ſign, that he was of the bloud Royal, cauſed him to be ſet apart to remain a priſoner; where he afterward by his great prudence, endeavoured the liberty of thoſe noble Gentlemen, and his own. I cannot think theſe petty Novices of war will compare themſelves to the valour of this man, accompliſhed with ſuch heroick proweſs.

Pietie of a ſouldier.

Let us come, if it pleaſe you, to conſider him at leiſure, whether he were of the number of thoſe, who profeſs themſelves wicked, that they may ſeem valiant. He was a man, who in time of peace, whileſt he governed the Citie of Genoa, daily heard two Maſſes, with ſo exemplar devotion, that he never ſuffered any man to ſpeak to him in the Church; where he ſaid the Office with ſingular attention, for which he ſo accommodated his company, that you ſhould never ſee the leaſt action of uncomelineſs in Divine ſervice, which he did not ſeverely puniſh. But the Hiſtorian addeth, that who had beheld his people at Maſs, would rather think he ſaw Religious men than Souldiers. Noblemen are of power to bend their familes to what they pleaſe, were it not that through ſoftneſs of ſpirit, they many times give way to the torrent; and contenting themſelves to be good, make all the reſt nought by the eaſineſs of their natures. I ſpeak not here to you of a Canonical Saint, a Hermit, a Religious man, a Prieſt; I ſpeak of a Marſhal of France, of a moſt ardent warriour.

Behold

Notable devotion of a souldier.

Behold, I pray, whether piety be incompatible with arms. This brave Captain happily made his Will, disposing of all his devotions, his affairs, and charge: each day he executed some part hereof, doing all the good he could during his life, not expecting the casual portions of others piety, as those, who cause the torch to be carried behind, to light them when they have lost their eyes, and indeed never do well, but when they are in a condition to be able to do no more. The charitable Lord informed himself very particularly of the necessities of the bashfull poor, set their names down in his Registers, as the rarest pieces of his cabinet, appointed on every side his alms to poor Religious, to widdows, to orphans, to needy souldiers, namely those, who through inability of old age and sickness, could labour no more. He visited Hospitals, giving, according to his means, round sums of money to furnish and accommodate them; if he walked in the streets, he ever had charity in his hands, that himself might give all he could, for he therein took a singular contentment: and never was he seen to be so merry, as when he had distributed good store of money; this was his hunting, his game, his delight.

He bare a singular devotion towards the friday, in memory of the passion of our Saviour; and whilest he was able, did eat nothing on that day but fruits and pulse, abstaining from all which participated of the life of beasts; and clothed himself likewise with a most simple habit, desirous to shew exteriourly some tast of the reverence we ow to the bloud of the Son of God. Besides abstinencies commanded, he ordinarily fasted the saturday, which is dedicated to the memory of the Blessed Virgin. He never fed at his repast but on one dish, and though he had great quantity of silver vessels, he caused himself to be served in pewter and earth, being glorious in publick, and in his particular, an enemy of worldly pomps and vanities.

I leave you to think, how much this kind of life is alienated from the curious Nobility, to whom we must daily give so many priviledges and dispensations, that it seems it is for their sakes needfull to create another Christendom, besides that which hath been established by the Son of God. A man would say, to see how they pamper their bodies, they were descended from Heaven, and that thither they should return, not passing through the sepulcher, for they deifie it, and to fatten and guild a dung-hill covered with snow, sport with the bloud and sweat of men.

Sage government of a family.

Superfluity of tast being so well represt, all went in true measure in the house of this good Marshal: his retinue was very well entertained according to his quality, and he had a very solemn custom by him religiously observed, which was speedily to pay his debts, and as much as he might possible to be engaged to none. It is no small virtue, nor of sleight importance, if we consider the Nobility at this time, so easily engulfed in great labyrinths of debts, which daily encrease like huge balls of snow that fall from mountains, and which require ages and golden mynes to discharge them.

Is it not a most inexcusable cruelty before God and men, to see a busie Merchant, a needy Artificer, every day to multiply his journeys and steps before the gate of a Lord or a Ladie, who bear his sweat and bloud in the pleyts of their garments? And in stead of giving some satisfaction upon his most just requests, it is told him he is an importunate fellow, and he many times menaced with bastonadoes, if he desist not to demand his own. Is not this to live like a Tartarian? Is not this to degrade ones self from Nobilitie, Christianitie, and Reason? Is not this to thrust the knife into the throat of houses and entire families? Alledge not unto me, that it is impossible for you to pay at that time what is demanded. Why well foreseeing your own impotency, have you heaped up debts, which cannot be discharged? Why do you not rather admit the lessening of your port? Why cut you not off so many superfluous things? Are not your sins odious enough before God, but you must encrease them with the marrow of the poor? From hence ariseth the contempt of your persons, the hatred of your name, the breaches and ruin of your houses.

A singular discretion.

This man in well paying his debts, was served and respected of Officers, like a little Deitie: there was no need to doubt, nor to make a false step into his house. Never would he suffer a vice, or a bad servant, were it to gain an Empire. Blasphemies, oaths, lies, slanders, games, quarrels, and such like ordures were banished from his Palace, as Monsters; and if he found any of his family in fault, he dismissed them, lest they should infect the other; yet not scandalizing them, nor divulging their offences. At the table he spake little, and did voluntarily entertain himself with example of virtues in the lives of Noblemen, not opening his mouth to discourse of his own proper acts, but with singular sobriety.

In his marriage he demeaned himself most chastely, and had such a horrour against impuritie, that he would not so much as keep a servant who had a lustful eye. Behold the cause, why passing one day on horseback through the streets of the Citie of Genoa, as a Ladie presented her self at her window to comb her hair, and one of the Gentlemen of the Marshals trayn, seeing her tresses very bright and beautifull, cried out, Oh what a goodly head of hair! staying to behold her, the Lord looked back on him with a severe eye, saying: It is not well done; it is not fit, that from the house of a Governour, a wanton eye should be seen to glance.

In this point and all the rest which concerned the commerce and repose of Citizens, he rendered so prompt and exact justice, that it was a proverb amongst those of Genoa, when any one was offended, to say to him who had wronged him: If you will not right me, my Lord Marshal will. The other understanding it, oft-times rather chose to submit himself to right, than expect a condemnation which was inevitable. He so by this means gained the good opinion of the people, that the inhabitants of the Citie sent to the King, beseeching he might continue the government to the end of his days: which having obtained, it seemed to them, they had drawn an Angel from Heaven, to fix him at the stern of their Common-wealth.

At the time that the Emperour of Constantinople, then dispossessed of one part of his Empire by the great Turk, came into France to demand succour, and had obtained of the King twelve hundred men, defrayed for a year; many widdow-Ladies were seen at the Court, who complained of injustices and oppressions by them endured after the death of their husbands; whereby this good Marshal was so moved with compassion, that with much freedom he instituted an Order of Knights for the defence of afflicted Ladies, which he surnamed The Order of the white Ladie, because they who made profession of it, bare a schuchion of gold enameled with green, and thereon the figure of a Ladie in colour white: thus sought he by all occasions to do good, and shewed himself a great enemy of idleness, the very moth of minds.

He ordinarily rose early in the morning, and spent about three hours in Prayer and Divine Service: at the end whereof he went to Councel, which lasted till dinner time. After his repast, he gave audience to all those, who would speak with him upon their affairs, not failing to behold his Hall daily full of people, whom he speedily dispatched, contenting every one with answers sweet and reasonable: from thence he retired to write letters, and to give that order to his Officers, which his pleasure was should be observed in every affair : and if he had no other employment, he went to Vespers. At his return he took some pains, then finishing the rest of his office, ended the day. The Sundays and Holy-days either he went on foot in some pilgrimage of devotion, or caused the life of Saints, or other victories to be read, daily more and more to dispose his manners unto virtue. When he marched in the field, he had an admirable way, not to oppress any of his company, nor would he permit, even in the land of an enemy, that the least disturbance should be given to Ecclesiasticks.

Behold you not here a life worthy of a French Cavalier? Oh Nobilitie, this man was not a petty Royster, who makes boast to fight in a meadow; but a souldier, who during the wars with the English, kept the field of battel three times, thirty days together, against those brave souldiers who would oppose him, from whence he went out all sparkling with glory and wonders.

I would here willingly adde a Bertrand of Gueselin, Count of Longuevil, & Constable of France; whose life Monsieur Menard hath given us, written by a pen of that ancient Age, in old language : you shall see a man, who after he had solemnly dedicated in the offertory of a Mass his soul, body, and arms, at the Altars, fought six or seven times hand to hand, exercised strange feats of battel and arms; stood in the midst of combates, bold, and confident as in his chamber, being otherwise furious, strong, and stout in the press. You should see a man sage in counsels, prompt in execution, whom an enemy found near at hand when he thought him thirty leagues off. A man in all things else free from fraud or dissimulation, chearfull, courteous, obliging, and liberal of his own, employing his moveables and the jewels of his wife, for relief of poor souldiers. Then you may judge, whether to be valiant, you may live in the Court of a Christian Prince like a little Turk. Where is your judgement? and where your reason?

The fifth SECTION.

Against Duels.

A condemnation of Rodomontadoes and Duels.

I Do assure my self some will not forget to tell you, that to be valiant men of the times, you must be outragious in slanders, in blasphemies, in audacious words, in duels, challenges, which are the mighty valours of this Age. Well then, my souldier, following this course you will learn to swear and blaspheme. I speak not how great this crime is, nor how much you render your tongue punishable in disposing it to this language of devils; but I will say one thing, which is very certain, those which seek for glory out of vice, have not alwayes been made eminently prosperous. All you may doe in purchasing hell by these execrable oathes, will bee to acquire the goodly qualities of a base clown.

Authours of duels.

And as concerning Duels, I undoubtedly hold, that if this infamous souldier, who hath abused you, were willing to speak the truth, which his conscience will dictate to him, he rather gives it you for an honest coverture of cowardice, than for true valour. The world is not so doltish as to measure courage by the model of Moors, slaves, and horse-boys, who were the first executours of these butcheries. How can you perswade us that a confused mass of these petty mutiners, who have nothing else in their mouthes but these duels, may be valiant men? We are not so ignorant, but that we well know courage never makes good alliance with servitude and effeminacy. But the most part of this kind of men, are servile spirits, who submit to an infinite number of shamefull and tyrannical laws, for a little smoak. They are bodies withered with lazines, who are many times entangled in their garters, and stand in need to have rings for winter and summer, to change according to the seasons. They fear the lancet of the Surgeon, they crie out aloud for a sleight fever, and will needs be tended like women in childbed : Imagine with your self, what valour can be herein. Were they beaten and stampt into powder in a morter, a hundred of such like Rodomonts would not make up one half ounce of warlick fortitude. But there is a little despair and rage, which boyleth in a passionate heart, to counterfeit virtue. God forbid, we should take chaff for gold, hemlock for parsley, or an Ape for a man. We know valour, by report of great Captains, resteth in mature deliberation and coolnes, as in its true element. When I behold one of these silly braggards, who hasteneth to the field for a base fear of some shame, or upon some liver-heat which tormenteth him, I make as much reckoning of it, as if I saw an angry hen. Do you think Sichem was a couragious man for enduring to be circumcised for the love of Dinah? My opinion is, it was an act of much cowardice to permit himself to be cut with a razor in the most shamefull part of his body, to please a silly female Jew, who when it was done, had great cause to turn this painfull sacrifice into scorn and laughter. This poor Courtier to satisfie a wily wench, for a foolish imagination of point of honour, hasteneth to be cut in pieces in the field : unhappy man, he thinketh to marry Dinah, and finds Proserpina; he proposeth to himself a worldly glory, that may rank him in the number of the valiant, and meeteth a bloudy death, which at one blow killeth body and soul. Let me die, if it be not the poorest thing to behold them in such adventures. For if one did see them, they would make those burst with laughing at their idleness, who were willing to bemoan their misery. I have drawn from this massacre, such as were more amazed than a bridled goose, and more ghastly than a dead man four days after his funeral, taken from his sepulcher. These silly creatures endured all this to make a wretched bruit run up and down in Paris, that they were in the end beaten, and had with so many cold sweats of deaths done that, which their Lackeys, who are somewhat more stupid, would a hundred times with more willingness of heart have undertaken. Behold you not who is worthy either of compassion or contempt? Yet you flatter them with a pretext of courage, which you enforce them to purchase at a costly rate. When you applaud such actions, and tell how brave a combate was performed behind the Charter-house, and that both of them came thither with much resolution, you are men guilty of bloud : It should suffice you to have your judgements so dull in the estimation which ought to be made upon valour, without rendering your tongues so tragical. Their trembling swords would become very lazie to consummate the mysteries of furies, if your words armed not despair, to play out the rest of the game.

Lazines. Juvenal. Satyr.

Perhaps you will say, you know those who have fought duels; who notwithstanding were valiant in Armies. I deny not this. I affirm not that a valiant man cannot fight a duel; but I deny that he is valiant for fighting a duel. David had been an adulterer, and became a Saint; but it is not for having been an adulterer that he was a Saint; nor shall any one have the reputation of valour among understanding men, for committing a crime. For if this duel were ever an infallible mark of courage, I demand wherefore have we seen those, who have shewed themselves most most importunate to provoke others to combat, most fiery to haſten thither, moſt factious to be herein opiniouative, and in the mean time, when they came to bear arms, where they muſt witneſs true valour for the ſervice of their Prince, ſuch encounters have happened, that they ſo deſpairingly ran off, that they have paſſed through forreſts two leagues over, and not ſeen a tree, ſo much affrighted they were. It is not neceſſary to name them, happily they are already too much renowned in the Hiſtories of the times. And yet you will make much account of theſe goodly ſwaih-bucklers.

Courage of duel like to that of the poſſeſſed.

Aſſure your ſelf the moſt part of thoſe, who ſhew ſuch boyling fury in theſe barbarous acts, are as Lunaticks poſſeſſed with an evil ſpirit. You would be amazed to ſee a little girle ſo ſtrong, that there muſt be twenty men to hold her. From whence, I pray, hath ſhe this force, but that ſhe hath the devil in her body? And tell me, a young Gentleman, who many times hath father, mother, wife, children, honours, riches, pleaſures in his life, would he go upon cold bloud to deprive himſelf of all this? Would he contemn the ſacred Edicts of his Prince, now very lately renewed by the zeal of our great Monarch? Would he deſcend with open eyes into hell, if he had not ſome black ſpirit of the abyſs, which dreggeth him to the laſt miſchief? He doth that for a cold countenance, an extravagant word, and a caprich of ſpirit, which he would not either for God, the King, or the whole world. We may well ſay this is the malady of inferiour houſes, and you take it for valour? A poor cocks-comb forſooth, called a ſecond, who putteth into compromiſe at the diſcretion of a crack't brain, all that which is moſt dear unto him in this world, and what he hopeth in the other, going to be the victim of death, or the murderer of a man, whom he never ſaw or knew, or if he have ſeen or known him, ſo far as to love or honour him, would he play all this goodly prize, if he were not poſſeſſed with an evil ſpirit? Yet you admire this. Why do you not rather wonder at the countenances, the twindges, and diſtorted mowings of the poſſeſſed?

I begin to perſwade you to reaſon (ſay you my Gallant:) You are an enemy of this race of Cadmus, derived from the teeth of ſerpents, and think not theſe petty wranglers of the times, with all their letters and challenges have any valour: But if a brave ſpirit be urged to fight by ſuch kind of men, ſhould he refuſe it? Verily there are main differences in duels, in the cauſes which make them, and the proceedings of ſuch as execute them. If you muſt needs go to duel, paſs thereunto, as David, in ſight of an Army, with permiſſion of your Prince or your Captain, againſt ſome Goliah, who hath defied you. Go thither with intention to defend the honour of your Nation, and to weaken the contrary faction. Behold who is worthy. If you muſt go to duel, go thither when your King or Lord ſhall command you to accept the combat, to end ſome notable war, and ſtay a great effuſion of bloud, but by the hazard of two Champions. Behold who is glorious. But if you haſten thither upon ſome chimera of ſpirit, which you call by the name of honour, upon ſome ambiguous word, to which you frame an interpretation againſt your ſelf, for a cold countenance, a ſurly brow, for a deſire which you have to become pledge of the follies of ſome fellow, witleſs, and a ſlave to his own paſſions; if you haſten thither for the love of ſome unchaſte woman, to whom you ſacrifice humane bloud, how can you be excuſable? For if you tell me your honour is more precious unto you than your wealth and life, and therefore, that as the law of nature permitteth you to defend both your riches and body at the point of your ſword, againſt a robber and a homicide, from whom you cannot otherwiſe diſ-engage your ſelf, you have the ſame right for the defence of your reputation, which is in man as the apple in the eye. I anſwer, that being ſo ſurprized upon the ſudden by ſome aſſailant, who provoketh you, threatneth you, and thruſteth his ſword into your ſides, if you uſe not a lawfull defence, it is not then ſaid that you are bound to flie, with ſome kind of ignominy. Nay, I will ſay beſides, that if true honour were intereſſed in refuſal of a challenge, he that ſhould accept it, might likewiſe according to the laws of conſcience ſeem ſomewhat tollerable: But from whom ought we to derive this eſtimation and judgement of true honour? Is it from certain ſleight braggards and witleſs people, who have ſold themſelves to paſſion, eternally to renounce prudence? Behold goodly Judges of honour: Behold who well deſerveth to preſcribe unto us the rule and price of the moſt precious thing in the world.

If we deſired ſincerely to eſtabliſh the judgement to be made of the point of honour, we ought to ſearch into the reſolutions of the Church and Civilians: but theſe kind of people are ſuſpected by you, as being alienated from the profeſſion of arms. Let us enquire it in the mouthes of warriours. Was there ever a braver ſouldier than the late King of moſt famous memory? And hath there likewiſe ever been a Prince more dexterous in arms, and more fortunate than he that now reigneth? Since their Edicts condemn duels, both in thoſe who challenge, and ſuch as are challenged, although much different in their proceedings, what do we need any other judgement to decide the point of honour? But Kings and Princes ſovereign (ſay you) notwithſtanding their Edicts, approve thoſe by word of mouth, who ſhew courage in ſuch like actions. Who dare reproach them with this? Who dare tell them to their faces, that they bely their Edicts by their particular judgements? Who ſees not ſuch words are purpoſely invented by thoſe men, who ſeek for pretexts to their falſe liberties? Why theſe Edicts, dictated by reaſon, agreed unto with judgement, ſupported by juſtice, provoked by piety; to the writing of which, Jeſus Chriſt would contribute his own bloud, to ſpare the bloud, and with it the ſouls of ſo many, as are loſt, and whom to ſave, he gave up his own life? Where ſhould we learn the rule of honour, the judgement, and will of the Prince, but in Oracles and virtues, which he hath conſigned to the memory of all Ages? I intreat you, trouble my head no more with theſe daſtardly combats and deteſtable maſſacres; let this be no longer, but for the infamous and melancholy bloud-thirſters. One Bachet, underſtanding that a Turkiſh Captain had called his companion into duel, What, ſaith he, are there no more Chriſtians? And have not we cauſe to ſay, Are there no Saracens nor Moors, and other Infidels, to turn the edge of the ſword againſt our entrails?

The ſixth SECTION.

Againſt the ill mannage of Arms.

FRom hence it is likewiſe, that you are taught in time of war to play the little Cannibal in arms, and to caſt nothing but fire and bloud from your throat, that menaces may march before you, and havock and deſolation after. Barbarous as you are, do you think becauſe you have a ſword by your ſide, you are therefore a Maſter over the life and bloud of mortals? Never was iron drawn out of the entrails of the earth, but either againſt wilde beaſts, or men who are worſe than beaſts; and you employ it to torment innocent people, whom you ought to protect under your wings. It is a ſtrange thing, that men who are made for the ſupport of men, and who are not ſtrong but for defence of the feeble, are now adayes more pernicious than wolves, hail, ſerpents, inundations, fire, plagues, and famins. Behold that which maketh warfare odious, behold that which diſgraceth an honourable profeſſion, behold that which poureth upon the heads of Great-ones, who countenance ſuch actions, the cups of Gods anger, mingled with gaul, worm-wood, and poiſon of Dragons.

The tears of poor labourers, widdows, and orphans, which are enforced by thoſe who entitle themſelves friends, with cruelties that would juſtifie the Saracens and Moors, ceaſe not to mount to the Throne of God, to ask vengeance on thoſe, who, to ſatisfie their ambitions, glut their appetites, and fiſh in troubled waters, enkindling wars inteſtine, timorarious, and unjuſt, not regarding the diſorders, which ordinarily ariſe from theſe wicked counſels. Oh God! it is a very great matter, that a man can make a hundred thouſand ſwords to be unſheathed in an inſtant, which have no eyes to ſee where they ſtrike, nor hands to pull them back, when they once have received motion. That a man, who hath but one life, ſhould expiate ſo many deaths, ſo many violences, ſo many outrages, as are committed by the unbridled ſouldiers! Much courage muſt be neceſſarily uſed, to make military diſcipline be obſerved, and if theſe furious corruptions cannot be hindred, it were better to abandō the charges and commands, than to cement them up with the bloud and tears of ſo many miſerable ſacrifices.

Juſtice of Beliſarius and Aurelianus.

The brave Beliſarius, who was one of the moſt excellent Captains in the world, having cauſed two ſouldiers to be empaled for ſome crime, ſeeing others to murmure at it: Know (ſaith he) I am come to fight with the arms of Religion and Juſtice, without which we can expect neither victory nor happineſs. I deſire my ſouldiers ſhould have their hands clean to kill an enemy. Never will I ſuffer any man in mine Army, that hath fingers crooked or bloudy, were he in arms as terrible as lightening. Force is of no worth, if it have not equity for companion. Hear a ſouldier ſpeak. He might perhaps have learned the ſame leſſon from the Emperour Aurelian, who wrote to one of his Lieutenants: My friend, If thou wilt be a Captain, nay, if thou wilt live, contain thy ſoldiers in their dutie. I would not that a peaſant ſhould ſo much as complain that he hath been wronged in the value of a chicken, nor that any hath taken a grape from his vine without his permiſſion. I will make him give an account even to a grain of ſalt, or a drop of oyl unjuſtly exacted. I deſire my ſouldiers ſhould be rich with ſpoils of enemies, and not the tears of my ſubjects. I would have them carry their riches upon their ſwords, not into their cabins. I would have them waſte in the houſes of their hoaſts, and that there be no ſpeech of any quarrels.

Procop. l. 1. de bello Vandal.

Vopiſc. in Aurel.

Excellent diſcipline.

And is not that ſtrange which Marcus Scaurus writeth, that there have been ſeen Regiments encamped round about a great tree laden with fruit, and the ſouldiers to depart the next morning, not doing ſo much wrong, as to take one apple from the Maſter of the place? And who would not be amazed at that which Lampridius ſpeaketh of Alexander Severus, that his ſouldiers marched to the Perſian war, like Senatours, and that the Countrey-peaſants loved them as their brothers, and honoured their Emperour as a God? Is it not a ſhamefull thing, that Infidels muſt teach us a leſſon of modeſty, and that this Alexander, who had learned a leſſon from Chriſtians, which was, not to do that to another which we would not have done to our ſelves, obſerved it ſo exactly even in the liberty of arms, that he thereby became as it were adored by his ſubjects? And in the mean time we behold Gentlemen, who never having wanted good precepts, exerciſe tyrannies on their ſubjects, both in peace and war, ſuch as Scythians and Arabians would abhor to do. War cannot now adays be made, but that it ſeems Attila with his Army is raiſed up, once more to pillage France. It is not enemies they ſeek to ſurprize, but purſes: and they are ever criminal enough, who have ſome, though but ſmall wealth to looſe. I know not where to ſeek for his unhappineſs, to find it in its ſource. The ſouldier excuſeth himſelf upon neceſſity, the Captain complaineth of payment, the one filcheth, and the other quarrelleth, whileſt the diſorder is immortal.

O brave and valorous Cavaliers, ought not you herein to ſecond the good intentions of our great King, and baniſh ſuch infamies, not onely from France, but even from the memory of men? If you deſire to ſee how you are to bear your ſelf in war, I will not go about to ſeek out a Saint Martin for you: Behold a man, whoſe life not long ſince hath been publiſhed, to ſerve as a model for the Nobility: we yet touch him as it were with a finger; for he died under the reign of Francis the Firſt, having ſerved three Kings in their Armies the ſpace of two and thirty years. It is the valiant Terrail, otherwiſe called Chevalier Bayard, born in Daulphine. I willingly make uſe of his example, both becauſe one of our moſt warlick Kings, the ſon of Francus the Firſt, would needs be knighted by his hand, to witneſs the honour he bare to his valour, as alſo, for that I ſee therein many noble paſſages, which taſte of the virtue of a true French ſouldier. He was a courageous Captain, of excellent direction, valiant, and magnanimous, of whom was ſaid, that he had the aſſault of a wild bull, the defence of the bore, and flight of the wolf. I ſet aſide his warlick deeds, I take ſome of his virtues, which I here will make uſe of. This Royal courage had no other aim in arms, but the glory of God, the ſervice of his Prince, the honour of his profeſſion: whereof we have an ample teſtimony in a ſhort Elogie, which his Secretary made upon him, ſaying, That after theſe two and thirtie years ſervice, he died almoſt as poor as he was born. Much is ſpoken herein, and I think Bayard more glorious under this title, than if he had born the Dutchy of Milan on his back. He had the true piety of a good ſouldier: For every morning he prayed to God moſt devoutly, and would not permit any man ſhould enter into his Chamber during the time of his devotions: he was ſo obedient to thoſe who commanded in the Army, that he never refuſed any Commiſſion impoſed upon him. Yea, well fore-ſeeing that the laſt charge enjoyned him by the Admiral Bonnivet was moſt dangerous, and as it were impoſſible, yet he went thither, ſacrificing his life to the commandments of the Lieutenant of his Prince, that he might not digreſs from his ordinary cuſtom. There was he ſlain by the moſt generous manner of death that might happen to any Captain of his quality. He was a Lion in arms, who with a choice company of men, ſelected by him, and trained to this profeſſion, wrought ſuch admirable effects, that there was not any battel won, of which he was not ever the principal cauſe. Never was any man more terrible to an enemy in the conflict; but out of it, it was ſaid, he was one of the moſt affable and courteous men of the earth. He was ſo ill a flatterer of Great men, that to gain a Kingdom he would not be drawn to ſpeak any thing but reaſon. His practice was to honour the virtuous, ſpeak little of the vicious, leſs alſo of his own deeds of arms, never to ſwear, do favours to all who required, as willingly as if himſelf were to receive the benefit, to give ſecret alms according to his ability, in ſuch ſort, that it is written, that he, beſides his other acts of piety, married at the leaſt a hundred young mayds. Behold of what what elements his ſoul was inwardly compoſed.

Marvellous contempt of money.

As for the manner of his carriage in the war, he as little cared for money as the dirt of the earth, and deſired not to have any but to give. Witneſs an act of great liberality, which is related of him. He by fair law of arms, took a Spaniſh Treaſurer, who carried with him fifteen thouſand Ducats; one of his Captains, named Tardieu, ſwore, enraged with choller, that he would have part of the booty, becauſe he was in the expedition. This good Captain ſmiling, ſaid to him: It is true, you were of the enterprize, but are not to ſhare in the booty; and were it ſo, you are under my charge, I therefore will give what I think good. This man entered into more violent fury, and went to complain to the General, who having well conſidered the buſineſs, adjudged it wholly to Bayard. He cauſed his Ducats to be carried to a place of ſafety, and commanded them to be ſpred on a table, in preſence of all his people, ſaying to them: Companions, what think you? Do you not here behold fine junkets? Poor Tardieu, who had been put by his pretenſions by expreſs ſentence of his Captains, looked on this money with a jealous eye, and ſaid: If he had the half of it, he would all his life be an honeſt man. Doth that depend on this? ſaith this brave ſpirit? Hold, I willingly give that, which you by force could never obtain, and ſo cauſed at the ſame inſtant ſeven thouſand five hundred Ducats to be told out to him. The other, who in the beginning thought it was but a meer mockery, when he ſaw it to be in good earneſt, and himſelf in poſſeſſion of that he deſired, he caſt himſelf on both his knees at the feet of Bayard, having abundant tears of joy in his eyes, and cried out: Alas my Maſter, my friend, you have ſurpaſſed the liberality of Alexander, how ſhall I ever be able to acknowledge the benefit, which I at this time do receive at your hands? Hold your peace (ſaid this incomparable man) if I had power I would do much more: and thereupon cauſing all the ſouldiers of the Garriſon to be called, he diſtributed the reſt of the Ducats, not keeping one ſole denier for his own uſe.

I ask of you whether this were not a heart of pearl, wherein there could not one leaſt blemiſh of avarice be found? Yea, alſo when he paſſed through the Countrey, even in a land of conqueſt, he paid his expence. And one ſaying unto him, "Sir, This "money is loſt: for at your departure from hence, "they will ſet this place on fire. He anſwered, Sirs, "I do what I ought, God hath not put me into the world, to live by rapine.

An excellent act of Chevalier Bayard.

Purſuing this courſe, he did an act at the taking of Breſcia, a Citie of Italie, for ever memorable, which I will here deduce as it were in the ſame terms as it is couched in his Hiſtory. Which is, that being ſet in the head of the Perdues, he firſt entered and paſſed the rampire, where he was grievouſly hurt in the top of his thigh with the thruſt of a pike, ſo that the iron ſtuck in the wound: he nothing terrified, ſaid to Captain Molard: I am ſlain, but it is no matter, let your men march confidently, the Town is won. Hereupon two ſouldiers bare him out of the throng, and ſeeing the wound ſtreamed forth much bloud, they pulled off their ſhirts, and rent them, to bind up his thigh; then in the firſt houſe they hit upon, they took a little door off the hindges, and laid their poor Captain upon it, to bear him the more eaſily. From thence they went directly to a great houſe, which they ſuppoſed to be very convenient for his accommodation. It belonged to an honeſt Gentleman, who was retired into a Monaſterie to avoid the fury of ſouldiers: For the ſaccadge of this Citie was ſo dreadfull, that there were reckoned, as well of Venetians who defended it, as Burgeſſes, to the number of twenty thouſand ſlain. The Ladie ſtayed in this houſe with two fair daughters, who had hidden themſelves in a barn under hay. As they knocked at the gate, the mother arming her ſelf with reſolution, openeth it, and beholdeth a Captain all bloudy, born upon this plank, who preſently ſet Guards about his lodging, and demanded a place to retire unto. The Ladie leadeth him into the faireſt chamber, where ſhe caſt her ſelf at his feet, and ſaid: Sir, I offer this houſe unto you, and all within it, for I well know it is yours by the law of arms. I onely beg of you, you will be pleaſed to ſave me, and mine honour, as alſo of two poor maids ready to marry, which my huſband and I have had between us. The Captain anſwered: Madame, I do not know whether I ſhall eſcape this wound or no; but I faithfully promiſe you whileſt I live, there ſhall be no injury done to you nor your daughters, no more than to mine own perſon. Onely keep them in your chamber, and let them not be ſeen: Send for your huſband, and aſſure your ſelf you have a gueſt, who will do you all courteſie poſſible. The Ladie much comforted to hear him ſpeak in that manner, obeyed, and employed all her care to give him good entertainment. She preſently perceived ſhe had lodged an honeſt man, when ſhe ſaw the Duke of Namures, the brave Gaſton de Foix, General of the Army, come daily to viſit him, and that theſe men in a Citie of conqueſt, ſpake of paying for all they had taken. The good hoſteſs waited on him, as on an Angel of Heaven, ſo much honour and virtue ſaw ſhe to ſhine in him. When he was cured, and that he ſpake of diſlodging, to be preſent at the battel of Ravenna, where his General paſſionately deſired him, the Ladie, who accounted her ſelf as his priſoner, with her husband and children, conſidering if her gueſt would rigorouſly uſe her, he might draw ten or twelve thouſand crowns from her, reſolved to give him a preſent, and coming into his chamber with a ſervant of hers, who carried a little ſteel box, ſhe preſently threw her ſelf at his feet, but he readily raiſed her up again, not ſuffering ſhe ſhould ſpeak one word, till ſhe was ſeated by him: at which time ſhe made this ſpeech, well obſerved by the Secretary of Bayard:

SIR, The favour which God hath afforded me in the taking of this Citie, by ſending you into this houſe, which is wholly yours, hath not been leſs, than the preſervation of the life of my huſband, mine own, and that of my daughters, with their honour, which they ought to eſteem more precious than life. Beſides, your people have lived with ſuch temper here in my houſe, that being not able to complain of any injuries, I have cauſe for ever to commend their modeſtie. Sir, I am not ſo ignorant of the condition, whereunto the miſery of war hath reduced us, as not very well to ſee, that my huſband, my ſelf, and children, are your priſoners, and that all the goods in the houſe are at your diſcretion, to be diſpoſed of to your liking. But knowing the nobleneſs of your heart, which is incomparable, I am come moſt humbly to beſeech you, to take pitie on your poor captives, and to uſe us according to your accuſtomed liberalitie. Behold a poor preſent which we offer, intreating it may be acceptable. In ſpeaking this, ſhe took the box out of the hands of her ſervant, and opened it before the good Captain, who ſaw it to be full of fair Duckets, at which he ſmiled, replying: Madame, how many Duckets are there in this box? The poor woman, who thought this ſmile proceeded from ſome diſcontentment, anſwered: There are in it but two thouſand five hundred, but if you be not ſatisfied, we will find more. Nay Madame, replied the Captain, I can well aſſure you, that ſhould you give me a hundred thouſand crowns, you could not do me ſo much good, as you have done in the courteous entertainment I have here received. In what place ſoever I ſhall remain, while God gives me life, you ſhall have a Gentleman ready at your command. As for your Duckets, I will none, I render you thanks, take them up again. I have ever more eſteemed people of honour than crowns, and think not, but I go as well satisfied from you, as if this Citie were at your disposition, and you thereof have made me a present.

She again prostrateth her self on her knees, and the Captain lifting her up, answered: No Sir, I should think my self for ever the most unhappy woman of the world, if you accept not this present, which is nothing in comparison of the infinite obligations I owe to your worth. Well, saith he, since you give it with so good a will, I accept it for your sake; but cause your daughters to come hither, for I will bid them farewell. These good creatures had charitably assisted him, during the time of his infirmity, in the presence of their mother, many times touching the lute, whereon they played very well, for his recreation. They fell at his feet, and the eldest made a short speech in her mother language, to thank him for the preservation of their honour. The Captain heard it as it were weeping, for the sweetness and humility he therein observed, and then said: Ladies, you do that which I ought to do, which is to give you thanks for the many good helps you have afforded me, for which I find my self infinitely obliged. You know men of my profession are not readily furnished with handsom tokens, to present fair maidens withal: But behold, your good Ladie mother hath given me two thousand five hundred Duckets; take each of you a thousand, as my gift; for so I am resolved it shall be. Then turning to his Hostess: Madame, saith he, I will take these five hundred to my self, to distribute them among poor religious women, who have been ransacked; and I recommend the charge thereof to you; for you better than any other understand where there is necessity. At this time, the Ladie touched to the quick with so great a piety, spake these words, couched in the History in ancient language: O flower of Chivalrie, to whom no other may be compared! our blessed Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, who for sinners suffered death and passion, both here in this world, and in the other, reward you. The Gentleman of the house, who at that time heard the courtesie of his guest, came to thank him with bended knee, making offer of his person and his whole estate. The young Gentlewomen, who were skilfull at the needle, made him a present of two bracelets, woven with threed of gold and silver; and a purse of crimson sattyn, very richly wrought. He very graciously receiving them, Behold, saith he, I have more than ten thousand crowns: and instantly he put the bracelets on his arms, and the purse in his pocket, assuring them whilest these gifts lasted, he would wear them for their sakes. Thereupon he mounted on horseback, accompanied with his true friend, the Lord D'Aubigny, and about two or three thousand men; the Lady of the house, the daughters, and the whole family, as bitterly deploring his departure, as if they should have been put to the sword. Idemãd of you, if the stars were to descend from heavẽ, whether they might find more love and respect? Where be these silly fencers, who are as comets of fire and bloud, to bear murder, pestilence, and poison into houses, who make the pillars of buildings to tremble with the force of blasphemies, who load whole families with injuries, wounds, and scars, who pill and ravage like Harpies, fed with humane bloud? Should they do nothing else all their life, but heap up mountains of gold and silver, they could not arrive to the least part of the contentment which this good Captain enjoyed, who sought no other recompence from his great actions, but the satisfaction of his conscience, and the glory to have done well. Thus is it, O Noblemen, that hearts are gained, to make a crown of immortality: Thus is Heaven obliged, and earth tributary to virtues.

The seventh SECTION.

Against sensual love and impuritie.

I May well say, that among all the qualities of a Nobleman, there is not any hath a sweeter odour than temperance, which represseth the voluptuous pleasures of the body. Let no man flatter you in the passion of love, as if it were a prime virtue of your profession. Believe me, it is the worm which gnaweth all great actions, the moth which eateth all the vigour of spirit, the stain which defileth all the fairest ornaments of life, the labyrinth which hindereth all generous designs, the rock which wracketh all vessels, the gulf which devoureth bodies and souls.

Divers kinds of love.

The wise Secretaries of nature have observed, that all creatures which have the breath of fire, have the tayl of a Dragon. Nor likewise do we ever see carnal love vehemently enflamed, but that it produceth some serpentine, hydeous, and disasterous issue. I affirm, fire penetrateth into the marrow of the total nature of the Universe, but hath effects very different, according to the subjects wherein it resideth. It otherwise scorcheth in Heaven, otherwise in hell, otherwise in the bodies of beasts, otherwise in sulphur and gun-powder, and such like bodies able to receive its action. It filleth the stars in Heaven with a flame full of lustre and honour: It tormenteth the damned in hell, it entertaineth the life of creatures, it wasteth all bodies drie or oily, to reduce them either into ashes or smoak. Take my comparison, and say with me, there are lovers who burn as Heaven, others as hell, others as bodies well composed, others as oyl and wood.

The first lovers have the ardours of Heaven, who entertain chaste and spiritual love for things Divine. These are pleasures, which the jealous eye cannot espie, the slanderous tongue cannot bite, bad report is not accustomed to defame; which equals have no cause to envie, nor can Tyrants, armed with horrour of so many torments, find the means how to take it from Martyrs. When we love God, we find him every where, we speak to him every where, we serve him every where, and every where we feel the services done to him, have their recompence. We talk to him as well in the whales belly as in the flaming furnace; witness Jonas and the three children, who found Chappels wholly built in the entrails of fishes and flames; because the love of God, the wisest architect of the world, had framed such for them.

The second lovers burn as hell, who live perpetually in stinking, wicked, and infamous concupiscences, in dark, extraordinary, and desperate passions, who are in sensuality as in an abyss, fettered with a long chain of servitude, never having any part of the air, or light of the children of God.

The third are as bodies mixed, who entertain conjugal, honest, and moderate amities; such as are found in good marriages, which are used according to God, in all honour and sanctity.

Those of the fourth order, enkindle one another, as so many little bodies that daily minister fuel to the fire, wasting spirit, flesh, and means, in certain frivolous and giddly loves, which after much use, make men of vapour, ashes, and smoak. You now adays shal find, that affections purely conjugal are very rare, and celestial loves much more; but every where there are many men, who burn like hell or pitch.

Four sorts of love.

There are four sorts of love, which have been great enemies, and still are, to the reputation of a good souldier: the one is the love of sensuality, the other of fantasie, the third of servitude, and the fourth of fury. On what side soever you turn your face, assure your self, Sir, you shall find nothing beautifull in this ugly beast.

Love of sensuality.

Love of sensuality, which subsisteth onely in voluptousnes of body, is a bruitish, base, and wandering love, which is ever employed to spie out and trade for flesh, having no other design, but to satiate an unworthy concupiscence, more unsatisfied than fire, the abyss, and hell. If nature had created you some Mustapha to grow fat in a Seraglio, & that you had had never heard ſpeech of good or honour, it were tollerable: but to ſee a brave ſouldier, well born and bred up, to paſs his life in laying ſnares for chaſtity, to ſearch out of both ſexes ſuch as make traffick of the ſins of others, to train up a wicked ſervant to be the meſſenger of your paſſions, to promiſe, ſwear, forſwear, to ſeduce poor forſaken maids, to caſt them from neceſſity into diſgrace, and from diſgrace into deſpair, how can it be but abominable.

Think you the earth is made to be repleniſhed with your ſins, and charities to be inſtituted to ſupport your crimes? It is idleneſs that ſerves as a ſtore-houſe for your paſſions, and it is your remiſneſs which doth not ſo much as vouchſafe to ſeek out a remedy. If you be reſolved to lead ſuch a life, give up your ſword, for you diſhonour it. It is no reaſon that it alone ſhould retain the virginity, which all your other members have loſt. You cannot well ſerve two miſtreſſes, Venus and Bellona, ſince they are ſo different. And go not about to propoſe to your ſelf that Sampſon, David, and Cæſar, made them well accord together: believe me, when they came to be laſcivious they ceaſed to be valiant.

It was neither with the looking-glaſs nor comb of Dalila, that Sampſon ſlew a thouſand Philiſtines, but with the jaw-bone of an Aſs. Whileſt he preſerved himſelf from women, he was a ſun, and a thunder-bolt; a ſun to enlighten his Nation, a thunder-bolt to deſtroy the Philiſtines. So ſoon as a woman had ſhaved him, he of a ſun became a coal, of a thunder-bolt a vapour, and of a man a lame jade, who from the field of battel, was ſent to mill, no longer having eyes, but to deplore the diſaſter of his loves with tears of bloud. When David in the liſt overthrew the Giant, he had not then received the wound from Bath-ſheba's eye. But after he had ſeen her at the fountain, his eyes ceaſed not to caſt forth flouds, and love dried up all his Laurels, that they had very much ado to wax green again in the water of ſo many tears. Hold it alſo for undoubted, that Cæſar being in the ſnows of the Gauls, thought not of committing adulteries at Rome; the buſineſs or war took from him all the taſte of love, and never did he ſubmit to the imaginations of a beaſt, till he retained no more deſigns worthy of a man. Voluptuouſneſs never acteth any thing great, but hath deſtroyed all that is great. And when God is pleaſed to overthrow Empires, he chooſeth ſouldiers who have chaſte hands, to chaſtiſe the effeminate. So Arbaces vanquiſheth Sardanapalus: So Alexander, who would not look upon Queens, his priſoners, but with an eye of chaſtity, defeated the Perſians, bond-ſlaves to luxury: So the Gothes gained the Empire of Rome, as ſaith Salvianus, God being willing to purge the earth, which the Romans had defiled, by the arms of a Nation more chaſte than themſelves, it being reaſonable, that thoſe ſhould enjoy their goods, who would have no ſhare in their vices.

Love of fantaſies.

The love of fantaſie is more ſottiſh than malicious or ſordid. There be Cavaliers, who perſwade themſelves they are the braveſt men of their Age, and that all Ladies, who ſometimes love vapour where it is not be loved, muſt of neceſſity have love in ſtore for them. They enter into ſo great vanities, as they caſt their affections upon none but Princeſſes, or eminent beauties, eſteeming the reſt of the world too baſe for the entertainment of their affections. They reſemble thoſe birds of Ægypt, who will not build their neſts but upon Palms; nor will they love but in a high place. Of this quality were Endimion and the Emperour Caligula, who in the end diſtaſting all the women in the world, transferred the ambition of their loves above the ſphere of fire, ſuppoſing they were hardy enough to take the Moon in marriage. One would not believe the frenzie of this paſſion, if we had not by experience ſeen men of moſt baſe extraction, with much content to entertain their thoughts upon the loves of the Queens of Antioch and Sicilie, tranſporting themſelves with joy, whenſoever it was told them they were entered far into their gracious favours. This is it which maketh me ſay, that we in two things know the greatneſs of our ſoul, to wit, that it can frame a world to its knowledge, as God hath created one in nature; and can lodge the thoughts in ſo high a place, that the pooreſt begger of the world can entertain affection for the moſt eminent perſon of the earth. The rich, who do as it were forbid the uſe of elements, cannot deny love, but it is a groſs infirmity to love out of the ſphere of your power, that which you can no more enjoy than the Moon in the Heavens. If we will love aloft, let us love him who hath made us. When once we have paſſed far into his heart, we ſhall find all the greatneſs of the world much lower than our feet.

If you, my ſouldier, entertain theſe fantaſtick loves, I from this preſent will ſend you to the Strophad Iſlands, with thoſe who ſearch for the hand of glory, the Philoſophers ſtone, and quadratura circuli, and who oft-times diſtil the money out of their purſes, with that little brain which is left them, through the ſame limbeck.

Love of bondage.

I fear you rather have the love of ſervitude, and make a Goddeſs of a piece of fleſh, to which it is your glory to ſacrifice your liberty, being ſo blind, as to kiſs the fetters of your ſlavery, inſtead of breaking them. Verily it is a pittifull thing to ſee a man burn in ice, and congeal in fire, having the colour wan, the viſage meagre, the eyes hollow, the cheeks ſunk, the ſpirit giddy, the reaſon uncollected, and the heart wholly feaveriſh, for the love of a creature who flouteth him. To ſee a man who walketh in his ſolitude, and creepeth like a ſpectre, not knowing whether he be of the number of the living or dead, who ſpeaketh, writeth, who prieth, who hopeth, who feareth, laugheth, ſigheth, waxeth pale, bluſheth, deſireth, deteſteth, dieth, riſeth again, ſinketh into an abyſs, and then toucheth Heaven with a finger, who playeth a Comedy of a dozen Perſonages in one hour, and paſſeth through more metamorphoſes in a day, than Ovid in three years.

Oh what a miſerable thing is it, ſaith the golden mouth of Conſtantinople, to ſeek to be roſted in aſhes, and ſo deſperately love a beauty, which is onely fair in the fantaſie of a feaveriſh brain, and of which in a ſhort time the moſt licorous worms would ſcorn to make their dung-hill! O my ſouldier, let ſuch a frenzie never enter into your heart; you were better ſerve a Turk or an Arabian, than ſuch a love. It is the punais-worm, which bites while ſhe liveth, and after death maketh her infection to be felt. Why go you about to idolatrize a woman? Have you not ſlavery enough at home, but you muſt needs ſeek it abroad? Withdraw your ſelf in good time from this captivity, gain the haven before the ſtorm ſurprize you; for if you once be engaged, there is neither arm nor oar can ſerve to bring you back again. Is it not a comely thing, think you, to behold a ſouldier, who hath a ſword by his ſide, able to hew monſters, to ſeek to play the cocks-comb in queſt of a wily wench, that exerciſeth the moſt infamous tyranny over him that ever was heard of? It is ſaid Omphale took the Diadem from a King named Hercules, and ſet her ſlippers on his head: That Dionyſius the Tyrant wrote the expeditions of his Kingdom with his hand, and that Mirrha cancelled or ſigned them at her pleaſure: That King Athanaricus tied the ſtrings of Pincia's ſhoes: That Themiſtocles cauſed himſelf to be purged and let bloud with his captive Miſtreſs. He that ſhould ſee all the follies of the entranced lovers, might obſerve an infinite number of matters much more ſtrange.

In

In ſerving a ſcornfull piece, who makes you die a thouſand times a day, you can oft-times hope for no other thing but ever to ſerve, and if you come to the end of your pretenſions, brag not ſo much; you perhaps have nothing, but that which ſervants, or perſons more unworthy, have obtained before you. This well deſerveth indeed to betray your honour, and to commit ſuch filly actions; but if you open your eyes to ſee the end of this goodly ſtage-play, you ſhall do as thoſe, who cauſed themſelves to be ſhaved when they eſcaped a ſhip-wrack: you would not let ſo much as a hair remain upon that young head, which ſuffered it ſelf to run at liberty after ſuch ſottiſh loves.

Love of fury. If you plunge your ſelf further into this paſſion, you ſhall find fury, which tieth cords, which mingleth poiſons, which ſharpeneth ſwords, which openeth black caverns, which erecteth gibbets, which kindleth coals, which prepareth racks, which produceth all that may diſcover the proceedings of an engaged love, and which maketh an arrow of all crimes, to hit the mark it aimed at.

Were I in your place, I would tear from my heart the ſleighteſt cogitations which occur by this folly, as cankers, vermine, and ſerpents; and I would ride on poſt, if it were poſſible, beyond the elements, with purpoſe to avoid ſuch encounters. All the braveſt ſouldiers have made boaſt of chaſtity. It was the trophey of Cyrus, to whom God for this cauſe gave all the treaſures of Aſia: It was the triumph of Alexander, who in recompence had the conqueſt of the Perſians: and the Emperour Julian, who made profeſſion to imitate him, although he had renounced all the Sacraments, would never forſake chaſtity, which he had learned amongſt Chriſtians: ſaying, This virtue made beautifull lives, as Painters fair faces. But not to ſearch any further into the ruins of antiquity, look what your Bayard did upon this point: behold an admirable paſſage, which I will relate in the ſame words as it is expreſſed in his hiſtory.

Julianus apud Ammianum.

A Royal act of military chaſtitie. They had cauſed a young maid to be conveyed into his chamber, which was one of the faireſt creatures of the world, and indeed ſhe was endowed with an Angelical grace, but that her eyes were ſwoln with extremity of tears. When the Captain ſaw her, How now, fair maid, ſaith he unto her, what ſay you? Why come you hither? The poor creature fell on her knees, and ſaid: Alas Sir, my mother hath commanded me I ſhould do what you would have me; yet I am a virgin, and never had I any diſpoſition to do ill, were it not neceſſitie enforced me thereunto; for my mother and my ſelf are ſo poor, that we periſh for hunger: and I wiſh to God I were dead, before I commit this act, or at leaſt that I were not in the number of unhappy maids. The noble Lord touched to the quick with the words of this creature, anſwered her, having tears in his eyes: Verily, pretty ſoul, I will not be ſo wicked, as to take that from you, which you ſo faithfully have kept for God. Thereupon he cauſed her to be veiled, covering her with a mantle, leſt ſhe might be known, he lighted a torch, and not recommending her to any other, conducted her himſelf, to reſt in the houſe of his kinſwoman. The next day he ſent for the mother, and ſaid to her: Are not you a wicked woman to betray the honour of your daughter, which ought to be more dear unto you than life? You deſerve a puniſhment ſo much the more rigorous, as that I underſtand you are a Ladie: for in doing this, you wrong Nobilitie. The poor woman wholly confounded, knew not what elſe to anſwer, but that they were as poor as might be. Is there no man, ſaith he, who requires her in marriage? Yes truly, ſaith ſhe, an honeſt man, a neighbour of mine, but he demandeth ſix hundred florens, and I am not worth the one half of it.

Then the brave Bayard drew out his purſe, and ſaid, Hold, here are two hundred crowns, which are of more value than ſix hundred florens of this Countrey to marry your daughter withal. I adde alſo thereunto a hundred more to cloth her, and a hundred to relieve your poverty; but my will is you diſpatch it in three days: all which was accordingly done with an unſpeakable joy of the mother and daughter, which made them live thenceforth very honourably.

O Nobility, I preſent not here unto you an Hermit, it is a Captain, it is a French ſouldier, who was compoſed of no other fleſh, bones, nor bloud, than you, while he in the mean time performeth an act of a Religious man the moſt mortified: he exerciſeth the liberality of a King, he equalleth therein, and as it were ſurmounteth the heroical deeds of the greateſt Saints. It is true, that S. Nicolas ſaved the honour of virgins, contributing thereunto his gold and ſilver: It is true, that in doing it he generouſly triumphed over the covetouſneſs of temporal goods: but he ſerved not in this action, as a triumph to himſelf, which is verily the choiſeſt piece of eminent virtues. Behold a Cavalier, who vanquiſheth both avarice and love, the two moſt dangerous rocks of the world. Bayard commandeth his purſe in a fortune not the beſt accommodated, which meriteth not the leaſt applauſe; but Bayard commandeth himſelf in a flouriſhing age, in a vigorous body, in preſence of an object ſo amiable. I beſeech you let us no longer ſay, that chaſtity is onely found in Cloyſters, it is every where, where the fear of God is, where generoſity or real virtue is. What can ſo many wretches anſwer to this, who fill the world with ſins, the Nobility with diſgraces, their bodies with diſeaſes, their name with infamy, and load ſo many poor abuſed creatures with miſeries and deſpair? What can ſo many ſpruce Gallants anſwer, who brave it through the ſtreets, and make oſtents in borrowed feathers, and in habits, ſtanding indebted to the Mercer for the ſtuff, and to the poor Taylor for the faſhion, paying neither the one nor other? True jack-daws of Eſope, who deſerve that all other birds ſhould aſſemble to pull their plumes off, which they have ſtoln to entertain their vanity. What will here ſo many gluttons and gameſters anſwer, who eat and rent up the entrails of men by their bloudy riots? Is it poſſible, that this ſouldier ſhould have four hundred crowns, which was then a huge ſum, to give in one onely alms, and thoſe who in bravery talk of nothing elſe but piſtolets, the belly, and game, have not a denier to throw to a poor body?

I will alſo ſhew you an eſſential virtue of your profeſſion, which is a certain mixture of honeſty, juſtice, and loyalty due to the King, the Weal-publick, your conſcience, even towards your enemies themſelves, in the example of this admirable man, juſtly called The Captain without fault.

The eighth SECTION.

Againſt the perfidiouſneſs of intereſts.

THere is given to you for the accompliſhment of theſe goodly precepts, a great virtue of the time, which is to betray faith, Altars, and all that which is precious in nature, or magnificent in Religion, to advance your fortune, without any fear at all to trample on the throats of your moſt faithfull friends, that you may go directly to the Temple of Honour, or the riches of the world. Poor Janiſary, think you that to be the ſhorteſt way? Have you never learned, that if you take fidelity out of the world, you pull down the principal Altar of the Temple, the ſanctity of humane hearts, the commerce of men; the repoſe of life, the knot and band of all felicities? Perjury, ſaith an Oracle, hath a ſon without ſon without name, feet, or hands, and who wandereth up and down throughout the world, and cruſheth in pieces the heads of the perfidious, even to the fourth generation. You in the ſubſequent diſcourſes ſhall behold the goodly ſucceſſes of ſuch proceedings: I for this preſent tell you, to ſtrengthen theſe precepts, that were faith and integritie baniſhed from the reſt of the world, they might be found in the heart of a French ſouldier.

Our excellent Bayard, from whom I more affect ſtill to derive this model, than from any other, made it well appear in an affair, where the life of the moſt eminent man of the Church was intereſſed. He was at that time in Italie, ſent by the King to aſſiſt the Duke of Ferrara againſt the armie of Pope Julius, then much oppoſite to France, although ſo many other worthy Popes heartily loved our Nation. See the cauſe, why he ſent to the Duke one Mounſieur Auguſtine Gerlo, a Gentleman of Milan, a traitour, and factious to perſwade him to forſake the French alliance with intention to deſtroy them, and that in recompence he would give him his neece in marriage, and make him Captain General of the Church. This Prince would not in any wiſe underſtand him, but he handled the matter ſo by his policie and advantagious promiſes, that he gained this Auguſtine, who gave him his hand, that he in few days would deſtroy the Pope, by the help of a miſchievous morſel, which he could eaſily give him. The Duke of Ferrara underſtanding theſe propoſitions, went to find out the noble Bayard in his lodging, and made a long diſcourſe to him of the evil diſpoſition of Pope Julius, and the enterpriſes he had, both on his life, and of the Frenchmen, of purpoſe to enkindle him for revenge. Then he purſued his opportunitie, and made overture to him of the treaſon of this wicked Gerlo. Bayard beheld him, and ſaid, How Sir? I could never have imagined that a Prince ſo generous as you, would conſent to ſuch a miſchief: and had you done it, I ſwear by my ſoul, before night I would have given the Pope notice of it. How? anſwered the Duke, he would have done as much either to you or me. It is no matter, replieth Bayard, this treatherie diſpleaſeth me. The Duke ſhrugged up his ſhoulders, and ſpitting on the ground, Mounſieur Bayard, ſaith he, I would I had killed all mine enemies in this ſort: but ſince you diſlike it, the matter ſhall reſt, and you and I both may have cauſe to repent it. We ſhall not if it pleaſe God, replyeth the good ſouldier; but I pray you put this gallant into my hands, that would do this goodly piece of ſervice; and if I do not cauſe him to be hanged in an hour, let me ſupply his place. The other excuſed it, ſaying, he had given him aſſurance of his perſon.

Behold you not a brave ſpirit? See you not a man of a Royal conſcience, and of an honeſtie in all things like to it ſelf? Where are theſe pettie ſpirits of the abyſs, more black than ſpecters and infernal furies, who have neither loyaltie for their Prince nor Common-wealth, but as it may concern their own intereſts, who ſwallow treaſons as big as cammels, to gain a flie? They would make truth it ſelf to lie, were not their iſſues ever tragical, abominable, and hideous.

The ninth SECTION.

Short and notable Inſtructions.

Auguſt. ep. 80. MY ſouldier, follow the precepes, which the great S. Auguſtine gave to Captain Boniface. Obſerve faith and virtue in Arms, which never will be proſperous on earth, if they be not fortified with bleſſings from Heaven. Beg of God, with David, to deliver you from your neceſſities, which are your paſſions: he doth nothing to overcome viſible enemies, that have power over bodies, who ſurmounteth not the inviſible, bandied againſt the health of our ſouls. Make uſe of the world, as a thing borrowed: do good with its goods, and become not bad. They are goods, ſince they come from God, who extendeth his power over all things both celeſtial and temporal. They are goods, ſince God gives them to good men; but they are not alſo great goods, ſince he affords them to the wicked. He takes them away from the virtuous, to trie their virtue, and from the perverſe, to chaſtiſe their crimes. It is true, ſtrength, health, victorie, honour, wealth, are indifferently the portion of all men; but conqueſt over paſſions, virtues, ſalvation of ſoul, immortalitie of bodie, glorie, honour, beatitude, are the proper inheritance of Saints. Love theſe goods, deſire them, ſeek them with all your endeavour, do almsdeeds to get them, faſt as much as your forces will permit: all here below paſſeth away but good works.

Think when you go to the wars, that the ſtrength of your bodie is a gift of God, & that it is not fit to arm againſt your ſovereign Maſters proper benefits. Keep promiſe even with your enemies, make peace with all the world voluntarily, and war for neceſſity to acquire the good of peace. Be peacefull even in Arms, for ſuch men are called the children of God. If it be neceſſarie to kill an enemie in fight, let mercy be always exerciſed in the latter end of the combat, principally, when there is no further fear of rebellion. Adorn your manners with conjugal chaſtitie, ſobrietie, and modeſtie. It is a ridiculous thing to conquer men, and be vanquiſhed by vices; to eſcape the ſword, and be overthrown by wine. If you want means, ſeek it not on earth by wicked practices, but ſecure rather in Heaven that little you have, by the exerciſe of good works.

Flee theſe rocks of Nobilitie, which we have hitherto ſpoken againſt, and above all bridle preſumption, choller, the tongue, and ſenſuallitie.

They are ſlaves, who cannot keep in the mean, between ſervitude and Empire, where either chains muſt be had to maſter them, or a Throne erected to honour them. Peſumption, if you afford it enterance, will make you of a man a baloon filled with wind, a ſcare-crow of honour, a temerarious thing void of courage, an undertaker without ſucceſſe, a phantaſtick without ſhame, which in the end ſhall become burdenſome to it ſelf, and odious to all the world. Choller and folly are two ſiſters, which have in all things the ſame qualities; or if there be any difference, it is, that the one with more furie maketh havock in an inſtant, and the other produceth her effects with more leiſure and cheerfulneſs: whileſt you are ſubject to this paſſion, no man can confide in you in matter of judgement, no more than to weather-cocks in the point of ſtabilitie: you will have all other vices in-ſeed, and perpetually live in the ſorrow of time paſt, diſturbance of the preſent, and uncertaintie of the future. As for the tongue, it is that which containeth all the good or evil of man: It is the needle of the great dial of the ſoul, that muſt ſhew all the hours. It is the truche-man of our thoughts, the image of our actions, the interpreter of our wills, and the principal key of converſation. He that will now adays live in the world, ſaith the famous S. Nazianzen, muſt have a veil over his eys, a key on his ear, a compaſs on his lips. A veil over his eyes, not to ſee, or in ſeeing to diſſemble many things; a key on his ears, to ſhut them up againſt ſo many follies and ordures, which proceed from bad mouthes: and a compaſs on the lips, to meaſure and ſquare out all his words with diſcretion. So many ſecrets unneceſſarily diſcovered, ſo many infamous ſlanders, ſo many inconſiderate tales, ſo many frivolous promiſes, ſo many impudent lyes ſuch perjuries and execrable blaſphemies, ſo many diſaſters which oft happen for a ſleight ſpeech, daily teach us, that words have no handles to hold them by, and better it is to trip with the foot than the tongue.

Senſualitie, if you powerfully reſiſt it not from the firſt reflections which reaſon may preſent, will make you a thing of nothing. The three ſpirits, wine, love, and game, will fetter you with a prodigious ſlavery. You will become a living ſepulchre, a tomb of ſurphets and ſlaughters, a gulf of calumnies, a meer hobgoblin without repoſe, which ſhall continually handle cards and dice, to bereave you of your purſe and underſtanding, ſo to make a ſpoil of your goods, a frencie of your reaſon, and a perpetual feaver of your life.

Your condition ought not to make you pretend power over men, if you ſeaſonably enterpriſe it not over your own paſſions. Beware how you enter into the liſt among ſo many noble ſpirits, there to diſcover your weakneſſe, and to adde nothing to the luſtre of the honour of ſo many worthy Anceſtours, but to render your own crimes the more remarkable. Shew your ſelf herein a reaſonable man, and endeavour that all your actions may be as lines, which grow from the centre of wiſdome, to be produced with all felicitie. Remember things paſt, rectifie the preſent, foreſee thoſe to come. Above all, learn to ſet a true eſtimation upon every thing in the world, and ſuffer not your ſelf to be ſurpriſed by the illuſions of ſo many objects, which when they have charmed the eyes, and overthrown reaſon, leave nothing behind them, but ſorrow to have done ill, and impotencie of doing well.

In converſation take the meaſure of your ſelf, and the like of thoſe with whom you deal, to husband and accommodate your ſelf reaſonably to all the world; yielding to every one the reſpect which his merit ſeems to require. The exerciſe of devotion will not hinder you from the endeavour how to become an able man in your profeſſion, from being honeſt, civil, diſcreet, affable, liberal, obliging, ſtout, couragious, patient, which are the principal qualities of a Courtier.

It is not deſired, that to be devout, you ſhould have a ſpirit drowzie, ſluggiſh, overwhelmed, not that through overmuch ſimplicitie you make profuſion of your ſelf, in an Age, where bountie ſeemeth to be the prey of inſolent ſpirits. Wiſdom will teach you neither to intrude nor pour out your ſelf; to diſſemble through virtue that which ought to be concealed; to adapt your ſelf to companies and affairs, to believe nothing lightly, nor to promiſe nor decide any thing without conſideration; to perſevere in certain things not ill, becauſe you have begun them; not to be harſh, nor too much complying, ſince the one taſteth of brutiſhneſs, the other inclines to flatterie. To propoſe to your ſelf good and evil, which may ariſe from an affair, to moderate the one, and tollerate the other. Above all, honour the King next after God, as the ſource of all greatneſs, and the fountain of the moſt noble lights, which reflect on Nobilitie. Honour him with profound reſpect, as the lively Image of God. Love him ſincerely, ſerve him with all fidelitie. If you be employed in affairs and governments, endeavour to perfiſt therein with conſcience and honour, which are the two manſions of a great ſoul. If you have merit without employment and recompence, ſay not therefore that all is loſt. It is a good buſineſs to be well at reſt, to manure your ſpirit, to enable your ſelf with reading and peaceable converſion, to govern your houſe. Learn nothing, but what you ought to know. Search that onely which you may profitably find; deſire nothing, but what you may honourably wiſh for. And be not conceited to run after a ſpectre of imaginarie favour, nor to mount to a place, where you cannot ſtay without fear, nor fall without ruin.

So many great Monarchs, ſo many Princes, Lords, and valorous men, who are come from Courts and the profeſſion of arms, to enter into the Temple of pietie, aſſure us, this life is capable of Saints, and that no man ought to deſpair of virtue, but he who renounceth it. If the brevitie of this Treatiſe would permit, I would willingly ſet before you, a David, a Joſias, an Ezechias, a Charlemaign, a S. Lewis, a Hermingildes, a Henry, a Stephen, a Caſimire, a Godfrey of Bovillon, a Wenceſlaus, an Edward, an Elzear, an Amideus: I would make you ſee flouriſhing Squadrons of Martyrs, drawn from warfare, amongſt which you would admire a Maurice, an Exuperius, a Sebaſtian, a Marius, a Memnas, an Olympiades, a Meliton, a Leontius, a Maximus, a Julian, an Abdon, a Sennen, a Valens, a Priſcus, a Marcellus, a Marcellinus, a Severinus, a Philoromus, a Philoctemon, and ſo many ſuch like. Finally, I would ſhew in the latter Ages men worthy of all honour, eminent in arms, and enobled with ſingular pietie; but I now content my ſelf to draw from Euſebius, Theodoret, Nicephorus, Zozimus, Socrates, Sozomenus, Cedrenus, and above all Cardinal Baronius, the life of Great Conſtantine, who hath been the very prime man amongſt Chriſtian princes, and hath witneſſed, eſpecially after his Baptiſm, a maſculine pietie, and a great example of ſanctitie.

CON-

CONSTANTINE.

The first SECTION.

The Providence of God over Constantine.

I Will ſhew to Chriſtian Nobilitie its ſource in the life of the prime Gentleman of Chriſtianitie. If we reſpect antiquitie, greatneſs, and dignitie, we ſhall not find a Prince either more anciently noble than he, who firſt of all among Emperours deſerved the title of Chriſtian, or more truly great than he, who ſo happily engraffed the empire of the univerſe on the tree of the Croſs; or more juſtly honourable than he, who cemented his honour with the bloud of the Lamb. It is the admirable Conſtantine, who ſo perfectly allied valour to pietie, Monarchy to humilitie, the wiſdom of the Croſs to the government of the world, the nails and thorns of the paſſion, to the Diadem of Kings and delights of the Court, that he hath left matter of meditation for the wiſe, of profit for Religious, of imitation for Monarchs, and of wonder for thoſe who admire nothing vulgar.

Greatneſs of Conſtantine.

Behold a marvellous Theatre of the providence of God, whereunto I would willingly invite all thoſe ſpirits, repleat with humane policie, and deveſted of heavenly Maxims, who are onely great by the greatneſs of their ruin, to ſee how the breath of God demoliſheth the Towers of Babel, to raiſe the walls of Sion, how the ſubtil are ſurprized in their ſubtility, how the ſcience of men becometh blind in its proper lights, how the vigour of the world is ſlain by its own hands, how ſtabilitie is overturned by the ſupports it chooſeth, how the ſpirit of fleſh at unawares contributeth to plant the Croſs on the top of Capitols and heads of Monarchs, by the ſame ways wherewith it promiſed to over-cloud them with darkneſs and abyſſes.

Theatre of Divine Providence.

I here produce a Conſtantius, bred up very young in the Court of Diocletian, who had an intention to become a ſcourge to Chriſtianitie: but God ſurprized him therein, as Moſes in the Court of Pharaoh, to ſtop the ſtream of perſecution, to calm the tempeſts of the time, confound Idols, and raiſe the Church on the ruins of Gentiliſm.

Reader, ſtay a little on the frontiſpice of this hiſtory, and behold how the Eternal Providence led this young Conſtantine by the hand, like another Cyrus, to humble the Great-ones of the earth before his face, and to give him hidden treaſures; to take from him ſo many bars and impediments, to open for him ſo many gates of iron, and to cauſe ſo many Kings to turn their faces and afford him their place. Iſaiah 45.

There was at that time twelve heads, which already either wore the diadem, or thought themſelves capable of it. Diocletian and Maximian held the higheſt place: They had choſen for Succeſſours Galerius and Conſtantius Clorus, father of our Conſtantine. Galerius had made two other Cæſars, Severus and Maximinus. Maxentius, ſon of Maximian, violently lently drew upon himself the Purple by main force, Licinius furiously opposed him to gain it. Constantius, Dalmatius, Hannibal, brothers of Constantine by the fathers side, beheld this goodly game, and might well hope to have some part therein, as being legitimate sons of Theodora, whom Constantius Clorus had espoused when he rejected S. Helena. Constantine saw himself the furthest off, through the disgrace of his mother, yet did the anointment of God make choice of him, dispersing all the rest by such and so divers ways, as we shall afterward behold, to place him in the throne, onely absolute and independent, and to establish him with a long continuance of years, and a large posterity, had it pursued the way which he traced.

The state of the Church under Diocletian.

Consider what then was the state of the Church, and view the wonders of the powerful hand of God. Diocletian had undertaken to raze from the memory of men the name of Christianity; and being an imperious man, who would as it were that the Heavens and elements should observe no other course but according to his will, and engaged very far in this affair, bare himself with such excess of cruelty, that for about three hundred years, that the Christians were persecuted, there had nothing been like the persecution raised under his Empire.

Then was the time, when in full assembly of publick games, which ordinarily were presented at Rome, the cries of an innumerable multitude were heard, who to flatter the design of the Prince, loudly proclaimed two and twenty times; Christiani tollantur, Auguste, Christiani tollantur, Let the Christians be taken away, O Emperour, let the Christians be rooted out. Then was the time that dreadful Edicts of persecution were affixed on every place, that the earth was covered with bloud and massacres, and slaughters dispersed as it were in all the parts of the habitable world. Christians were accounted as the dregs of mankind, the scorn of the earth, and object of all cruelties. Some were shut up in caves, not daring to appear in publick, excluded from commerce and society of men, deprived of necessities, which nature would have to be common to all the world, they not being permittted to draw water from wels, or to buy a handful of herbs in the market, unless they presented incense to Idols, purposly fixed in publick places. Others crept up and down in the deserts, among wild beasts, and sometimes roasted with heat of summer, and sometimes congealed with cold of winter, tearing up with their nails the grass, which they mingled with their tears before they ate it. Others were led into Theaters, Amphitheaters, and Tribunals of Judges, where old men of four-score and an hundred years of age were seen. Ladies very honourable, most tender maidens and little children, brought into the slaying house there to die, before they knew what it was to live.

All the tortures which the Busiris and Mezentiuses knew not, were then invented, and exercised on the bodies of Christians: there was no speech but of racks, combs of iron, moulten lead, boiling cauldrons; but how to crush men under presses as in the time of vintage; but of shutting bodies up in vessels, armed within with counterpointed nails, and rouling them in this moving prison down the descent of hils; but of annointing them with oyl and honey, and exposing them to wasps, in the boiling ardours of the sun; but of hanging women by the feet in their nakedness, to serve as a spectacle for lustful eyes.

It is not credible such horrours could enter into the hearts of men, without some particular impression of malign spirits; yet Diocletian thought it was a great point of state, and the true means irrecoverably to banish Christianity.

Behold the cause why he spared none, yea not pardoning even his neece Susanna, nor his wife Serena, whom he caused to feel the edge of the sword for professing Christianity. It was desired the Martyrs should be numbred, but this was impossible, for when it appeared that one moneth reckoned up seventeen thousand, and the rest carried the like proportion, the Christians prepared themselves rather to die than to keep any further record of them. The Emperour also caused all holy books to be exactly sought out, to commit them to the flames, thinking it was a singular policy to suppress our Religion: but it is a thing extreamly prodigious, and an invincible argument of the Divinitie of our faith, that notwithstanding all these endeavours, the Church was like the burning bush, which derived glorie from its proper flames. She increased under the sword of persecution, borrowing her ornaments from ignominy, her riches from losses, and life from her tomb. It seemed that every drop of bloud which distilled from the bodies of Martyrs, was a grain of seed to make others spring, which in the end wearied executioners, blunted the edge of swords, wore out all the instruments of torture; yet was Diocletian for all this nothing mollified.

Conditions of Diocletian.

A man would wonder, from whence he should conceive such hatred against Christianity: but he that will consider his nature and ordinary proceedings, shall find, that besides the suggestions of Hell, he had inclinations disposed to such cruelties. He was born of very base birth, nursed up in bloud, addicted to the Religion of the Gentiles, so far as to make himself the most superstitious. Whilst he abode in France, as yet a young souldier, a Druid who much intermeddled with divination, foretold him he should arive at the Empire, when he had killed the fatal bore. He being of a spirit ambitious and credulous, went purposely a hunting, and ordinarily chased bores, to see if a Crown would spring from their bloud. But that was not it which the evil spirit pretended. There was at the Court a Lord, named Aper, as much as to say the bore, father-in-law to the Emperour Numerianus, a man powerful & factious, who after some years possessed himself of the Roman Empire by crime and treachery. Diocletian adventured to kill him, not so much for hatred, as he said, as for desire to fulfil the prophesie of the Druid, and he having thrust his sword through his body, being already arived to the highest degrees of warfar, and well beloved of the souldiers, was proclaimed Emperour. This election made him greatly esteem the false Religion of Pagans, and to take deep roots in his superstition; which was much augmented by the Priests of Idols, mortal enemies of Christians, who perswaded him, the Gods that had given the Empire, demanded of him in requital the extirpation of Christianity, and that his hand was fatal to cut and burn the heads of the Hydra, which his Predecessours could never destroy. This afforded him matter of vanity, which he very easily apprehended, and it being also softly whispered in his ears, that the Christians had a plot upon his state, and promised themselves in their prophesies an everlasting Empire, he grew moody even to rage, employing all manner of engines to give counterpoize to their exaltations. Besides, he being ever desirous to appear exactly absolute in his commands, and effectuall in his enterprizes, thought he must never give over persecution, till he had buried the memory of the Christian name; and he voluntarily suffered himself so to be flattered upon this subject, that no man could do a thing more acceptable than to tell him he had extinguished the wicked Sect, and established the honour of the Gods immortal. Columes also and Monuments were dedicated to him with this inscription, SUPERSTITIONE CHRI-

CHRISTI UBIQUE DELETA, which witnessed, these honours were yielded him, for having throughly purged the world from the superstition of Christ: but his conscience suggested the contrary, wherewith his spirit fierce, and cruel, was horribly amazed.

O God! we may well say, there is neither force nor counsel can oppose your designs: your divine Providence, shut up in a cloud, roareth over crowned heads, in a moment overthroweth the mountains of winds, which the Tyrants railed one upon another, and makes the silly wisdom of the greatest politicians, appear like an owl unfeathered, and ashamed at the rays of the mid-day.

He leaveth the Empire.

Diocletian, who was reputed the subtilest, and most courageous man of the world, upon a suddain resolved to forsake the Empire, and to hide himself in some grot, like a beast, timorous and wretched. He abandoneth the sceptre and purple, to retire himself into a little country-house, and with his own hands to manure a garden.

Reasons.

This gave matter enough of surmise to all the world, which could not penetrate his intentions. It was believed by no man, that he did it for humility, for these apprehensions found no place in the heart of a man, who caused himself to be adored, and presented his shoes embroidered with precious stones, to be kissed by them, who came to salute him. He notwithstanding publickly professed, that he addicted himself to this life through a generous contempt of the vanities of the world, being fully satiated with honours of the earth, and having accomplished all the hopes of the most ambitious; so that he knew what the fortune of the Cæsars was, and that Diadems were charged with more thorns than pearls: that there was but one way to contentment of life, which was to despise what others adored: and pursuing this, he wrote a letter to a friend of his, who perswaded him to re-assume the Empire: If you saw the lettice which grow in my Garden, planted with mine own hands, you would think me too good a Gardener, to become a miserable Emperour.

This man would needs play the Philosopher, which he had never learned, and endeavour to colour this change which he had made, with appearances of virtue: but the most understanding judged it was the disease of Timon, and a melancholy enraged, that had transported him into this retirement. He was extreamly confounded, to have drawn blood out of all the veins of the earth, to stifle a Religion which flourished in its proper ruins. It seemed unto him, that a million of spirits of the dead, encompassed his bed, to require from him, an account of their lives: he began to apprehend something divine in this Religion, which he had so outragiously persecuted, and withall to fear a horrible punishment in the revolution of the affairs of his estate. Behold the cause why despaire, anxiety, and eminent peril, made him voluntarily to despoile himself, as a man ready to be drowned, believing still, that he should have a better penny-worth of the punishments of Heaven, in the person of a Gardener, than in that of an Emperour. He anticipated his punishment, serving for execution to himself, and leaving an Empire, which seemed as it were as fast tyed to him as his soul, to make, being yet alive, an honourable recompence to the truth, which he had so unworthily offended. He perswaded Maximianus, partaker of all his crimes, to be also the companion of his fortune and both of them retired, leaving in their places Galerius and Constantius, the father of our Constantine; ignorantly giving the Empire to him, who had already brought forth a son, who should ruin all that which these two had built.

Let us now behold his extraction and qualities, beginning from the eminencies of his birth; and let us find in his time the wicked Hermit in the bottom of his cave.

The second SECTION.

The Nobilitie of Constantine.

IT is said, when nature made the wild Lilie, she also taught bees to make hony: and I may say, when she created the grandfathers and parents of great Constantine, she then began the work of a perfect Emperour, which she afterward finished in the person of this Monarch, whose life we write.

Plinius Caninius. Rectè monuere veteres, fabis fucere discendis.

Nazarius observeth, that he was descended from the Emperour Flavius Claudius, a Prince so renowned, that it was said, the moderation of Augustus Cæsar, the vigour of Trajan, and piety of Antonius were assembled together, to honour in his heart. He sustained one of the most furious incursions of the Barbarians, which ever was upon the Roman Empire, for he in one sole battel defeated three hundred and twenty thousand, and deserved a statue of gold, which was erected for him in the Capitol, having reigned onely two years.

Constantius Chlorus the father of our great Constantine, was as the rose amongst thorns; for he lived among those Barbarous Emperours, who made the world shed tears of blood, with so great cruelness, torment, and concupiscence, that France and England, where he ordinarily resided, loved him as their father. That which gained him the good will of people, was, that he rendred himself affable to all the world, and thought no treasure greater than the love and affection of his subjects. He was a capital enemie of extortions, and vices of unjust monies, even to the lessening rather the train of his house, than to overcharge those, which other Governours had oftimes to ill executed.

Notable moderation in Constantius.

He being as yet but nominated for the Empire, Diocletian understanding his deportments, whether he would reach him frugalitie, or that he feared left the bright lustre of the integritie of Constantius might eclipse him, one day reproched him with his povertie, and sent Embassadours to him expresly to see his husbandrie, and exhort him to heap up treasures, as well as other Cæsars. He desirous to appear magnificent at this meeting, spake but one word, which was to give the people notice he wanted money. It was a pleasing spectacle to behold, how all the world ran to him with full hands, every one offering him what he had, with a love so cordial, and so prompt alacritie, that nothing might be said to be more affectionate. He in few hours amassed together great treasures, which he shewed to these Embassadours of Diocletian, who were much amazed thereat. But the brave Prince after their departure, restored all had been presented unto him, saying, he loved better to see riches in the coffers of his subjects, and to retain their loves for himself, than to have all the treasures of the Indies in his house, without friendship.

Eusebius.

Excellent passage.

A judicious experiment.

It was verily a fair and generous lesson, which he taught the Great-ones of the earth, who through excess of avarice heap together all that, which they must forsake, and in great abundance of wealth have a main want of two things which ought to be eternall, to wit, Love and Truth.

Constantius did all this by ways of moral virtues: for although he had very good inclinations to Christianitie, he was no Christian by profession, being as yet strictly associated to the great persecutours thereof: yet becauſe the accidents of time and place might permit it, he freely made uſe of Chriſtian Officers, judging thoſe would be moſt loyal in his ſervice, who were moſt conſtant in piety. And to this purpoſe Euſebius addeth, that he being one day deſirous to make trial of the faith of Chriſtians which were of his train, commanded them to ſacrifice to Idols; which the moſt faithful conſtantly refuſed, reſolving rather to forſake Court and life, than to be traitours to the character of their Religion. Others yielding to the ſtream of the times, and hope of worldly favours, ſhewed themſelves ſomewhat more pliant to his will, which he having perceived, diſmiſſed them all; ſuppoſing they might well be perfidious to their Prince, ſince they had been diſloyal to their God. And as for the reſt having highly commended them, he afforded them extraordinary preferment.

To be faithful to the King one muſt be loyal to God.

Helena.

One would wonder from whence ſuch ſincere affections ſhould ariſe, in ſo ill education as he found among Perſecutours of the faith. But for my part, I think we ought to impute this change, next after God, to the holy and couragious Helena, whom he eſpouſed in his firſt marriage, and who was mother of our admirable Conſtantine. This incomparable Lady, that ſought the Croſs with more induſtry, than others do Empires, hath engraven her praiſes with an adamantine pen in the memory of all Ages. It is ſtrange why certain modern Grecians, as Nicephorus and others, have been ſo deſirous to attribute to Greece this creature, ſo that ſtriving to make her a Grecian, they have made her an out-caſt. I have not ſo much leiſure in this treatiſe, as to amuſe my ſelf in recounting and refuting their fabulous narrations, being naturally an enemy of men affectedly eloquent, who have no other profeſſion but to lye in good terms. I ſpeak that which is the more probable, agreeing with what is written by Cardinal Baronius, whoſe opinions are ordinarily moſt ſincere. Helena was an Engliſh woman by Nation, daughter of one of the beſt qualified men of this great Iland, who lodged in his houſe the Lieutenant of the Roman Empire. Zoſimus the hiſtorian, who could neither love Conſtantine nor his mother, morally hating Chriſtianity, reproacheth her, that ſhe was no Lady, and ſpeaketh as of a woman of baſe extraction: but we may well ſay, that his hiſtory, when he ſpeaketh of faithful Princes, hath mingled much gall with his ink. Certain it is, that Helena being a ſtranger, could not be in the Roman Empire of reputation equal to ſo many Princeſſes of the Court, from whom Conſtantius might at that time expect alliance, yet was very honourable in her own Country, not ſo much by Nobility of bloud, as that of faith, wherein in my opinion ſhe already was inſtructed; there being many Chriſtians in England under the Empire of Diocletian. For I hold with S. Paulinus, that ſhe was the firſt Miſtreſs of her Son in the faith, and that we ſhould not have had a Conſtantine, if God had not given us an Helena, Princeps Principibus Chriſtianis eſſe meruit, non tam ſuâ quàm Helenæ matris fide, ſaith this great Biſhop.

It is the opinion of Polidorus lib. 10. Of Radul. h. in his Polychron. l. 4. cap. 29. Of Hunter. lib. 1. Of Ounſ. in the Treatiſe of Roman Emperours, Of Harpſfelius in his hiſtor. Eccleſ of England. Lipſius is of another opinion.

Conſtantius at that time, Governour in great Britain for the Roman Emperour, being lodged in the houſe of her father, did caſt his eye upon Helena, who was endowed with an abſolute beauty; by reaſon whereof, as we may conjecture, ſhe was afterward called Helena in the Empire, this name being not otherwiſe familiar with the Engliſh. With this eminent comlines of body ſhe had modeſty, and a ſingular grace, which was a ray imprinted by God upon her forehead; as he did heretofore to the virtuous Heſter, to make her amiable to all the world. It is true, which Euſtatius a Greek Biſhop ſaid, that beauty which hath no grace, is a bait floating on the water without a hook, to be taken, and to catch nothing: but when theſe two things do meet, they exerciſe much power over hearts.

Beauty and grace of S. Helena.

And at that time Conſtantius felt the eyes of Helena had made more impreſſion upon his ſoul, than could the ſword upon his body: and being a Prince of a ſingular continency, ſo highly prailed by the Pagans themſelves, he would not require the daughter of his hoſt by any other means than thoſe of a lawful marriage, which Zoſimus hath not wholly denied in this point, more reſpective, than ſome Grecians, of Chriſtianity. The father ſeeing the honour done him by his hoſt, made no difficulty to reſolve upon it; and the prudent Helena with as much eaſe condeſcended to the will of thoſe to whom ſhe owed her being. She entred into marriage for the univerſal good of the Church, to which ſhe ſhould bring forth a Conſtantine. Her firſt care was to ſoften the warlick humour of her husband, by the temper of ſweetneſs and goodneſs, which ſhe gave him in ſuch ſort, that in ſo great a rage of ſhedding of Chriſtian bloud which than reigned, he kept his hands the reſt of his days moſt innocent.

His marriage.

This marriage was as the ſacrifice of Juno, where the gall of the offering was never preſented. There was ſo much love on both ſides, that the ſpirit of Conſtantius lived onely in that of Helena, and Helena as the flower of the ſun perpetually followed the motions of this bright ſtar, together with all the good diſpoſitions of her husband. The young Conſtantine, born in the ſame Britain, ſeemed alſo more firmly to knit the knot of theſe chaſt loves, when behold an obſtacle which interpoſeth.

Conſtantius is ſent to ſucceed in the Empire, and is declared Ceſar by the Emperour Maximianus, on this condition, that he ſhould forſake Helena his wife, and marry Theodora the daughter-in-law of the ſame Emperour. An Empire is a mervellous flaſh of lightning in the eyes, it dazleth and ſhuts them up from all other conſideration. This good husband, who had ſo much affection for his dear ſpouſe, ſuffers himſelf to be won by the ambition and eaſineſs of his nature, which bowed much to the wills of thoſe who ſeemed to wiſh him well, and by the luſtre of the purple preſented to him. Maximianus would needs play the Tyrant aſwell over loves, as men, and plotting marriages, placeth his daughter in the conjugal bed of Conſtantius, to plant him in the Throne of Ceſars.

Inconſtancy of men.

S. Helena, of more worth than an Empire, underſtanding the news, bare this alteration with great conſtancy, not complayning, either of the chance, force, or diſloyalty of Conſtantius, but accounted it an honour, that to refuſe her no other cauſe was found, but the good fortune of her husband. She more feared than envied Scepters, and was hidden in her little ſolitude as the mother of pearl under the waves, breeding up her young Conſtantine in ſuch ſort, as God ſhould direct her. Conſtantius touched with this admirable virtue, lived in body with Theodora, and in heart with his Helena. He gave contentment in the Eaſt to a man Imperious, and ſerved the times, to have his will another day. But he was in the Weſt, in the better part of himſelf. Beſides, when he was abſolute, and that he muſt needs divide the Empire with Galerius his Colleague, he voluntarily reſigned the reſt of the world unto him, to have France, Spain, and his Ile of England, where the moity of his heart remained.

Virtue of S. Helena.

It is a very hard matter long to reſtrain an honeſt and lawful love. It is ſaid when Sicily was torn from Italy by an arm of the Sea, which interpoſed it-ſelf a-thwart, palm-trees were found by the violence of waters rent aſunder, which in ſign of love ſtill bowed the one to the other, as proteſting againſt the element, which had ſeparated their loves: The like happened to Conſtantius and Helena,

Love of Conſtantius and S. Helena.

Helena, the torrent of ambitions and affairs of the world having parted their bodies, could not hinder the inclinations of their hearts. Constantius returned into Great Britain, there to live and make his tomb, for he in the end died in the Citie of York. And as he being on his death-bed was asked which of his children he would have succeed him, since besides Constantine he had three sons by Theodora; at that time forgetting his second wife and her offspring, he answered aloud CONSTANTINUM PIUM, I will have no other successour but the PIOUS CONSTANTINE, which was approved by all the Army.

Thus God, the Master of Scepters and Empires, willing to reward the modestie of the virtuous Helena, laid hold of her bloud, to give it the Empire of the world; in the end, leaving the sons of Theodora, to whom Maximian promised all the greatness of the world.

The third SECTION.

His Education and Qualitie.

Gregor. epist. 6. l. 5. ad Childebertum. Quantò cæteros homines regia dignitas antecellit, tantò cæterarum gentium regna regni professio vestri culmen excellit.

A Great Oratour hath heretofore said, speaking of Constantine, that he appeared as much above Kings, as Kings above all other men. It is the Elogie, which after-vard S. Gregorie gave to our Kings. Verily he was accomplished with a spirit and bodie in so high a degree of perfection, that there needed no more but to see him, to judge him worthy of an Empire. Nature sometimes encloseth great souls in little bodies ill composed, as fortune hath likewise placed Kings in Shepherds Cottages. It is an unhappiness deserving some compassion, when a great Captain is of so ill a presence, as to be taken for one of his servants, and be made to cleave wood, and set the pot over the fire, to prepare his own dinner, as it heretofore happened to Philopœmen.

Beautie of Constantine.

Constantine took no care for falling into such accidents. It seemed, as Eumenius saith, that nature from above had been dispatched, as a brave harbinger, to score out a lodging for this great soul, and to give him a bodie suteable to the vigour of his spirit, so well was it composed. He was of a stature streight as a palm, of an aspect such, that the Oratours of that time called it divine; of a port full of Majestie, his eyes sparkled like two little stars; and his speech was naturally pithie, sweet, and eloquent; his bodie so able for militarie exercises, that he amazed the strongest, and so sound, that he had no disease. In these members so well proportioned, reigned a vigorous spirit, very capable of learning, if the glorie of Arms had not wholly transported him into actions of his profession. His father well enformed of his fair qualities, caused him to come into the East, where he took a tincture of good letters, at the least so much as was needfull for a warlick Emperour, and applied himself seriously to the exercise of Arms, wherein he appeared with so much admiration, that he was alreadie beheld with the same eye, one would an Achilles or an Alexander, were they alive again.

Diocletian, who had not as yet forsaken the Empire, would have him at his Court, to work him from apprehension of Christianitie, to which he might be alreadie much disposed, and draw him to the hatred of our Religion. It was a most dangerous school for this young Prince; for education ordinarily createth manners, and we are all as it were, that which we have learned to be in our younger dayes. Constantine notwithstanding gathered flowers in this garden-bed, not taking the breath of the serpent which was hidden there-under. He soon learned from Diocletian militarie virtue, prudence to govern souldiers, good husbandrie in revenews, authoritie to become awfull: but he took nothing either of his impietie or malice. This Barbarous man in the beginning passionately loved him, and would perpetually have him by his sides; but when he saw that passing through Palestine and other parts of his Kingdom, the young Constantine was more respected than himself (so much his carriage, especially compared to the harsh countenance of the Emperour, had eminence in it) he began to grow into suspicion; and as it is said, desired secretly to be rid of him. But Constantine prevented the blow, retiring under an honourable pretext to the Court of Galerius, the associate of his father Constantius, who most willingly left this son with him in pledge, thereby to hold some good correspondence with him.

Constantine at Court of Galerius.

This Galerius was a creature of Diocletians, who had heretofore declared him Cæsar, yet still retained such power over him, that when he had displeased him, he made him run on foot after his coach, not deigning so much as to look upon him. He in the beginning very courteously entertained the son of his faithfull friend, affording him all manner of favours, but in process of time he conceived a strong jealousie, beholding in this young Mars more excellent parts, than he had done in all the Courts of the world besides.

Excess of virtues stand in the account of crimes with malign eyes, so as to be culpable one must be an able man. Galerius resolved to overthrow Constantine for those qualities which made him amiable to all the world; and not thinking it safe to take him away by main force, he made war against him, like a fox, persecuting him in that manner, as sometimes Saul did the invincible David. He found by chance, that a King of the Sarmatians made an incursion on the territories of the Roman Empire, and shewed himself so furious, that none durst any more encounter him than an enraged beast. Galerius gave commission to Constantine to bid him battel, thinking it was a most honourable pretext to be freed from him, and that he had a reasonable excuse with Constantius the father, when he should shew him his son dead in the bed of honour. The young man, who shut up his eyes to danger, and onely opened them to glorie, went thither readily; and all succeeded so prosperously, that he not onely brake the troops of the Sarmatians, but also led this King along enchained to Galerius. This man, who received not so much joy to see an enemie at his feet, as sorrow for the prosperitie of a friend, very coldly commended this encounter, and determined with himself to involve the virtue of Constantine in other battels, still seeking in his valour the matter of his ruin.

It was at that time a thing very ordinarie, to make condemned men to fight with savage beasts in an Amphitheater, thereby to give contentment to those who are delighted to behold such spectacles. Galerius called for a combat of Lions, and beheld it with Constantine, who was very impatient to see that such as undertook the assault of those beasts performed it, in his opinion, so coldly. He therefore had a desire to adventure himself therein. Galerius, who observed him over-strong for men, thought he might find his tomb in the belly of Lions. Note, how under colour of withholding him, he thrust this young virtue further on, alreadie much enkindled with his proper flames. The valiant Prince descendeth in person into the list, and assaileth the Lion, whom he slew with an incomparable strength, whereupon so loud acclamations, and such extraordinary applauses were raised through all the Amphitheater, to the honour of brave Constantine, that it alone was sufficient to make the treacherous Cæsar burst with anger.

Envie is a mischievous vice, it resembleth those mountains which throw their burning entrails against flowers, that blossom on their tops, as the envious dart gall and flames against those men, who bravely bloom over their heads. Envie.

Galerius made the son of his friend reign in hearts, by the same ways wherewith he endeavoured to deprive him of life and Scepter. In the end, he still persisting in his wickedness, and not ceasing to prepare new ambushes, some men of good understanding advised Constantine to withdraw himself from the malignity of this wicked man, which he did forsaking his Court, without leave taken, and speedily returning into England, where at that time his father expected him with much impatience. Zosimus saith, that in this voyage he took the post-horses which best fitted him, and maimed all the other, to take from his enemies the means of pursuit.

The fourth SECTION.

His entery into the Empire.

IT was in this revolution of times that Diocletian and Maximian having dispossessed themselves of the Empire, and Constantius having swayed certain years with a most prosperous and peaceable government, died at York, a Citie of England, to the great grief of the West, which he had so prudently governed. Constantine by good chance was there and nominated by his father for the Empire a little before his death; which judgement was approved with such consent of the souldiers and all the people, that he had scarcely as yet wiped away his tears, when the purple was cast on his shoulders, and he saluted Emperour. The good son, who thought on nothing but to render the last duties of his piety to the memory of his father, found this honour unseasonable, and would have declined it by all means: but a grave Oratour hath said in his Panegyrick, there is no horse so swift, which can steal from mortal eyes a man, whom the Providence of God pursueth with Empire in hand. He is constrained to yield, though through modesty he would not be absolutely pronounced Emperour, but contented himself with the title of Cæsar, well foreseeing he was to have many great affairs upon his hand, before he could be peaceably established in his throne. Quis te Cyllarus, aut Arion posset eripere, quem sequebatur Imperium? Eumenius.

The first shock he had, came from two Kings of Germanie, to wit, Assacar and Gaisus, who passing the Rhene with huge troups, endeavoured to overwhelm the Gauls, thinking to surprize a young Emperour, as yet uncollected in the uncertainty of his affairs. But he nothing amazed, speedily encounters, defeats, and takes them, leading them enchained in a triumph, whereupon succeeded an accident, which I should rather attribute to the humour of Diocletian than of Constantine. For, after he had taken his pleasure upon these two Kings, he delivered them over to wilde beasts in a combat, which he caused to be presented, for the entertainment of the people. And although the Oratours of his time much applauded this in him, as an act of justice, for the great havock they both had made, notwithstanding having regard to the qualitie of the persons, this proceeding cannot be excused from cruelty, never made familiar to the manners of Christians. Constant.an.2.

This forreign war drew along with it civil wars, wherein the powers of the earth encountered together, with incredible fervours, and terrible events. Behold a marvellous game, and a great spectacle of the vanities of the world: you shall see seven Princes, who aspired to the Monarchy, taking each one to himself a piece of the purple, which they were in pulling, and despoiled themselves of it in seeking to put it on. The most fiery of them all, who would swallow the whole earth, could not have so much as five foot to cover his body. A wonderful spectacle of the affairs of the world.

Maxentius, the son of Maximian, companion of Diocletian, a man lost in conscience and reputation, condemned by the judgements of his own father, who thought him unworthy to succeed in the Empire, understanding that Constantius was dead, and that they had chosen his son the young Constantine, born of an English mother, entereth into desperate furies, and being then at Rome, ready for the purpose, caused himself to be declared Emperour, by the souldiers whom he had gained, alluring them by the means of large promises. Galerius, who after the death of Constantius, and the retirement of Diocletian and Maximian, thought himself the neerest to the Monarchie, laboureth speedily to hinder the tyranny of Maxentius; and having already made two Cæsars to succeed, to wit, Severus and Maximinus, he dispatcheth Severus with all diligence, to suppress Maxentius: and as this Severus was now gone out of Milan, bending towards Rome, with Legions of African souldiers, Maxentius prevented him, defeats him, as well by treason as force, takes him, and causeth him to be unworthily strangled. Galerius desperately incensed with this outrage, would needs fall upon the West, all full of lightenings and flames; but the distresse of the safety of his territories stayed him, and made him create another Cæsar, named Licinius: after whose nomination he survived not long, for he died of an incurable ulcer, Heaven revenging his misdeeds by a horrible maladie and an enraged death. After his decease, these two Cæsars, who were both of his faction, Licinius and Maximinus beheld one another with a jealous eye, and made shew of contestation; but Maximinus dying at Tharsus, of a very sudden death, decideth the difference by an irrevocable reincamation.

In the mean time Maximian, who despoiled of the Empire, before he had a will to reign it, as yet retained blond sparkling in the veins, like a young man: and seeing they had lifted his son to the Throne, whom he had ever reputed a man of no worth, burst with jealousie, and burst with anger. He therefore hastened to find out his old friend Diocletian in his grot, (a) and endeavoured to perswade him by all means possible to resume the Empire. Maximian the ancient companion of Diocletian would needs return to the Empire, & his Oration upon that subject.

(a) At Corsutium a little village of Sclavonia, which Zosimus maketh to pass for the Citie of Charter by a notable equivocation, reading Carnuti, for Caruati.

Shall we endure (saith he) Great Augustus, this young sire so proudly to insult over the patrimonie of the universe, and make sport with the majestie of the Roman Empire? Your authoritie transported me to a resolution, to which, that I may speak freely, I never had any great inclination: but I patiently bare it whilest I saw Galerius and Constantius in the government of the Empire, who seemed two heads very fit for a Crown. But now behold my Maximius, to whose trust I would not have committed the house of a silly Burgess of Rome, to govern it; behold a young Britan, and another I know not who, true mushromes sprung up in a night that would divide between them Europe, Asia, and Africa. God knoweth, that I speak, it not through ambition, but seeing the house of our fathers, and our own all on fire; it is very good reason we bring water to quench it. What do you here in this miserable grot? You are not made for it: the Eternal Providence, which should have fixed you on the government of the World, so necessarie are you for it, is ashamed to see you among beasts beasts and peasants. To speak freely, you do amiss, and it is very ill interpreted; your great courage hath ever better hitherto loved to erre, than avow a fault: and I still was of your opinion, while time permitted; but at this present, when the World runs all into confusion, expecting no reparation but from your hands, with what water can you wash the stains of the blood, not of one man nor of two, but of a whole world, which shall stick upon your forehead, and of all posterity, if to obey a fantasie of spirit you suffer the Empire to be lost? Think you when these young men shall be Masters, you shall enjoy this grote in safety? You have too much courage, and Tyrannie hath too much distrust, to leave you so much as life, when it can uncontrollably take it from you. Let us go presently and reassume the Diadem; we shall no sooner stamp with a foot, but we shall make all the world follow us in arms, for our service. If you still affect this kind of retirement, you shall thither return again, when we have pacified all: but believe me an Empire is a shirt, never to be put off but with life.

These perswasions were very moving: notwithstanding Diocletian, who concluded all his wisdom in the obstinacie of his resolutions, replyeth:

A brave reply of Diocletian.

Maximian, I absolutely renounce all the friendship which is between us, if ever you speak to me of such affairs. What levitie have you observed in my proceedings, to perswade me to this change? I protest before the Gods immortal, I will never return to the government of the Empire, no more than into my mothers womb. Miserable man that you are, have you yet so little experience of the vanitie of worldly things, as to prefer a rag of purple before your libertie? I do not know what contentment you may take in government, but for my part, I protest I then slept on thorns, and fed on gall. I neither enjoyed day nor night either rest or travel, nay not sleep; ambition depriving me of things which criminals find under fetters, and which nature is pleased should be common to all the world. I must live by exteriour shews, countenances, and smoaks; and if others once did what I would have them, they made me a thousand times do what I would not. It is said, a Planet which hath its exaltation in one sign, finds ever its counterpoize in another. If I had any good success on the one side, I was ever paid on the other with some discontent. My desires were infinite, and though I seemed very potent, I never had the hundredth part of what I wished; and verily I knew not my self what I would have, so many things desired I, which daily taught me mine own impotencie. What a goodly delight have we to cover the earth with arms, and the Sea with vessels, and fetch a great circuit to seek out a felicitie, which we never find? What libertie, to live a slave of the world, to possess the world? What riches, to beg even from the sweat of a peasant, to entertain riot? What tranquilitie, to live perpetually in torment.

Your conscience knows this to be true, which I say: When you and I would intermeddle with affairs, according to the obligation of our charges, what care must there be for revenews? what travel for militarie matters? what watching for justice? what noise upon the complaints of so many Provinces poured out at our feet? what fear of surprizes? what distrust of friends? what deadly sweats for treason? what anxieties, and what apprehensions of so many lamentable events, which would happen to others before our eyes? If we resigned the care of affairs to two or three men of our cabinet, they disturbed one another, and sold us to their ambition under colour of service. In the end they caused us to carry the seeming Scepter of all their follies, and made us accountable for all the havock, injustices, and miseries of humane kind. Is not here cause enough to desire such slaverie? If you and I had bodies of whales to clothe, and stomacks to be fed with huge sums of gold every hour in the day, I would say, that needs we must return to these kind of spoils to content us. But we have to do with few things, and for a little space. I swear unto you, that from the time I betook me to this retirement, it hath seemed that all the elements were for me, and that I never was more powerfull, more rich, or contented. I have found all that, which I sought for, health, repose, truth, wisdom, arts, and the Gods. Go not now about to colour your specious oration with pretexts of the publick good, I well know where your ambition itcheth: believe me, he is neareſt to heaven, who leaſt careth in whose hands the earth is. What importeth it, that young Constantine, Maxentius, and Licinius divide the world? I shall see them strive together, like ants about a grain of earth. If the world must be lost, as it is very likely, I had rather it were in their hands than mine. I very well see the Empire is sick to the death, I have forsaken it, like an old Physitian, & will hear no more speech of it, than of a body in the coffin. Believe me, neither you nor I can do any thing for its health but to witness our inability. All those who have admired our resolution in forsaking the Diadem, will be the first that will cast the stone against our inconstancy, if we weakly go about to require again that which we so generously have abandoned. God forbid I should enter into a fantasie to despoil my self of a glory, that never any one Monarch had before me, which is the contempt of a world, when I had it in mine hands. If you be resolved to loose your self, as it without company, your friendship ought to pretend nothing upon me to the prejudice of mine honour and conscience. And whereas you propose unto me the danger of my person, I do not think that envy will extend it self over the coleworts and lettice of this little garden, planted by mine own hands: and should they come thither, I have already lived long enough, according to the course of nature, enough to satisfie the desire, which I had if glory, and too much to see the miseries of the world. I will not think much to render up this life, which I have upon my lips, to him who gave it me.

We must needs say this man had a great understanding, and goodly Maxims: For had not mischief given him the spirit of a hangman against Christianitie, he might be accounted in the number of the greatest Emperours. Maximian was much amazed at the constancy of his resolution. Notwithstanding, the desire he had to return to his former honour being insatiable, he spared not to take the purple again, and bear himself as Emperour, protesting it was the desire of publick good, which put the Scepter into his hands.

Maximian the baloon of fortune.

It is an admirable thing, how his ambition was discountenanced. He, who promised himself, much respect, was hissed at by the souldiers, as a man vain, unconstant, and shallow; was chased out of Italie, and Sclavonia, and other places, which he sought to possess, and reduced as it were to such terms, as to see himself at the mercy of his son, which he apprehended as the last of his afflictions: Although some have thought there was collusion between the father and the son, for the accommodation of their affairs. He wished now to be in the bottom of a cave with his Diocletian: but since he had begun the play, he must finish his act. The subtil man, who well foresaw that Maxentius, a brain-sick Prince, was upon ruin, resolved to league himself firmly to the fortune of Constantine. Behold why being retired in haste towards him, having engaged his house in the Empire, it was not difficult for him to find access there, as also for that the new Emperour in this great concourse of arms and affairs, was very willing to make use of the counsel of a man refined in policie.

Maximian entereth so far into the heart and judgement of Constantine, that to tie him the more to himself, and wholly cement up his own affairs, he gave his daughter Fausta in marriage to him; whom the young Prince espoused in his second wedlock, lock, having first of all been married to Minervina, by whom he had two children, Crispus, and Helena. This marriage of Fausta was solemnized with much magnificence, and the son rendred so much honour to his father-in-law, that he seemed to retain nothing of the Empire but the name and habit, dividing with him the rest of his power.

3. Disposition

We may well say the spirit of Maximian was turbulent and insupportable; for not satisfying himself with all this excellent entertainment, he thought he was nothing, if he wore not upon his forehead the Diadem which he had forsaken. He began to set things in order at the Court, and to prepare factions in such sort, that he seemed to have no other purpose but to set his son and his son-in-law together by the ears, to enjoy both their spoils. In the end he put his design very far upon the fortune and life of Constantine, & being as he was vain to talke of his enterprizes namely to his daughter Fausta, whom he esteemed to be of a good disposition, he opened himself so much to her, that he made, as saith the Wiseman, of his lips the snare of his soul. For the young married wife; having more affection in store for her husband than her father, and who having already the tast of Empire, would not yield it up to him, to whom she had owed her birth, hastened to tell all to Constantine, advising he should take heed of his father-in-law, and that he was a wicked man, who would if it were possible deceive all the Gods of Olympus for the desire he had to reign. Maximian well perceiving that his daughter had discovered the plot, and that there was no further safetie for him at the Court of his son-in-law, secretly stole away, and endeavoured to regain the East; but was taken tardy at Marsellis, and there strangled, to give an end to his life & all his designs. Some have written that he hanged himself through despair of his affairs; others, that it was by the commandment of Constantine: Others have said, that his son-in-law was willing to save him, but the publick hatred born against Maximian prevented clemency, which I think the more probable. Verily I would not disguise the exorbitances practised by Constantine before his entrance into Christianity; for he cannot be justified upon some disorders: But since Zosimus the historian, who pardoneth him in nothing, chargeth him not with this death, I see no cause why we should accuse him

Eusebius.

Victor Nazarius. Non omnia potes, Dij te vindicant & invicem.

Behold the desperate end of Maximian, after he had persecuted the Church, embroiled Empires, all armed the whole world, by the extravagances of his ambition, an infamous halter taketh a little air from him, which he thought he could not freely enough breath, whilst any man stood more eminent than himself. Let us now see the good government of his son.

The fifth Section.

His prowess against Maxentius.

Constant. 7.

Maxentius had reduced the City of Rome into such a condition, that there was no sorrest of theeves wherein the lives of Citizens were not more safe than in their houses. He who held his advancement from souldiers, for recompence gave them the priviledge of all crimes; so that in the brave orations which he made to them, no words were more frequent in his month, than these, Frulmini, dissipate, prodigite: Enjoy, riot, spend; and what he said in words, he first of all taught by example. What ever avarice could do in rapines, prodigality in profusions, cruelty in massacres, luxury in adulteries, a barbarous life in all kind of bruitishnes, returned upon the great Theater of the world, in the person of Maxentius. Whe he had caused houses to be rifled, and unworthily massacred the best qualified Senatours, he betook himself to the honour of Ladies, which he endeavoured to taint with all sorts of artifices. Among other things it is recounted, that having cast his eyes upon a Lady, a Christian by profession, and wife of a Senatour of an honourable rank, he dispatched villains, who served him in such like ordures, to attach her, with sword and violence in their hands. The timorous husband said to the Empetours Guard, he would refer this matter to be treated at the will of his wife. She understanding what was practiled went presently out, and shewed to these wicked messengers, that she was not now in a fit state to be presented before the Emperours eyes, and prayed, they would give her a little time to put on her attyres; which they most willingly condescended unto. The couragious woman, inspired as it was thought with a particular instinct from God, cast her self at the feet of our Saviour, holding a ponyard in her hands, and thereupon began to say: What shall we do, O holy chastity, which I with so much loyalty have preserved in the conjugal bed, never having admitted a forrain love to enter into my heart? Shall we now abandon thee to the pollutions of a Tyrant, forsaken both by God and men? Let us rather die. Die? It is one of my great desires, but to die by my own hands is a sin. Yet the inspiration of God dictateth to me, he will not be offended with the remedy, which is onely left me to decline my happiness. I will follow the spirit and leave nothing to the flesh, wherewith to displease God. If there be a fault in it, my hope shall smother it, and my bloud shall wash it away. Upon these words, interrupted with sighs, she thrust the ponyard into her bosom, giving end to her life, to enternize her honour.

Strange Tragedy.

Simil. S. Ambros. l. 3. de virginibus.

The Bauds who expected her at the gate, wondering much at the length of time she bestowed in dressing, entred into the chamber, and found her drenched in her own bloud: wherewith they were so amazed, that fear gave them wings to flie, and make relation to the Emperour of what had passed: but the wretched Pharaoh, was not for all this any thing mollified, still continuing his sacriledges with magick and horrible witchcrafts, until such time that Constantine came to awaken him.

Behold one of the noblest acts of valour, which hath ever been among all the Emperours, that either have preceded or succeeded the great Constantine. For having sought peace by all manner of reasonable wayes, and seeing Maxentius would by no means hearken unto it, but that he caused his images and statues to be broken and dragged over dunghils, he resolved to assault him with a just war, in which he began, although not publickly, to abandon the false Gods, and resign himself into the hands of the Saviour of the world, thereunto invited by that excellent vision of the Cross, and other circumstances, which I reserve for subsequent Sections, where I intend to speak of his calling to Christianity.

It was from this time he took the fatal banner, called the Labarum, wherein the name of our Saviour was written in certain cyphers.

The Army of Maxentius was composed, by the report of Zosimus of an hundred threescore and ten thousand foot-men, with eighteen thousand horse, forces so terrible, that they were able to stop the most adventurous.

Constantine amassed together Gauls, and from England, and France it-self, in the name of inhabitants upon Rhein, all the forces he could get, and put into the field about ninety thousand foot-men, with many horses of service, which onely amounted to eight thousand. It is the supputation of Zosimus, although others sufficiently declare the troops were far less. He, who by relation of Eusebius was then about thirtie years of age, although others make him younger, shewed in the manage of this Army, all the qualities which might be desired in the most accomplished Captain. For he marched from the Rhein unto the wals of Rome, with singular order, and unparalelled dexterity.

When he entered into Italy he found many resistances both of men and Cities, who endeavoured to stop his passage, in such sort, that needs he must give two or three battels, which he most couragiously won, forcing the rebellious Cities, and very courteously using those who rendered themselves into his hands. In the end he resolved to besiege the City of Rome. Maxentius, who might have tyred him out with long delays, resolved to oppose, and with all expedition joyn battel, considering in the vast multitude of his forces, which were very fresh to set upon an Army, already wearied with so great a journey.

Besides, he had many notable works over Tyber, on the bridge Milvius, which the Romans now call Ponte-mole. His enginiers promised him, that with certain buckles of iron they would build and demolish the bridge as he should think good: So that when his Army was to pass, it should go upon firm ground, and when Constantine with his troups set foot upon it, they were but to let a certain engin loose to drown the bridge and cast it into the river. It seemed to Maxentius he had two strings to his bowe, either to overthrow Constantine in the field with a huge Army, or entrap him with the stratagem of this bridge, when he was engaged in the battel, and that he had given him a tast of pursuit.

Upon this resolution he passed the Tyber with his Army. Constantine, most glad to have drawn him out of the wals of Rome, arrangeth his battalions with marvellous dexterity, and disposed his souldiers to the fight. Behold two dreadful Armies, which looked one upon another like to huge clouds full of storms, readie to pour down upon the heads of many mortals. The lot is cast, and the quarrel of the Empire of the world must be determined in few hours. The brave Constantine resolved with that small proportion of horse he had, yet men most daring, to assail the Cavalrie of Maxentius, and for a singular testimony of his valour, and the trust he had in God, he first of all appeared in the head of his Army, and with many paces set forward before the rest, making his horse curvet in a martial manner. It was an easie matter to know him, for his arms shined all with gold, and his helmet was set with precious stones. His enemies began to fall roundly upon him; but the Captaines of Constantine, seeing their Emperour so generously to out-brave danger, followed him with such fervour, as if every one of them expected an Empire for recompence. They fell like lightning upon their enemies, who were much amazed at this first charge; yet they notwithstanding made good resistance, but maugre all their endeavours, those of Constantine brake through, and defeated them.

Maxentius beholding his Cavalry, in which he reposed all his hope, to be so ill handled, resolved upon a retreat, to make use of his bridge, and drown Constantine engaged in the pursuit of those that fled. But oh the justice of God! The wicked man, as saith the Royal Prophet, falleth into the ditch which he himself had digged. It is not known whether those besotted engineers failed in their design, or whether the great numbers of those that fled caused this ruin: but the bridge brake under Maxentius his feet, and threw him into Tiber all bloudy, like another Pharaoh in the red sea, with all the principal of his Empire, who environed his person. He amazed at so violent a fall, hoped yet to recover the other shore, being excellently mounted, where he was seen to wrestle a certain time with the waves, which in the end swallowed him up. There was in the beginning a great slaughter of those, who made resistance: but in the end seeing their Emperour drowned, they yielded all to the mercy of Constantine, who stayed the victorious sword in the hands of souldiers, to consecrate it to clemency.

Maxentius defeated.

He did well to search for the body of Maxentius in Tiber to take off his head, which was fixed on the point of a lance, and born to Rome and Africk, to satisfie justice for the enormous forfeits he had committed when he was alive. From thence this brave Conquerour is received in the City of Rome, as an Angel descended from heaven, for the deliverance of the world. Never was triumph so highly valued as his, because in the trophеys of other Emperours, they triumphed for the gaining of some far-distant Province; but in this, lost Rome recovered it-self. The Queen of Nations ceased to be the prey of Nations, & breathed now a sweeter ayr of ancient liberty. If ever Prince saw a glorious day in all his life, this was it, which shined then over the head of Constantine. They came from all parts of Italy to behold him, and those who had seen him thought they had lived long enough, supposing it unfit to behold any other humane thing. Amongst so many notable spectacles, at that time in the City, none was looked upon, but he; his face was the object of all their admirations, and his valour the matter of all discourses.

The Senate, to witness the joy they conceived for this victory, prepared him a triumphal Arch, all of marble, one of the stateliest monuments that ever had been raised to the honour of a Conquerour, wherein this Inscription was engraven.

IMP. CÆS. FL.
CONSTANTINO
MAXIMO. P.F. AUGUSTO.
S. P. Q. R.

QUOD INSTINCTU DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITUDINE, CUM EXERCITU SUO, TAM DE TYRANNO, QUAM DE EJUS OMNI FACTIONE, UNO TEMPORE, JUSTIS REMPUBLICAM ULTUS EST ARMIS, ARCUM TRIUMPHIS INSIGNEM DICAVIT.

This said that the Senate and people of Rome dedicated this triumphal Arch to Constantine Emperour and Great Pontifice, happy Prince, and Augustus: because by an instinct of Divinity, and an admirable greatness of courage, he had with his Army freed the Common-wealth from a Tyrant and all his faction, by the justice of his arms: Where, in the Arch on the right hand were read these words, Liberatori Urbis; on the left hand, Fundatori Quietis; which clearly declared him, the Freer of the Citie, and Founder of Repose. There was likewise inscribed on it the number of years, in which they desired to render vows for this glorious victory. Observe, as you pass along, that the Senate was as yet Pagan, yet knowing the devotion which Constantine bare to the Saviour of the world, though he were not then a declared Christian, they abstained from the mention of Gods, and spake onely of one Divinitie.

The

The sixth SECTION.

The death of Diocletian, and feats of Arms, performed by Constantine against Lycinius.

SInce I have undertaken to represent the famous warlick Acts of Constantine to shew his arrival to Monarchy, I will here insert the end of Diocletian and Lycinius. When Constantine caused his Standards to march against Maxentius, there remained no more of so many Cæsars, but Lycinius, who was created a little before the death of Galerius. The brothers of Constantine would alter nothing. Diocletian remained in his retirement. There was none but this Lycinius, who was an old souldier, a man raised from nothing, but advanced by arms, and who had done so good services to Galerius, the creature of Diocletian, in the war which he had against the Persians, that out of meer respect of his valour he was chosen Emperour.

In all other things he was of a rude and gross spirit, as derived from Peasants, and who all his life had done nothing else but handle iron, either for tillage, or war, not having acquired any neatness of a civil life. Behold the cause, why being ignorant and proud, he extreamly hated learning, which he called the poison of the Empire: and had it been in his power, he would have banished all knowing men, that there might be none able to reproach his ignorance. Constantine, as wise as he was warlick, saw well he must mannage this spirit, who might much trouble him in his design against Maxentius, for which cause following this counsel, he promised him a share in the Empire, and his sister Constantia in marriage. It is held this marriage was solemnized at Milan, a little after the defeat of Maxentius, where many treaties passed between Constantine and Lycinius touching their principalities, and from that time a most favourable Edict was made for the re-establishment of Christians, & the honour of Christianity; which Lycinius, although a Pagan, refused not to sign.

Victor addeth, that Diocletian was sent for to the wedding of Lycinius. For it was much desired to hear him speak, and see what he had upon his heart; his spirit being very able to give cause of distrust to two Princes, who were desirous to establish themselves in all security.

The subtile Hermit on the other side, who feared to be overtaken, made an answer, in which he besought their Majesties to give him leave to live in his Hermitage, and affoord him that for delight, which others commonly tooke for punishment. That he had not for the time to come any mind upon marriages, and that as his age dispensed him from voyages, so retirement freed him from the vain pleasures of the world. That his presence contributed nothing to this action; that the uneasiness of ways would much prejudice his health. In the end, since the resolution he had made never to enter into the mannage of any affairs, had left him no other share but vows and prayers, he would imploy them for their prosperities.

These fair words satisfied not the Emperours, who had a desire to draw the wolf out of the wood, which gave them occasion to write back again to Diocletian letters very sharp, as if they would willingly involve him in the business of Maxentius. At this time the miserable man plainly saw, the vengeance of God sought him out, in the place which he so obstinately chose for his repose.

When that notable Edict was read unto him, which was made in favour of Christians, and that he understood Churches were already built for them every where, that they assembled to celebrate their feast with all liberty, that Constantine had caused the Cross to be set even in his banners, and that on every side the praises of Jesus of Nazareth were preached: On the contrary, that the Temples of false Gods were shut up, their statues broken, their Altars overturned, and that all Paganism went to confusion; this direful Persecutour then felt an infinite number of vipers to tear his entrails. And seeing besides, Victor. that he with so much sharpness was sent for, he imagined the Christians victorious over persecution, would rent him in a thousand pieces. Thereupon, having his soul extreamly perplexed, and his body burdened with diseases, languishing and incurable, he perpetually invoked death, the most amiable of all his Goddesses, to deliver him from the ignominies and toils of life. In the end she too slowly answering his desire, as the most probable opinion speakes, he hastened her pace, taking poison, as a man who could not die by a worse hand than his own.

Behold the desperate end of the greatest Persecutour which the Church hath ever had: who endeavouring to extirpate our Religion, hath filled our Martyrologes with the names of Martyrs, our Altars, with veneration, Christianity with Crowns, and the world with virtues, and buried himself in the tomb of despair and infamy; to teach all Greatons; that a worse blindness cannot fall upon them, than the persecution of Innocents, whose bloud hath a voice in it, which crieth out to the memory of all Ages.

Lycinius being alienated from the friendship of Constantine, failed not to put Diocletian into the number of the Gods, although himself were shortly after to be razed from the number of men. This creature, who by report of Heathens of his own factions was covetous, cholerick, and lascivious, could not long comply with the humours of Constantine: for he ceased not to torment the Christians which were in his Empire, with excessive cruelties, though himself, as we have said, had signed Edicts in their favour. Condition of Lycinius.

Constantine, who suffered as much as he thought reasonable, seeing his spirit became untractable, armed against him. The first encounter was at Cibales, a City of Sclavonia, where Constantine was encamped upon a hill, and Lycinius in the valley. The battel was very sharp on both sides, it lasted a whole day, from morning till night, they scarcely breathing; & therein Constantine was in much danger, had it not been that the spur of honour that pricked him on, made him do admirable things, which in the end discomfited Lycinius, and put him to flight. He went creeping away, like an old serpent, who had received many blows, but yet retained strength and poison. For having gained Thrace, where he thought himself strongest, he rallied his troops, and disposed himself for another war. First battel against him.

Constantine stoutly follows him, finding means to pass the rivers, whereof these flying enemies had broken the bridges to cut off their way, and he so speeded, that he suddenly was in Thrace, near to the Army of Lycinius. From that very evening he ranged his forces for fight, resolving to give them battel at the break of day. Lycinius seeing they followed him so hard at heels, made him a virtue of necessity, and animated himself to sustain the shock, having no want of men able to do bravely. This second battel was also very rough, both parties bearing themselves manfully: and the ballance of victorie seeming not yet to incline either to one side or other, behold five thousand Legionaries of Constantine, that had very long chased Lycinius, not being able to overtake him, arrived in the heat of this battel, and fell upon his Army to enclose it, but he, who was, to say truly, valiant in the art military, defended himself very well, and in the end freeth himself 2. Battel.

himself from this fight, with composition to leave Sclavonia to Constantine, contenting himself to reign in Thrace and the Eastern parts.

This accord was signed with the bloud of Valens, whom Lycinius had before created Cæsar, and whose punishment Constantine demanded in this treaty of peace, as he who was authour of all those Civil dissentions. This peace so plaistered up, lasted not long. Lycinius, still upon alteration, could not contain himself within the limits of reason. He gathered together a great multitude of ships, from the coast of Cyprus, Ægypt, Venetia, Africa, Bithynia, and other places, and set a great Armado to sea. On the other part, he had an hundred and fifty thousand Foot in the field, with fifteen thousand horse. Constantine well perceived that he aimed at Monarchy, and had set up his rest: This was the cause why he prepared forces to confront him, making a naval Army of about two hundred great ships of war, with two thousand of burden, a foot-force of an hundred and twenty thousand men, ten thousand as well Cavaliers as brave sea men.

Great victory of Constantine

Now was the time the affair of Empires must peremptorily be decided. Constantine armed with the confidence which he had in the Saviour of the world, whose banner was then advanced in all his Armies, knowing that Lycinius was at that time encamped at Adrianople, overtook him passing the river Ister, at this present called Mariza, so suddenly, that at the first encounter he routed all his Army, killing thirty four thousand of his men, and taking a very great many other prisoners, who yielded to his obedience. Lycinius was so amazed with this blow, that he speedily retired to Byzantium, which afterwards was Constantinople, where Constantine pursued, and hardly pressed him. In the mean time Ablantus, who had the charge of the Sea-forces of Lycinius, resolving to give battel, put to sea a great quantity of vessels in a streight, which could not bear such a number. The Admiral of Constantine determined to assault him, with onely four-score light ships, who at advantage assailed him, finding him much plunged in his fleet. Night having broken off this first encounter, they began a-fresh in the open sea, where the tempest handled the vessels of Lycinius so ill, that an hundred and thirty were lost, and the rest put to flight.

Whilest these things were in doing, Constantine very streightly besieged the Citie of Byzantium, having raised plat-forms that were like huge mountains, which at the least equalled in height the walls of the Citie, from whence he battered it, and endammaged it with much facility. Lycinius seeing it was not the securest way for him; gaineth Bithynia, where he trieth his utmost endeavour, making arrows of all wood: but all succeeded so ill with him, that of an Army which exceeded an hundred thousand men, there scarce remained thirty thousand. He, who could not yet find in his heart to give over, shuts himself up in the Citie of Nicomedia, where Constantine furiously assaulteth him; so that seeing himself upon the extream despair of his affairs, he went out of the Citie, and cast himself at the feet of Constantine, laying aside the purple robe and Diadem, and onely demanding a place of safety, where he might pass the rest of his days, which could not much longer continue, for he was fully three-score years of age.

End of Lycinius.

A certain Priest of Nicomedia, who lived at that time there, and who set hand to this History, saith, that Constantine sent him into France to bewail his sins; but the more probable opinion is, that he put him to death, being weary of his disturbances, and having much distrust of his spirit, notwithstanding that Constantia still lived, and begged of her brother the life of her husband. Constantine cannot be excused to have used most severe punishments even against his nearest kindred, having still in his head the fire of war and ambition, and not being reconciled but very late to the mildness of Christianitie.

Behold how so many Emperours being removed, he remained sole Master of the world, making afterwards divisions to his brothers, the sons of Theodora, as he thought good. He that would attentively consider this arrival of Constantine to Monarchy, and the reign of more than thirty years, which God gave him, shall see more clear than day, that all these favours came not to him, but by the virtue of true Religion, whose Altars he the first of all Emperours exalted.

The seventh SECTION.

The vices and passions of Constantine before Baptism, with the death of Crispus and Fausta.

I Will not here present unto you a Constantine in outward lineament, as Eusebius hath done, to cover his faults, and onely expose beauties to view. It is no wonder that he had vices before Baptism, but it is the miracle of Christianity, to change Lions into Lambs, sinks into fountains, and thorns into roses and tulipans. The ice of winter makes the beauty of the spring, darkness contributes to the lustre of light, nor ever is the sun more bright, than after an eclipse. So grace, which is the splendour of eternal light, makes it self to be seen with more triumphs in arms, where it hath subdued most iniquities. It is certain, that this warlike humour of Constantine, transported him into vanities, ambitions, jealousies, and in some sort into a bloudy disposition, which was greatly fomented by the education he received in the Palace of Diocletian.

Behold a prodigious accident, which happened in his house, by a precipitation ill ordered, the death of his poor son Crispus, poisoned by the commandement of his father, upon a wicked and sinister calumny raised upon him by his step-mother. Verily my pen shaketh with humour, being to touch upon this history, and I know many Grecian flatterers either have passed it over in silence, or been willing to disguise it in favour of Constantine: but the holy Martyr Artemius freely avoweth before Julian the Apostata, who reproched him with it, forbearing to deny a fact, which was very notorious, yet desirous to sweeten it by intervening circumstances. Cardinal Baronius is much displeased with Eusebius, who hath spoken nothing of it, as if it were a thing very strange, that a man, who wrote to the son the life of his father, in form of a Panegirick, should not charge his writings with crimes and furies, which men then endeavoured to suppress by all means. Great men have their judgements too tender for such like histories, and ordinarily resemble that creature, which bears his gall in his ear. They cannot hear a true Historie in any thing which toucheth them, without offence; they must sometimes understand their own lives in the rumours of people: where the one unlimittedly takes the liberty of speaking all, since the other takes licence of doing all.

Constant. 19. Bar.

Alban. animal. Albertus.

The vices of Constantine about these times cannot be concealed. But he having caused his son Crispus to be put to death, and thereunto added the death of his wife Fausta, who had raised the calumny against the innocent, this distick was affixed to the gates of his Palace, attributed afterward to Consul Ablavius:

Saturni aurea sæcla quis requirat?
Sunt hæc gemmea, sed Neroniana.

It was an alluſion to the humour of Conſtantine, who much loved pearls and precious ſtones; as alſo to that, which paſſed in the matter of Criſpus and Fauſta, the ſubſtance whereof is this: Let us not ſeek any more for the golden Age of Saturn: Behold one all of pearl, but the Age of Nero.

Let us ſpeak what we think moſt probably to have happened in this affair. We have already mentioned, how Conſtantine in the prime of his youth was eſpouſed in his firſt wedlock to Minervina, upon which the Writers of his time have much praiſed him, as a Prince very chaſte, who to avoid wandering and unlawfull pleaſures, willingly tyed himſelf to a legitimate marriage, and from that time took upon him the ſpirit of a husband. It is an eaſie matter to believe, that this Minervina, whom he married, had taken the name of Minerva, becauſe of the wiſdom, grace, and beauties, reſplendent in her perſon. It ſeemeth theſe great perfections of mind and body, ever draw along with them a certain fate, which affordeth them no long continuance, but rather the lives of roſes, that in the evening make a tomb of the ſcarlet, whereof in the morning they made a cradle. The poor Princeſs quickly died, after ſhe had brought forth to Conſtantine at one birth, which was her firſt and laſt, two twins, to wit, a ſon named Criſpus, and a daughter, who from the name of her Grand-mother, was called Helena, and afterward married to Julian the Apoſtata.

The firſt marriage of Conſtantine.

Minervina.

This Criſpus was verily the moſt accompliſhed Prince of that Age, for he at the very firſt ſucked in piety with his milk, having the moſt glorious S. Helena for his firſt Miſtreſs in Chriſtianity. From thence being initiated in the ſtudy of good letters, he had for Tutour that famous man Lactantius Firmianus, one of the moſt eloquent and ancienteſt Authours of Chriſtianity: who being the inſtructour of Cæſars, notwithſtanding lived in ſuch poverty, that he with much ſtraitneſs enjoyed the neceſſities of life. Criſpus having manured his ſpirit with learning, very courageouſly addicted himſelf to the exerciſe of arms; wherein he very well expreſſed the Genius and dexterity of his father, but with much more grace and ſweetneſs. For Hiſtories aſſure us, he was of viſage moſt amiable, full of attractives and admiration, which made upon the minds of men ſo much the more impreſſion, as they were ingrafted in a ſingular modeſty, and a goodneſs ſo natural, that no man could near hand behold it without affection.

Criſpus and his qualities.

O God, what fury is there in diſhoneſt love, and how much did it diſturb the houſe of Conſtantine! If Lords and Ladies, who give admittance to affections and thoughts unlawful, did well conſider the acerbities which attend this paſſion, they would rather tear their hearts out with their nails, than pollute them with ſuch ordures. It is not without cauſe, what the wiſe Ariſtophanes hath ſaid, that love was baniſhed from Heaven, as a trouble-feaſt and diſturber of the repoſe of Divinities. The truth is, where this paſſion ſetteth foot, it exileth from thence innocency, and tranquility, two the moſt precious pearls of life; and and were there wicked loves in Heaven, there would no longer be felicities. Happy is that life, which hath no eyes for thoſe carnal beauties, and is all eyes to preſerve it ſelf, eſpecially in the beginning, from ſuch ſurprizals.

So Simon the Magician ſaid, that the ſoul of Helena had put fire, trouble, and jealouſie among the Angels, but that taking from the this object of concupiſcence he had accorded them. Philaſtrius de hæreſ.

The miſerable Fauſta wife of Conſtantine, daughter of Maximian, who had received good education in the houſe of her father, and was of a very ſenſual humour, even ſo far as to controle the devotions of her husband, and pick quarrels againſt Religion, which ſhe would never embrace, had in this diſorder vehement diſpoſitions, ſiniſterly to admit the love which the beauty of Criſpus might eaſily afford her. This divine feature ſtanding always as an object for the wanton eyes of the Empreſs, enkindled ſo much fire in her veins, that another flame muſt be found to quench it. The children which ſhe had by her huſband were nothing to her, in compariſon of Criſpus; Criſpus was in her heart. Criſpus in her thought. Criſpus in her diſcourſe, wherein ſhe yet had ſome temper, fearing to diſcover her paſſion. Yet could ſhe not forbear but ſay, Criſpus was the idæa of perfect men, and the incomparable ſon, whoſe worth and virtue would ſurvive with the world. It was much wondered, how a ſtep-mother ſhould entertain ſo much good opinion of the ſon of her husband; yet ſhe having hitherto lived within the limits of honour, it was interpreted, all theſe affections were ſincere and innocent. Criſpus, who then thought not upon his own defence, in a combat that was nothing but courteſie, took all theſe favours as witneſſes of a moſt unſpotted amity, reciprocally rendering to her much reſpect, wherewith ſhe ſhewed her ſelf not a little troubled, deſiring he would treat with her in a more free faſhion: for love had already deſpoiled her of majeſty.

Saint Auguſtine hath very well ſaid, that he who will puniſh an exorbitant ſpirit, muſt leave it in its own hands, to ſerve both as a ſcaffold and executioner to it ſelf. The unfortunate Fauſta, who had already given over-free paſſage to ſin, felt acceſſes of ice and fire, of deſires, of affrightments, of confidence, and remorſe. Her conſcience accuſed her in the bottom of her heart, and ceaſed not to ſhew her the enormity of this fault, when by the help of impudency, ſhe thought to have quenched theſe little ſparkles of goodneſs, which God ſoweth in the moſt forſaken hearts. She knew not how or where to begin this pernicious deſign. Criſpus ſeemed to be too chaſte, his Chriſtian religion made him in her opinion too auſtere, his ſpirit was as yet too tender, and not capable of a moſt powerful wickedneſs; and although he ſhould conſent, where may faithfull complices be found, fit occaſions, and liberty, to content an infamous deſire? The pain which ordinarily attendeth crimes, the rigour of a Conſtantine jealous of his bed, the infamy, and apprehenſions of puniſhments, coming to fall upon her thoughts, made her well to ſee both the abyſs and horrour: but paſſion tranſported her hood-wincked, beyond all conſiderations, ſo that one day taking her opportunitie, ſhe accoſted the young Prince with words, which ſufficiently teſtified her a loſt woman. But he, who would not at the firſt put her into confuſion, with modeſtie declined what ſhe had ſaid, and interpreted it far from her thought. She, who would no longer appear a Lucrece, being much troubled he ſhould underſtand in a chaſt ſenſe, what ſhe had ſpoken to an ill purpoſe, unfolds her ſelf ſo freely, that the wiſe Criſpus, no further able to ſuffer this bluſhleſs ſpirit, ſpake a word to her rough and hopeleſs, That if ſhe perſiſted in this infamous deſire, he would give the Emperour notice; and thereupon flew from her like a lightening, and withdrew, leaving her in a deſpair and rage, not ſufficiently to be expreſſed. All her love then turned into a diabolical hatred, which ſuggeſted furies and black thoughts, reſolving with her ſelf to uſe him as as the wife of Potiphar did Joſeph. She ſerved her ſelf with all the arms of grief, which were at that time very natural to her, ceaſing not to weep and ſigh before her husband, as if ſhe had afflicted her ſelf for anothers ſin: yet had ſhe ſo much cunning, that ſhe feigned to hide her tears, and ſmother her ſighs, to render the diſguiſe more dangerous, by a pretext of modeſty.

Love turned into rage.

The Emperour ſeeing her in this plight, asked the cauſe of her ſadneſs. She anſwered, it was fit for his Majeſty not to know it. He the more perſiſted to underſtand what ſhe feigned to conceal, preſſing and interrogating her, to draw her calumny from her, with as much earneſtneſs as one would a truth. In the end ſhe declared with many counterfeit horrours, and words cruelly modeſt, That his ſon Criſpus would have enterprized upon the honour of his bed; but God be thanked, her faith inviolable put her under ſafety, free from ſuch dangers: And that ſhe demanded no other ſatisfaction from this miſerable man, who was fled, but the remorſe of his wicked conſcience. Conſtantine recommending ſilence unto her, entered into a black and deep anger, propoſing unto himſelf, that the retreat of his ſon was a note of his crime; he determined therefore to put him ſpeedily to death, and for this purpoſe, calling one of his ſervants, the moſt truſty and beſt reſolved for executions, having under great oaths and execrations obliged him to ſecreſie, gives him expreſs commandment to meet with his ſon Criſpus as ſoon as he could, to treat warily with him, not affrighting, nor giving him the leaſt ſuſpition, and withal to fail not to ſerve him at his firſt repaſt with poiſon well prepared, ſo to ſend him into the other world. This man amazed at ſuch a dreadfull command, asked of the Emperour, If he had ſo well reſolved on this affair, as to uſe a ſon of ſo great merit in this manner. Yea, ſaith he, I have thought upon it, and it is neceſſary he die: for I muſt tell you, it not being needfull to inform you further, that beſides the practiſe conceived by him, his life is incompatible with mine. The other ſuppoſed he had plotted ſome conſpiracy upon the life and ſcepter of his father; behold the cauſe, why he haſtened the blow, and being already very familiar with poor Criſpus, he accoſted him with great complements of honour and courteſie, feigning to make him merry, becauſe indeed he then ſaw him in a very ſad humour, upon that which had paſſed between him and Fauſta, covering his thoughts as much as he might, to preſerve the honour of his wicked ſtep-mother. Death of Criſpus. Hereupon an unhappy banquet was prepared for the innocent, which was the laſt of his life, poiſon being traiterouſly given him, there where he leaſt expected it.

Verily this death, which way ſoever we look, is moſt lamentable. The Tragedies which bemoan it with ſo much ornament, as that of our Stephanius, have much ſpirit in them; but taking onely the thing in the ſimple nakedneſs of the fact, it miniſtereth matter of compaſſion to hearts moſt obdurate: A young Prince, at that time the moſt abſolute in the world, beautifull as an Abſalom, valiant as an Alexander, innocent as a Joſeph, at that time taken away, when he was at the gates of the Empire which expected him, and taken away by a death ſo hydeous and treacherous, and by the commandment of his father, who cauſed him to die as one inceſtuous, not admitting him to ſpeak, nor permitting him to juſtifie himſelf, nor affording leiſure to know himſelf, nor one ſmall moment of time to prepare himſelf for death, which is allowed to the moſt criminal. He was ſilently involved in the extremity of unhappineſs, to ſhut up the mouth of innocency, and open that of calumny, to rail againſt his very aſhes.

The generous ſoul, ever prepared for this paſſage by the laws of Chriſtianity, which it had ſo devoutly embraced, iſſued out of his chaſte body, to haſten to the crown of the Elect, leaving incomparable ſorrows behind it. Alas! what doth not a wicked affection, a calumny, a ſuſpition, an unbridled anger, an inconſiderate word? O you Great-ones, will you never learn wiſdom by the evils of others?

The rage of Fauſta turned into pitie. As ſoon as this news came to the Court, the wicked Fauſta well ſaw it was an effect of her treachery, and lively repreſenting before her own eyes this poor Prince, whom ſhe before had ſo much affected, at that time ſo unworthily maſſacred, in a beauty, in an age, wherein ſuch as die are moſt pitied, and in a goodneſs, which would have given matter of compaſſion to Tigers and Lions; all her paſſion and hatred was turned into an enraged ſorrow, which made her crie out, and lament at the feet of her husband, confeſſing ſhe had ſlain the chaſte Criſpus, by her deteſtable calumny, that it was ſhe who had ſollicited him to evil, but had found him a Joſeph, endowed with an invincible chaſtity, and had deteſted her ſin, as it well deſerved; whereupon excited with choler, and fearing to be prevented, ſhe had proceeded to this dreadfull accuſation, and therefore was unworthy to live, ſince ſhe had ſlain the moſt innocent Prince of the world, and ſtained his own father with his proper bloud. Calumny diſcovered.

Conſtantine amazed beyond deſcription at ſo prodigious an accident, had neither reply, nor ſenſe of a man, ſo much wonder had rapt him from himſelf: but when he ſaw his holy mother Helena, who had ſo tenderly bred up the poor Criſpus, bewailing him with unconſolable tears, and begging of the father, at the leaſt the body of her grand-child, to waſh it with the waters of her eyes, and bury it with her hands, ſaying, the wicked beaſt had ſlain her Joſeph; he was pierced to the quick with compaſſion, mingled with fury. Then the poor ſiſter of the deceaſed, who ſeemed nought elſe but the ſhaddow of her brother, coming alſo to diſſolve her ſelf wholly into tears, near to her Grand-mother, this ſpectacle the more enkindled the paſſion of the Emperour: And thinking that Fauſta well deſerved death, being convinced of ſuch a miſchief by her own confeſſion, he cauſed her to enter into the bath, and ſo in an inſtant to be ſmothered with the vapour, which was a puniſhment wherewith many times they put perſons of quality to death.

Death of Fauſta. Behold the iſſue of the hydeous loves of Fauſta, to teach all Ladies, that thoſe paſſions, which begin by complacencies, ſoothings, and curioſities, very often end in horrible tragedies. In the mean time the houſe of Conſtantine remained long drenched in a dead ſilence, and all was very ſecretly carried, ſo that none knowing what publickly to think of the death of Criſpus and Fauſta, it gave occaſion to many to affirm they died for ſome conſpiracy.

We cannot here excuſe Conſtantine of a violent anger, a precipitation, & a proceeding too bloudy. Howſoever, he cauſed Criſpus to die under a falſe belief of impurity, which he thought was to be revenged, and Fauſta puniſhed by way of juſtice. Behold why this ſin, though it hath much miſchief in it, yet it hath not the determinate wickedneſs of the ſin of David in the death of Urias, becauſe the one wrought with a manifeſt knowledge of his crime and the other proceeded therein with much ignorance, and ſenſe of juſtice. Yet Conſtantine after theſe exorbitances was touched with great remorſe, which in the end put him actually on the profeſſion of Chriſtianity.

The eighth SECTION.

The calling of Conſtantine to Chriſtianitie. The progreſs of his Converſion and Baptiſm.

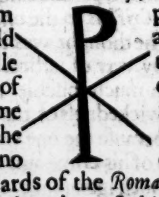
I Have always eſteemed the ſaying of S. Paulinus, which we before alledged, very probable, that the faith of S. Helena did not onely make Conſtantine a Chriſtian, but the firſt of Chriſtian Princes. This good mother without doubt gave him the firſt tincture of Chriſtianity; but being of an ambitious and warlike ſpirit, who went along with the main ſtream of the world, he was not ſo ſoon confirmed in the faith and integrity of religion. Notwithſtanding, he began to have moſt lively apprehenſions for his converſion about the ſeventh year of his Empire, which was the year of the defeat of Maxentius; whileſt he had this great Conſtant. 19.

war upon his hands, his temporal necessities opening his eyes, that he might have recourse to spiritual forces. He then endeavoured, as he afterward relateth, to meditate seriously within himself, that there was some Divine Providence from Heaven, which gave concussions to victories and Empires, without which the counsels of men were cloudy, their Armies weak, and labours vain. Afterward remembering what had passed in the Roman Empire, he saw that those Emperours, who had shewed themselves most fervent in the superstition of false gods, and were the greatest persecutours of Christians, had been infamous and unhappy, not beloved of the people, without name, not honoured, issueless, and and for the most part odious and execrable to posterity. He then imagined, that this Religion, which professed so much sanctity, and was grown up in the temples of three hundred years, had something divine in it, and that perhaps it would not be amiss to invoke in this great labyrinth of affairs, the God of his mother.

Beginning of the conversion of the Emperour.

As he then went up and down revolving these discourses in the bottom of his thoughts, casting his eyes up to Heaven, he perceived about the evening, the figure of a great Crois, all composed of most resplendent light, which seemed unto him to bear these Characters, IN HOC VINCE, Vanquish in this sign. This was much more important than the bowe in Heaven, which Augustus Cæsar saw about the sun, when he entered into Rome to take possession of the Empire. Notwithstanding, Constantine and the Captains, who observed this sign in Heaven, had some distrust, because of the figure of the Crois, which till then was ever accounted of an ill presage. Now, as the Emperour slept in the night, in great perplexity of cogitations, it seemed that the God of the Christians appeared unto him, with the same sign which he had seen the day before, commanding him expresly to carry it hereafter in his Ensigns.

Following this vision, he caused a Banner to be made, in the manner as Eusebius describeth it, who had seen it. It was as a launce all of gold, which had a piece of wood athwart in form of a Crois, from whence hung a rich imbroidery, in which was the image of the Emperour, and about it a Crown of gold and pearl, which bare in the middle the two first letters of the name of our Saviour. This was from that time forward his prime Banner, which the Romans called the Labarum. It was no otherwise different from the standards of the Roman Bands, but that it carried the sacred cypher of this venerable Title, which was not understood by all the world, but held by the Pagans as some devise of the fantasie of spirit. The war against Maxentius having so prosperously succeeded, as we have said, under this propitious standard, Constantine held the Saviour of the world in great veneration, and made the Edicts, which we know, in favor of Christians. Notwithstanding, he for a long time deferred his publick and solemn profession thereof, whether it were that the course of great warlike enterprizes and affairs diverted his mind, or whether he feared to distast the prime men of the Empire by this change. It is likewise thought, that his wife Fausta, whom he in the beginning much affected, greatly weakened his love to Christianity; in such sort, that the Christians ceased not to be still ill intreated in this remisness of the Emperour. In the end, after the calamitie of the death of his son and wife, so tragically happened in his own house, he seriously opened his eyes, about the nineteenth year of his Empire, to seek remedy for his evils.



Absolute conversion of the Emperour.

Zosimus, a Pagan, leadeth us as it were not thinking of it, to the knowledge of the time, and manner of his Baptism. For he saith, that Constantine, after the death of Crispus and Fausta, had great remorse of conscience; and that not wholly having abjured Paganism, he sought from South-sayers, and Pagan Philosophers, as others adde, the means to purifie himself from the bloud, which he so unfortunately had shed. It is said that one Sopater, the wisest of the Platonists, who had sometime lived in his Court, told him these stains of bloud would stick on souls, and never be washed out, and that if they departed this life without punishment, they would re-enter into other bodies to expiate in the end those crimes which they had committed, and that there was no other remedy. The Emperour found this Philosophie very harsh, and his spirit being much tormented with very strange disturbances; behold, saith Zosimus, an Ægyptian newly come from Spain to Rome: (note that he meaneth the great Bishop Hosius, who was sent at the same time into Ægypt by Pope Sylvester.) This Ægyptian, saith he, having insinuated himself into the favour of some Ladies of the Court, found by their means access to the Emperour, who failed not to propose unto him the difficulties and troubles of his conscience. This man answered him, that his Majesty should not need to disquiet himself hereupon, and that there was no crime so enormous, which might not be expiated by the remedies which are practised in Christian Religion. To this the Emperour very willingly hearkened, and resolved, all delayes laid apart, to become a Christian.

Discourse of Sopater.

See here the beginning of the Baptism of Constantine. As for the sequel, it is a question much perplexed: for some would have him to be baptized in the suburbs of Nicomedia, upon the point of death, and others at Rome by S. Sylvester, about the 19th year of his Empire. I say briefly, to decide this difficulty, that it is a most unreasonable belief, to think that Constantine the Great, called by the general voice of the holy Fathers, The holy and Religious Emperour Constantine, recorded in memorials and publick registers of the Church, which are recited before Altars, as the chief of Orthodox Princes; Constantine, whom the Arians, yea, the most refractory, which have been after him, never durst declare of their faction, to have been christened at his death, by the hand of an Arian Bishop, out of the communion of the Catholick Church. There is not one to be found who favoureth this opinion, but Eusebius, who hath been an Ensign-bearer of the Arians, and who no more ought to be credited in this article, than a Pagan Historian, it being most unequal to take him for a Judge who had made himself a party in this affair. And if some passages be found somewhat doubtful in the Chronicle of S. Hierom, which seem to support this errour, it is easie to consider, that this Doctour, who was a merchant enriched with infinite variety of learning, hath made many pieces, which he rather translated and compiled from others, than composed upon his own invention: and the learned are not ignorant, that his Chronicle is accounted in this kind of books, as a work formed from observations and opinions of Eusebius, which should not at all alter the estimation we have of Constantine, acknowledged and averred by so many other passages of the same Doctour. And if S. Ambrose in the funeral Oration of Theodosius, said, that Constantine received Baptism being in extremity, we must not therefore infer, that he was baptized by Arian in the last instant of his life; other wise he would not call him in the same passage a Monarch of great merit, who left faith as an inheritance for Princes of his posteritie. This extremity then is an extremity either of troublesom affairs, in which Constantine saw himself involved, for having so long time deferred his Baptism, or as others say, an extremity of sickness, wherewith he was surprized in the Citie of Rome, and cured by Baptism.

His Baptism.

In ultimis constitutus.

The opinion of Eusebius being rejected, I ask, whether ther it be not much more probable, to take that of a Councel entire, and very ancient, held under Pope Silvester about the year of our Lord, Three hundred twenty four, which is said expressly to have been assembled at the same time that the Emperour Constantine was baptized by Sylvester Bishop of Rome, than to adhere to inventions of a passionate adversary? As for other circumstances of this Baptism, which are drawn from the acts attributed to S. Sylvester, we must affirm, there are divers things very hard to believe, if we proceed according to humane reason: for we cannot so easily imagine what is expressed in those writings, that Sylvester was hidden in the caverns of the mountain, which afterward bare his name, flying the persecution of Constantine: of which other Authours make no mention, as being contrary to the humour and Edicts of this Prince, who after the victory gained against Maxentius, ever favoured Christianitie. Besides it is there said, that Constantine demanded, what Gods were S. Peter and Paul, who had appeared to him in his sleep: Which was not very likely in an Emperour, that so many years before was instructed in the mysteries of Christian Religion. Adde also the leaprousie of Constantine, whereof no authour hath spoken before those acts, and wherewith it is held, that Constantius the son of this great Emperour was much offended, complaining they attributed to his father counterfeit maladies, to cure him in picture. If we must pursue opinions humanely reasonable, I would say, that Constantine could no more be leaprous, than our King Clodoveus of most glorious memory; of whom S. Gregory of Towers hath said, that on the day of his Baptism he was cured of an old leaprosie, intending by that speech, from sin. It is true that Cardinal Baronius doth all which an able man may to clear these difficulties: but there are certain things, which it is more comely to believe piously, than easily to establish by reason. And therefore if the Reader here desire to know my conceit, I hold, it is a timorarious thing to go about to taxand turmoil old beliefs, which though they pass not for articles of faith, are notwithstanding received with edification in common opinions. Varro saith, that to desire to be wise contrary to common understanding, is to rank ones self in the number of fools: and the great S. Hilary hath said very worthily, that the first verity of wisdom is sometime to believe what one would not, submitting our judgement to men of the best understanding: which if it were well conceived, so many young heads would be ashamed to account themselves able men, especially in matter of faith, thereby inordinately taxing all the monuments of antiquity.

The history of the Baptism of Constantine drawn from the acts attributed to S. Sylvester, is more easie piously to be believed, than effectually proved.

Gregor. Turon. hist. l. 2. cap. 31.

Prodit novus Constantinus ad lavacrum deleturus lepræ veteris morbum.

Contra multos sapere desipere est.

Sapientiæ prima hæc veritas est, interdum sapere quod necesse est. Hilar. l. 8. de Trinitate.

I say then, for these acts, which are accounted to be S. Sylvesters, and namely for those reported by Pope Adrian, as it is not my intention to engage my self upon the proof of them by a way of sleight human reasons, so would I not in any sort impugn, but rather believe them, with a religious simplicity, which is the science of Saints, and ever the most assured.

History of Baptism according to the acts of S. Sylvester.

These acts tell us, that Constantine still deferring his Baptism, and living in much liberty, was stricken with a leaprousie, which was a manifest wound from Heaven, wherewith greatly afflicted, he consulted with Magicians to apply some remedie. They gave him deadly counsel, whereof the Kings of Ægypt had heretofore made use in the like maladie, which was to make a bath of humane bloud. This at the beginning seemed to him very strange, but the infirmity which pressed him, had no ears to hear reason: little children were taken of the meanest condition in the Citie, to cut their throats like sheep, and consecrate their bloud to the health of the Emperour. The mothers dissheveled and desperate, ran after their tender infants, even to the gates of the Palace, and howled so dreadfully, that Constantine hearing their cries, and withal the cause of their sorrow, commanded the infants to be restored to their mournfull mothers; esteeming it more reasonable to tollerate his evil, than to be cured with so cruel a remedy.

The night following, S. Peter, and S. Paul appeared to him in a dream, and adviled him to forsake all these Pagan superstitions, to re-edifie the Churches of Christians, and send for Pope Sylvester, who was at that time hidden in the grots of Mount Soracte, that would discover unto him a fish-pool, which should heal his leaprousie. As soon as he awakened, he recounted his dream to the Lords of his Court, and sent to seek out the Pope, who seeing these Gentlemen come, disposed himself to Martyrdom, thinking they came to lead him forth to slaughter: but understanding from their own mouthes much other news, he set forward towards the Emperour, who most courteously received him: and having made a long discourse of matters which had happened unto him concerning his calling to Christianity, he demandeth of him what Gods were Peter and Paul, who had appeared unto him in sleep, and made overture of the fish-pool, wherein he should be washed. The Pope answered they were no Gods, but Apostles, and servants of God. Thereupon he required to see their images, which Sylvester sent for by a Deacon: and having found them like to the faces he saw in sleep, he cryed out aloud, that he no longer must desire the fish-pool.

Sylvester seeing him resolved to be baptized, commandeth a publick fast, accompanied with ordinary prayers, catechizeth the Emperour, and counselleth him to take seven days of retirement, to prepare himself for Baptism, and which is more, to lay aside for those days the purple and Imperial Diadem, that he might be clothed with the habit of penance; which he couragiously performed. And the day of Baptism being come, as soon as he was washed with these life-giving waters, he was miraculously cured of his leprousie, beholding a light from heaven, and a hand stretched over him. See what is in these ancient monuments, and which Cardinal Baronius rendereth probable, with reasons very consonant.

The ninth SECTION.

The acts of Constantine after his Baptism.

CONSTANTINE after his Baptism began a quite other course of life: for laying aside all humane respects, which had hitherto tyed him to Gentilism for considerations of his State, he caused a Throne to be prepared in the Palace of Trajan, where having sent for the Senate, he declared with the eloquence of a Monarch, the reasons which had moved him to this alteration of Religion, and said:

Notable Oration of Constantine, partly drawn out of his acts and Edicts.

SIRS, I doubt not, but the change of Religion, which I have made, will appear strange to many, who blame all that which they cannot understand, and will understand nothing, but what flatters their presumption. All noveltie is odious to those, who love the old age of errour: Yet I can tell you, this is no new Religion which I have imbraced, but that which was begun in the purified souls of the golden Age, happily finished in our days. The first men of the world had verity in bloom, we now see the fruit, which we may and shall enjoy, if we be not ungratefull to our happiness, and traiterous to our own conscience. Believe me, Sirs, the world is almost grown out of it's non-age, for God hath taken pitie of the ignorance thereof, and made it see, it was not time any longer to place Dragons and Owls upon Altars, nor other Gods, accounted as monsters, if they would return into the life of men. If our Anceſtours, blinded by miſhap, have made to be eſteemed for Divinities ſo many criminals, for whom our laws do now ordain puniſhments, we are not bound to participate with the crimes of the one, nor the errours of the other, under pretext of antiquitie. I muſt confeſs, that I from my infancie have had great diſtruſt upon the follies which I ſaw in the ſuperſtition of Gentiles, and that which further confirmed me in this opinion, was, that one day I heard the anſwer of an Oracle, which had long time ſtood mute, and being demanded the cauſe of this ſilence, anſwered, The Juſt hindered it from ſpeaking, and we found thoſe Juſt were the Chriſtians, who then had power to ſtop the mouthes of devils.

Afterward I began to conſider thoſe men, whom I ſaw ſo perſecuted, and that there was not a corner of the earth that was not ruddie with their bloud, yet were they notwithſtanding ſo patient in their perſecutions, that they had prayers on their lips for thoſe, who rent their hearts out of their bodies. This then gave me matter of amazement; but when I came to think on their Church, which flouriſhed among ſo many ſtorms, and encreaſed under the ſwords of perſecution, this ſeemed to me more than humane; yet tranſported with the torrent of common opinions, I ſtill reſiſted the voice of God, which ſpake in my heart, when it opened my eyes, and made me once lively apprehend the dreadfull ends of Emperours, who had perſecuted Chriſtianitie, comparing them to the felicitie of my father Conſtantius, of moſt glorious memorie, who had preſerved his hands innocent even to death, free from any ſtain of Chriſtian bloud. This was ſufficiently potent to move a ſoul, which would eaſily yield to reaſon: but God redoubling his inſpirations, made me one day behold in the Heavens a prodigie, which many ſaw with me, to wit, the figure of the Croſs, compoſed of moſt reſplendent light, which appeared juſt at the time I was to wage battel againſt Maxentius. I call the living God to witneſs, that I therein read diſtinctly theſe words, written as with the rays of the Sun, IN HOC VINCE. And it is a wonder that I deferred ſtill to yield my ſelf up, till ſuch time, that the Saviour of the world advertiſed me in a viſion, to take into my Standards the ſign which I had ſeen in Heaven the day before. I inſtantly obeyed, and have ſeen ſo prodigious effects ſucceed in the defeat of Maxentius, which you have admired, attributing to man that which was a work of the Divinitie.

I thought then to have diſcovered what I was, but conſiderations of ſtate, which had too much force upon my ſoul, ſtayed me, and have made me walk along hitherto, in a life more licentious than I intended. I now proteſt before the face of Heaven and earth, that I am a Chriſtian both in heart and profeſſion; nor ſhall any motives ever alter that, which I have ſo conſtantly reſolved on. Yet for all this I purpoſe not to force any man in his Religion, leaving for this time belief as free as elements: Yet for the charitie I bear towards my good ſubjects, I cannot but wiſh them as much good as my ſelf. Now all my greateſt happineſs, and which I eſteem more than my Purple and Diadem, is to entertain the knowledge of a living God, which hath been revealed to us by his onely Son Jeſus Chriſt, the Doctour and Saviour of the world. His perſon is full of miracles, his life of wiſdom and goodneſs, his doctrine of puritie; and if to conquer our pride, and expiate our demerits, he hath humbled himſelf to the puniſhment of the Croſs, ſo much therefore the more ought it to be honourable, ſince he hath done for us all that, which an incomparable love can do, and endured all that which an invincible patience may ſuffer.

I can do no other but love and ſingularly honour thoſe who are enrolled under his Standard, as my brothers in Religion: and let it not ſeem ſtrange to any, if heretofore ſhewing my ſelf very liberal to beautifie and enrich the Temples of Gentiliſm, I now apply my ſelf to build and adorn the Churches. I will render what I owe to God and my own conſcience, nor ſhall my ſubjects, who are of a Religion different from mine, be any way intereſſed, therein deſiring to preſerve them, as perſons, whom I hope one day to have companions in faith, and cobeirs in glorie, if they adde never ſo little conſent to the lights, wherewith the wiſdom of God Incarnate hath repleniſhed the world. I onely beſeech thee, O great God, on whom all Scepters and Crowns depend, ſince you have united the Eaſt and Weſt under my hands, you would arrange them under the yoak of your Law, which is the knot of Empires, and ſource of felicitie. I offer unto you my perſon, mine Arms, my Scepter, and all mine abilities, humbly begging of you to accept my ſlender ſervice, and to give me the aſſiſting wiſdom of your Thrones, to govern in all honour, all juſtice, all peace, and amitie, the people which you have committed to my charge.

This Oration was heard by all the world, with very great applauſe, in ſuch ſort, that for the ſpace of two hours, the cries of an infinite number were heard, who made many acclamations in favour of Chriſtian Religion. Fourty times was repeated, UNUS DEUS CHRISTIANORUM, There is but one God, which is the God of the Chriſtians: and thirty times was proclaimed, LET THOSE WHO DENY CHRIST, COME TO NOUGHT: and ten times, LET THE TEMPLES BE SHUT UP, LET THE CHURCHES BE OPENED: And fourteen times, THOSE WHO ARE ENEMIES TO JESUS CHRIST, ARE ENEMIES TO THE EMPEROURS: And ten times, THOSE WHO ARE ENEMIES TO JESUS CHRIST, ARE ENEMIES TO THE ROMANS: And fourty times, THERE IS NO OTHER GOD, BUT HE WHO HATH SAVED US. AUGUSTUS CONSTANTINE: And fifty times, HE EVER SHAL VANQUISH WHO ADORETH THE SAVIOUR OF THE WORLD: And thirty times, LET THE PRIESTS OF IDOLS BE BANISHED OUT OF THE CITIE: And thirteen times, LET THOSE ALSO BE EXILED OUT OF ROME, WHO WIL SACRIFICE TO IDOLS: And fourty times, COMMAND THEY BE PRESENTLY THRUST OUT OF OUR WALS. Admirable change of the world by the Oration and example of the Emperour.

Upon theſe laſt cries, the Emperour roſe up, and making a ſign with his hand, required ſilence, which inſtantly made all this great multitude to hold their peace; and thereupon: No, ſaith he, I intend not any man ſhould be forced in the matter of his Religion; the ſervices of the world are oft-times conſtrained: but thoſe we render to God, ought ever to be voluntarie. We have no greater proof of the Divinitie, than mercie. God ſheweth what he is, in ſo long time, and with ſuch patience, ſuffering the impieties and ingratitudes of men. I would have all the world know, that I intend not to make Chriſtians by neceſſitie, but by diſcretion. As it is a crime to denie true Religion to thoſe who require it, ſo it is an importunitie to ſeek now to impoſe it by force on ſuch as demand it not. They that will not follow my example, ſhall not therefore be ſeparated from my friendſhip. I am the common Father of all in general, and no man ought to be fruſtrated of the preſervation which I owe him.

Theſe words ſtayed the out-cries of thoſe, who already tranſported the affairs into diſorder, by an indiſcreet zeal, and gave good aſſurance to the Pagans, ſo that the Emperour going out of the Palace, they lighted at mid-day many lamps and torches, to conduct him to his houſe, with a thouſand teſtimonies of joy and alacrity.

He at the ſame time cauſed certain laws to be publiſhed, by which he left the Gentiles at liberty in in the exerciſe of their ancient ſuperſtition, on ſuch condition, that they ſhould abſtain to ſpeak in any Edicts and converſions.

any sort against the honour of the Saviour of the world; nor should at all disturb the Christians: adding, that he intended the sons and daughters of the family, yea the very servants, should not be kept by force in the Pagan superstition, but have all liberty to be baptized when they had a will thereunto.

O God, what incomparable charms have the examples of Great-ones in them, to dispose men to virtue! Nicephorus saith, that in a very short time there were numbered twelve thousand men, besides women and children baptized at Rome. Yet was it observed, there were few Senatours, nor of other politick spirits; so much the wisdom of the flesh is contrary to that of the Cross. Faith is the inheritance of the humble, and all those souls puffed up with presumption of their own ability, stick so fast to the earth, that they loose the sight of Heaven.

Piety of Constantine.

The holy Emperour, who was desirous to render himself as profitable by works and examples, as he became comfortable in his discourses, employed himself with an incredible fervour in all that which concern the service of God, and namely in the building of Churches.

Where among other things, he did an act worthy of immortality: for the eighth day after his Baptism, passing to the place which was already dedicated to S. Peter, and where he had a purpose to build a fair Church, there in presence of all the world, he pulled off the purple Robe and Diadem, took a spade in hand, and began to dig the earth, to lay the foundation; then throwing the scuttle upon his royal shoulders, he carried twelve burdens of earth in honour of the twelve Apostles.

It was a spectacle full of admiration, and which gave an unspeakable joy to the Pope and Bishops there present. Notwithstanding the spirits of the times said, it was to abase the purple too much, and vilifie the dignity of Cæsars: not considering that the Emperour Vespasian, from whom Constantine was descended, had done the like in honour of Idols, and were withal desirous, that this man should have less zeal for the living God, than others had used in the service of devils.

But the devout Constantine danced before the Ark, whilest Michol murmured at the window. He had a desire to adorn the place where he was baptized, as the cradle of his Christianity: and made the most admirable Font that was ever beheld, whereof we yet see some signs remaining, which our holy Father Pope Urban the Eighth, hath lately adorned, and embellished with notable endowments: For, among other magnificences, he caused it to be all covered both within and without with plates of silver, and commanded to set up in embossed work the statues of our Saviour and S. John Baptist, with seven figures of Hearts, which poured out water; all which was also in very fine silver, so that it appeared with a marvellous lustre. He commanded for curiosity, to burn balm in stead of oyl in the lamps there hanging, desirous to apply the use of this precious liquour to the services of the Church, since Heliogabalus, the most prodigal of the Emperours, had used it in the lamps of his house.

He was not content to erect two Churches, the one to S. Peter, and the other to S. Paul, which he enriched with innumerable gifts; but he also changed his proper Palace of Lateran, into a Church of our Saviour, which our Kings have afterward done in imitation of him, oftentimes giving their houses to make houses of God. He likewise there established a good quantity of revenues for the poor, which should become Christians, leaving the managing thereof to the discretion of the Pope.

It would be a prodigious thing, yea very troublesom, to reckon up particularly all the presents he gave, and rents he setled in favour of Churches. It sufficeth to tell you that the Pagans became so jealous, that from that time forward, they began to call him the PUPIL, saying, that the first ten years of his Empire, he had been a good Emperour; the second ten, a robber, despoiling Lycinius and others: But as for the third ten, he had put himself into Tutelage, resigning to the Church the whole manage of his estate. See the ordinary hyperboles of passionate spirits, who behold with an envenomed eye the wealth which is taken from riots and vanities, to be bestowed on the Church. Yet notwithstanding this great Emperour so intermingled magnificence with the husbandry of his revenues, that the people were not neglected, nor did his greatness loose any thing of its lustre.

It is a strange thing, that with all those celestial qualities which God had conferred upon his person, he could never tame the stubborn spirits of the Roman Senate; so much infidelity joyned to presumption, admitteth obstacles to the lights of verity. This affront made him undergo another resolution, to build a Citie else-where, which he would equal to the majesty of Rome, and fashion to his best liking, as he afterward did, changing the Citie of Bizantium into the royal Constantinople, an eternal monument of his greatness.

The tenth SECTION.

The endeavour of good works, with the virtues and laws of Constantine.

THis Monarch changed into another man, lived not but by the fire of charity, cleaving to the earth by very slender roots of the necessities of nature: he began seriously to manure the practise of prayer, discoursing familiarly with God, with a tast so sensible, that it surpassed all delights imaginable in nature and wit; a diligence so great, that being in Arms and under Pavilions, he ever had his little oratory of retirement, where like another Moses he consulted with the Divinity. He hearkened to discourses of God with incomparable pleasure; and when he spake of the mysteries of our faith, which he as it were perpetually did, it was with so great exercise, that his heart seemed to melt with his words. His zeal so transported him, that of the prime Captain of the world, he became a Doctour and Preacher, to procure the conversion of his subjects. He who so many times had carried in his hand the sword of the Empire, to cut off rebellious powers, bare then in his mouth the sword of the word, to fill the world with wonders. What he spake with his lips, he taught by examples, carrying under the purple a body worn out with abstinence and mortification. His devotion

He so trampled vanity under-foot, to which he formerly had some inclination, that among a great number of Churches and edifices of piety, which he caused to be built, he would not have his name thereon engraven, reputing himself unworthy, that God should accept such offerings at his hands. And as one day a Bishop, a flatterer, and an Arian, put himself forward to tell him, that after he had governed the world upon earth, he should do the like in Heaven with the Son of God; he felt himself so confounded with this word, that he who ever treated with Ecclesiasticks with very much reverence could not contain himself, but say: Bishop, let it not fall out you any more use such words concerning me, for they are unto me most hatefull: you shall do much better and more suitable to your profession, to pray the living God, I may be both in earth and heaven the least of his servants, than to propose to your self Scepters and Empires for me. Humility.

His patience. His patience was equal to his humility, whereof S. Chrysostom hath observed an excellent passage in the oration of Bishop Eutropius to the Emperour Theodosius, where he saith, that as one day in a popular commotion, they stoned the statues of Constantine, there wanted not many about him who endeavoured to enflame him to the revenge of those outrages: to which he smiling answered, they had strucken a man of stone, but the model remained entire. Now being not ignorant, that the vigour of Christianity consisted in works of charity, he applied himself thereunto with so much fervour, that it seemed his hands were that, which the Hebrew text speaketh of in the Canticles, Hands of the spouse, vessels of gold, replenished with a sea of bounty.

Before his Baptism, great calamities had reduced miserable fathers to such necessity, that being not able to maintain their children, they sought to be discharged of them by ways most lamentable; of which the good Prince being advertised, he wrote to Ablavius his Lieutenant of the whole Politick government of the Empire, to publish a Law through all the Cities of Italie, in which was intimated to all necessitous fathers, who were unable for the education of their children, that they should present them at a place appointed, there to receive apparrel and convenient sustentation: adding, he intended that not onely publick moneys should be employed to supply such wants, but that he would despoil himself willingly of that which was proper and peculiar to himself, for their comfort.

If he found any beggars in the streets, he delighted to clothe them, and to behold them in this new plight, making of his Palace a mount Thabor, where men were transfigured, changing their miseries into felicities. He most particularly enquired after the shamefac'd poor, who had hertofore been wealthy, & learned from them their fortunes, birth, and want, and as he found their qualities and merits, he gave sometimes lands and entire possessions to those, who were in very pressing necessities. A poor widow, who sighed in a corner of her house, forsaken of all the world was much amazed, that this Monarch of the world, came as an Angel from Heaven, to wipe away her tears, and provide for her poor orphans. A forlorn maid, and even upon the brink of the precipice, by the unhappiness of poverty, found the Emperour had given order for her marriage, and had himself taken the pain to know her future husband, and recommend good husbandrie unto him on his part.

This man was as the Intelligence tyed to the government of the Primum Mobile, which is never weary, among so many concussions and motions afforded to total nature. He was a sun, who drew up, and digested all the vapours of the lower world, not intermitting any thing of its course or lights. He was an Ocean, who received drops of water as well as huge rivers: and as there was nothing so high in the world as to be above his greatness, so was there nothing so low, which could withdraw it self from his charitable knowledge.

He ever had his eye open upon the necessities of mankind, and not contenting himself to provide for them by the ordinary wayes of charitie, he thereunto added the hand of justice, making most wholesome laws for the tranquilitie of the whole world. This good Father of the Universe sought out poor banished men, who had been unjustly despoiled by the rigours of injustice, and restored them to their professions. He proposed to himself in his own repose, the affliction of those who had wrongfully been transported into desert Islands, where they still lived, made slaves under the tyranny of men, and in a worse condition than beasts. He thought upon the miseries they endured, who were condemned by unrighteous sentences to labour in mynes. He reflected on the long services of military men, who were absolute in arms, yet oftentimes gained nothing but poverty and ignominy. But above all these considerations, as occasions required, he made most worthy Edicts, for the comfort of so many persons as lived in the acerbities of the world. And for as much as concerned justice, which consisteth in the punishment of crimes and abuses, he was a Hercules, who had perpetually his club lifted up to quell monsters. His Edicts.

There was a custome in those times of Duels and gladiatours, which were much more tollerable than now-adays, for then none were employed therein, but slaves, criminals, and men of the sack and halter, who were already condemned to death. And now-adays is found a frantick Nobility, who degrading themselves from the honour of generous spirits, and bearing the sentence of an ignoble action against themselves, make tropheys of that which is put upon Mooriſh slaves for punishment. Yet the great Constantine saw this manner of punishing the base and abject creatures of the world was too brutish and butcherly, and that it would do well to change these duels into Gallies, or some such like thing; for he wrote to Maximus the Superintendent of justice in these terms: Duels.

"These bloudy spectacles in the civil repose and "domestick peace wherein we live, please me not "at all. Behold the cause why I will wholly take "away these combats of Gladiatours. For if there "be such graceless wretches, who for the punish-"ment of their crimes deserve such a sentence and "such condition, I ordain that you rather cause "them to labour in the mynes, to the end that "without effusion of bloud, they may feel the pain "due to their demerits. Given at Berytus, the first "day of October, under the Consulship of Paulinus "and Julianus. L. 1. de gladiat. Cod. Theod.

I leave you to think what this Monarch would have said of duels of this time, where they hasten to pour out willingly upon publick passages that bloud, which ought rather to be shed upon the walls of Infidels, to cement up the glory of the French. Apostrophe to King Lewis the thirteenth

O Lewis, our great Monarch, it seemeth the God of peace hath permitted the heads of this Hydra to have hitherto budded forth, that they might be made to fall under the innocency of your hands, divinely destinated to so many good works. You have again very lately renewed your Edicts against this pestilence, assuring unto fathers and mothers the bloud of their children for the service of your Crown, and taking away a stain which stuck so many years upon the brow of your Empire. Heaven and earth have participated in the contentment which hath succeeded from these good ordinances, as they do in the preservation of the lives of your subjects, and tranquility of your whole Realm. Let your Majesty so handle the matter, that this Law may hold with nails of adamant, and not loose a glory, which Constantine would have bought at the price of two Empires.

This brave Prince, who ever had been most chast, made also sharp war against the infamous ordures of lust: for he expelled from the Court, as vermine, certain effeminate men, who had made sale of their souls to dishonour, and at other times made a lamentable traffick of their bodies, insinuating themselves by this means, into the Palaces of Great-ones, and sometime into honourable rank. He degraded them all from Nobility, and forbad them to bear even the marks of men of Arms, tying them to services the most contemptible. Besides, he caused to be taken from publick infamies, many poor Christian maids, that had been abandoned to evil by the form of punishment, making expres inhibitions to His chastity.

those villains, who live upon others sins, never to undertake the like practises. Briefly, he so abolished the crimes, which had been tolerated under the other Emperours, that S. Hierom writing upon Isaiah, hath given the title to Constantine, that his Empire had vanquished two monsters, the most dreadfull that were ever seen by destroying the infidelity and impurity of the earth.

His prudence. Cod. Theod. L. de pœnit. Quæ facies, quæ ad similitudinem pulchritudinis cœlestis est figurata, minimè maculetur. Zozom. l. 1. c. 8.

His prudence descended even to the moderating and changing the punishments of offenders, which had some disproportion; and among other things, he decreed, that characters should no more be imprinted upon the forehead of the miserable, for the respect that is due to the face of man, on the which God hath engraven his image. And moreover, for the honour he bare to the Cross, he forbade it should ever again be defiled with the punishments and executions of malefactours; thinking it unreasonable, that that which was matter of glory to Emperours, should likewise serve as an instrument for the pains of the unhappy. He suffered not any image to be made unto him, either in tables, statues, or coins, whereon the Cross was not ever set; such honour bare he to this venerable sign, which Hereticks have ever rejected, with as much malice as stupidity.

Honour of the Cross.

It were an infinite thing for him that would particularly decipher so many noble actions of our Constantine. I content my self to have here set down that in brief, which might have been distended into many chapters, and to make many dishes of it, endeavouring to furnish out more substance for my Reader, than unprofitable amplifications.

The eleventh SECTION.

The Zeal of Constantine in the proceedings of the Councel of Nice.

THE Emperour Constantine had great cause to say, what he spake in Eusebius, That he was as the common Bishop of the Church outwardly; so much vigilance and zeal he exercised, to procure all which concerned the maintenance thereof. Behold an accident happening under his reign, which more troubled Christendom, than ever did the torturing racks, the combs of iron, or boyling cauldrons of Diocletian.

Original of the Arians.

Theologie had been for a long time taught in the Citie of Alexandria, at which time a Priest named Arius, held the regency; who had the reputation to be subtile in seeking out questions, which never had fallen into the thought of man: but otherwise was malicious, and of an evil life. Out alas! that these extravagant curiosities should bring, and daily also introduce prejudice into the Church and repose of the people! It were to be wished that those, who through long idleness, and itch of vanity, amuze themselves to find out novelties in matter of belief, might rather handle the coulter in tillage, or the oar in gallies, than turn over books, and contaminate the honour of Divinity. Satan never found a spirit more fit to perplexe holy letters, and embroil Empires, than this wretched man of whom we speak.

Arius and his qualities.

Saint Epiphanius, who might often have seen him, saith, He was of a large body, of a sad countenance, covering under a mask of austerity, hydeous monsters. He had an extream ambition to hold the highest place, and seeing that Alexander, a holy man, was preferred before him in the Episcopal Chair of Alexandria, he entered into desperate jealousies, searching out all possible means to crie down this Bishop, and raise calumnies against him, to dispossess him of his charge. And the life of this Alexander being so unspotted, that no least stain of reproach might be seen therein, he resolved to involve him in some captious disputations, thereby to accuse him to hold opinions not consonant to the doctrine of the Church. It happened that the Bishop in preaching and speaking of the Son of God, put him, as he ought, in equality of power and honour with his Celestial Father, calling him by the Greek word ὁμοούσιον; whereupon this man sought to reprehend him, alledging some passages of scripture maliciously interpreted, of which he made use to establish the unhappy heresie, which denied that the Son was the same essence of God his Father, and took away from Jesus Christ the diadem of the Eternal Divinity, by making him a meer creature.

Alexander, who was not a man of mean account, but such an one as to his sanctity of life, added solid doctrine, defended himself courageously against the impostures of this malign spirit, very well justifying his belief touching the Divinity of our Saviour: which having been throughly proved in the Assembly of an hundred Bishops, who were first of all called together for this purpose under Hosius, Legat of Pope Sylvester, he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Arius and his complices. This wicked man, who burst with anger to see this condemnation passed against him by those whom he reputed to be infinitely under him in ability, put himself into the field with very much ostent; the differences he lately had with these Prelates, making him understand his Divinity, was odious, if he therein used not some colour to disguise the malice thereof. He also practised so many wiles, that he dazeled the eyes even of those, who were men very capable: for after he had deduced his reasons with a great facility of words, and large quantity of specious passages, and that he thereunto added a cold countenance, counterfeiting himself a modest man, persecuted for the truth, he trained spirits not vulgar to the love of his novelties. All the very same proceedings have been seen with the Hereticks of this time, and if so many corrupt souls had not wholly enclined to their own ruin, God gave them sufficient examples in elder evils to avoid the new. We may well say when we behold these schisms and heresies to arise, that there is some comet of the kingdom of darkness, which insensibly throweth plague and poison into hearts. It is a strange thing that a little sparkle let fall in Alexandria, caused instantly so many fires, that having invaded Ægypt, Lybia, Thebais, and Palestine, they in the end involved almost the whole world. No man at that time cared how to live, but every one was ready to dispute. Bishops bandying against Bishops, drew the people distracted with opinions: The Churches, houses, and Theaters ecchoed in the sharpness of contentious disputations, and the Cities forgetting all other miseries, rent one another for the interpretation of a word. Arius, to gain support, instantly seeketh for favour from the Court. And knowing that Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia was of great credit, he used all the flatteries, of which this man was capable enough, to gain him to his side. This Eusebius was eminently furnished with all those dispositions and industries, which the most subtile Hereticks have at any time exercised to trouble the Church of God. He was verily one of the worst men then in the Empire, since he had sold his soul to ambition, so much the more pernicious as it was covered with a veil of Religion. It is true which the Hebrews say, that Vineger is an ill son of a good father, for it is commonly made of the best wine: so there is nothing more sincere than an Ecclesiastick, who liveth in the duty of his profession; but when corruption falleth thereinto, and that he hath once degenerated, there is not a worse sharpness, nor a more a more dangerous malice. Religion ſerved this wicked man as a buskin for all feet, for it had no other bounds, but that of his own intereſts; and he ever, like weather-cocks on the top of ſteeples, turned his face on what ſide ſoever the wind blew.

In the perſecutions of Chriſtendom he made himſelf an Idolater; in the garboyls of Lycinius he leaned much to his ſide; and when he ſaw Conſtantine abſolute in the Empire, never was man more plyable to flatter him. Doubtleſs he had all the qualities we have ſeen in Luther, Calvin, and ſo many other new Sects, who have ſtill ſought favour from Great-ones by wyles and moſt perillous charms. So wanted he not excellent parts, and great eminencies; for he had a ſpirit very ſubtile, ſpeech cunning, a face which ſpake before his tongue, and as for his extraction, he ſoared ſo high, as to make himſelf the kinſman of Cæſars. The air he deſired to breath was the Court, and his Biſhoprick when he was abſent, ſeemed to him a baniſhment. Behold the cauſe, why he drew near to the center of the Empire as much as he could, in ſuch ſort, that being firſt Biſhop of Berytus, he put himſelf forward to the chair of Nicomedia, afterward took the heart of the Kingdom, and in the end ſetled himſelf in the Royal Conſtantinople.

This alteration of chairs had in this time a very ill ſavour, and this life of Court ſo paſſionately affected by an Eccleſiaſtick not called thereunto, could not in any ſort find approbation among good men. Great perſonages are ſometimes very lawfully in Court, for the ſervice of Kings and publick neceſſities, but they are there as the birds of Baruch upon white thorns, as the Gyants of holy Job, which mourned under the waters, as thoſe ſweet fountains found in the ſalt Sea. An ambitious man, who heweth down mountains to arrive thither, and liveth not exemplary, deſerveth to be regarded therein as a fiſh out of his element, or the pyde bird whereof Jeremie ſpeaketh, whom all the reſt aſſailed with beak and talon.

Baruch 6. 70. Job 26. Jer. 12.2.

Euſebius notwithſtanding little regarded the reputation of a good Prelate, ſo that he might arrive to the height of his enterprizes. To inſinuate himſelf the more into the good liking of the Emperour, he gained Conſtantia ſiſter of Conſtantine, and widow of Lycinius, as Calvin did afterward the ſiſter of Francis the firſt. The good Lady, who being deſpoiled of Empire by the death of her husband, and had no longer ſo much employment to number the pearls of her Diadem, would needs then intermedle with curious devotion, and diſpute on the myſteries of the holy Trinity. Conſtantine after the death of S. Helena his mother, held her at his Court with much reſpect, that ſhe might the more eaſily digeſt the acerbities ſhe had conceived in the loſs of her husband, and much eaſier was it to entertain her in the affairs of the Church, than in thoſe of Empires. Beſides, he found it not amiſs that ſhe might buſie her ſelf in the doubtfull queſtions of Biſhops. So purſuing the Genius of her curious ſpirit, ſhe paſſed ſo far, that ſhe became an Arian by the practiſes of this Euſebius, who having already gotten credit with her, ſpake to her of Arius, as of a worthy man perſecuted by his own ſide, for his great abilities; and explicating to her his doctrine in popular terms, which ſaid there was no apparence how a ſon could be made as old as his father, and that poor Arius had been baniſhed from Alexandria, for that he would not ſign this propoſition, this drew compaſſion from her.

The ſpirit of Conſtantia tainted with this doctrine, began already to caſt an evil odour upon the Emperour her brother; and Euſebius coming thereupon to make recital of that which paſſed in Alexandria between Alexander and Arius, ſet ſuch a face upon the whole buſineſs, that he made, as it is ſaid, the Sun with a cole, figuring out the good Prelate Alexander as a paſſionate man, who could not endure an excellent ſpirit in his Biſhoprick.

'T is a pitifull thing that great men ſee not the truth, but through the paſſions of thoſe that ſerve them. This poor Alexander, who was a holy old man, and grown white in the exerciſes of Religion, was then preſented to the Emperour by the information of Euſebius, as a fool, who under a grizled head had extravagancies of youth; in ſuch ſort, that Conſtantine vouchſafing to write unto him, taxed him as the authour of this tumult, in that he put a frivolous queſtion into conſultation, and gave occaſion of diſpute, which could never have proceeded but from abundance of idleneſs. And as for Arius, he ſaid of him, that he gave too much ſcope to his ſpirit upon a ſubject, which might much better have been concealed. And for the reſt, they ſhould be both reconciled, mutually pardoning each other, and hereafter hindering all manner of diſputations upon the like occaſion.

Conſtantine deceived.

Alexander, who had done nothing but by the Counſel of an hundred Biſhops, ſeeing himſelf treated in a worſe condition than Arius was, in the Emperours letters, and conſidering the blaſphemy, which this Heretick had vomited againſt the Divinity of the Word, was reputed as a trifle, thought verily they had endeavoured to envenom the ſpirit of Conſtantine, to the prejudice of the truth. For this cauſe he informed the other Biſhops, and namely Pope Sylveſter, of the juſtice of his cauſe, anſwering very pertinently to the calumnies objected againſt him. On the other ſide Euſebius, who beheld the integrity of this holy Biſhop with an ill eye, and who had very far engaged himſelf to maintain Arius, embroiled the affairs at Court, as much as his credit might permit. In the end, the diſputation was ſo enkindled through the Chriſtian world, that needs muſt a general Councel be held to determine it.

Euſebius a true patron of hereticks.

Three hundred and eighteen Biſhops are aſſembled at Nice, a Citie of Bithynia, by the approbation of Pope Sylveſter, at the requeſt of the Emperour Conſtantine, who invited the moſt eminent by expreſs letters, and gave very ſingular direction, as wel for their journey as their reception. Never was there ſeen a goodlier company. It was a Crown, not of pearls nor diamonds, but of the rareſt men of the world, who came from all parts like bees, bearing (as ſaith S. Auguſtine) honey in their mouths, and wax in their hands. There you might behold Venetians, Arabians, Ægyptians, Scythians, Thracians, Africans, Perſians, not ſpeaking of Weſtern Biſhops, who were there already in no ſmall number. It was a moſt magnificent ſpectacle to behold on one ſide venerable old men, white as ſwans, who ſtill bare upon their bodies the ſcars of iron and perſecution, which were invincible teſtimonies of their conſtancy: on the other, men who had the gift of miracles, ſo much as to force the power of death, and tear from him the dead out of their tombs: on the other part, men accompliſhed in Theologie and eloquence, who in opening their mouthes ſeemed to unfold the gate of a Temple, full of wonders and beauties. There was to be found that great S. James of Niſibis, Paphnutius, and Potamion. There was Oſius, S. Nicholas the firſt, Gregorie the father of our Nazianzen, Spiridion, and ſo many other worthymen. The good Pope S. Sylveſter could not be preſent therat, by reaſon of the decrepitneſs of his age, but ſent thither three Legats, Oſius, Vitus, and Vincentius. The Emperour received them all moſt lovingly, kiſſing the ſcars of ſome, and admiring the ſanctity of others, never ſatisfying himſelf with the modeſty and good diſcourſe of all, both in particular and general. Among theſe children of God, were likewiſe ſome Satans, adherents to Arius, who diſcovered in their eyes and countenances the paſſions of their hearts.

Councel of Nice.

Theſe

These turbulent spirits fearing the aspect of this awfull assembly, softly suggested divers calumnies to surprize the spirit of the Emperour, which very naturally retained much goodness. And for this purpose they presented to him many requests, and many papers charged with complaints and accusations upon pretended domages. Verily these proceedings were sufficient to divert this Prince from the love he bare to our Religion, were it not that through the grace of God, he had already taken very deep root in the faith.

In the end, to do an act worthy of his Majesty, beholding himself to be daily burdened with writings, wherein these passionate Bishops spake of nothing but their own interests, he advised them to set down all their grievances, and all the satisfactions which they pretended to draw from those who had offended them, and present them on a day designed. They failed not to confound him with libels and supplications: but this grave Monarch putting them into his bosom, said openly: Behold a large proportion of Accusations, all which must be transferred to the judgement of God, who will judge them in the latter day. As for my self, I am a man, nor is it my profession to take notice of such causes, where those that accuse, and such as be accused, are Bishops. Let us, I pray you, for this time, leave these affairs, and treat we the points, for which this Councel is here assembled: onely let every one, following therein the Divine clemencie, pardon all that is past, and make an absolute reconciliation for the time to come. When he had spoken this, he took all the civil requests presented unto him, and caused them to be cast into the fire; which was much applauded by all those who had their judgements discharged from partialities.

Zozom. l. 1. cap. 16.

In the mean space, the Bishops before they entered into the Councel, took time to examine the propositions that were to be handled, and leisurably to inform themselves of the pretensions of Arius, who was there present, and who already felt the vehemency of the vigour of S. Athanasius, though he was yet but a Deacon in the Church of Alexandria.

The day of the Councel being come, the Bishops assembled in the great Hall of the Palace, where many benches were set, both on the one side and other. Every one taketh his place according to his rank. Baronius thinketh the Legats of the Pope were seated on the left hand, as in the most honourable seats; which he very pertinently proveth. In the first place on the right hand, sat the venerable Bishop Eustatius, who was to begin the prayer, and carry relations to the Emperour. The Bishops remained silent for a while, expecting his coming; and suddenly he appeared, not accompanied with any Guard or souldiers, but with a small number of friends. Eusebius, who was there present, saith in his History, that never was any thing seen more admirable than the person of this Monarch, at the meeting of this Councel. For besides that he was of a most gallant stature, and a singular presence, he was delighted to hold it as it were enchased in rich attire. The purple wherewith he then was clothed, mingling the lustre thereof with the rays of precious stones, which sparkled on his head, made reflections of grace and majesty arise in the eyes of all the beholders. He passed through the middle of the Assembly, and all the Prelates rose up to do him reverence. Then being come unto his place, he stood upright, expecting from the Bishops a sign given him to sit, which being done, and prayer ended, he sat down upon a golden chair very low, which was placed in the middle, to the end he might be encompassed with so great a number of Saints, as a Palm with a row of Cedars. The others also being seated near him, Eustatius, selected out to open the Councel, stood up, and made an Oration, whereof we find some pieces in Gregorie a Priest of Cæsarea, which import thus much:

Constantius in the assembly of Bishops.

Oration of Eustatius at the opening of the Councel.

We have very much obligation, O sacred Majestie, to render immortal thanks to the living God, in that he hath made choice of your person to put the Empire of the world into your hands, and that by your means destroying idolatrie, he hath exalted the glorie of his Altars, and established Christianitie in that tranquilitie which we presently enjoy.

It is an act from the right hand of the Omnipotent, which we durst not hope for in our days, if God had not made you to be born for the good of the universal world. It is a prodigie to have seen you in a short time to calme so many tempests, disperse so many smoaks of sacrifices to devils, extirpate so many horrible superstitions, and enlighten such cloudie darknes with the rays of the knowledge of the true God.

The world, which was before polluted with ordures, is purified, the name of Saviour is known to Nations the most barbarous: The Father is glorified, the Son adored, the Holy Ghost declared; a Trinitie consubstantial, that is to say, one same Divinitie in three Persons, is acknowledged by all the faithfull.

That is it, O sacred Majestie, which supporteth the greatnes of your Empire with those three fingers of power, wherewith it holdeth the mass of the earth, poized as it were to serve as a basis. As your felicitie is inseparably tyed to its honour, so ought you to reverence, defend, and invincibly protect all that, which concerneth the glorie thereof.

Behold a strange accident, and which is to us more sensible than the persecution of Diocletian. They go about to dis-member the Trinitie, and thrust the knife of division into its throne. One Arius, who hath taken his name from furie, a wolf bred among us in a sheeps skin, a Priest of Alexandria, an enemie of the doctrine of Apostles and Prophets, hath proclaimed war against the Son of God, endeavouring to deprive him of the essence, honour, and power, which he holdeth equal from all eternitie with his heavenly Father.

This is it which hath assembled us here to condemn his errour, and most humbly to beseech your Majestie, that when you have heard the opinions of all these great men here present, you will hold a steadie hand upon the preservation of Apostolical doctrine, and command all those to be cut from our body, who will persever in their damnable opinions, to the end we may breath the Christian air in all liberty, which the world beginneth already so sweetly to taste under the happines of your reign.

Then was the time, saith S. Hierom, when the first trumpet began to sound against Arius. After the good Bishop of Antioch had ended, the Emperour beholding all the assembly with a very gracious aspect, spake in Latin, to retain the majesty of the Roman Empire, and in a moderate tone, those words which are couched in Eusebius, the sense whereof we render:

Oration of Constantine.

Venerable Fathers, I must needs affirm, that I never desired any thing more passionately, than to enjoy your sweet presences; and infinitely am I bound to God, that he hath accomplished my desires, granting me a blessing that I prefer before all the happines in the world, which is, to see you all here assembled, and united in will, for the glory of God, and peace of the Church. I pray you, suffer not the storm to surprize us in the haven, thereby to snatch from us the comfort, which we already have in our hands; and if God hath given us victorie against Tyrants, let us not turn our arms against our selves, to tear out our proper entrails. It is most certain these domestick troubles are much more to be feared than all the hostilities in the world. The sword of persecution can dissever nothing but members, but these divisions tend to the subversion of souls; which maketh them so much the more dangerous beyond common wars, as the spirit is above the body.

God

God having afforded me so many victories, and so many prosperities, I proposed to my self there remained nothing from me to ask of him, but an humble acknowledgement of his benefits, and leisure to rejoyce with those whom I saw through his favour in repose, sheltered under the good success of mine arms, and the authority of my Laws. It hath been a grief very sensible unto me to understand of those revolutions, which have passed in our Citie of Alexandria, and which have afterward dispersed themselves through the rest of Christendom. I have done all that possibly I might in the beginning to stop them, but seeing the evil increased with so much danger, I have called you hither to apply the last remedy. I beseech you, O venerable Priests of the living God, to preserve among your selves that concord, which I think I may read in your countenances, and not to suffer your selves to be deprived of the benefit of peace, since the Divine providence hath selected you to establish it upon Altars, by your prayers for all the rest of the world. Cut off speedily the root of evil, and sweetly pacifie these troubles of the Church: you shall do a thing most acceptable to God; and as for my self, who am your fellow servant, I shall hold me obliged as for a singular benefit.

The Interpreter explicated the Oration of the Emperour in the Greek tongue: Then the propositions of Arius were read. At the reading whereof the most part of the Bishops stopped their ears for horrour, as afterward S. Athanasius observed. From thence they proceeded to opinions, where the disputation was enkindled on both sides. Constantine afforded a singular attention to all that was said, peaceably entertained sentences, encouraged all the world, sweetened acerbities which might slide into the heat of contention, and guided all the affairs to peace. In the end, Arius is condemned, and a form of faith conceived for the equality of the Word with the Father, whereat many Arians much amazed, failed not to strike sail, and yield themselves to the plurality of voices, fearing least their contestation might ruin their reputation with the Emperour. It is thought Eusebius the Historiographer was of this number; a man of the time, who knew how to comply readily with the humour of those, who had authority and force in their hands. As for the other Eusebius, Bishop of Nicomedia, who had maintained the faction of Arius with much passion, he saw himself shamefully fallen from the opinion of his great credit, and durst not refuse to sign the doctrine of the Councel. Greatly was he streightned in another Session, to pronounce excommunication upon Arius his creature, saying he was consenting to the decision of the Councel, under shadow of some perplexed words, which he made use of to cover his opinion. The fathers shutting up their eyes to all human reasons, and fortifying their arms against favour, surprized this Eusebius, and Theognis Bishop of Nice, in the condemnation of Arius which they would not sign, declaring them upō this refusal, deprived of their Bishopricks. They interposed the authority of the Emperour, who suspended the execution, on such condition, that they gave satisfaction to the Councel.

Condemnation of Arius.

Never were men more humbled, namely Eusebius; who thought himself the all-predominant; for he was constrained speedily to retire, and address his request to the Bishops, in terms most suppliant, in which he protested wholly to submit himself to the decrees of the Councel; yet notwithstanding he spared not to embroil matters with an infinity of wiles and malice, which made the Emperour open his eyes to confirm their sentence who had condemned him, and send him into banishment, with subrogation of another in his place, though he afterward by ordinary submission was repealed. At that time happened a marvellous labyrinth of affairs, in which began the combats of great S. Athanasius, which are to take up another History besides this, it extending much further beyond the years of Constantine. As for the success of Arius, after the banishment of ten years, he still intermedling with factions, found means to be heard in another Councel of Jerusalem, where feigning a penitence artificially counterfeited, he handled the matter so by the practises of Eusebius, who was then in favour, that he was absolved, with commandment given to the good Alexander, Bishop of Constantinople, to receive him into the communion of the Church.

S. Athanasius.

The holy Prelate stoutly refused it, knowing well it was an hypocrisie, which tended to annul the decrees of the Councel of Nice, and bring confusion into the Church. But Eusebius of Nicomedia ceased not to make armed inhibitions, threatening that in case of refusal, he would deprive him of his Bishoprick. He, who cared not so much for the loss of his dignity, as the safety of the Church, forsook all these subtilities of Theologie, and exhorting his people to a fast of seven days, by the counsel of S. James of Nisibis, who was then present, spared not to macerate his body with austerities, and present to God day and night his humble supplications to divert this scourge. In the end, the affair being very shortly to be determined, he prostrated his face against the earth, before the Altar, and said: My God, if it be true, that Arius ought to morrow to be received into the communion of the faithfull, I beseech you let your poor servant Alexander go in peace, and not loose the faithfull people with the wicked. But if you be resolved to preserve your Church, and I may be assured you will do it, look on the threats of Eusebius, and deliver not your inheritance to the scorn of the wicked: but rather take Arius out of this world, lest we receiving him, may seem to introduce heresie and impiety into your house.

The next day Arius went early in the morning from the Emperours Palace, very well accompanied with Eusebius, and walked in pomp through the streets of Constantinople. He was a man more subtile than confident, and it is thought the apprehensions he had of the issue of this combat, put terrour in him, and this terrour caused him to step out of the way. Behold the cause, why being by chance in the market-place of Constantinople, he retired into a publick place of ease, to satisfie the necessities of nature. Socrates holdeth, he cast forth a great quantity of bloud, and thereupon falling into a swoon, not being able to be holpen, he yielded up his wicked soul by a just punishment from Heaven, leaving to posterity a perpetual detestation of his life, with a horrour of the very place of his death.

End of Arius.

Eusebius caused the body to be interred, Alexander breathed again, and all the Church triumphed upon the admiration of the judgements of God, seeing that he, who had raised so many bloudy tragedies, was dead in his own bloud; and after he had infected the soundest parts of the world with his poison, vomited up his contagious soul in the publick infections, drawing on his criminal head the execration of all Ages.

The twelfth SECTION.

The government of Constantine.

HAving shewed unto you the greatness of Constantine in matters of Religion, let us now behold it in his politick government. It is no slight note of the vigour of his spirit, that he enterprized to make another Rome, and so prosperously to have perfected this his design.

Constant. 19. Constantinople erected.

There is found among the Gentiles a certain Epigram in the ruines of ancient Rome, which said: It stood in need of Gods to make it, but there was but one God necessary to destroy it. What may we say of the courage, prudence, happy success of the Emperour in the establishment of Constantinople? We will not make him a God, as the Pagans, but say he was a man singularly assisted by the providence of God, in the greatness of his undertaking.

He perceived in this new change of Religion there were in Rome many harsh spirits, and that even among the principal, whom he could not reclaim to Christianity, as his zeal fervently desired. Behold, whether desirous to consecrate to God a place better purified from Idols, where he might be served with more consent and better judgement, or whether he were transported with the desire of honour, and the memory of posterity, he resolved to build a City, which should bear his name, and be as it were the master-piece of a great Monarch.

For this purpose he had some desire to build on the ruins of Troy the Great, thinking the fame of the place, renowned for its unhappiness through all the parts of the habitable world, might contribute somewhat to the glory of his name: but he having laid the foundations, God gave him notice in sleep, that this was not the place appointed him, and that he necessarily must change the countrey: whereat being much amazed, yet still persisting in his design, as not throughly satisfied upon the will of God, it is held, the tools and instruments of work-men were insensibly transported over the sea to the other shore, and that an Eagle setling upon the Level of the Master-Architect, took it up, and hastened to bear it directly to Byzantium; for that is the City, whither Constantine, forsaking the ruins of Troy, transferred his great designs. It had hereto fore been a very fair City, but as arms strike at all which is eminent, so had it been infinitely ransacked by many wars happening in the revolution of affairs and Ages. Yet it still supported it self with some manner of reputation, when this great Prince determined to amplify, enrich, and perfect it throughly, there to fix the seat of his Empire. Zonar. & Glycas.

It is added, that himself marched round about the wals, holding in his hand a half-pike, designing the circuit of his future Constantinople; and as he still went measuring up and down by the aym of his eye, one of his favourites said to him: Emperour, how long will it be ere you make an end? I will finish, saith he, when he stayes that goeth before me: Which made men think there was some heavenly intelligence, that conducted his enterprize. At the same time he thought he saw in sleep a very ancient Lady, which in an instant was turned into a most beautiful virgin, whom he adorned, and attyred, setting his Diadem on her head. Observe what is said of the beginnings of Constantinople: whether such things happened with all these circumstances, or whether we naturally love to tell some strange tales in favour of antiquity; as if these fictions were able to give it the more credit. One thing is most undoubted, which Zosimus, although an enemy to Constantine, is enforced to admire, that the manage of this great design was so prosperous, that in five or six years a goodly City was seen on foot, which extended about one league in circuit beyond the walls of Byzantium.

Constantine, who had a holy desire to equal it to ancient Rome, spared nothing of all that, which the invention of men might find out, courage undertake, and power execute. He there built Palaces, Theaters, Amphitheaters, Cirques, Galleries, and other edifices, infinitely admirable, so that S. Hierom had reason to say, that Constantine to attyre his Constantinople despoiled all the other Provinces.

It is a Maxim among Great-ones, that to make a huge Dragon, it is fit he first devour many little serpents; and to raise a great City, many much less must be ruined to serve for food unto it. The greatnesses of God are good deeds, those of the world are naturally destructions; for they eat and devour their neighbours, as the tree which we call the Ivie, which insensibly draweth the juice of plants growing near unto it. It is not expedient there should be many greatnesses in the world, they would drie rivers up, as did the army of Xerxes, and would impoverish each other by their mutual contestations. Yet notwithstanding needs must there be Majesty in the civil world, to the proportion of elementary. And for this cause God made Kings, taking a pattern from himself, & commandeth we honour them as his living images: Kings make the greatnesses of the world, which are the effects of their powers: Needs must there be a Constantinople that posterity may see Constantine on the back side of the medal, for I think his virtues have represented him on the other side very honourable.

At the least, it is a thing exceeding laudable, and well considered by S. Augustine, that in this infinite store of Pagans, which he must yet of necessity tolerate, the Emperour permitted not either Temples of Idols, Sacrifices, or Pagan ceremonies. Well might he be curious to cause from all parts to be brought ancient statues of marble, brass, and other matter, which represented Jupiter, Cybile, Mercury, Apollo, Castor and Pollux, and so many false Divinities, which he set up in Theaters, Amphitheaters, or Races, where the courses of horses were used, and in other publick places. Eusebius, followed by Baronius holdeth, it was to expose them to the scorn of the people, which is very hard to believe: for I should rather think, that these pieces, being the most exquisit workmanships of the world, and that Constantine vehemently desiring the beauty of this City, could not then resolve upon such a Jewish zeal, as to break and deface them; but contented himself with the distribution of them into profane places to give lustre to his enterprizes. Yet must we say, that though we at this present are out of the danger of Idolatry, rich men of this Age have no reason to set up so readily in their Halls and cabinets, Juno's, Venuses, and Diana's, and so many histories of the Metamorphosis, with scandalous nakedness. Tertullian, an eager spirit, pursueth all this as a crime, and proveth in the book he composed of Idolatry, that all those who cooperate in such works, do worse, than if they sacrificed to Idols the bloud of beasts. "For they offer (saith he) their spirit, their industry, "their travel, and their estate to Sathan; and though "they have no intention of sin, they minister matter "to other of offending God. Tertul. l. de Idol. cap. 6.

Behold the cause, why Constantine, although he were in an Age wherein Paganism being still in much request, it was very difficult to take away all these figures, notwithstanding he disguised them as much as he could; witness, that a great statue of Apollo being brought to Constantinople, one of the best pieces that ever had been seen in those elder times, he caused a Constantine to be made of this Apollo, changing it into his own image, and commanding some parcels of the venerable nails of our Saviour to be enchased over his head. It is in my opinion to this same image that he added a golden globe in the hand thereof, and over it a Cross with this inscription: Tibi, Christe, Urbem commendo. Besides, he made three Crosses to be erected, the most magnificent that might then be imagined, & set in the midst of a publick place the statue of the Prophet Daniel among the Lions, all covered over with plates of gold, to represent a figure of the Resurrection. And as for his Palace, he caused to be pourtraid at the very entrance thereof the history of the Passion in a most exquisit work, wrought and tissued with pretious stones, very much resembling Mosayk work. All of it being finished, he made the dedication of the City on the tenth of May, and as it is very probably supposed, the five and twentieth of his Empire, consecrating it to God, in memory of the glorious Virgin Mary, and doing great acts of liberty to the people, which he commanded by his Edicts to be continued for perpetuity. Codin addeth, that he caused also sumptuous edifices there to be built for the Christians Senatours, which he drew from the City, and made them so like their lodgings they had at Rome, that they were so ravished therewith, as it seemed their houses by miracle had been transferred from Rome to Constantinople. The two chief Churches were those of the Apostles, and of S. Sophia, to whom Constantine gave beginning, but the greatness of the work is due to the Emperour Justinian.

Our great Monarch, who had his eye open over all, forgot not to establish a good Colledge in his City, whereunto he drew the choise of learned men in all professions, dignifying and adorning it with immunities and great priviledges, in such sort, that Aurelius Victor called him the nursing-Father of learning; and pursuing this design, he took a particular care to erect a good Library, and above all to furnish it with good store of holy books, well written, the superintendency whereof he gave to Eusebius of Cæsarea.

Behold the estate of his Constantinople, which he by Edict commanded to be called New Rome, and Sozomen assureth, that in multitude of people, in abundance and riches, it surpassed the ancient: which is not very hard for any to believe, who will consider Rome in the absence of Emperours being then but as a Palace disinhabited; yet could not Baronius endure S. Gregory Nazianzens speech, who said Constantinople as much in his time excelled the other Cities, as Heaven surpasseth earth.

This would suffice to shew the politick prudence of great Constantine; but it shineth also in other points, of which I think this to be most considerable, that he held for the space of thirty years an Empire so great, in a time wherein the Emperours had ordinarily so short a reign, that they resembled those creatures, which enjoyed but one day of life, in an age, when the people were so apt to revolt, that the sea had not more agitations, than all Kingdoms had vicissitudes; in an establishment of Religon very new, wherein commotions are commonly most dangerous. We may well say this Prince had something in him above all that which is humane, to cement together an Empire of so long continuance, in affairs so discordant.

It is true, that he tolerated the sects of Pagans for meer necessity, otherwise he must have killed the whole world to make a new of it. The wise Prince well saw it was a thing impossible to annihilate superstition in an instant, which had taken such deep root for a thousand years, about which time Rome was built; but in this civil peace, which he gave to all the East, he insensibly undermined the foundations of impiety, and verily by little and little it perished in his hands. His spirit sparkling like a fire could not rest, [but seeing the Magistrates of the Empire were moreover busie, yet not discharging the duty of their places, and that by the greatness of their power they made themselves too absolute, he altered the whole government, dividing their charges, and multiplying the offices of the Empire: For which Zosimus blameth him, not considering it was the policy of Augustus Cæsar, reputed one of the most ablest Princes of the world; and that he, who will consider the state of the Empire established by Constantine, shall find so much order in this great diversity, so much wisdom in inventions, so much courage in executions, so much stability in continuance, that he shall have more cause to admire the deep counsels of the Emperour, than find what to blame in his government. The same Zosimus, as a Courtier and a Pagan, extreamly displeased with great liberalities which Constantine exercised towards the Churches, furiously taxeth him upon the matter of tributes, saying. He invented new, and exacted them with much violence. Tributes.

And yet notwithstanding there are no tributes under Constantine, the use whereof is not observed to have been in the Age of the former Emperours. For concerning the impost of a certain sum of gold and silver paid by merchants from four years to four, which the Grecians called Chrysargyros, although the name were then new, the manner of it could not be so, since the Historiographer Lampridius, in the life of Alexander Severus, makes mention of the gold of merchants. And as for that which was also imposed upon prostitute women, it was likewise under the reign of the same Alexander: So that he who will compare that, which is done before Constantine, and that after him in this article, shall there find much moderation in his proceedings. For so far was it from him to surcharge the people, that he gave a relaxation of the fourth part of tributes; which is so much, as if a King after the space of four years passed, should free his people for a year from ordinary subsides, which would be no small liberality. Now concerning the violence whereof this man complaineth, the Edicts of Constantine testifie, that he would not have any man to be so much as imprisoned for monies due to his coffers. True it is, he had a list of the names of men of quality in the Empire, with a taxe of their revenews, to enforce them to publick necessities, and by this means discharge the poor. Otherwise it is well known this Prince was so zealous for justice, that he would not suffer even the letters of favour obtained from him, should have any power to the prejudice of ancient laws. And that if any of his favourites had a process, and would beg of him to interpose his authority for him, he would leave him to justice, willing rather to afford him coin out of his coffer, than one sole word of favour, which might dispose the Judges to bend the ballance more to one side than another. He had his eye upon his Officers, and retained them in their duties, discovering and chastising corruptions, and banishing with his whole endeavour all crimes that were against the law of God, and publick tranquility. Cod. Theod. l. 2. de exactionibus. Cod. Theod. l. 2. tit 2. Victor.

He was much seconded in the administration of affairs by the diligence of Ablavius, the greatest favourite of the Prince, and Superintendent of Justice, who was verily a man of Judgement, had he not blemished the gifts of God with unsatiable avarice.

He was surnamed The Baloon of fortune, for the many changes which happened in his person. For it is held, that he was of very base extraction, born in Constantinople, then called Byzantium; and that a Mathematician arrived in this City, upon the instant the mother of Ablavius was to be delivered. This man weary of his way, and very hungry, went into an Inne where he cals for dinner: his hostess was very busie to provide it for him, at which time one came to entreat her to assist a neighbour of hers in her childbirth, for she practiced the office of a Midwife. This made her forsake her guest, to help the poor creature, who was said to be in great danger if she gave not remedy. The business being dispatched, she returned to her guest, who was very angry, and murmured with much impatience. She to appease him excused herself upon the necessity of the accident happened: but this notable Astrologer, hearing speech of the birth of a child, forsooke the pot and glass which he dearly loved, and endeavoured to set the Horoscope of this Ablavius, newly come into the world. And thereupon said to the hostess. Go, tell your neighbour, she hath brought forth a son to day, who shall shall be all, and have all, but the dignity of an Emperour.

I think with Eunapius, that such tales are rather made after events, to give credit to judicial Astrology, than to say they have any foundation upon truth. It is not known by what means he was advanced, but he came into so great an esteem, that he governed the whole Empire under Constantine, who freely made use of him, as of a man discreet and vigilant in affairs, though much displeased to see him too eager in his proper interests. And it is said, that walking one day with him, he took a stick in his hand, and drew the length of five or six foot on the earth; then turning towards his creature Ablavius, why so much sweat and travel? In the end of all, neither I nor thou shall have more than this, nay thou dost not know whether thou shalt have it or no.

He was the cause by his factions, that Constantine almost caused one day three innocent Captains to be punished with death, being ill informed, had it not been that S. Nicholas then living, appeared in a dream the same night to Constantine and Ablavius, threatning if they proceeded any further, God would chastise them, which made them stay execution.

Ablavius notwithstanding was so tyed to the earth, that the words and examples of his Master had small power over his soul, in such sort, that he had an unhappy end, ordinary with those who abuse the favours of God.

For after the death of Constantine, Constantius who succeeded in the Empire of his father, taking this man as it were for a Pedagogue, so much authority had he assumed unto himself, and thinking he could not free himself of his minority but by the death of Ablavius, caused him miserably to be butchered, sending two for executours of this commission, men suborned, who saluted him with great submissions, and knees bended to the earth, in manner of Emperour. He, who before had married one of the daughters of the Emperour Constans, brother of Constantius, thinking they would raise him to the dignity of Cæsar, asked where the purple was. They answered they had no commission to give it him, but that those who should present it were at his chamber dore. He commandeth them to be speedily brought in: These were armed men, who approaching near unto him, instead of the purple, inflicted a purple death, transfixing him with their swords, and renting him as a Sacrifice.

If the poor man following his Masters example, had been willing to set limits upon his fortune, and taken shelter at least in the storm, to meditate upon the affairs of his conscience, he would the less have been blamed: but natural desires have this proper, that they are bounded by nature which made them. The fantasies of ambition, which grew from our opinions have no end, no more than opinion subsistence. For what bounds will you give to the falsehood and lying of a miserable vanity, which filleth the spirit with illusion, and the conscience with crimes? When one goeth the right way, he findeth an end: but when he wandereth a-cross the fields, he makes steps without number, errours without measure, and miseries without remedy.

The thirteenth SECTION

The death of Constantine.

IT seemeth great men who have lived so well, should never die, and that it were very fit they still did, what they once have done so happily. But as they entred not into life by any other way than that of birth, as men, so must they issue out from this ordinary residence of mortals, as other men.

Constantine had already reigned thirty and one years, and was in the threescore and third of his age, living otherwise in a prosperous old age, and having a body exceedingly well disposed to the functions of life; for he incessantly travelled in the duty of his charge, without any inconvenience, ordering military matters in his mind, instituting laws, hearing embassages, reading, writing, discoursing, to the admiration of all the world.

This good Prince earnestly desired the conversion of all the great ones of his Court. Behold why, not satisfied with giving them example of a perfect life, he inflamed them to good with powerful words, which were to souls, as thunder-claps to Hinds, not for the delivery of a beast, but the production of salvation.

A little before his death, he pronounced in his Palace to those of his Court a very elegant Oration of the immortality of the soul, of the succes of good and evil, of the providence of God in the recompence of pure souls, of the terrour of his justice upon the incredulous and reprobate. This divine man handled these discourses with so much fervour and devotion, that he seemed to have his ear already in heaven, to understand mysteries, and enjoy an antipast of Paradise.

A while after he felt some little inequality of temperature in his body, which was with him very extraordinary, so sound and well composed he was. Thereupon he was taken with a fever somewhat violent, and causing himself to be carried to the baths, he remained not long there: for little regarding the health of his body in comparison of the contentment of his soul, he was possessed with a great desire to go to Drepanum in Bythinia, a Citie which he surnamed of his good mother, where was the bodie of S. Lucian the Martyr, to which he had a particular devotion.

He being transported into this desired place, felt in his heart an alacrity wholly celestial, and for a long time remained in the Church notwithstanding the indisposition of his body, fervently praying for his own salvation, and the universal repose of his Empire. From thence he went directly to a Palace which he had in the suburbs of Nichomedia, where feeling the approaches of death, he disposed himself for his last hour, with the marks of a piety truly Christian. His Princes and Captains who heard him speak of death, being desirous to divert his mind from this thought, said, He was become too necessary for all the world, and that the prayers of all men would prolong his life. But he, Of what do you speak to me, as if it were not true life, to die to so many dead things, to live with my Saviour? No this beer is not a death, but a passage to immortality. If you love me, hinder not my way; one cannot go too soon to God. This spoken, he disposed of his last Will with a constant judgement and courageous resolution, declaring in his Testament the estate of affairs he would establish, even in the least particulars, and very well remembring all his good servants, for whom he ordained pensions and rewards for every one according to his merit.

He divided the Empire between his three sons, at that time absent; and having distributed their several shares with great providence, he gave to Constantius the Empire of the East, leaving a Will sealed with his own signet in the hands of a certain Priest, whom he appointed to deliver it immediately to his son, which he did: and afterward Constantius so much honoured this man, that being inflexible to all other, he onely obeyed him as a God. The dispose of his temporal affairs being setled, he transferred all his thoughts to familiar discourses which he had with God, and yielded up his most happy soul on the Feast of Pentecost, the 22. of May, about mid-day, in the year of our Lord. 337.

The souldiers and officers who waited next his person, not thinking his end so near at hand, upon this news were seized with a grief so outragious, that tearing their cloaths, and prostrating themselves upon the earth, they bewailed their Emperour with complaints, which rather resembled yellings than moderate sorrow, called him, Their Sovereign Lord, their good Master, & common Father of the world.

His body was put into a coffin of gold, covered with purple, to carry it to Constantinople; where it was many dayes exposed in his Palace attired in Imperial habit, receiving the same duties and reverences, as if he had yet been alive, never was there observed toward any Emperour whatsoever either such great concourse of people, or cordial affection: not so much as little children but were touched with a sensible grief, as if they had lost their father. One might have seen among the people some confounded with sad and heavy sorrow, others to break forth into complaints, the rest to pour themselves out in devotions and prayer. When ancient Rome heard the news of his death, she caused the baths and publick Places to be shut up, all mirth and solace to cease, that they might lament the loss of a most honoured father.

The Princes his children speedily arrived at Constantinople, caused his obsequies to be performed after the manner of Christians, conducting the body to the Sepulcher with the Clergy, wax lights burning; and prayers of the Church ordained for the souls of the dead. For Eusebius, who was there present, maketh express mention of the ceremonies, which new Hereticks, through great impertinency and malignity have endeavoured to deny for the comfort of the dead.

It is a mervellous thing to consider what power virtue hath over the hearts of men, and to behold how many divers sects are different in that, which is matter of belief in Divinity, but all notwithstanding agree in the honour due to honesty. The Pagans would needs canonize Constantine in their manner, and made a God of him, representing him in a Chariot, harnessed out with four horses, as flying above the clouds, and a hand stretched from Heaven, which made shew to hold him in this most blessed mansion of immortality. The Greek Church hath honoured his memory, as of a Saint; although Constantine had so humble an opinion of himself, that it is very likely he ordained by his Testament, which was afterward seen to be executed in his funerals, that his body should be interred not in the Church of S. Peter and S. Paul, but before the porch: esteeming himself most happy, if after he had born the prime Diadem of the world, he might serve as a porter to a simple fisherman.

I now aske of you, my Reader, who have considered the beginning, progress, and end of this Monarch, where may you find one more clear in greatness of courage, more generous in his enterprizes, more prudent in his carriage, more fortunate in successes, more constant in his perseverance? Poyze a little, and put in a ballance the glory of his arms, the happiness of his conquests, the wisdom of his laws: what virtue think you had he here occasion to make use of, to set a new face upon a whole world, to oppose Armies with iron, stratagems with prudence, rebellion of untamed spirits with mildness? What arm to resist the torrents of iniquity? What stroke to counterballance the inclinations of wils, and swift motions of an universal world. Verily I must affirm Augustus Cæsar was a great Prince, for that he changed the face of the State of a mighty Common-wealth, built up a vast Empire; but not to flatter, nor raise our Princes above their merit with the interest of our own cause, we shall find this man had some thing in him much greater. I admit the other seemeth to you more subtile if you consider him in the maturity of prudence he shewed in his elder days; notwithstanding if you behold him in all the parts of his life, you shall find great vices therein: I lay not onely of impurity, or neglect, but of wickedness and inhumanity: which was the cause that he having one day in a banquet taken the shape of Apollo, those about him named him Apollinem Tortorem, Apollo the Hangman. I go not about at this time to search into the vices either of the one or other. I admit that Constantine though descended of the most noble bloud of Romans, and as fortunate as ever Augustus, was in his beginning somewhat cruel: Yet no man can deny, but that in military virtue, he in all points surpassed Augustus Cæsar, who was never put into the rank of the most warlike Princes.

Greatness of Constantine.

Let us not here overprize the supereminency the one had above the other in this point: Let us onely compare them in quality of founders of new Estates. The one made a new world civil; and the other a new world Christian. The one to do what he did, found a Julius Cæsar, who before-hand cut out his work for him: The other hewed forth a way through rocks, flames, thornes, wholly involved with contrariety. The one arranged men under a civil submission, in recovery of a Monarchy, which is an ordinary thing: The other without arms disarmed them from the affection they bare to their ancient superstition, which every well understanding Judge will esteem a mattter very difficult, because ordinarily men are very obstinate to retain the beliefs which they have held from father to son, through the revolution of many Ages. Finally, Augustus said he found a City of stone, speaking of ancient Rome, and had made of it a City of marble; but Constantine might boast to have raised a Rome wholly new in the establishment of his Constatinople.

It is affirmed by the Pagans themselves, who never attributed any thing to Constantine above his merit, that he was at the least, say they before his baptism, comparable to all the greatest Princes of the Empire. Eutropius, a souldier of Julian the Apostata, who little loved Christian Princes, is inforced through a truth to confess, that he was (d) A great man, having qualities and virtues of mind and body most innumerable, and that his fortune being very great he had notwithstanding equalled it by his industry and merit. Behold a testimony from the mouth of an enemy.

(d) Vir ingens. Innumeris in se animi corporisque virtutes clarorum fortunam in bello prosperâ fuit. verum ita ut non superaret industriam.

I would here willingly demand of Machiavel, who in the Treatise he composed of a Prince, said: That he which in all things would hold a strict profession of an honest man, cannot long continue in the company of such others as are of no esteem; and that it is necessary for a Prince who will maintain his own power, to learn how he may sometimes be wicked, and to practise it according to the necessity of affairs: And in his State-Discourses well discovereth he is of opinion, a Prince should cherish the Religion which most suteth with his designs whatsoever they be.

The Prince cap. 2. and upon the 1. Decad. chap. 12. 13.

Admirable providence of God, above all humane Policy.

I should willingly know of all those that pursue the like Maxims with this corrupt spirit, what they would here answer me, upon the progression of the fortune of Constantine. Verily behold here a State-wisedom, whereunto the pen of this Secretary, who pretended ability in some petty humane tracks, cannot arrive. Behold a light, whereat all these eyes are dazeld. Behold an abyss, where all carnal men are lost, if we will well reckon them up, we shall find twelve or thirteen, who in several ways argue upon the Diadem with Constantine. By what degrees hath the divine providence conducted him to the Sovereignity of the Empires of the world? Is it by those, which Monsieur Nicholas Machiavel hath prepared to lead his Prince in? If one must dispoil himself of innocency to be re-invested with the robe Imperial, why did Constantine take the way of Empire by by that of ſanctitie? If uſe muſt be made of Religion, as of an inſtrument of State, and that taken which hath the moſt credit in the opinion of the people, why went he about to chuſe Chriſtian Religion, at that time when the moſt part of the world, was ingulfed in Gentiliſm? Behold Maxentius, who according to the ordinary cuſtom of the people of Rome, cauſed the pretended books of Sybilles to be turned over, conſulted with Augures, offered ſacrifices: This gave him a reputation of piety with a people as much infidel as him ſelf: Why did not Conſtantine purſue the ſame ways: Why did he ſet the ſign of the Croſs on his Standards, eſteemed fatal and of ill preſage in the minds of the moſt part of his army? What favour might he then expect from Chriſtians? Would he draw treaſures from them? They were deſpoiled of all. Pretended he to raiſe huge armies of them for his ſervice? They were ſo cut down, that one onely month ſaw ſeventeen thouſand heads upon the ground. Did he perſwade himſelf there was much ſtrength in their religion? They were all either maſſacred, maimed, or baniſhed. Did he look for counſel? They were men eſteemed void of learning or policy. Did he hope for credit? They were trampled under foot like dirt in the ſtreets.

Why then did a man reputed of ſo excellent judgement, confine his intereſts to theſe miſerable creatures? He ſtood in need for the accõmodation of his affairs of a Roman Senate, and it was Pagan. He wanted good Captains, & they were in a manner all Gentiles. He muſt have Forts, and they all held for ancient ſuperſtition. What doth he go about? And yet behold in a time wherein his affairs leaſt ſeemed to require it, he takes the marks of Chriſtianitie, and with them haſteneth to aſſail the Army of Maxentius, compoſed of a hundred threeſcore and ten thouſand footmen, and eighteen thouſand horſe, he himſelf according to the relation of thoſe, who lived in the very ſame time, having in this conflict, but very ſmall troops. From whence cometh it, that he in ſo ſhort a time, and with ſo few people, defeated ſuch formidable powers? Not to bely the matter, had theſe men been but earthen ſtatues, they might make reſiſtance. Had they but been an army of ſheep, they might weary the ſouldiers of Conſtantine to cut their throats. From whence comes it they were ſo ſoon defeated? From whence comes it that Maxentius ſo baſely betook himſelf to the ſtratagem of a bridge, which he prepared for his enemie? From whence comes it that a Roman Senate, which had confirmed ſo many Edicts againſt the Croſs, a people bred up in the horrour of the crucified, ſhould readily receive a man, who entred into Rome with the Croſs, and the name of the crucified upon his Standard? From whence comes it, that on the triumphall Arch dedicated to him, he would have no mention of Roman Gods? At the leaſt, according to the counſel of the Sectaries of the Florentine Secretary, he ſhould diſſemble his religion, he ſhould give way to time, he ſhould make himſelf outwardly a Diocletian, and inwardly, if needs he would, a Conſtantine. Will any one ſay, he was at that time a man victorious, who came to give law, and not receive it? But who ſaw not, that his fortune being as yet in the bud, he was to walk towards Empires as on thorns, fearing above all things to irritate in the change of Religion the principall ſpirits of the Eaſt and Weſt, who were paſſionately affected towards their Sect? I affirm Maxentius the Defendor of the Gods, ruinated himſelf by his ill government. Lycinius was yet on foot; and verily Lycinius an ancient ſouldier, who had waxed old in arms, and had never arrived to the Empire but by his valour, drew in the end all the partie of Gentiliſm, with forces innumerable both by ſea and land, which ſeemed able to ſwallow many worlds. He made uſe of the counſell of Monſieur Machiavel, he proteſted he took arms for the defence of the Gods and Altars of ancient Rligion, againſt a man who ſought to introduce a barbarous Sect into the World. Was not this a matter very ſpecious in the times, when the ſuperſtition of Gentiles was exalted by Edicts of Emperours to the higheſt degree of honour? Lycinius notwithſtanding is beaten, overthrown, ruined, both by ſea and land, although he were one of the moſt inventive in the ſubtilities of the art millitary, of the moſt reſolute for execution, and the moſt ſtubborn, to make up again a deſperate fortune.

O you Nobilitie, what ſhall we ſay hereupon? Muſt we not confeſs there is one God in heaven, and not any other God, but that of Conſtantine, who giveth Kingdoms, eſtabliſheth Scepters, and cementeth Crowns? If all this proceeding had been an extravagancie of paſſion, we might attribute one part of it to the hazard of Wars, the other to the valour of Souldiers, and the laſt, to the heat of the firſt encounters. But to hold an Empire thirtie and one years, with ſo great an equality, ſo accompliſhed a felicitie, ſo ſecure a peace, from the time of his laſt conqueſt, what may one anſwer to this?

From whence is it, that Conſtantine having forſaken ancient Rome, of purpoſe to build a fair Citie, where God might ſincerely be honoured, and adored, without any commixtion of Gods or Altars of Gentils, which he as yet through neceſſity muſt tolerate at Rome, yet nothing was changed in the Weſt? Was there want of men to undertake it? The greateſt of the Senate were in a manner all Pagans. Were there not people enough to make revolts? They were as much inclined thereunto as ever. Were there not ſouldiers to ſupport the enterprizes of thoſe who had a deſire to rebel? There was as many and perhaps more at that time, as at any time before. From whence then proceeded this ſweet tranquilitie, but that the great Angel-Protector of Conſtantine, given unto him by the living God, held one foot on the Eaſt, and another on the Weſt, to protect, preſerve, and honour a man, who had defended, maintained and reverenced true Religion.

Oh Nobilitie, let no man go about to confine your hearts to theſe ſlender and wretched policies, which ruine all generoſitie. Whileſt your Anceſtours ſincerely honoured the God of Conſtantine, of Charlemain, and S. Lewis, and whileſt they with all ſinceritie manured the pietie of their predeceſſours, without any mixture of novelties, factions, and ſubtilities, they flew like Eagles to the conqueſt of Provinces, and made their arms reſplendent almoſt in ſo many places, as the ſun enlightneth with his rays. Now they endeavour to perſwade you, that following a pettie ſpirit of wrangling, which ſubmitteth religion to intereſts, you ſhall make up to your ſelves golden fortunes; when indeed experience daily teacheth you, they are but of gilded ice, and are melted under the lightening of Gods juſtice. Advice to the Nobility.

Open your eys to that, which I preſent you in this hiſtorie; behold yet, if you pleaſe as you paſs along, the ſequel and proceeding of the ſucceſſours of Conſtantine. He left three ſons, the one called by his own name, the other Conſtantius, from the name of his Grand-father, and the third Conſtans. Conſtantine and Conſtans lived not long: the whole Empire which was divided between three, was re-united under the power of Conſtantius, who verily was an enemie to the ſuperſtitions of Gentiles, for which God gave him in recompence great victories againſt the Tyrant Magnentius. Succeſſours of Conſtantine.

But this unfortunate Prince, inſtead of following the ſame belief of his father, haſtened to throw himſelf violently into the novelties of the Arians; whereof Ammianus the Hiſtorian, who was a Pagan ſouldier, very aptly reprehendeth him, ſaying, he had done himſelf great wrong, for that inſtead of preſerving Chriſtian Religion in its ſimplicity, he had imbroiled and falſified it with noveliſm, uſing more perplexity to ſearch out ſubtilities, than gravitie to pacifie the Church: For he by this means, ſaith he, ſtirred up an infinite number of diſſentions, which he nouriſhed with diſputes and quirks of words; ſo that under his reign you ſhould never ſee Biſhops but riding poſt over the fields to hold Synods, thereby to draw all Chriſtendom to the Emperours party. This was the cauſe that there were almoſt no horſes nor Couriers to be found for the affairs of the Empire, ſo much were they imployed in voyages which were made for theſe goodly Councels.

He hath excellently well expreſſed in few words the nature of Conſtantius; for he was perpetually buſied in theſe litigious wranglings of the hereſie of Arians, aſſembling Conventicles of his falſe-Biſhops to condemn the Orthodox. From whence it came to paſs, that hated of men, and forſaken by God, he led a life full of jealouſies, ſuſpicions, diſturbances, and which is worſe, defiled with bloud and maſſacres.

In the end, having heard the news that Julian the Apoſtata his couſin, whom he had before declared Cæſar, was among the Gauls, and ſaluted Emperour, and having paſſed through Italy, came to preſent himſelf in Thrace, he went ſpeedily out to reſiſt him, and fell into ſuch deſperate furies, that on his way he was ſurpriſed with a ſharp feaver, which ſo broiled his body, that they durſt no more touch him than a burning fornace. This malady in a few days bereaved him of ſoul and Empire, leaving the one to the judgment of God, and the other to Julian.

Behold what became of this deplorable Prince, in the one and fourtieth year of his age, for having betrayed the Religion of his father: the gravitie and modeſty obſerved in him, which was the cauſe he was never ſeen to ſpit nor wipe his noſe, nor turn his head in publick, nothing availing him to lengthen out his life. Julian, Nephew and ſon-in-law of great Conſtantine, for he eſpouſed Helena ſiſter of Criſpus, took inſtantly the government of the whole Empire upon him, and would needs overthrow all that which his uncle had done in matter of Religion.

Julian with the qualities which Machiavel giveth a Prince had ill ſucceſs.

Let us conſider a little without paſſion the notable extravagancies of this ſpirit, who contemning the pietie of Conſtantine, ſought to eſtabliſh himſelf by all the ways, which the poor policie of earth ſuggeſteth to thoſe who have renounced heaven. To ſpeak to the purpoſe, we muſt affirm, this man had all the qualities which Monſieur Machiavel gave to his Prince. If diſſimulation may be uſed for a Kingdom, never was a lamb more mild than this young man at the Court of Conſtantius, to take all ſuſpicions from him, which he conceived of his near allies; and although he already entertained moſt miſchievous thoughts in the matter of Chriſtian Religion, he ſo covered them by the publick profeſſion he made of it, that the very Eunuchs who had all charge moſt narrowly to prie into his actions upon this point, obſerved nothing therein which tended to alteration in Religion. But far otherwiſe, about the age of ſixteen, he cauſed his hair to be cut, and vowed himſelf to the Church, as a Prince moſt Religious, who thought little on the Empire of the world.

And after, when he was ſent into France, although he uſed ſtrange ſuperſtitions and witch-crafts, riſing up in the night to pray to Mercury, to whom he dedicated much devotion; yet did he alſo notwithſtanding celebrate the feaſts with Chriſtians: and that which beſides is more conſiderable, when he was proclaimed Emperour, though he had an enraged deſire towards it, and that all this ſolemnitie, was throughly agreed upon by his cunning, yet feigned he to have all the averſions in the world againſt it, and cauſed himſelf to be carried to the throne as one would draw an unruly ſacrifice to the ſlaughter.

What ſpirit was evermore diſſembled than this mans? If, as ſaith the Secretary, a Prince ſhould endeavour to have virtues in apparence which may render him acceptable in publick, though he be not to take much pains to have them in effect, never did any man better put on the mask of much honeſty than this. For in the fortune of Emperour, he would ſeem like the moſt mortified Stoik of all that Sect; ſhewing himſelf ſo chaſt, that never might you hear one ſole misbecomming word fall from his lips; ſo ſober, that he gave an example to the moſt auſtere Monks; ſo negligent in the neatneſs of his body, that he much gloried to ſee vermine run up and down on his beard, which he wore very long to play the Philoſopher in all kinds; ſo patient, that he many times endured all ſorts of affronts and ſharp words from mean men, no more moved thereby to anger than a ſtone.

If it muſt needs be, according to the ſaid Maxims, that a Prince to procure eſtimation, ſhould perform great enterprizes, this man was no ſooner ſeated in his Throne, but that he practiſed admirable policies, and haſtened to make war on the Perſians, to imitate Alexander the Great, to whoſe virtues he aſpired. If needs ſome remarkable act muſt be done in the beginning, he at his entrance profeſſing Paganiſm, repealeth the Biſhops, which Conſtantius a Chriſtian Prince had baniſhed. If liberallitie muſt be uſed, this man gave all, and ſaid his treaſures were better among his friends, than with himſelf. If excellent Maſters in every art and ſcience are to be cheriſhed, this man did it with much paſſion.

From whence then proceedeth it, that with all thoſe goodly parts of Machiavels Prince, he hath ſo little proſpered, reigning but one year and ſeven months, and dying ſtrucken with a blow from heaven, which the Pagans themſelves confeſs to be ignorant from whence it came; and dying in a frenzy, which cauſed him to fill his hand with his own blood, and cry, Thou, O Galilean haſt overcome, and leaving in his death a memory of his name ſo odious to all poſterity.

The poor man forſaking the way already ſo happily beaten by Conſtantine, unluckily haſteneth to joyn amity with thoſe wiſe Politicians, who had all Plato's Common-wealth, who eſteemed themſelves the moſt accurate in the government of the World, who promiſed him by theſe wiles he practiſed, the abſolute extirpation of Chriſtianity, and to make him the moſt awfull and moſt glorious of all the Emperours of the world. And I beſeech you, what became in the end of all theſe promiſes, but dreams, illuſions, and vapours.

Conſtantius under the holy Philoſophy of the croſs, reigned more than thirty years. Conſtantine waged great wars, had great victories, great triumphs, was attended by great Councels, great Cities. Conſtantine left a Religion, ſo eſtabliſhed, that the malice of an Arian ſon, nor the policy of a new Apoſtata could not extinguiſh it. Conſtantine never entred into any battel where he came not off victorious. And Julian in the firſt war he undertook upon the beginning of his empire, confounded all his Army, led his Captains to ſlaughter, was himſelf ſlain as a victime. And the ſage Politicians which he ever had in his army, inſtead of Prieſts and Biſhops, drew him to death, to ſerve as a ſpectacle of confuſion for the one, and matter of mirth for the other,

May we not wel ſay, O Nobilitie, that theſe ſpirits who divert your hearts from the chaſt beliefs of your Anceſtors, from the puritie of faith, the candor of a good conſcience, to invenom them with a doctrine doctrine of impietie, policy, and treachery, under colour of humane wisedom, are the plagues of States, the ruins of houses, and the fatal hands to annihilate greatnes.

I will not infer for a necessary conclusion, that all such as live in the fear of God and in integrity, must ever have pleasing successes according to the world, in the manage of temporal affairs: this is not a thing absolutely promised to us by God. We have not sold him our fidelity and Christianity upon such condition, that he should still afford us the bread of dogs, and favour us with felicities, which he imparteth to Sarazens and Mores. I know good Christian Princes may be afflicted, sometime for the punishment of certain sins, which they with too much indulgence have permitted; sometime for a trial and spectacle of their virtue; sometime to teach us there is another life for the children of God, since they in this same are ill entreated, sometime for causes which the providence of God involveth as in a cloud, replenished with obscurity and darkness. Yet shall you find in reading histories either divine or humane, that all those who have progressed on with true feeling of God, and with the lightenings of integrity, and touches of a good conscience, which nature provideth for every man, have commonly been the most expected, the best beloved, the most happy, and most permanent.

Aug. lib. 5. de civitate Dei cap. 24.

And to speak with S. Augustine, would not they ever be most happy, if they had no other felicity, but to be just in their commands, moderate in their fortunes, humble among services, modest in praises, and faithful servants of God, in Empires? Wherein consisteth the happiness of man, if it be not to fear God, so to fear nothing els? If it be not to love a Kingdom, where we no longer may dread to have companions? If it be not to pardon injuries through clemency, and not revenge crimes, but by justice? If it be not to be chast in the liberty of pleasures? If it be not rather to command over our own passions, than Cities and Provinces?

Behold the principal felicity of great Constantine, which you ought, O Noble Men, to take for your model. Do in your own houses what he acted in an Empire: establish there constantly the fear and love of God. Banish vices, as he from his City of Constantinople the Temples and Victims of false Gods; that the honour of the Cross may set a seal on all your thoughts, all your counsels, all your enterprizes; that your examples may serve to God as amber, and adamant, to attract so many hearts of straw and iron, as are now in the world, to the love of virtue, that these duels of gladiatours, condemned by Constantine, may be the horrour of your thoughts, and detestation, of your hearts; that devotion, chastity, humility, patience, charity, virtues so familiar to this great Monarch, may make an honourable warfare, which shall possess your heart; and that all of them may there reign, each one in particular with as ample Empire, as all of them in general.

THE STATES-MAN.

TO STATES-MEN.

SIRS,

SInce God hath put the government of people, justice, and most important affairs into your hands, he hath likewise raised you upon a high degree of honour, to be looked on in offices, no otherwise than as stars in the firmament.

Your dignities are obligations of conscience, that bend like the chains of MEDÆA, and scortch weak souls in purple and gold: but which on the other part afford to generous spirits a perfect lustre of Divinitie. The more light a bodie enjoyeth, say the learned, so much the more ought it to have of participation and favourable influences, for objects which are in a much lower degree than it. So likewiſe muſt we neceſſariely ſay, that your qualities, which grant you nearer approaches to the ſource of greatneſs, and embelliſh you with the rays of the majeſtie of a Prince, do moſt particularly oblige you to all the great virtues, which concern the Weal-publick.

It oftentimes happeneth, that thoſe who flie from charges and affairs under pretext of tranquilitie of ſpirit, if they be not well rectified therein, find inſtead of repoſe a ſpecious ſluggiſhneſs; and thoſe, who make profeſſion of arms, if they take not good heed, ſuffering all the innocencie of the Golden Age to languiſh, make themſelves virtues of the iron Age: but your conditions, which have a certain temperance of a life more ſweet, accompanied with laudable employments, open the way to you, which maketh and crowneth merits. Yet is there need of a ſoul very able to preſerve it ſelf ſincerely in charges, among ſo many corruptions, and of a heart perfectly purified, to link it wholly to the intereſts of God, who with three fingers of his power ſupporteth Eſtates and Empires.

That is the cauſe, why I offer this Treatiſe, not ſo much to give Maxims of State, of which there are always enough to be found; as ſometimes to awaken a good conſcience, which is a true ray reflected from the eternall Law, to the end that among ſo many temptations of Honour, and ſuch burdens of affairs, it may not loſe any part of its vigour. If you deign to ſpend ſome hours of your leaſure hereon, it perhaps wil not be unprofitable; for at leaſt that will let you ſee a States-man, as rare as a Phenix, and as pure as an Angel. But if this conſideration furniſh you with any good thoughts for your perfection, I ſhall eſteem my ſelf well reçompenſed for the ſervice, which I in this work have vowed to your eminent qualities:

THE STATES-MAN.

The first SECTION.

The excellencie of Politick Virtue.

I Have ever made account of the division of virtues which the Platonists use, when they call the one Purgative, the other Illuminative, the third Civil, and the last Exemplar.

Purgative virtues are those, which give to our souls the first tincture of sanctity. For they take our heart, wholly possessed as it is yet with earthly passions, and discharge it from so many imperfections which ordinarily corrupt nature, to give it a tast of heavenly things. Illuminative afford us day-light, when we have vanquished the agitations of sense, & establish us in the sweetness of some repose, where we begin to behold the entrances, progresses, and issues of the world wherein we are placed, and the course of this great Comedy, called life. The Civil draw us out of our selves, to apply us to our neighbour, and to render every one his due according to his degree, in the good conversion betwixt man and man. Exemplar proceed much further in perfection; for they expose themselves in publick, to serve as models for others, and appear in charges and dignities, in the government of Kingdoms, Provinces, Cities, and Communalties. This is it which I call here the virtue of a States-man, taking the word generally, not only for those who are engaged in the manage of Monarchies, Sovereignties, and Re-publicks; but also for such as exercise justice, and other principal charges of civil life. We must affirm this politick virtue which maketh true States-men, is a rare piece; and as it were the cream and most purified part of wisdom, seeing that not contenting it self with a lazy knowledge of virtue, it laboureth to build, adorn, and establish the civil world by the maintenance of justice, without which in the ampleſt Kingdoms are the greatest thefts.

Excellentibus ingeniis citius defuerit ars, quâ civem regant, quàm quâ hostem superent. Tit. Liv. lib. 2.

If the world be a harp, as saith the eloquent Sinesius, justice windeth up the strings, stirreth the fingers, toucheth the instrument, giveth life to the airs, and maketh all the excellent harmonies. If the world be a Musick-book, framed of days and nights, as of white and black notes, justice directeth, and composeth. If it be a ring, justice is the diamond. If it be an eye, justice is the soul. If it be a Temple, justice is the Altar. All yieldeth to this virtue, and as it is enchaced in all laudable actions, so all laudable actions are incorporated in justice. It is an engine much more powerful in effect than was that of Archimedes in idæa; for it doth that in Kingdoms, which this man could never so much as imagine in his mind, though ambitious enough in inventions. It maketh, I say, Heaven to descend on earth, and earth to mount up to Heaven: Heaven to descend, in introducing a life wholly celestial in the uncivil conversation of men; earth to mount up, in drawing it from dreggs and corruption of a covetous and bloudy life, to enlighten it with rays of a prudent knowledge, to embelish it with virtues, diversifie it with beauties, and settle it in the center of repose.

D. Tho. 22. q 58. Justicia legalis, præclarior omnibus moralibus quia bonum commune præeminet bono singulari. Tertull. 2. adversus Marcion. Bonitas Dei operata est mundum, justitia modulata est.

God maketh so much account of an honest man, recommended to the government of others, that having chosen Noah to command over onely seaven souls, shut up in the Ark as in a moving prison, he calleth him his Heart: for to say truly, we must have the heart of God, to bring forth counsels sufficiently able to save men, and to be in the same instant the mouth of God, to pronounce the Oracles of truth. God asketh Job, who is the man on earth that shall make the musick of Heaven? To which I would willingly answer: It is a good Justicier. For in what consisteth this harmony of Heaven? We are not in my opinion to imagine it according to the dotages of some Philosophers, who of it have made unto themselves a celestial musick composed of voyces and sounds formed by the mutual encounter of those admirable Globes. The harmony of Heaven is nought else, but the good order of the sun, the moon, stars, day, and night, and seasons, which daily progress along with a regular pace, and measured motion, not erring in the least point.

Genes. 8. v. 27. according to the Hebrew text.

Job. 8. 33. Ordinem Cœli.

This order, which is so excellent and divine in Heaven, is introduced upon earth by the means of justice, which guideth and governeth all the actions of men within the circuits and limits of duty, so sagely and divinely, that he who would observe so many singular laws which books recommend unto us, should quickly make earth become a little Heaven. For the same reason Origen interpreting this passage of Isay, where God saith, Heaven is his Throne, sheweth, that the Paradise and Heaven of God upon earth is justice; from whence it cometh to pass, that such as use it, as they ought, are wholly celestial in science, life, and conversation. Was it not this consideration which drew the Babylonians to build the Palace, where judgements were given, in the forme of Heaven; for the very stone-work was of Saphirs, which are of celestial colour, and in the seelings, clouds were counterfeited, and in those clouds certain birds, reputed as messengers of justice, as if they had been delegated to see the deportments of men in discharge of their offices, and to advise them, that giving judgement on earth, they must ever have an eie and an ear in Heaven.

Isay. 66. Cœlum mihi sedes est. Efficiuntur sedes Dei, facti prius conversatione & peritia cœlestes. Orig. Philostr. l. 1. c. 18.

I also discover this by another observation of Scripture; for it teacheth me, that the brave Princess Debora surnamed the Bee, judged the people, and held her Assizes under a Palm: or as it is probable, after the reason both of the one and other were heard, she took a leaf of this tree, and gave it to him who had the right. And from this practise is derived the custom to plant Palms at the gates of great Advocates and Justiciers, which was likewise observed in ancient Rome.

Now why think you would God have the first sessions of justice to be held under Palms, but to signifie that which Philo speaketh of, that as the Palm beareth his heart and strength in the top, so good judges direct their whole understanding and affections to heaven, living perpetually as in the presence of the Divinitie, or else, that as the virtues of the Palm are innumerable, so the excellencies of justice are infinite?
